ARGENTINA has made a trade pact with Spain. It will largely increase its exports of wheat, meat, and other foodstuffs in exchange for "manufactured goods, machinery, and chemical products." The pact also provides for the establishment of an air route between Madrid and Buenos Aires, though the plans for that have not been perfected yet. Our State Department hopes—for hoping is an essential by-product of appeasement—that the air line won't materialize. It knows that an air line from Spain to Argentina would be either a German or an Italian enterprise since Spain has no means, financial or industrial, to start air lines. But shipping facilities will certainly be increased, and goods will begin to flow to Spain, and thence—? Well, it is hoped in Washington that Argentina's wheat and beef will not feed the armies of Adolf Hitler. But if they should, what could the United States do about it? It would hardly be good form even to ask Acting President Castillo or Generalissimo Franco where those foodstuffs were going. Both are neutrals in the war, and both are friends of the United States.

It wouldn't be polite, and yet when Archibald MacLeish, chief of the Office of Facts and Figures, announced the other day that the Japanese embassy in Madrid was using "technically neutral Spain" as headquarters for propaganda against the United States, a fleeting wonder must have passed through the minds of our policy-makers. What, they must have asked themselves with puckered brow, what the hell is Spain's fake neutrality worth anyhow? And they may have recalled the fact that Nazi agents in several Latin American countries, instead of packing up their short-wave sets and heading for home after the Rio conference, are carrying on political warfare as usual through Franco's embassies and consulates. An instance was revealed just the other day through the arrest in Rio of a Nazi spy. The spy, one Walter Menze, gave the office a report of his activities in the course of which he said, "This month I received money from the hands of Herr Klock, formerly of the German embassy, who now works as a member of the auxiliary staff of the Spanish embassy." The report was printed in O Globo of Rio on February 19, in case the State Department would like to check it. Another employee of the dissolved German embassy staff in Rio has also moved over to Franco headquarters; his name is von Cassel. But Vargas is our friend—an even closer friend than Castillo—and so it is unlikely that the State Department will inquire how it happens that Señor Raimundo Fernandez Cuesta, the Spanish ambassador in Rio, now shelters under his neutral wing Nazi diplomats who Mr. Welles fondly hoped would be ousted when Brazil ended its relations with Germany last month. Fernandez Cuesta, incidentally, was one of the chief organizers of the Spanish Phalanx.

The State Department may find some satisfaction in Vargas's decision to place German and Italian property in the care of a custodian following the sinking of four Brazilian ships by Axis U-boats. Perhaps, too, it is pleased by the overwhelming popular feeling against the Axis which took the form of riots and mob attacks on German stores in Rio de Janeiro. But the Brazilian government has announced that for the present it has no intention of either arming ships or declaring war. The dictator has solemnly proclaimed a state of emergency so that he may exercise full executive powers; but since he has exercised them right along anyhow, the gesture is not impressive. For all his large pretensions of solidarity with the United States and the Allied cause, he will play a game of watchful waiting just as long as he can. Democratic Brazilians living in New York are convinced that the riots were as much aimed at Vargas and the pro-Nazis in his government as at the Axis.

As for Castillo, his new pact with Franco links him even more closely than before to Hitler. The delegation sent by the Franco government to arrange the details of the accord is headed by a prominent member of the Spanish Phalanx, Eduardo Aunós, who knows Argentina well and can be trusted to do a good job for his masters in Madrid and Berlin. For Hitler has moved quickly and intelligently to take advantage of the chief loophole in the Rio agreement—Castillo's refusal to break off relations with the Axis. Argentina's trade agreement with Spain is Hitler's answer to Rio. By one masterly stroke Franco is assured of relief, the Axis of new sources of necessary foodstuffs, and the Argentine producers of grain and meat of a market for their surpluses. An important breach is made in the British blockade of Europe, while Argentina becomes an even more active center of Nazi intrigue in this hemisphere. The River Plate is an open mouth leading into the body of South America. Ships that take food to Spain can carry back fresh supplies of Nazi agents and of propaganda material for the Phalanx to distribute throughout the continent.

It is said in Washington that Mr. Welles is worried about the Phalanx and is "watching" it. But while Mr. Welles watches, the Phalanx works. In Mexico, for example, according to a dispatch by Harold Callender printed in the New York Times last Sunday, the Phalanx is financed by Spanish nationals to the extent of 200,000 pesos a month. Mexican officials consider it more important as an agent of the Axis than the German colony itself, "for the Phalangists speak the language of Mexico and can more readily conceal their anti-American activities." "These Spaniards," says Mr. Callender, "can travel to and from the United States. [This is a curious fact in view of the State Department's refusal to permit Spanish Republicans even to pass through the United States on their way to Mexico.] One is said to have made recently an extensive tour of American factories and to have sent a report to General Franco. The Phalanx is even believed to have a military section. Its leaders do not conceal their sympathy for the Axis; yet Spanish Fascists are not technically members of the Axis and cannot be lumped with other Axis agents by the authorities. This naturally enhances their value to their masters." But nobody in Mexico, or in Washington, knows what to do about the Phalanx, according to Mr. Callender, because Spain is not an Axis power.

The sham neutrality of Spain and its diplomatic relations with the United States make possible all these pro-Axis maneuvers. The failure of appeasement is evident; what ordinary Americans cannot understand is the refusal of their government—a war-time government—to abandon this disastrous policy.

Donald Nelson Has Chosen

BY I. F. STONE

Washington, March 15

THE destiny of the American people remains in flabby hands. The navy is still losing ships and the dollar-a-year men are still losing time. The losses off Java, added to the losses at Pearl Harbor, bring closer the day when foreign troops may set foot on our soil, but too many of the men in key positions here do not actually realize that there is a war on. The resignation of Robert R. Guthrie as head of the War Production Board's textile, clothing, and leather-goods division indicates how little difference the change in name from OPM to WPB, the speeches of Nelson, and the Pearl Harbor disaster have made.

Guthrie goes because industrial mobilization under Donald M. Nelson is still in the hands of men who do not want to mobilize industry, who want to go on making radios and refrigerators and washing machines and typewriters and carpets. When Nelson became head of the War Production Board he said, "Heads will roll." But the first to tumble is that of one of the few dollar-a-year men here whose heart was in an all-out effort. In a conflict between an all-outer and the business-as-usual crowd, Nelson let the latter win, accorded Guthrie the scantiest hearing. I hope the Truman committee will give this affair a thorough airing so that the country can judge for itself whether Nelson has what it really takes to do the job.

Nelson is a very fine and likable man, modest and sincere, open to suggestion and criticism, genuinely devoted to his country. There is much already to chalk up in his favor. He forced through the plan for labor-management production committees last week over last-minute objections from the War and Navy departments; both are dominated by the mentality of the National Association of Manufacturers and regard these committees literally as part of a plan to "Sovietize America." Nelson's appointment of Robert R. Nathan, Thomas Blaisdell, and Fred Searles as a three-man planning board and overseeing eye is one of the most encouraging moves made in production in some time. Searles is a conservative from the ranks of industry, Nathan and Blaisdell are young New Dealers, but all three are all-outers. Nelson has begun on the heartbreaking task of infiltrating new men and new ideas into the Army-Navy procurement services, whose conventional-minded attitude is one of the most serious obstacles to the war effort. These steps all represent the beginning, though only the beginning, of progress. If it were not for the terrible tempo of events, we could afford to sit back with patience and wait for results.

Unfortunately time is with the Axis. In the East the Japanese are accomplishing in weeks what it will take years of fighting to undo. This spring will see a gigantic effort by Berlin and Tokyo to encircle Britain, Russia, and the United States and cut them off from one another. In this context the rate of industrial mobilization is dreadfully sedate. A glance back at the dates is instructive. Pearl Harbor was bombed on December 8. It was not until January 20 that Nelson ordered automobile production ended by February 1. Much of the force was taken from this order two days later when the War Production Board allowed automobile manufacturers to triple last year's production of parts during the first half of this year. Parts production will not end until June 30. On January 23 the WPB further weakened the drive for conversion of the industry by permitting the manufacturers to build 34 per cent more trucks this March than in March of last year.

Even slower has been the move toward mobilization of other major consumer-goods industries which have been absorbing strategic materials and using machines that can be turned to war work. It was not until February 23 that production of domestic mechanical refrigerators was ordered discontinued. The order does not take effect until April 30, and "nothing in this order shall be construed to prohibit or limit the production of replacement parts." So long as the companies can go on making parts, they will be half-hearted about conversion.

Last year the radio and phonograph industry consumed 2,100 tons of aluminum, 10,500 tons of copper, 290 tons of nickel, and 70,000 tons of steel. But it was not until March 7, three months after Pearl Harbor, that the WPB finally ordered manufacture of radios and phonographs discontinued. The order does not take effect until April 22, and the industry will not cease production entirely for some time after that. It may complete radio sets on which it began assembly work "on or before April 22," and after the assembly work is finished it may go on making parts. The washing-machine industry is another that is consuming materials which literally mean lives. Yet it was not until March 12 that the WPB issued a "proposed order" which would end production of washing machines by large manufacturers on April 15 and by small manufacturers on May 15. Here, again, they may go on making parts.

These are dry and humdrum details, but I do not apologize for dwelling on them. Materials which should be going into tanks and planes and guns, machines which could be turning out armament, are involved. In the prosaic words of these orders is the cryptogram where freedom's future may already be written. Wars are not won by this dilatory, half-hearted kind of industrial mobilization. Continued production of radios and refrigerators and washing machines and of a whole list of consumer goods yet to be banned is a crime against the people of this country and their allies, and it is a crime which must rest ultimately on the conscience of Donald M. Nelson. Why does he permit it?

Nelson's code for dollar-a-year men is a farce. He has said that no dollar-a-year man will be permitted to pass on matters affecting his own company, but they pass all the time on matters affecting their own industries. Guthrie, a conservative business man who soon found himself allied only with Hillman's labor people and Henderson's brain trusters, won the hatred of the industry crowd because of his fight for conversion. Though a quarrel with greedy textile interests seems to have been the immediate cause of his going, the most important enemy he made was Philip D. Reed, chief of the Bureau of Industry Branches and chairman of the board of General Electric. General Electric makes radios, and Guthrie's leadership in the fight to end production of radios was the real beginning of his downfall. This is the second time that Reed has played a part in obstructing the war effort in the interests of his own industry. As William L. Batt's deputy in the old materials branch, he fought expansion of steel and aluminum, and he should have been sent back to his board of directors long ago. The disturbing part of the Guthrie affair is that it was Reed and not Guthrie who won Nelson's support.

Industrial mobilization, as run by the Reeds, is full of loopholes. The WPB still does not know the full amount of the precious raw materials hoarded in the inventories of industry. Production of planes is retarded by lack of aluminum, and production of tanks is retarded by lack of steel plates, but there is no will ruthlessly to invade the stockpiles of big business and make hidden metals available for war. What we have in the WPB is "self-regulation" of business with all its inevitable evils, the same subordination of our country's safety to private interests that helped ruin France. Must the Japs land before we wake up?

Routes to Victory

BY DONALD W. MITCHELL

WITH the conquest of Java Japan completed another step in its progress toward hegemony of the Pacific. The vital areas of the western Pacific and eastern Asia are now all in its hands. Although its conquests have not been consolidated and guerrilla resistance may be bothersome for some time, Japan has already won the main battle. Yet notwithstanding the disastrous and prestige-shattering defeats they have suffered, the United Nations have not lost the war. How, then, can they turn their defeats into ultimate victory?

By driving a wedge through the war area Japan has split the Allied forces into two segments, and by reason of its control of the Indies and Malaya, enjoys a stronger strategic position than ever before. It now can turn its attention either to the south against Australia or to the west against India, or in both directions at once. In the approaching Battle for India the United States is not in a position to give large-scale aid. We have already sent technical advisers and are dispatching planes to bolster the somewhat shaky air superiority which the British have in Burma. Arms for large bodies of native troops probably represent a more profitable expenditure of merchant tonnage than would the transport of American troops. Of course we should be prepared greatly to increase our naval pressure against Japan should it withdraw large naval units for use in the Indian Ocean.

The defense of Australia and other British islands in the southwestern Pacific, on the other hand, should be regarded as definitely the responsibility of the United States. It will not be an easy task. Fighting planes and, very soon, gasoline will have to be transported by one of the longest lines of supply anywhere in the world. This line, however, has been rather well guarded by the establishment of bases in the months since December 7. And a considerable stiffening of Australia's depleted man-power by American troops has probably also been achieved; so far as possible the necessary food and other supplies for these men should be furnished by their host country in order to conserve shipping.

The United States cannot make its defense of Australia air tight because, if for no other reason, too much has already been lost elsewhere. The wild tropical coast of northern Australia, including Port Darwin, may easily be in Japanese hands by the time this article appears in print. The western coast is only less vulnerable. But southern and southeastern Australia, containing the bulk of the population, the industrial regions, and the sources of food supply should prove defensible. The United States had a three months' start in sending forces to this area, and southern Australia's enormous distance from Japan presents the enemy also with a hard problem in logistics. Further, American sea power can operate here without danger of aerial attacks from nearby bases; this risk apparently scared us out of trying to put naval reinforcements in the East Indies.

It would probably prove a mistake, nevertheless, to base our main Pacific war effort on Australia. Not only does it lack the necessary naval bases, but more important, to strike at the mainland of Japan effectively from the south would require us to undertake an intensely hard and expensive campaign in which, operating without adequate bases and against a better-armed enemy, we should have to reconquer everything previously lost. Australia must be defended as a source of supplies for sea and air raiders, but if it is possible we should get at Japan by some nearer way and force it to meet the unexpected rather than fight the type of war it chooses.

Two other routes of attack exist. Dutch Harbor in the Aleutians is only 1,400 miles from the nearest Japanese islands. The Great Circle route across the northern Pacific is thus the shortest road to Japan. To attack along this line we should have to capture and garrison bases across the northern Pacific much as Japan did in moving south. The initial steps would probably not be strenuously opposed, but as we approached the population centers of Japan we would be sure to encounter increasingly powerful resistance.

This northern route has the advantage of short distance, but it also has several drawbacks. Dutch Harbor is not a real naval base, and completely adequate facilities are not to be found nearer than Hawaii; the weather is extremely bad during a large part of the year; save for fisheries, Japan has few vital interests in the Far North. But the greatest difficulty is our need for better air-base facilities than those afforded by barren volcanic islands. Russia's Siberian bases, almost essential for success in this enterprise, will probably not be made available until our aid in Europe has started the decline of Hitler.

The most promising route by which to attack the Japanese islands lies immediately west of Hawaii. Our raids in the Marshalls and Gilberts, though intended to eliminate possible interference with the American transport line to New Zealand and Australia, probably had as a secondary objective the feeling out of some of the more formidable of the Japanese "stationary airplane carriers" which bar the way through the central Pacific. These islands would have to be captured, garrisoned, and developed as American outposts prior to any attempt to bring American sea and air power into reasonable proximity to Japan. It is a process that can be started from the south as well as the east, and the reduction of the Marshall and Caroline groups would at the same time make our southern supply lines much more secure. A successful campaign through the Pacific would put us in possession of island bases within comfortable bombing range of Japanese cities and especially Japanese lines of communication with the south. At some point in such a campaign we could confidently expect a decisive test of strength with the Japanese fleet. American victory would bring naval and air dominance and as a corollary the ability to recover territories previously lost. Even defeat could scarcely make the Allied position worse than it is now, with all initiative and control of the scene of operations in Japanese hands.

A serious Allied offensive presupposes several conditions. Both naval and air superiority are absolutely essential to success. Merchant shipping is an equally vital factor, since the transportation and supply of troops make enormous demands. We must also choose whether to take the offensive in the Pacific or in other theaters of war, since we are not prepared to launch attacks all along the line. Lastly, but this is vital, we must have sufficient moral toughness to pay the price of war, to risk heavy losses in return for valuable gains. It is an attribute which the Japanese have displayed markedly in this war.

Even if we cannot undertake a full-scale attack immediately, we should still employ offensive tactics. The naval and aerial attrition suffered by the Japanese has already been heavy. It must be maintained and extended to other areas closer to Japan proper. Because our bases are closer to the Japanese islands than Japan's are to our Pacific coast, we have an immense advantage in this type of war. Air raids can be made from carriers if we are willing to run risks. However, raids are at best a stopgap while we gather strength for a more serious effort.

Coughlin's New Capital

BY DONALD GRANT

Boston, March 15

BUNKER HILL, the Old North Church, and all the other proud relics of a time when a fierce love of freedom and democracy was flowering in New England take on an ironic symbolism these days as the poison of Nazism drifts through the crooked streets of Boston like a fog from the bay.

Before Pearl Harbor the Christian Front flourished among the Irish of South Boston, and America First found a blessing in the Back Bay. Occasionally the two met, as when an aristocratic dowager offered aid and comfort to Francis P. Moran, dapper young leader of the Christian Front. Moran held weekly meetings in Hibernian Hall, Roxbury, pounding Nazi propaganda down the throat of anyone who could be dragged in by the young toughs of the Christian Front. He showed the Nazi propaganda film "Victory in the West" more than once, with appropriate admonitions that all American boys in the army be told how impossible it was to stop the great German war machine. He cheered Lindbergh, cursed the Jews, and carried on campaigns to influence Congress with the aid of the franked envelopes of Senator D. Worth Clark, Senator Burton K. Wheeler, and Representative Stephen A. Day.

The Coughlin weekly, Social Justice, and the Brooklyn Tablet were sold at these meetings, as were the paper-bound volumes published by George Sylvester Viereck, recently convicted as a Nazi agent, under the imprint of Flanders Hall. When Moran turned his files over to the Boston police department, he still had 8,000 unsold Flanders Hall books. Also in his files were some interesting correspondence with Father Coughlin, Japanese propaganda, hundreds of propaganda leaflets published by the German Library of Information, and evidence of active collaboration with such notorious characters as George E. Deatherage of the Knights of the White Camellia, William Dudley Pelley of the Silver Shirts, Mrs. Elizabeth Dilling of the "Red Network," Charles B. Hudson, and Robert Edward Edmondson.

Moran was one of the first to run for cover after Pearl Harbor. Boston newspapers printed a few timid reports of Christian Front activities, and Moran agreed, at the request of Police Commissioner Joseph F. Timilty, to suspend his meetings. Since then he has devoted his time to the rather menial task of whipping up Boston circulation for Social Justice, which continues to be the chief inspiration of all the little Führers in America. The paper is hawked outside every Catholic church in the city, and 10,000 copies, it is estimated, are sold every week in the Boston area.

No one, however, should imagine that the defeatists in Boston—Irish or Yankee—became convinced of their error on December 7. On January 31 the Reverend Edward Lodge Curran of Brooklyn, spokesman for Father Coughlin in the East and friend of the Brooklyn Christian Front leader John F. Cassidy, came to Boston. When Moran attracted 500 people to his meetings he was doing very well. Father Curran, speaking under the auspices of the Knights of Columbus, drew an audience of 1,200 at Boston's Hyde Park High School. And instead of Christian Front toughs—or rather in addition to the old Christian Front crowd—Father Curran was flanked by two Boston priests, several important business men, and representatives of local units of the American Legion and Veterans of Foreign Wars.

His words, however, were the same old Christian Front line, slightly touched up for the occasion. The old isolationists—Lindbergh, Wheeler, Nye, Fish—were warmly defended; England and Russia were scorned; our own national leadership was ridiculed and discredited. The new emphasis was on the current press criticism of civilian defense. After repeating some of the more extreme instances, with elaborations, Curran demanded that our armed forces be brought back from the areas of conflict to protect our own shores.

This suggestion was to have an interesting sequel. The Boston Herald, through its featured columnist Bill Cunningham, was the next to raise the cry for home defense. Editorially, the Herald, both before and after Pearl Harbor, has strongly supported the war effort. Even now it regularly prints a "rumor clinic," which dissects the kind of half-truth about the war that is found frequently in Cunningham's column. The explanation lies in the fight for circulation in Boston's crowded newspaper field, which has led to some odd twists in Herald policies. The big morning circulation in Boston goes to the Post, which has its stakes deep in the Irish districts of South Boston and Charlestown. To get some of this circulation the Herald hired, at what is reported to be a fancy salary, the Post's sports columnist, Mr. Cunningham. Then the war broke out, and Cunningham became overnight an authority on grand strategy; his column appeared on the front page in the Sunday edition. There he beat his chest with super-patriotism but at the same time interlarded his fervor with poisonous bits of sucker bait for the dissenting Irish. Sometimes his column adjoined the Herald's "rumor clinic," but that didn't prevent Cunningham from including sly insinuations that he knew many dark secrets about the war. "I can write you a Pearl Harbor story that will turn your blood to ice water," he said. And "I heard a naval story concerning Boston harbor that would literally curl your hair."

On February 15 Cunningham described the New England coast as defenseless, with the German fleet just over a black horizon. He added:

> You ask, "What can I do?" . . .
> As an American and Bostonian you could register a ringing demand with your Congressman that something be done to give this city and nation of yours some protection.

Two days later Senator David I. Walsh made the following statement on the floor of the United States Senate:

> Yesterday and today my office has been flooded with letters from people in Massachusetts calling my attention to a newspaper article published in the Sunday press in which there was a dramatic exposé of the complete lack of necessary defenses for the city of Boston and the Massachusetts coast. It has stirred up the people in my section of the country. . . . I regret to have to say to them in reply that their plight is different only in degree from that of any other coastal city in the United States. . . . The day may come when we may have to bring back from the four corners of the world our depleted navy to be a source of defense for our own shores.

On the following Sunday Cunningham boasted in the Herald of having inspired Senator Walsh. The next day, February 23, Axis radio announcers repeated Senator Walsh's remarks with glee, and the Axis campaign to arouse a fear-born demand in America to recall our fleet from the combat zones was backed by a Japanese submarine attack on the West Coast. For the time being the attempt has failed. As the Japanese raider was shelling our coast, President Roosevelt told the American people that we would continue to carry the fight to the enemy wherever he could be found.

Boston defeatism, however, has not been downed. Father Curran returned to Boston on March 3, this time under the auspices of the Central Council of Irish Clubs, made up of people who trace their descent from ancestors in particular counties of Ireland. The meeting was held at the Hotel Bradford, and nearly 3,000 people attended. Sitting on the platform and applauding loudly were the Acting Mayor of Boston, the Mayor of Cambridge, a good number of Catholic priests—and the former doorkeeper of the now discontinued Christian Front meetings. Senator Walsh wasn't able to come, but he sent a telegram expressing regrets that he couldn't share the platform with "my very great friend, Dr. Edward Lodge Curran."

After a long oratorical denunciation of our allies, the Russians and the "totalitarian British," Curran developed the theme that we should keep our fighting forces at home. He felt sorry for MacArthur (Social Justice also sheds this tear), warned both labor and industry that the government was taking away their rights, said communism was the true enemy, and spoke with the bitterest scorn of the "four freedoms." His anti-Semitism was there, but it was veiled behind careful words. This was not a Christian Front meeting but a more subtle attempt to broaden the base of obstructionism.

A new theme, the glories of the "Irish race" and the need to keep alive the bitter memories of that "race," was merely suggested by Curran; its expansion was left to one of his Brooklyn henchmen, John Connolly, who was introduced as a representative of the Irish county groups in New York. The Irish, Connolly said, must stand as a "race" inside the American nation and as a "race" demand recognition and rights. It sounded like the Sudeten Germans talking in Prague, but Connolly kept a straight face. He said that plans were brewing for a national convention of the "Irish race" and that further announcements would be made later.

As I write, Father Curran is once more to the fore in Boston; this time as chief speaker on a program celebrating the anniversary of the evacuation of Boston by the British during the Revolutionary War. His appearance on this semi-official program drew vigorous protests from many Boston people, including members of the American-Irish Defense Association, trade unions, the American Defense-Harvard Group, and various church and civic organizations. The Veterans of Foreign Wars refused to participate in the program with Curran.

The reason why Boston has been tapped for the honor of leading the fight against the fight for freedom isn't hard to find. In the Boston area are half a million men, women, and children of Irish descent. In Ireland their ancestors were not always treated with consideration by the British, and when the Irish came to New England they met stiff stares from the descendants of the earlier emigrants from the United Kingdom. Boston Yankees continued to take the rich economic cream and to leave the skim milk to the newcomers. But an Irishman, given half a chance—and the Boston Irish have had considerably more than that—knows what to do in such a situation. Some of the Boston Irish have become so prosperous they have begun to act like Yankees. Many are poor, very poor. But any politician who doesn't make his obeisance to the shamrock in Boston just doesn't go to town on Election Day.

Why, then, this discontent on Boston Common? The answer goes back to Coughlin and Curran and Moran, and the constant stream of propaganda to which the Irish have been subjected. That the propagandists of the Axis are attempting to exploit the Irish Catholic minority in America in order to divide us cannot be doubted. Who consciously is furthering this design for conquest, and who is being driven along as a screen for the enemy, will come out at some later day.

Actually, as the Gallup poll shows, the vast majority of Irish Americans are so whole-heartedly committed to the war effort that they think Eire is wrong in its refusal to let British and American soldiers use Irish bases to guard Irish freedom. A clear majority think Ireland should go so far as to join the war and fight for its own freedom. The average American of Irish descent would be a lot happier if he were left alone to fight the Nazi enemy as an American, unchecked by the confusion-mongering Coughlinites. That some old Beacon Hill Yankees have descended from their America First dais to play a part in the Irish county associations is a sideshow about which we can afford to laugh, after the war is won. No self-respecting Irish American would listen to the high-hat America First crowd for a minute if their chatter didn't sound so much like Father Coughlin's.

For Father Coughlin is a Catholic priest. Father Curran is a Catholic priest. And whatever else you may say about him, the average Irish American is loyal to the Catholic church. If he is sorry for himself and repeats Social Justice nonsense, it is because he has been given his cue by Catholic priests.

Unfortunate as it may be, the Roman Catholic church is going to be held to account for Coughlin, Curran, and company by the American people. Any fine distinction drawn between a priest speaking for the church and a priest speaking as an irresponsible individual will be as beside the point in the final adding up of the score as it is meaningless to many Irish Americans in Boston today. If the official Catholic hierarchy in America doesn't know this, it is time someone told them. For the sooner the responsible Catholic authorities act on this knowledge the better will be the relations between their church and the rest of this nation in the years to come.

Headaches in Post-War Planning

BY MAXWELL S. STEWART

NOT all of Washington's feverish energies these days are going into plans for the prosecution of the war. In almost every department of government a few individuals are concerned with the vast problems that are bound to arise when peace comes. No one seems to pay much attention to the work these men are doing. But assuming we win the war, their decisions may determine the shape of the post-war world.

Responsibility for the general aspect of long-range post-war planning is in the hands of the National Resources Planning Board. But several of the regular government departments have advisers on post-war problems, and there is at least one unofficial group, made up of men from a number of agencies, which serves as a sort of intellectual clearing-house for the subject. In addition, the National Resources Planning Board has deliberately drawn industrialists, bankers, real-estate operators, builders, and other representatives of private business into its discussions, in the hope of forming as broad a base as possible for its work. The Board of Economic Warfare, headed by Vice-President Wallace, is the agency most directly concerned with post-war planning in the international field, but the State Department, the Commerce Department, and the Tariff Commission also want a share in the program-building.

It is only to be expected that the various individuals and agencies interested in the problem should have differing ideas about the post-war program. A basis of agreement is found in the feeling that something must be done to prevent a post-war economic breakdown and a repetition of the present conflict, but there is little else in the way of common ground. The differences are not primarily over minor matters such as methods of approach; they concern the basic nature of the post-war world.

We find, on the one hand, an articulate and influential group of New Dealers who would meet the post-war crisis with a broad and fairly rigid system of economic planning. Illustrative of the thinking of this group are two booklets recently prepared by Alvin H. Hansen of Harvard, a special economic adviser of the Federal Reserve System. Professor Hansen holds that a post-war depression can be avoided by a carefully planned program of combined consumer and government spending. The increase in consumer spending would be brought about by a reversal of the policies necessitated by the war. Taxes, particularly excise taxes, would be lightened, consumer credit would be expanded, and individuals would be encouraged to spend the money they are now saving for the purchase of defense bonds and even to dip into their war-time savings. The government spending would fall into two main categories: (1) expansion of the federal social-welfare program to include provision for family allowances, greater efforts in the field of nutrition, an enlarged public-health program, and a revised old-age-assistance scheme; and (2) aid in financing a gigantic urban redevelopment and housing program. Professor Hansen rejects as quite without foundation the notion that such a program would be difficult to finance. "Every cent expended, private and public," he points out, "becomes income for members of our own society. Costs and income are just opposite sides of the same shield."

Planning is also being urged as a solution for international anarchy. An important group that includes Vice-President Wallace feels that the control mechanisms developed during the war should be extended and adapted to meet the requirements of the post-war situation. Mr. Wallace would apply, for example, the "ever-normal-granary" principle to a large number of commodities and on a worldwide scale. This would mean the development of a permanent system of export quotas and an attempt to stabilize prices at a point fair to both consumers and producers. It would presumably be accompanied by a system of international credits not dissimilar to our present lend-lease arrangements.

As might be expected, these ideas of planning have met violent opposition both within and outside government circles. Washington is full of men who are convinced that Hansen's schemes are hopelessly impracticable. Some persons, particularly those linked with real-estate or building interests, regard them as dangerously socialistic. But criticism is not confined to the conservative camp. Many liberal New Dealers are frankly disturbed by the possibility of further extension of economic controls. In most cases their anxiety is based on practical experience rather than a nostalgic distaste for regimentation. They have seen an idealistic yet practical experiment in planning like the AAA become the football of pressure politics. And they have seen idealistic planners develop a vested interest in their own plans which has transformed them into the most dangerous type of bureaucrat.

Critics of Wallace's program for post-war reconstruction charge that it is a gigantic AAA, on an international scale. They challenge the assumption that the post-war world must be built on the patterns created during the war. All the existing instruments of control in the international field, they argue, are weapons of economic warfare, and as such are ill adapted to the requirements of a cooperative international society. And they maintain that controls of any type in the hands of the average government official would inevitably be used for nationalistic purposes.

The sharp line of cleavage between these two camps promises to cause many headaches before it is bridged. It is of course not surprising that many members of the staff of the Board of Economic Warfare support Wallace's views on the post-war world, while the economic staff of the State Department tends to oppose controls as inconsistent with Secretary Hull's reciprocal-trade policy. The State Department has never admitted that the Board of Economic Warfare is responsible for the shaping of post-war economic policies. It insists, on apparently sound grounds, that these policies should not be determined by any domestic agency but must grow out of negotiations with foreign countries. The recent lend-lease agreement with Great Britain and the one in prospect with China would seem to show that such negotiations fall within the province of the State Department. There is reason to believe that the area of responsibility of these two agencies will soon be more clearly delimited.

The larger issues of post-war reconstruction are not likely to be thus arbitrarily settled. But they are not incapable of settlement. The differences of opinion arise largely from a tendency to oversimplify the complex problems of present-day social and economic organization. Actually there can be no simple pattern for post-war reconstruction, and the effort to achieve one is responsible for much fruitless controversy. If the opponents of post-war planning could be brought around the same table with the planners, the two groups would be found much closer to agreement than is generally believed. Probably no one in a responsible position wishes to go back to the dog-eat-dog days of unfettered competition. On the other hand, few would deny that the laws of supply and demand perform a useful function within a restricted area. To be more specific, even the most hard-boiled real-estate operator will concede that some government aid is necessary if the public is to have adequate housing, and the most utopian planner sees the difficulties of large-scale government construction and operation. If the problem is to be solved, it will not be by seeking a generalized formula, applicable to the whole area of post-war reconstruction, but by deciding each situation on its merits.

Experience has shown, for example, that there is little opposition to the use of federal funds to support private building projects, and the United States Housing Authority has worked out a complicated but effective method of cooperation between federal and local authorities. The results, however, have not proved entirely satisfactory. The houses built for the low-income groups have, in general, been considerably better than those occupied by the majority of middle-income families, who could not qualify for the projects. And little or nothing has been done to meet the housing needs of the latter group. This has created a good deal of jealousy and friction throughout the country. In Detroit, where racial as well as economic differences were involved, rioting developed as a result of supposed favoritism. Problems of this type will obviously have to be cleared up if we are to count on a post-war building program to save us from a depression. If housing standards must be somewhat lowered in order to get the houses built in quantity and if the cooperation of real-estate interests must be obtained in order to get housing for the middle-income groups, these compromises must be worked out while there is yet time.

It may be argued that ultimately we shall have to choose between a completely planned society and a return to laissez faire. Possibly. But even the Soviet Union found it unwise to attempt too rapid an expansion of the area of its planned economy. As long as we retain private enterprise as the foundation stone of our economic structure, our planning cannot be complete. If private enterprise is to function efficiently, provision must be made not only for incentives in the form of profits but for a certain market-place flexibility in price, supply, and demand. In general, planning which concerns itself with broad fiscal policies and allocation of federal funds preserves this flexibility and does not interfere with private enterprise, while attempts to impose priorities or other quantitative controls, or to compete directly with private enterprise, lead to serious difficulties.

When we approach the problems of international reconstruction, the necessity for compromise between laissez faire and planning becomes more apparent. The failure of the efforts made during the first post-war period to reduce tariffs, restore the gold standard, and encourage private international lending indicates the futility of that type of approach. It is generally admitted today that the self-adjusting international economy which existed before World War I was an imperialist economy, based on the exploitation of backward countries. We cannot restore that system if we would. On the other hand, a system of controls such as were imposed during the period of frenzied economic warfare in the 1930's may be even more detrimental. Restrictions of any type tend to lower living standards, and, if competitive, to lay the basis for war.

Yet the removal of these artificial barriers to trade, although desirable, is bound to create new problems. Many of the countries devastated by the war are going to need help. Specialized raw materials, machinery, and equipment from the United States will be needed to develop the latent industrial resources of China, India, and the Latin American countries. In this situation we may very well find that we cannot produce enough to meet all needs. Years may be required before our industry can be restored to a full peace-time program. If no attempt is made to plan post-war reconstruction, these supplies will go to the highest bidder, regardless of need. In practice this would probably mean that China, India, and the poorer of the Latin American states would be unable to obtain the needed materials. A system of export controls would make possible a more equitable distribution of these supplies, but we have seen that such restrictions are open to grave abuses. Perhaps the most serious objection to this type of control is that it places too much power and responsibility in the hands of a single agency. The controlling body would have vast power over industry, trade, and commerce, not only at home but also abroad. It should be obvious that no group of men in Washington can have sufficient knowledge to decide in detail what every country in the world should import from the United States.

This difficulty could be avoided if, instead of seeking to control each item of export, the United States contented itself with broad financial help to the countries in need of post-war assistance and then permitted these countries to purchase what they want at market prices. This principle has been followed to a considerable extent in the lend-lease assistance given to Britain and China. It has the advantages of encouraging flexibility in price, supply, and demand. Theoretically, it may be inferior to a system of world planning in which the interests of the backward countries are given first consideration. But it is a type of planning which is feasible in a transition period, and it is infinitely safer than an attempt to impose a pattern of American or Anglo-American economic domination on an unwilling world.

Changes in Finland

BY MAURICE FELDMAN

IN RECENT months the political life of Finland has undergone drastic changes which have hardly been noticed abroad. Today Finland is governed by a military dictatorship entirely under German control. President Risto Ryti in his speeches has violently assailed the British plutocracy and the "slave treaty" of Versailles. One of the best known of Finnish historians, Jalmari Jaakkola, in a book entitled "Finland's Eastern Problem," has raised the cry of Lebensraum for Finland and claimed even districts around Leningrad as Finnish. Professor Jaakkola's book has been made a compulsory textbook in all high schools and has been translated into Swedish, German, French, and English. The Finnish National Socialist newspaper Kansallissosialisti declared that it is for Finns what "Mein Kampf" is "for our brothers in arms . . . the confession of our faith," adding, "With the help of the German people and their great Führer, Adolf Hitler, our leader, Mannerheim, will obtain for Finland the place it deserves under the sun." Ryti's tirades against Great Britain and Jaakkola's book were also enthusiastically welcomed by the Ajan Suunta, organ of the Patriotic People's Movement, the Finnish fascist party.

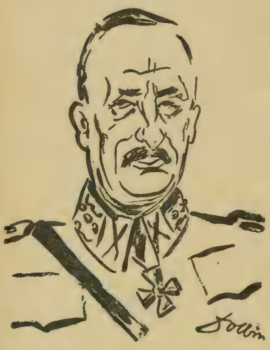
This party has eight seats in the Finnish Diet and is often supported by representatives of the National Coalition Party, with twenty-five seats, and of some other parties which have suddenly developed National Socialist leanings. The majority of the Diet, however, is made up of representatives of the Social Democratic Party, with eighty-five seats, and of the Swedish Party, with twenty-five seats. These two parties and in general the Agrarian League, with fifty-six seats, still stand for democracy and strongly oppose the imperialists, militarists, and Quislings. The organ of the Finnish Social Democrats, the Suomen Sosialidemokraatti, has sharply disputed the claims of Mannerheim, Ryti, and Jaakkolla for a Finnish Lebensraum. On January 3, 1942, it said in its leading article, "In Finland the problem of Lebensraum has never existed. The Lebensraum of the workers is freedom. The workers, who have shown that they know their duties, know also their rights."

The same newspaper declared on the following day: "The Finnish people are longing for peace, and the first thing to do is to stop military operations. Finland's policy has never been and must never be a policy of imperialist aggression." The trade unions are also demanding peace. Their leaders recently called on Premier J. W. Rangell and told him they could not guarantee order and discipline in plants and among the unemployed unless the government made peace immediately and removed all Gestapo officials from Finnish bureaus. The union leaders referred to the great scarcity of supplies and the rise in prices and pointed out that while Finland was short of almost every kind of food, German soldiers were sending home food parcels weighing ten pounds. They also protested against the intention of the Finnish government and the German authorities to send all Finnish unemployed to Germany.

That conditions in Finland are going from bad to worse was confirmed by the editors of reputable conservative and liberal newspapers in Sweden—such as the Göteborgs Posten, the Dagens Nyheter, and the Sydsvenska Dagbladet—who recently returned from a trip through Finland. Finland's export trade, which before the war consisted mainly of lumber and pulp for Great Britain and the United States, is today entirely cut off.

Its agriculture, which is chiefly stock-raising, has suffered tremendously because no fodder can be imported from overseas and the farmers, in consequence, are forced to slaughter their cattle. Discontent is growing among the farmers and workers.

Under Nazi pressure hundreds of liberal politicians, journalists, and professional men have been arrested as Communists, though in fact their views were anything but radical. The fate of such left-wing Social Democrats as K. H. Viik, the former secretary of the party, and the deputies Ryömä and Sundström is unknown. In Helsinki and other cities short-wave radio sets have been confiscated to prevent the people from listening to Finnish broadcasts from London. According to a report from Stockholm, control of Finnish policy has been shifted from the Diet to the General Staff of the army. Baron Mannerheim is said to have declared in a Cabinet meeting shortly before Christmas, "If the Diet does not want to obey, we will chase it out of Finland. There was nothing but talk until we started marching shoulder to shoulder with Germany. The time for action has now arrived."



Baron Mannerheim

Mannerheim and his officers, 85 per cent of whom belonged to the Nazi Lappo movement, are today the masters of Finland. The Finnish army, however, enjoys only as much freedom of movement and can exercise only as much influence on domestic politics as the German Nazis will permit. Sweden, because of its close ties with its neighbor—Finland belonged to Sweden from 1155 to 1809—feels great sympathy with the Finnish people and has repeatedly tried to persuade the government and Mannerheim to make peace. But all its endeavors to act as an intermediary have failed. Relations between the Finnish Quislings and the democratic Swedes have now deteriorated. Swedish newspapers are prohibited in Finland, and the Swedish government is often sharply attacked in the press. The movement to send Finnish children to Sweden was discontinued on account of German interference. The Uusi Suomi, organ of the National Coalition Party, has contended that food should be sent to Finland but that Finnish children should not be sent to Sweden. The widening breach between the Finns and the Swedes is fostered by the Nazis. Recent actions against the 1,700 Finnish Jews were of course inspired from Berlin.

Everybody's Business

BY KEITH HUTCHISON

Wall Street's Tax Program

EGGED on by a large part of the press, the business lobbies are advancing on Capitol Hill with the objective of turning Mr. Morgenthau's tax program inside out. Their program is "Lower taxes for the rich; higher taxes for the poor," though naturally they don't put it quite so bluntly.

Publicly their arguments run somewhat along these lines: We agree with Mr. Morgenthau that a war tax program must seek to cut down the amount of income available for consumption. Otherwise the excess of purchasing power over the volume of goods and services in the market will inevitably exert an irresistible upward pressure on prices. But if we are to achieve this we must locate the additional purchasing power created by the war program and tax that. It is not to be found among the upper and middle income brackets, where taxation is already so heavy that living standards are being revised downward, nor is it visible in corporation profits—after taxes. Hence it must be found going into the hands of the workers, including those at present totally exempt from direct taxation.

This argument leads to the proposition that the way to raise the necessary revenue and to check inflation is to tax the real war profiteers—the workers. But while the business lobbies agree about the desirability of this objective, they have not reached complete accord in regard to means. One school would like to reduce or even abolish personal exemptions altogether, but the objection to this course is that it would increase the taxes payable all the way up. A more popular proposal is for a general sales tax; this has been strongly urged on the House Ways and Means Committee by the New York State Chamber of Commerce and the National Association of Manufacturers.

W. J. Schieffelin, Jr., spokesman for the first of these organizations, stated that the Treasury was trying to raise too much new revenue as well as seeking it in the wrong spot. The House, he suggested, should levy an additional total of $5,000,000,000 instead of aiming at Mr. Morgenthau's figure of $7,160,000,000, and should rely mainly on a sales tax instead of mainly on income and excess-profits taxes. He proposed a 5 per cent sales tax on all products except food, which would be taxed only 2 per cent, and a few luxury articles to be charged at higher rates, and estimated that these rates would produce a total of $4,000,000,000.

The National Association of Manufacturers placed before the House two alternative sales-tax schedules: (1) a 4 per cent manufacturers' tax, imposed at the point of final sale, together with a 4 per cent war tax on general consumption at the point of final sale; or (2) an 8 per cent war tax on general consumption at the point of final sale. The first combination, it was stated, would yield $4,400,000,000 and the second $4,800,000,000.

Examination of these proposals at least excuses the New York Chamber of Commerce and the N. A. M. of any close conspiracy, for if the estimates of one are correct, those of the other must be cockeyed. Since the N. A. M. expects an 8 per cent tax to yield $4,800,000,000, it is obviously anticipating total sales of $60,000,000,000. It is not possible to calculate just what retail turnover the Chamber estimates would be necessary for its selective-rate scheme to produce $4,000,000,000; but assuming an average of 5 per cent, gross sales greatly in excess of $60,000,000,000 would be necessary.

In regard to direct taxation, the Chamber and the N. A. M. agreed that Mr. Morgenthau is much too tough. The Chamber proposed that increases in income and corporation taxes should be limited to $1,000,000,000, or less than one-sixth of the amount which would be procured by the Treasury's proposals. The N. A. M. program was heralded as one of "taxation to the limit—leaving only enough for survival"; and actually it suggested a 9 per cent excess-profits tax, compared with the Treasury recommendation for graduated rates ranging from 50 to 75 per cent. This noble gesture lost its effect when it was followed by requests for a number of changes in the method of computing excess profits and for considerably lower rates on corporation surtaxes. The net result of these proposals would be an increase in corporation taxes of about $1,400,000,000, or half the amount sought by the Treasury. And some large corporations, as the N. A. M. representatives admitted, would pay less than they do now.

The case against the general sales tax has frequently been stated in these pages, and there is no need to elaborate it again. Falling as it does with equal force on the poor man's loaf and the rich man's caviar, it is the most inequitable form of taxation. Yet a sales tax on everything except absolute necessities might be justified in war time. For the arguments of its proponents are sound to this extent: it is not possible to curb the excess purchasing power set free by war expenditure solely by taxing the rich and the well-to-do. If all incomes over, say, $5,000 were taken by the Treasury, there would still be an inflationary lack of balance between available income and available goods. And inflation, let us remember, is the most unjust form of taxation.

It follows, therefore, that either additional taxation on the low brackets or some form of compulsory savings or both is a necessity in the present situation, and Mr. Morgenthau can be criticized for pitching his total demands too low. But what cannot possibly be justified are proposals for adding to the burden at the bottom of the income scale in order to lighten the load at the top.

The financial press frequently makes the point that the limit of taxation on corporations has been reached and that if further "exactions" are imposed they will regretfully be unable to fulfil their production tasks. Patriotism, in other words, is not enough unless stimulated by sufficient profits. A correspondent airing this view in the Wall Street Journal of March 12 wrote, "Even in Nazi Germany corporations are allowed to earn 6 or 7 per cent of invested capital, but, then, Herr Hitler's financial advisers are too astute not to realize that there is nothing to be gained and much to be lost by killing the goose that lays the golden eggs."

My own confidential agent in Germany tells me that a secret conclave of corporation chiefs met in Berlin to study the March bulletin of the National City Bank of New York. They were amazed to find a table showing that the net income after taxes of 825 leading American manufacturing corporations was 23.7 per cent higher in 1941 than in 1940, and that the return on net worth rose from 9.9 per cent to 11.9 per cent. One daring soul said, "We should protest to the Führer about our miserable 7 per cent when even Roosevelt refuses to kill the goose that lays the golden eggs and permits nearly 12 per cent." But the others hushed him: "Better not; after all, Roosevelt doesn't put business men in concentration camps either."

In the Wind

TECHNOCRACY, INC., long thought to be a dead or dormant movement, has come back to life with an expensive newspaper advertising campaign. Howard Scott, who started Technocracy in 1933, is leading its revival. Not only does he boast of a scheme to increase production many times, but he claims that his engineers have designed a bombing plane that will fly around the globe with a twenty-five-ton bomb load. Observers who have attended recent Technocracy meetings report that the members have taken to military uniforms and drill. A feature of the new program is its recommendation that all public bars be closed and that distribution of liquor be curtailed.

THE KU KLUX KLAN, which was involved in the race riots at the Sojourner Truth housing project in Detroit, is organizing small units called the "Faithful Fifties" throughout the country.

BRITISH LIBERALS are protesting against the government's withdrawal of its subsidy from Picture Post, a publication resembling the American Life. The Ministry of Information had been buying bulk lots of the magazine for distribution to troops and civilians in the Middle East, but when Picture Post published an article by Tom Wintringham criticizing the conduct of the Libyan campaign, the ministry refused to purchase any more copies.

LEADERS OF PUBLIC OPINION on the West Coast are demanding that a representative of that region be given a high position in the war effort. At present no member of the Cabinet or the production boards is from the Far West.

A BRONX CHAPTER of the America First Committee held an officers' meeting on March 6, 1942. . . . Joe McWilliams's American Destiny Party held a meeting on March 4 at which it was announced that McWilliams would soon be returning from Chicago to New York to continue his political work.

THREE TRUCKLOADS of the best brandies and wines from the Normandie—which boasted one of the finest stocks in the world—were removed for the personal use of Gaston Henry-Haye, Vichy's ambassador in Washington.

BOOKS and the ARTS

Memo for Mr. Jarrell

RANDALL JARRELL'S remarks on modernism and romanticism in contemporary poetry are interesting: he has correctly noted that all modern poetry is really romantic, and he has intelligently catalogued various manifestations of the romantic impulse. A certain inadequacy in his discussion, however, arises from the fact that he has not gone back far enough; he does not exactly fall short but rather plunges, as it were, in medias res, or in prope extremas res. His assumption, implicit and apologetic, is that his subject, the classical versus the romantic, is almost too trite to treat, and that because of its familiarity there is no need for definition of terms: everybody knows the difference. Everybody knows that the Epicureans put rich food in, the Stoics hungry foxes on, their respective bellies; everybody knows that the difference between classic and romantic is—but come to think of it, what is the difference?

By way of contributing to the discussion, and for what it is worth, I offer here the suggestion that the basic difference between the classical and the romantic artist lies in his attitude toward the society, the state, in which he lives. You cannot hate that state and be a classical artist; you can like it, and be a romantic one. It is not so much a question of approval as of participation. The classical artist thinks of himself as primarily a citizen, the romantic as individual. Both accept the obligations imposed on them by their art; both, if that art takes the form of writing, write as they must: but the romantic writer is thinking, "I write as I please," the classical, "I write as I should." The classical writer, therefore, exercises propriety, restraint, decorum, not as virtues per se; his aesthetics are imposed by his civics. It is not true that only the classical writer is concerned with form; the romantic writers are often preoccupied with it to the point of obsession, witness the Alexandrians, but they come to it by what they believe is free choice, not civic responsibility.

It would seem to follow from this that a classical writer can only appear within a closed political system sufficiently unstable to require the close attachment of its members, who nevertheless regard it as static. So in the past we have had primitive societies, isolated city states, or a world society organized along Catholic (religious) or feudal (political) lines, in which romantic writers, if they appeared, would be classed as heretics. It would likewise follow that a classical writer must be pretty rare, well-nigh impossible, in English literature, for the entire history of English literacy is involved in the rise of the bourgeoisie, and Protestantism in religion and laissez faire in economics turn the writer into either a successful merchandiser of commodities or an outraged outcast. Milton, I suppose, had a certain amount of civic sense; in the eighteenth century a good many writers thought themselves citizens of an autonomous republic of letters inside England; and, close to our own time, one might think of Kipling as possessed of certain classical tendencies.

Among the Greeks there was a high proportion of classical poets; among the Romans, almost none. For one thing, the Romans' belief in their cultural inferiority to the Greeks inhibited a strong civic feeling in their own literature; the only form they claimed as their own, satire, as they defined it, abounds in romantic extravagances. For another thing, the change of the Roman state from an agrarian republic to a mercantile imperialism was too swift and successful to require their attachment; under this prosperity it was easier to become sophisticated than patriotic. Augustus, troubled by the lack of morale, tried to restore the atmosphere of the good old days; but Varro had been no match for Lucretius, and even in the writers who tried their best to be sympathetic with their patron, Vergil and Horace, the individual kept triumphing over the citizen. Propertius, who was also in the Augustan circle, was downright wanton, and Ovid, outside it, eventually paid with exile for the privilege of treating as he pleased the society he so richly enjoyed. The more one studies our own poetry in the light of that of Alexandria and Rome, the more one will see how greatly similar causes combine to produce similar effects.

Mr. Jarrell might have pointed out, with more assurance than he did, the fact that modern neo- or pseudo- or would-be-classical aspirations are themselves an inevitable vagary of romanticism, and fundamentally romantic. We may interpret the yearnings of the humanists, the Southern agrarians, Yvor Winters, or T. S. Eliot as we wish; say that they indicate (psychologically) the desire to return to the authority of the father, or that they have revolutionary significance (politically) because they are opposed to the present system. Either way they fail to be classical because they mistake the outward and visible form for the inward and spiritual grace; what they are working out, rather cleverly, is a new device for insuring originality. But a protest against Protestantism is still Protestant; the desire to escape romanticism itself romantic.

If we live long enough, we may see the establishment of a society—a mechanized worldwide industrial communism—out of which a classical literature might be expected to emerge. We are not likely, however, to see such a literature, for it will be a long time after that before all residues of romanticism are absorbed or liquidated, before all the throwbacks are weeded out. In our own day the Gothic tale comes sneaking in disguised as a detective story; and we have poets whose spiritual relation to the nineteenth, eighteenth, seventeenth, or sixteenth century is much closer than their use of references to Darwin, Freud, or Marx inclines us to suspect. And the critic of the future will also have some nice problems in deciding where the line is drawn between the man who really and truly writes as citizen and the one who merely attempts to merit the sanction of officialdom and the approval of the dominant oligarchical bureaucrats.

ROLFE HUMPHRIES

PUBLIC LIBRARY

The Sparrow Revolution

THE PINK EGG. By Polly Boyden. Truro, Massachusetts: The Pamet Press. $2.

THIS is a fable about the downtrodden, underprivileged sparrows who make a revolution and throw all the robins and other handsomer, luckier, and more talented birds out of the orchard where they live, and some of the very nicest robins turn in and help them. As one of the singing birds says, wistfully: "But all you sparrows are so much closer to the future than we other birds; so you must show us how to get there because we do not want to lose our way."

Why choose sparrows out of all the bird world to represent the human downtrodden and underprivileged? They are fairly dull-looking little birds who do not sing; they are the most gluttonous of small birds except the bluejay, so lecherous they have become the symbol of human incontinence, and so quarrelsome there is no getting on with them at all. Any bird can tell you. If you want to get down on sparrows just watch them descend on a feeding station where robins and wrens and mocking birds and all sorts of sweet singing creatures are sharing their food in peace. Will the sparrows allow this to go on? No, they scatter the others with blows and curses and then fight among themselves as they lick the platter clean. Only the bluejay can beat them at this game, and only because he is bigger and has a tougher beak. Ounce for ounce, the sparrow is meaner than a bluejay. He simply hasn't got the heft.

If the future of the bird world is really with the sparrows, it is a grim prospect. It is significant, too, that the sparrows were able to enlist almost the whole bird race in an unselfish labor to further the good of—you've guessed it, the sparrows. They say the campaign will be for the improvement of all, but nothing in their conduct leads you to believe this. They lack almost everything it takes to create a good world, they are as noisy and selfish and dull as some people, really; but what is good for sparrows, they say, will be plenty good enough for other birds: they'll take it and like it, or they'll have to go, that's all. They will be spared to work, however, until they have finished helping the sparrows build a world in which nothing a sparrow cannot appreciate will be permitted to exist.

St. Francis doped the birds, preaching to them that way, says one debunking sparrow. But if birds are what this book makes them out to be, it is possible that the birds doped poor St. Francis. At any rate, if they were sparrows, he wasted his breath talking to them. They'll never learn by that method.

The symbol of the lighthouse in this story interests me because it illustrates the danger of turning the world over to the sparrows. This lighthouse stands on an island, the only spot hospitable to sparrows; in the jacket note it is identified as danger and desire. Left to myself I might have thought it stood for Truth or the Light of Reason or Morality. Whatever it may mean, there is something sinister in the attitude of the sparrows toward this lighthouse. It is the creation of human beings, who collectively seem to mean, to the birds, a higher power which distributes its favors on a mysterious plan: the island is free to any bird who can reach it, and it is meant to be a place of shelter and peace. What is the meaning of the lighthouse? the birds ask among themselves. A sparrow remarks that they don't know yet what it means, but they will look into the question later, and there is a hint that once the birds find their way to the island, they will put out the light, since they will not need it any more.

Now if the lighthouse really signifies danger and desire, those birds are very silly to think they can abolish it. And if it should mean guidance, for example, and was put there for the convenience and safety of birds, their plan to put it out when they no longer need it seems to me shortsighted and selfish to the last degree. There will always be birds in the infinite future trying to find their way to the island.

Well, these birds build fires and wear orange felt hats and wield apple axes and carry away their wounded on stretchers, and if the author is not really talking about birds, I am. I say it is a grim little slander on the birds, and on that part of the human race typified by the sparrows. I don't think the working people, the proletariat as they used to be called, are at all like sparrows, and I think the choice of such a comparison is not very tactful to say the least.

It is odd, also, to find another fallacy: the intelligent, poetic, inspired, and heroic birds in the feathered revolutionary movement are nearly all renegades from the upper classes who sacrifice their fortunes and devote their talents to their less fortunate brethren. I don't agree with this thesis. Those birds from the upper classes haven't been half as important as they like to believe. I think most of them have had a good time and got more than they gave. The really heavy job has been done by the working people.

As for these birds with their unpleasantly human ways, I am reminded irresistibly of the beachcomber's fable about the man who tried to make the mice in his house wear little wool hats during the cold weather. He wasn't any more successful than Miss Boyden trying to make her birds wear waistcoats, but he was a great deal funnier.

KATHERINE ANNE PORTER

Nazi-Ridden Rumania

ATHENE PALACE. By R. G. Waldeck. Robert M. McBride and Company. $2.75.

UNTIL "neutral" Rumania entered the war, Bucharest was the witches' caldron of the Balkans. Diplomats and agents were scheming and intriguing; there was espionage and counter-espionage on a large scale. The Athene Palace Hotel was the luxurious center of this activity. It was also the point of vantage from which Countess Waldeck, an American journalist of European descent, and accent, watched the Nazi spider spin the web in which anti-Nazi Rumania ultimately was caught.

In the frame of a personal narrative the Countess offers character sketches of the leading actors in the Rumanian drama. Interwoven with accounts of tragic events are delightful stories which bear witness to her keen power of observation. She shows how the pro-Ally Antonescu became a German tool and how even the Nazis could not always bridge the gap between planning and reality. Her portraits of the "Old Excellencies"—those aristocrats who found

Maniu, the incorruptible leader of the Peasant Party and the hope of a liberal and democratic Rumania, so "irritating"—and her cartoon of the hohe Tier, the "big shot," of the German military mission are drawn in the best Hogarthian manner. As for the royal dictator who ruled the country with the assistance of Urdareanu and Madame Lupescu from 1938 until his flight, she makes it clear that "Carol was neither pro- nor anti-German, nor pro- nor anti-British. He was only pro-Carol."

In spite of its gossipy background, this account of Nazi propaganda carried on with two sets of agents, one official, the other unofficial and more efficient, is a valuable contribution to current history. About one of the unofficial agents, an Austrian Catholic count but a "150 per cent Nazi," with whom the author established "a beautiful friendship built on a mutual distrust, scientific curiosity, and a sort of wistful fondness," we learn that he was thoroughly informed concerning American affairs. He could, for instance, "discuss by the hour the relative merits of Mr. Bliven of the New Republic and Miss Kirchwey of The Nation." He thought, incidentally, that American totalitarianism would be along Communist lines because there was no American race.

Nazi propaganda, judged by its results, was, indeed, clever, but the Nazis, for all their haughtiness, harbor a subconscious inferiority complex. This becomes conspicuous in the jokes which the Nazis, like the Jews, tell of themselves. Mme Waldeck quotes them as saying that "they could not tolerate real Jews when they were able to produce an ever-so-much better synthetic Jew, as the person of Herr Dr. Goebbels proved."

Intermixed with comments of a personal character, "Athene Palace" includes various political remarks very much to the point. We may doubt whether it was, indeed, Stalin's occupation of Bessarabia that brought the German attack on Russia, but it is certain that the Vienna award on Transylvania was not only "a blatantly uncreative, unimaginative, sterile decision" but a great blunder when one considers how badly Hitler needed peace in his southeastern Grossraum. Countess Waldeck watched with keen insight the clash of Nazi and Rumanian fascism, a clash which explains why the Germans preferred to collaborate with the doubtfully fascist Gigurtu than with the Iron Guard. And we must heartily indorse her judgment that "universal mercy was the imperialistic element in any order," and that therefore, Hitler's order, "which condemns a priori entire races and nations to everlasting doom," has no hope of success in spite of its military victories.

Occasionally there are overstatements, as for example, that for the last twenty years "Hungarian fathers of families always said, 'No, no, never,' as they sat down to eat their goulash." Hungarian government propaganda must not be mistaken for the habits of Hungarian farm hands whose wages average twenty cents a day. Rumanian peasants are no better off. Anyone who wishes to learn something of their fate would do better to read Donald Hall's "Rumanian Furrow," but no person who is interested in the machinations of grafty Rumanian politicians, beguiling feminine entanglements, Balkan glamor, and underground Nazi plotting should miss this witty and fascinating book. One page on the assassinated Professor Jorga, "the Rumanian version of the Goethean man," is more valuable than many volumes on Rumania written by errant journalists—errant in both senses of the word.

RUSTEM VAMBERY

A New Poet

AWAKE! AND OTHER WAR TIME POEMS. By W. R. Rodgers. Harcourt, Brace and Company. $1.50.

W. R. RODGERS is undoubtedly a writer of real distinction. The appearance of a poet who has a command of words, an individual technique, and a capacity to say what he means, as distinct from the many writers who have some good taste and happy moments and are intoxicated with uncontrolled words and ideas, is a literary event. The critics should therefore salute Mr. Rodgers, and those who enjoy poetry should read him.

W. R. Rodgers has the intellectual power to organize a strong imagination. That is saying a great deal, and, beyond it, there is little that it can be useful to say at present. I think it is mischievous to say, as one critic has done: "I back him to go as far as, or farther than, Auden." Critics are not tipsters, and there is nothing whatever in Rodgers's poetry to invite comparison with Auden, unless one regards all contemporary literature as a great race in which one poet wins, thus doing credit to the critic who has backed him. Rodgers lacks Auden's intellectual curiosity, lightness of touch, mastery of varied patterns, everything that is Auden's; just as Auden lacks Rodgers's vivid kinetic imagery and the attractive clumsiness which makes reading some of his poems resemble walking across a plowed field on a windy day, with occasional glimpses of a bright transparent sky through the clouds.

The poet with whom it may be helpful to compare Rodgers is Frederic Prokosch. Prokosch is musical and smooth, whereas Rodgers is harsh, violent, and unmusical, but nevertheless their talents, as poetic types, are similar in being immediately attractive, with an almost physical attraction. Neither goes very far beyond the attractiveness of his poetic appearance, as yet. Prokosch is hyacinthine, Narcissus-like, Grecian; Rodgers is husky and hairy, a man from the Irish bogs—I speak of their poetic, not their physical, exteriors. The reader is fascinated by both of these appearances; but when it comes to asking the poet what he thinks, they are both curiously monosyllabic. If they do express anything resembling an idea, its conventionality contrasts rather strangely with their lush style.

Thus Mr. Rodgers is most successful in taking ordinary attitudes to life and projecting them in brilliant pictures. The most brilliantly successful of these attempts is "Summer Holidays," an account of the clerk's excursion on holiday into natural scenery. The view of the clerk, that his life consists of Rut and Rout, is one that has been insisted on by many poets, since about the year 1900. Within the limits of this modern poetic convention "Summer Holidays" is a striking word-picture sustained for several pages and only collapsing in the commonplaces about history at the end.

The imagery of Rodgers's poetry often strikes one with a shock of surprise and delight, like some French impressionist painting:

Suddenly all the fountains in the park
Opened smoothly their umbrellas of water

This is lovely, surely, and there are many moments as lovely n this short book.

Rodgers's faults are an unrestrained verbosity and a sometimes tiresome over-use of alliteration. With more economy he would be a wholly delightful, if somewhat spasmodic, poet. With more thought the development of his poems would be strong and sweeping. As it is, his lines tend to arrest the attention, and then fail to develop beyond what is vivid and striking. Sometimes the ends of poems seem arbitrary and prosaic.

This volume contains all that Mr. Rodgers has as yet written; naturally, therefore, there are occasional failures. But the general impression it leaves is that he is already a poet with a brilliant power of observation and an ability to organize, as in "Summer Holidays," many images and pictures into a coherent whole. There are genuine and memorable experiences in this book. STEPHEN SPENDER

Britain and America

THE ATLANTIC SYSTEM: THE STORY OF ANGLO-AMERICAN CONTROL OF THE SEAS. By Forrest Davis. Reynal and Hitchcock. $3.

FORREST DAVIS has done much more than present unassailable proof of the inevitability of Anglo-American cooperation in the Atlantic. While this hitherto unrecognized natural partnership is the main thesis of "The Atlantic System," the by-products of the work are just as valuable. Presenting the popular as well as the official and semi-official arguments on both sides of the question, Mr. Davis not only proves his point but shows with unexaggerated emphasis the great danger to a country of the forces of ignorance and partisanship. But for these unfortunate factors there would have been an end long ago to Anglo-American problems and hesitations, and the indispensability of an all-out alliance between the English-speaking peoples, denying to militaristic powers access to the shores of the Atlantic, would have been manifest.

Americans, as Andrew Carnegie complained, were weaned on "bad history books"; they come to the voting booth, typewriter, and platform obsessed with memories of the Revolution of 1776 and with those British applications of American theories of the freedom of the seas which produced, first, the War of 1812 and then the unpleasantnesses during the Civil War. The citizens of the New World whose false pride forbade their recognition of the hundred years' dependence of the Monroe Doctrine upon the Royal Navy were equally unaware of the steps taken by London to counteract that "Concert of Europe" which aimed at intervention against the United States at the time of the Spanish-American War and the Venezuela crisis. Nor were Americans acquainted with the fact that London had refrained from entering into European arrangements, including a German alliance, lest such action prove disturbing to Washington, and that British ambassadors had repeatedly passed on to our Department of State vital "European" secrets. Mr. Davis describes the steady retreat of British interests in deference to the spirit, and not merely the letter, of the Monroe Doctrine—the settlement of the Venezuelan and Alaskan problems, the relinquishment of British claims to Hawaii and the Panama Canal, and the dismantling of fortifications in this hemisphere. Without elaboration the author indicates how London exchanged an effective military Japanese alliance for an entente with Washington of doubtful reliability, and notes its offer of naval parity with the United States.

Throughout this scholarly presentation Mr. Davis uncovers the activities of a Germany responsible for the Venezuela incident, as interested in expanding into the Western Hemisphere as it was resourceful and tireless in its struggle to drive a wedge between the United States and the British Empire. Berlin's intrigues and overt acts in the Pacific are also shown, and there is a reminder of that school of German geopolitics which aims at dominating the world by seizing control of the Eastern Hemisphere. Here again, though the author does not make the allusion, we had Americans remembering von Steuben, forgetting Manila Bay, overlooking the methods whereby the important atolls of the mandated islands went via Germany to Japan.

"The Atlantic System," covering the period from 1890 to date, deals at length with Woodrow Wilson's total lack of strategic insight, a shortcoming that has been overcome in this country only since the downfall of France, and culminates in the Atlantic Declaration of President Roosevelt and Prime Minister Churchill, with its promises to disarm the militarists and police the world. In a "story of Anglo-American control of the seas" there is little room for a discussion of the position of France. Yet knowing, from this work if from no other, the instability of democratic planning and how readily the peoples of America and Britain might relapse into their customary and disastrous apathy, we cannot well agree with Mr. Davis's afterthought that a liberated France does not belong in the Atlantic System. If Britons have failed to appreciate American problems, if the people of the United States have been remiss in their relations with their de facto transatlantic naval ally, the entire English-speaking world has been even more negligent in its treatment of France during the past thirty years; and this treatment explains, though it does not condone, Vichy's collaboration with the geopoliticians. In any democratic Atlantic System the ideological, military, and geographical position of a strong French Republic, one that has military and naval backing instead of promises and arguments, appears to be a sine qua non.

Mr. Davis has produced a political-naval masterpiece that is as valuable as the best of strategic and tactical treatises. Civilians have here a manual by which to test public opinion and to understand vital problems of national defense against a human rather than a technical background. It reveals the tragedy of unsound, wishful, and malicious thinking, which, during the period in question, has done more to harm democracy than a dozen enemy battle fleets could have hoped to accomplish.

Florida People

CROSS CREEK. By Marjorie Kinnan Rawlings. Charles Scribner's Sons. $2.50.

THERE is a deceiving simplicity about "Cross Creek," a book of pleasant reminiscences of "a bend in a country road" by the sharply perceptive author of "The Yearling." By the time you finish it you realize that it is more than the story of the people and flora and fauna of a backwoods community: it is a way of life—a way that smacks of Thoreau, without Thoreau's asceticism, for the author, while believing that nature possesses the secret of happiness, loves all sorts of people, and records their peculiarities of temper and dialect with zest and humor.

"I do not understand," she writes, "how anyone can live without some small place of enchantment to turn to." She herself has found her small place among the colored folk, the white folk, the magnolia trees, the hogs, and the waters of the "Yearling" country, and in this narrative of her sojourn there she reveals herself again as an extremely sensitive observer, who sees much that others do not and feels keenly about everything. It is as if color and sound and happiness and sorrow were all heightened for her, and she translates this brightness and sharpness for the reader. It is hard to believe her assertion that writing causes her "great mental anguish," when her style is so natural, so apparently spontaneous, so full of quick humor and quick sympathies. The Florida she pictures is not the Florida of the resort folders; it is hard and crude, but being at least quiet and warless it has a good deal to recommend it just now, and "Cross Creek" places it before you with haunting charm.

Authority and Liberty

ON THE AGENDA OF DEMOCRACY. By Charles E. Merriam. Harvard University Press. $1.50.

PROFESSOR MERRIAM is convinced that "not even enlightened despotism" is the answer to any of the problems which a technical age faces. The answer, on the whole, he believes, is a democracy which emphasizes leadership, technical expertness, and planning. He is convinced that "liberty is not secure in proportion as government has no power." His whole treatise is a convincing refutation of laissez faire conceptions of democracy. In one sense such a thesis holds the candlelight of the obvious to the daylight of common experience, for we are obviously being driven by ineluctable historical forces to various forms of collective control, in both the economic and political sphere, which no one had anticipated a few decades ago. The real question is no longer whether we shall plan or not. The question is where the authority for planning will rest and how effectively we can keep the seats of highly centralized authority under democratic control.

In dealing with this problem on its international level Professor Merriam is convinced that we can move forward to "the security of a jural order of the world in which decisions are made upon the basis of justice rather than violence." He is not unmindful of the many complexities of international politics, but he hardly considers the perplexing problem of the relation of a central authority to the democratic essence of an international order. Any scheme of justice requires an organizing center just as much as a proper balance of all the forces and vitalities involved in it. The relation of authority to liberty is a perennial issue in all forms of political organization. The conflict inherent in these two facets of democracy is not fully comprehended in this otherwise excellent treatise. REINHOLD NIEBUHR

NEW DIRECTIONS IN PROSE AND POETRY, 1941. Edited by James Laughlin. New Directions. $3.50.

IF THE publication of "New Directions in Prose and Poetry" affords the reviewer the opportunity of making remarks about new directions in prose and poetry, then I can best begin this piece by observing that there are no new directions in prose or poetry. Here, mobilized under the somewhat unenthusiastic insignia of a man sitting down on a horse sitting down, the "advance guard of more than forty writers"—I take my facts and figures from the editorial blurb—exhibit their orthodoxy through six hundred pages and ten photographs. The total effect is to produce a book that I can only compare to the Fat Lady of the Circus. Here prose becomes adipose tissue and poetry mucous membrane. I feel that there must be something uncertain in the state of Connecticut, and it is either the weather or the editorial policy of James Laughlin. But before reviewing individual contributions I may point out an error of fact to the editor: Roger Roughton committed suicide in Dublin two years ago; he was not killed in the Spanish civil war. Nor should the suicide of Roughton, even at such a time as this, so full of possible deaths, be passed over parenthetically, for he was, as all his short stories (including The Sand Under the Door, reprinted here) and several of his poems attest, a youth of whom one could speak in the same breath as Charles Hamilton Sorley, Clare Parsons, and that pathetic young poet whom Matthew Arnold elevated from an entirely undeserved oblivion, David Grey. If for nothing else in the collection, those who appreciate precision of prose and a lyrical touch like Mozart's little finger should be grateful to James Laughlin for presenting a good example of Roughton's work.

It is the editorial liberality of New Directions that I boggle at; for the principles of selection at work behind the scenes of this publishing establishment remain quite beyond my personal comprehension. When the emotional constipation of Delmore Schwartz precedes the intellectual looseness of Hugh MacDiarmid, and the deliriums of André Breton follow a Survey Anthology of Soviet Russian Poetry, then I can see no good reason why the text of the Declaration of Independence and excerpts from Winchell do not also appear here. Unless the title of this annual has absolutely no significance whatever, we are entitled to anticipate that the contributions to it will share an element of the experimental that New Writing, for instance, makes no pretensions toward: New Writing is new writing but New Directions is no longer new directions.

The best thing in this issue runs to one and three-quarter pages and in this space does more to divest the human being in front of its own eyes than the whole remaining 598 pages. This is a parable called Before the Law, by Franz Kafka, and apart from being so ambiguously mysterious that each reading surrenders a whole series of new interpretations, it has a kick in the tail which I can only liken to O. Henry or rattlesnakes. There is also a bad-tempered and eccentric paper of Ezra Pound's on The Argument of the Novel that leaves me with the remembrance of a violent old man splashing noisily in the shallows of critical literature when he should be extending more Homage to Sextus Propertius; for Ezra Pound as poet has golden saliva but Ezra Pound as critic is so exhibitionist that I can never see the avoirdupois for the pound. The long surrealist poem Fata Morgana, by André Breton, if cut into strips and colored with crayon, would make a rather delightful dado for a boudoir: unlike Ezra Pound, André Breton is a great critical and theoretical writer who demonstrates perfectly the validity of the proposition that you can't write poems merely because you want to.

The verse play entitled Paris and Helen: an Entertainment, dedicated by the author, Mr. Schwartz, to Metro-Goldwyn-Mayer, contains some of the flattest lines that I have ever read. Verse fulfils, or should fulfil, the function of an intellectual and emotional shorthand; Mr. Schwartz writes verse that reminds me of Victorian calligraphy; thick on the dramatic stroke and thin on the lyrical. He has, however, the unusual virtue of a sense of decorum, so conspicuously absent from the contributions of, for instance, Paul Goodman, who seeks to achieve his effects by an erratic posturing of the first person singular. Finally, this notice should not be concluded without a palm being handed to Georg Mann for his story on Azeff Wischmeier, the Bolshevik Bureaucrat. It is brilliant satirical fireworks. GEORGE BARKER

IN BRIEF

MODERN BATTLE. By Major Paul W. Thompson. W. W. Norton and Company. $2.75.

"Modern Battle," twelfth in a series of short military books put out by Norton, performs a distinct service for the general reader. Frequently the civilian never knows what happens during a given battle. Censorship interferes with full accounts at the time, and later, interest does not justify attempts to resurrect the past, even in cases where the facts have become available. By extensive rummaging in foreign publications, mainly German, Major Thompson has reconstructed clear and non-technical accounts of fifteen engagements in the present war, each of which he treats in a chapter. The main campaigns covered are those in Poland, France, and the Balkans. Despite its distinct virtues, his volume has a number of the shortcomings common to war books. Comparatively few military men possess the knack of writing interestingly, and Major Thompson is not one. Moreover, only battles on land are treated, and in these air power is viewed as a purely auxiliary force. Finally, though the book is newly off the press, all events touched on are at least a year in the past, and some of the most interesting and vital campaigns of the war receive no mention.

DEARLY BELOVED. By Harry Sylvester. Duell, Sloan, and Pearce. $2.50.

An earnest but inconclusive novel about the Jesuit brotherhood in a Catholic community in Maryland, where the economic and social relations between Negroes and whites furnish a burning problem for an idealistic churchman to try to solve. Though the plot seems somewhat tailor-made to fit the author's indignant thesis, it is a sincere attempt to dramatize a worth-while issue: the church's regretful inability to remedy the cleavage between Christian doctrine and Christian practice.

SHAKESPEARE WITHOUT TEARS. By Margaret Webster. Whittlesey House. $2.75.

Some years ago Granville Barker demonstrated that a producer of Shakespeare may get a point of view from which things unnoticed by the critic or scholar become very plain. Miss Margaret Webster has the benefit of considerable experience in staging the plays, and as a result has a good many interesting things to say. Occasionally she rushes in where most of us fear to tread, as when she disputes with W. J. Lawrence about Elizabethan staging or with the fantastically technical editors on the subject of folio readings versus those of the "good" quartos; but even here she is worth examining, especially when she declares that her own experience has shown that the folio readings are often more speakable than those of the quarto. "Shakespeare Without Tears" is intended as a sort of introduction to Shakespeare for the general reader or the prospective auditor, but the point of view is always that of one who asks first how anything will work out on the stage.

DRAMA

A New Theory for J. M. B.

ACCORDING to his official biographer, J. M. Barrie thought the dream in "A Kiss for Cinderella" the best single scene he ever wrote, and so far as I am concerned there can be no doubt that it is at least the best thing in the not too happy revival of the play at the Music Box Theater. But as the same biographer admits, the piece as a whole is only for those who admire its author's famous sentiment so unreservedly that it cannot be laid on too thick to suit them, and perhaps I find the little girl's vision of what a royal ball would be like genuinely amusing just because it seems rather more in the manner of Lewis Carroll than in the manner of Barrie and hence furnishes almost the only relief in a two-hour stretch of sweet pathos and coy humor.

I doubt that I should ever know just how to take the very insubstantial story of the fabulous little waif who, in the midst of a previous world war, stole planks to make boxes in which to keep orphans, and I should not know how to take it partly because the waking scenes are almost as dreamlike as the dream itself, and I have no way of knowing what relation to reality they are supposed to bear. Nor does the present production give me very much help, since the star, Luise Rainer, is, to put it bluntly, obviously miscast. To begin with, her accent is so thick that she is, at times, quite incomprehensible, and she seems, in addition, to be the cause of incomprehensibility in others. Even Ralph Forbes, whose Policeman is certainly the best-played role in the production, sometimes requires the closest attention if one is to understand what he is saying, while Cecil Humphreys as Cinderella's artist employer talks so persistently into an invisible beard that one can, half the time, only guess at the gentle amiabilities he is supposed to be scattering. Nor is indistinctness of articulation the only reason why Miss Rainer is hardly qualified for the role, since if Maude Adams was right for it she is certainly wrong. There is in her too much of the spitfire and, in general, too sharp and rebellious a quality to suit with an atmosphere as relaxed as that which Barrie's all-pervading sweetness tends to create. Obviously the whole production has been mounted with care, but it fails to cast any adequate spell. Perhaps it will appeal to those for whom Barrie needs to be given only half a chance, but if he is ever to come back as a generally popular playwright I suspect that it will be only via better productions of other plays—plays in which he less obviously abandons himself to the very tendencies which only devotees can admire without strong reservation.

As the play unfolded and I realized with increasing alarm the strength of my own resistance to so much sweetness and light on the stage, I evolved a theory to justify what might appear to be a curmudgeonish attitude. And since the theory is brand-new—or let us say, rather, as new as anyone can reasonably expect a theory to be when it concerns a field over which Aristotle, Freud, and William James pioneered—I hereby offer it freely to such members of the public as may need to be reassured against the fear that a distaste for Barrie can mean only a heart of flint. Here, then, it goes:

To begin with, one must remember that there are two hypotheses, represented respectively by Plato and Aristotle, concerning the effect upon human conduct of what one sees represented on the stage. Plato's is simply that we tend to imitate the passions and the actions which we see represented; Aristotle's is, on the contrary, that that is precisely what we tend not to do. What we experience imaginatively is purged away, and that is of course why tragedy properly deals with evil passions and crimes, the impulses toward which are, as it were, ritualistically exorcised. Now I should like to go farther and propose what seems to me a very reasonable corollary to Aristotle's theory. If emotions experienced in watching a representation are not encouraged but got rid of, then it would seem obvious enough not only that evil passions should be represented on the stage but also that good ones should, on the contrary, not receive too full a ritual expression. And yet that is exactly what kindliness, generosity, and general benevolence do get in the works of Barrie and the other sentimental dramatists from the time of Sir Richard Steele down to the present. Even the most naturally generous man, the most universal lover of his kind, might have little benevolence left over for practical application for some time after he had been the victim of a purging as drastic as that which "A Kiss for Cinderella" administers. And now that I come to think of it, I do indeed remember that J. M. B.'s adoring biographer admits that his hero's generosity was highly capricious and that he boiled with indignation when the income-tax office finally compelled him to pay what he had for years failed to contribute. Perhaps comedy is the proper place for realism, cynicism, malice, and wit. Perhaps the place for benevolence and love is the active life.

RECORDS

COLUMBIA places first on its March list the performance of Beethoven's Piano Concerto No. 5 (known as "Emperor") recorded by Serkin with the New York Philharmonic-Symphony under Bruno Walter (Set 500, $5.78). In the first movement Serkin places very well—with power, with fire and excitement. But even in this movement I prefer Schnabel's playing in Victor Set 155—for the greater power that he achieves with the calm of maturity; also for the hair-raising tensions that he builds up and releases in the passage of ascending and descending octaves in the development section (side 3); also for the unsentimental expressiveness in the quiet passage that follows these octaves and in a few other such passages, in which Serkin's playing recalls the remark that someone told me Toscanini had made to him about Walter: "When he comes to something beautiful he melts." In the second movement the difference is more considerable: Serkin's bumpy phrasing sounds like that of a clumsy-fingered pupil, after Schnabel's with its continuity not only in rhythm but in mere physical sound. And in the third movement the principal theme as Serkin plays it has nothing of the dynamic quality which Schnabel's sharply contoured and inflected statement gives it; quieter passages again are sentimentalized by Serkin as they are not by Schnabel; and that episode in the development in which three times the principal theme begins expansively and then is brought to the same bustling conclusion hasn't the humor in Serkin's performance that it has in Schnabel's. I would, then, choose Schnabel's performance in spite of the mediocre orchestral framework; and if I wanted more distinguished orchestral playing I would take Columbia Set 243, with the orchestral part played by the Vienna Philharmonic under Walter, and with Gieseking's performance of the piano part, which is sensitive and suave not only where Serkin's is powerful but where it is sentimental or bumpy.

REINHOLD NIEBUHR, in The Nation, says: "Martin Niemoeller, who sits in prison on Hitler's explicit orders even after a Nazi court declared him innocent, will undoubtedly be known as one of the heroes and martyrs of this period. . . . His 'sermons' breathe a religiously exalted defiance of tyranny. . . . To read this book with understanding is to know why the blood of the martyrs has been the seed of the church in all generations."

DR. JOHN HAYNES HOLMES, in the New York Herald Tribune, says:
"Martin Niemoeller might have avoided trouble. He had only to be tactful and above all to keep silent. But like an earlier and greater Martin, Niemoeller felt himself under the command of conscience. He could not do otherwise than speak. . . ."

Another reason for these preferences is the recorded sound of the new Serkin-Walter version. Toscanini's 1936 recording of Dawn from "Götterdämmerung" reproduces the real sound of the New York Philharmonic-Symphony—among other things the dark color and richness of the low strings, the depth and body in the sound of the kettledrum, the deep-plumbing massiveness of the sound of the full orchestra. On these new Columbia records the sound of the orchestra is voluminous but flat, with none of that depth and body; the kettledrum is wooden; the cellos are light in color and nasal in quality; and even the voluminousness that is impressive at first gets to be noisy and confused and unpleasant. And in addition there is the noise and grit of the surfaces, with a periodic sputter on one of them. I have been speaking of what the records sound like on large wide-range machines with light, sensitive pickups; on a small machine of limited range with a heavy pickup the sound is more agreeable, but that sputter remains. The recorded sound of the Schnabel performance in Victor Set 155 is balanced and clear, natural and easy to listen to; that of the Gieseking-Walter performance in Columbia Set 243 is a little less good in these respects.

The depth and body and other normal characteristics of an orchestra's sound that I mentioned before are to be heard in Columbia's recording of the performance of Debussy's "Iberia" by Reiner with the Pittsburgh Symphony (Set 491, $3.68). Its one fault is that when the volume is set correctly for the loud passages it is incorrect for some of the soft ones. Thus, at the beginning of the last movement what should be the soft, distant sound of the flute passage of the second movement (marked pp and encore plus lointain by Debussy) is loud and near; the twenty-two measures in which the first movement dies out are also too loud and near; and I could cite other instances. The performance is good; the work is one of Debussy's most marvelous scores; the set, therefore, is a must.

Only one of Victor's February orchestral recordings has arrived so far: Strauss's "Rosenkavalier" waltzes, performed by Ormandy in an exaggerated Viennese waltz style that is as ludicrous as it is tasteless (18390, $1). And as it happens the only other February item that I can report on is the complete recording of Chopin's Waltzes played by Brailovsky (Sets 863 and 864, $4.50 and $3.50). The best known of these pieces are quite charming; the few that are rarely if ever played—Op. 69 No. 2, Op. 70 Nos. 2 and 3, each on one side of the three records in Set 864—turn out to be uninteresting. Brailovsky's performances are in the affected, capricious, and sentimental style that most people think proper for Chopin; and they are recorded with excellent fidelity to timbre, but with occasional rattles, and with several crackling or gritty surfaces in my review copy.

The way of playing Chopin that most people think proper and I do not is to distort the shape of the piece in order to exaggerate its emotional content. The way of playing him that I think proper and most people do not is one in which emotional insight operates through, and is restrained by, a sense for plastic coherence in form. And this way was heard in Webster Aitken's magnificent performances of the Twenty-Four Preludes at his recent Town Hall recital—magnificent as forms in sound, and through these as poetic communications. Aitken's recitals are occasions at which he presents to the public whatever music has occupied his mind; and in the past this has been matters like Beethoven's "Hammerklavier" Sonata, Bach's "Goldberg" Variations, Schubert's Sonatas. But this time he turned out to have been absorbed in four arid little Duets of Bach, in which his phrasing was exciting for itself; and in Debussy's Twelve Etudes, which were the occasion for a display of stunning pianistic eloquence in a vacuum—the musical vacuum of those elaborations of Debussyan idiom and style. On April 15 at the Y.M.H.A. this eloquence will be displayed in music more worthy of it—Beethoven's Sonatas Op. 28, 81a, and "Hammerklavier."

Dr. Niebuhr on the Jews: First Honest Analysis

Dear Sirs: I wish to congratulate you on the publication of Reinhold Niebuhr's articles, Jews After the War, in your issues of February 21 and 28. They are the first utterance in any American magazine that attempts a profound and honest analysis of the problem instead of indulging in flattering generalities. It is my conviction that an article such as this does more toward the solution of so intricate a problem than a dozen interfaith meetings.

In Brandeis's Footsteps

Dear Sirs: The publication of Reinhold Niebuhr's Jews After the War was a noteworthy event. It is heartening to know that a distinguished spokesman for genuine American liberalism understands the essence of the Jewish problem. Liberal and progressive Americans honor the late Justice Brandeis, and it is encouraging to note that they are also willing to accept his basic conception of Americanism and to support the cause of Zionism to which he was so zealously devoted.

A People Needs a Country

Dear Sirs: . . . I was particularly gratified to find in The Nation an unbiased and correct appraisal of the Zionist movement by a Christian authority who has earned for himself an enviable reputation as a great thinker, philosopher, and logician. . . . It is high time that the voices of liberal opinion in America should cease treating the Jews as a religious sect which in a free and democratic world is entitled to "toleration." Any casual survey of recorded history will reveal them as a distinct ethnic group or people. As such they must have a base or homeland of their own just as other peoples have, without prejudice to their rights of citizenship in any other country of their birth or adoption.

I have read much in The Nation about the anticipated post-war settlement in which Poland, Norway, Denmark, Belgium, France, etc., will be resurrected. This, of course, is elementary justice. But no such settlement will have any permanent value in the society of the future unless the Jewish question is dealt with realistically, and Jews too are treated as a people instead of as refugees.

Zionism a Counsel of Despair

Dear Sirs: Dr. Niebuhr deserves, and doubtless will receive, many thanks from Jews for his sincere effort to provide a solution for the vexing Jewish problem, but in his eagerness to lay that famous ghost he seems to have simplified the question too much and to have provided a confusing and inadequate answer.

The desirability and possibility of a settlement of Jews in Palestine was demonstrated before the rise of Hitlerism. That scourge has made the Jewish National Home a crying need. The establishment of a strong, populous Jewish settlement in Palestine will be one of the first and most urgent tasks of civilization after the war.

But will it provide a solution for the Jewish problem, which is fundamentally one of the relationship between Jews and non-Jews? The principal tenet of Zionist philosophy is that the attempt to solve the cluster of problems—social, economic, political, psychological, religious, and so on—arising from this relationship has been an absolute failure; that those problems can only be solved by the removal of the Jews to a place where they can be by themselves. This fundamental faith denies any possibility of solving the Jewish problem outside Palestine. Yet the problem itself is based on the assumption that relationship between Jews and non-Jews is not only possible but unavoidable, and that the home of the Jews is the place of their birth or adoption. The success or failure of Zionism, therefore, has little bearing on the Jewish problem.

Assuming that one million or two million Jews can be settled in Palestine after the war, how will that solve the problem of the other fourteen or fifteen million Jews in the rest of the world? Will Dr. Niebuhr contend that anti-Semites in the United States, Germany, and Poland will be less virulent if they know that Jews have a home of their own in Palestine? Would not the reverse be the case? Would not the successful removal of several million Jews from their native homes be rather an encouragement to the anti-Semites to increase their activities? That is what actually happened in Poland before the war; the success of the Zionist experiment spurred the Polish anti-Semites to a more intensified campaign.

I am not advancing this as an argument against Zionism. Anti-Semites will never be satisfied no matter what the Jews do, but by the same logic, the success of Zionism cannot possibly affect the position of the Jews in the diaspora. The sphere of Zionism is Palestine. There it has done and is doing excellent work, but when an attempt is made to apply Zionist principles and philosophy to Jewish life outside Palestine, the Jewish problem is complicated, not solved. Dr. Niebuhr's articles are excellent proof of this. He is clear and convincing so long as he argues for the establishment of a National Home in Palestine or elsewhere, but he becomes obscure and highly confusing as soon as he tries to apply his nationalistic principles to Jewish life outside Palestine, for instance, in the United States.

One gathers from Dr. Niebuhr that Jews in America, as elsewhere, are a distinct social group, unmistakably different from the larger American group by reason of some mysterious qualities which cannot be clearly stated because they are neither cultural, religious, nor racial alone. In fact, Dr. Niebuhr tells us that it is not only futile but wrong for American Jews to try to sink their group differences in the larger American culture. They render no service either to democracy or to their own people by doing so, he says. It appears that what used to be known in former days as Americanization is a cultural vulgarity and almost an ethical offense if practiced by the Jews. Yet Dr. Niebuhr does not seem to find anything wrong in the same process going on among other nationalities in the United States. The Jews alone seem to be sentenced to a kind of eternal cultural and spiritual isolation, from which they can escape only by removing themselves to a place of their own in Palestine, or in some other place—perhaps Madagascar.

One is somehow depressed by such a statement despite the terms of ultra-modern and super-refined liberalism in which it is couched. And no wonder, for there is a distinct echo of racialism in it, even if the racialism is named "cultural pluralism."

It is understandable, even excusable, for Jews in the face of their present tragedy to lose faith in humanity and to wish to slam the door on the world. But for non-Jewish liberals to offer such counsel of despair to the Jews as a solution of their problem is very disheartening.

WILLIAM ZUCKERMAN

The Jewish Will to Survive

Dear Sirs: Dr. Niebuhr's article was like a clear strong wind blowing away the cobwebs and the musty odor of a house long closed to air and sunlight.

"Those Jews who do not feel themselves engaged by a collective will to live have a perfect right to be so disengaged," he says. No liberal Christian will challenge that, nor will the Jew who recognizes "Jewish nationality [as] something more than race and less than nationhood" be able to deflect the instinct of assimilative annihilation among those others. But history tells a tale of the Jewish mass will to survive, and for millions of Jews Zionism is the expression of that will.

Granted that in another civilization or perhaps in an advanced phase of our civilization the Jews might survive as a nationality scattered among nations, it is nevertheless tragically unrealistic to offer that solution now. Dr. Niebuhr is both realist and scholar when he states that he regards answers to the Jewish problem which do not take basic ethnic facts into consideration as expressions of a premature universalism.

Mr. MacDonald Objects

Dear Sirs: As a Nation contributor and an old friend and admirer of Victor Serge, I'd like to be allowed a few comments on the exchange between a group of Mexicans and German refugees, several of whom are known Stalinists, and the editors of The Nation which appeared in The Nation for February 28.

The letter attacks in violent language Richard H. Rovere's article in a recent Nation exposing the political motives behind the charges, made chiefly in Toledano's own paper, El Popular, that five left-wing refugees in Mexico are Nazi agents. The letter repeats the charge and refers to "proofs" that are alleged to be in the hands of a committee of the Mexican Congress. Although the letter does not even hint what these "proofs" are, and although Rovere is an assistant editor of The Nation, the editors of The Nation reply in effect by washing their hands of the whole business. One of the five refugees under attack, Gustav Regler, is strongly indorsed; another, Victor Serge, is less positively indorsed; and the other three are abandoned under the rubric: "We cannot answer for the character of all the persons who have been under attack in Mexico."

On February 9 a letter signed by 200 prominent Americans was sent to President Camacho demanding that he afford protection to the five refugees. That letter did "answer" for the anti-fascist character of these men. "It is a matter of public record," it said, "that all of these men have for years been active anti-fascists." Among the signers were Governor Culbert Olson of California, Thomas Mann, Dorothy Thompson, Matthew Woll, David Dubinsky, Freda Kirchwey, and four other editors of The Nation.

Now, am I right in assuming that what is at issue is not the general political beliefs of these refugees but certain specific charges of past and present collaboration with the Nazis in Europe and now in Mexico?

The letter from Mexico implies that anyone who opposes the present war is an agent of Hitler. With consummate tactical skill it refers only once to the issue—are these men the "shock troops of the Nazi fifth column" as charged?—and devotes most of its space to attacking their line on the war. It's not at all clear to me whether The Nation accepts this reasoning or not. Its apparent change of heart about these refugees implies that it does, since the letter from Mexico adduces no evidence that Serge and his partners are "Axis agents" beyond their alleged general political attitude toward the war.

It seems to me important for all of us who are still concerned about political morality to become clear on this. Does one or does one not become a tool of fascism, in The Nation's eyes, if one opposes the present conduct of the war as imperialistic? Can liberals still distinguish between Nazi agents and revolutionary working-class socialists? At the very moment that Gorkin, a former leader of the P. O. U. M., for example, is being slandered by his Communist opponents as a Nazi agent, fourteen leading members of the P. O. U. M. have just been condemned by a Vichy court to years of imprisonment at hard labor for "having maintained or reformed in France a political party capable of injuring the safety of the French state." The Nation has made its attitude toward Vichy clear enough. Is it willing to believe, on the mere word of his bitter political enemies, that a leader of a group even now being punished for "injuring the safety" of this Nazi stooge regime, that such a man—whatever one's political disagreement with him—is likely to be an Axis agent?

DWIGHT MACDONALD

New York, March 1

[Since this letter by Mr. MacDonald voices a point of view expressed by several other friends of the refugees under attack in Mexico, it is evident that The Nation did not make its position clear in the answer to the protest from Mexico. This time we would like to be as explicit as possible and then drop the subject for good. The Nation's answer was not intended to "cast suspicion" on Gorkin, Pivert, or Muniz. Our purpose was to insist for a second time that men should not be threatened or attacked for their political beliefs. We cited specifically the records of Serge and Regler for two reasons: first, because we know both men well enough, either through their work or personally, to be able to judge at first hand the character of the charges leveled against them; and, second, because their public support of the war against the Axis itself contradicts those charges.

Mr. MacDonald asks whether we believe that one becomes a tool of fascism "if one opposes the present conduct of the war as imperialistic." This is a political catch question. The Nation itself, supporting the war from the start, has frequently criticized the way it was conducted. The real question is whether a person becomes a tool of fascism if he opposes the war itself—not merely its "present conduct"—as imperialistic. To that question our answer is yes.

Fascism asks no more of anyone than opposition to the war as an imperialist adventure. Nevertheless, a tool is not an agent, though Mr. MacDonald seems to use the words interchangeably. The attitude and activities of these men do not make them "Nazi agents" or justify threats against them or attacks upon them by Communists.—THE EDITORS OF THE NATION.]

The Shape of Things

HITLER IS PLAGUED BY JACKAL TROUBLE. Just at the moment when he is calling on the Axis puppets for large new contingents of cannon fodder for his spring campaign, two of his allies have started snarling viciously between themselves. Hungary and Rumania both seem much more anxious to fight each other than to continue battle against the Russians. The bone of contention is Transylvania, the division of which, as dictated by Hitler in the Vienna agreement, left both claimants unsatisfied. In a recent speech Michael Antonescu, brother of the Rumanian Premier and acting Foreign Minister, declared: "During the past year we have been victims of grave offenses and provocations. . . . Northern Transylvania, cradle of our country, was submitted to a regime of oppression and humiliations." Replying to this speech, Count Bela Teleki, spokesman for Transylvania in the Hungarian Parliament, asserted: "We must take action to insure that the shameful conditions [in southern or Rumanian Transylvania], under which Hungarian nationals are robbed of all their possessions and are oppressed, end immediately." The exchange of accusations and insults is now being taken up by the press of both countries, and there are reports of concentrations of Rumanian and Hungarian troops along the Transylvanian frontier. Most significant of all is a story from Berne to the effect that Premier Antonescu is negotiating with Dr. Juliu Maniu, leader of the Rumanian peasants and a stout anti-Nazi whose popularity is such that the Nazis have not dared to touch him. Maniu is said to demand as a basis for cooperation the withdrawal of Rumania from the Axis pact. This may be a bigger price than Antonescu can afford to pay, but he is said to have agreed that no more Rumanian troops shall be sent to Russia unless Hungary makes equal sacrifices.

IT IS CLEAR FROM MOSCOW DISPATCHES that German resistance has stiffened all along the vast Russian front. Soviet troops still seem to be making some progress in most areas, but none of the chief German strong points have fallen. Some are surrounded and others under severe attack, but so far the German defensive strategy appears to have worked successfully. In the past few days both the tempo of the Soviet attack and the strength of German resistance have been intensified. For the first time in months we read reports of the extensive use of Nazi planes. Eighty-eight were reported destroyed this last week-end—seventeen brought down by Soviet-flown British Hurricanes at the approaches to Moscow. Particularly encouraging is the announced arrival behind the Soviet lines of a number of American Airacobra planes, said to be superior to the latest German Messerschmitts. The Russians are also reported to have a considerable number of sixty-ton and ninety-ton tanks in reserve for the expected Nazi spring offensive. Talk of an early break between Japan and the Soviet Union has been checked, temporarily at least, by a one-year renewal of the Soviet-Japanese fisheries agreement that expired last December. It is fairly clear that the Soviet Union will not initiate war with Japan until Great Britain and the United States have opened up a second front in Europe. Recent speeches by Litvinov point clearly in this direction. What Japan will do remains anyone's guess.

EVIDENCE PRESENTED AT THE RIOM TRIAL continues to reveal appalling inefficiency in the war leadership of the French generals, many of whom are today in positions of high responsibility in the Vichy regime. All the witnesses testifying before the court have stressed the failure of the French air fleet to render assistance to its troops in the desperate days of May, 1940. Yet Daladier has pointed out that France still had 4,200 planes, including 1,600 first-line craft in the unoccupied zone in June of that year. He said that 750 anti-aircraft guns, or enough for fourteen divisions, fell into German hands at the French supply depots. In view of the revelations, it is little wonder that Fernand de Brinon, Vichy envoy to the German authorities in Paris, is reported to have suggested that the Riom trial be dropped "as detrimental to the interests of [Vichy] France." Some observers have declared that the trials indicate that Vichy is not as supine in its relationship to Germany as is commonly supposed. There is, however, little other evidence to support this view. French policy continues to come as close to outright collaboration with the Reich as is possible without actual entry into the war. The Riom trials prove, however, that the French courts are resisting Nazi dictation just as the German courts did in the first years of Hitler's regime.

THE APPOINTMENT OF RICHARD G. CASEY AS a member of the British War Cabinet and its representative in the Middle East has had the unexpected result of calling attention to the dissatisfaction felt by Australia because it is not allowed to share in the formation of war policies. Prime Minister Churchill apparently thought that the appointment of Casey would ease the strain which had arisen between London and Canberra. But it happened that Prime Minister Curtin of Australia preferred to have Casey retain his post as Minister to the United States, and was indignant when Churchill overrode his desires in the matter. The real reason for Curtin's wish to keep Casey in Washington came out a day or so later when Herbert Evatt, the Australian Minister of External Affairs, arrived in Washington with a proposal that the War Council which determines Pacific strategy should sit in Washington and that Australia and New Zealand should have full representation on it. It was, of course, the Australian government's intention to have Casey represent it on this council. At present Australia has a member on the Southwestern Pacific Council, which sits in London, but basic military decisions are made in Washington by a body which contains no delegate from the British dominions. The problem of working out effective representation for the smaller partners in the war effort of the United Nations, while maintaining efficient centralization of control, is a difficult one. But surely no country has a better claim to recognition than the dominion which is now carrying the heaviest part of the struggle against Japan.

A WARNING AGAINST ANTI-LABOR HYSTERIA has been issued in an unexpected quarter. The Wall Street Journal of March 23 enters a plea against hasty and vindictive legislation designed to overthrow present federal labor policy. This is news of the man-bites-dog variety. Of course, the major organ of big business has not experienced a Pauline conversion. It is as much against the National Labor Relations Act and the wage-and-hour law as ever, but unlike the Scripps-Howard press, it has some conception of the ultimate implications of Representative Howard Smith's bill. Repeal of the forty-hour law, it realizes, would not necessarily lengthen the working week. But it would mean a cut in pay encouraging and legitimatizing a demand for higher hourly rates. That could prove awkward after the war. It realizes, too, though it does not say so directly, that abrogation by law of union contracts limiting hours would provide a precedent for legislative abrogation of contracts between corporations and the government. And, indeed, if overtime pay is ruled out by Congress, it will be essential to revise every defense contract which in fixing prices took into account the payment of overtime rates. The Wall Street Journal fears that coercion of labor of the kind advocated by Representative Smith and others may prove a "totalitarian beginning" which will lead to other and less desirable totalitarian ends. "If we put a ceiling on wages," it points out, "we will put it on profits. If we demand that a worker shall take part of his pay in defense bonds, why should not also a Congressman or an editor?" We don't indorse all the arguments in this inverted special pleading against a crack-down on labor, but they seem worth the attention of the prairie firebugs discussed by Mr. Stone on a later page.

IT IS NOT A SHORTAGE OF OIL BUT A shortage of transport which has made necessary the War Production Board's order to reduce deliveries of gasoline by 20 per cent to dealers in Eastern Atlantic and Northwest Pacific states. The U-boats have been successful in picking off a number of tankers; others have had to be diverted from their regular routes to supply United Nations forces in distant parts of the world. Australia, for instance, which formerly depended on the Netherlands Indies for its oil supplies, must now draw on this country or Iran, and in both cases long and hazardous voyages are necessary. The result is that those parts of the United States which have hitherto depended on tankers for oil must curtail non-essential gasoline consumption or risk a shortage of heating and industrial fuels. Secretary Ickes, the Petroleum Coordinator, has declared that dealer rationing is only a preliminary step and that consumer rationing cards will follow as soon as a system can be organized. This proposed measure has been attacked by the gasoline dealers and the Automobile Association, but it seems to us the only reasonably fair method of distributing the reduced supply. The dealers fear it will encourage "price chiseling" by dealers scrambling to collect coupons and thus swell their total volume. On the other hand, we expect that the method of restricting consumption by rationing dealers, while admissable as a stopgap, is going to cause headaches to dealers and their customers alike. The former must give preference to various classes of consumers, such as physicians and truckers, and will then have to decide how to allot what remains among other consumers. The system is certain to encourage the payment of premiums and evasion of price ceilings.

THE U-BOAT CAMPAIGN OFF THE ATLANTIC coast appears to be gaining headway despite the increasing vigilance of our patrol forces. Losses have not been large in relation to the total number of ships which daily ply the sea lanes along our coast, but they are large enough to cause concern. Fortunately, there are reasons to believe that conditions will improve. The navy has announced that the number of patrol vessels will be substantially increased within a few weeks. Great Britain has sent planes to Cuba to join in the submarine hunt. Furthermore, it has been found that losses can be kept down by restricting shipping to specified northbound and southbound coastal lanes during the daylight hours, and requesting all vessels to put into port at night. This plan has been tried with satisfactory results, and if it is put into full operation, losses should be cut to a minimum.

EARL BROWDER HAS BEEN IN PRISON FOR a year now, and this week the Communists are holding a demonstration in New York to urge his release. It has been The Nation's position since Browder's conviction a year and a half ago that while the government's case against the Communist leader was legitimate, the penalty was unjust. He was given a $2,000 fine and four years in federal penitentiary for failing to inform the authorities that a passport he had used during the Spanish war was not his first. No evidence was introduced to show that the offense had serious consequences, nor was there any precedent for imposing so heavy a sentence. The truth is that Browder's case was brought to trial at a time when Communist opposition to the war and the American defense program had aroused strong public resentment, and the severity of the sentence was a measure of the party's unpopularity. Earl Browder is in Atlanta Penitentiary because he is a Communist; all precedents would indicate that if he had not been a Communist he would have received either a reprimand or at most a small fine. This fact alone is sufficient argument for his release.

The Guthrie Case

IT MAY be no coincidence that the "prairie fire" against labor and the forty-hour week which I. F. Stone examines on page 358 flared up just at the moment when the resignation from the War Production Board of Robert R. Guthrie, a conservative business man, called attention to the extent to which some of the dollar-a-year men were still holding up the all-out conversion of industry for war purposes. The lag in output of many kinds of war material is a fact, but there is little evidence to show that it is due to strikes—which have almost ceased since Pearl Harbor—or to the forty-hour week. On the other hand there is plenty of evidence of corporations putting profits before defense, of industries clinging tenaciously to inventories needed for war production, of the reluctance of private business to give up the manufacture of civilian luxuries and to make use of substitute materials.

This is the situation which has been dramatically exposed by Mr. Guthrie's resignation. It is also the situation from which the propagandists of the National Association of Manufacturers are strenuously endeavoring to distract attention by grabbing the headlines for the "little man's" revolt against union labor.

The rules for the employment of dollar-a-year men include a provision that no person shall be employed in any position in which he will make decisions directly affecting the affairs of his own company. But if the testimony of Mr. Guthrie and other WPB executives is to be believed, this rule is honored in the letter rather than in the spirit. We are told, for instance, that Philip D. Reed, chairman of the board of General Electric, who is chief of the Bureau of Industry Branches, opposed Mr. Guthrie's proposals for ending the production of radios, of which General Electric is one of the major manufacturers. Another dollar-a-year man, Kenneth Marriner—formerly connected with a wool-manufacturing firm—was said to be instrumental in blocking proposals for blending wool with other materials so as to stretch the limited supplies available for civilian use.

It is to the credit of Production Chief Donald Nelson that he should have asked for an investigation of the Guthrie case by the Truman committee, one of the few Congressional committees which can be trusted to go into the story thoroughly, letting dollar-a-year chips fall where they may. Unfortunately, Mr. Guthrie was subpoenaed by the Faddis subcommittee of the House Military Affairs Committee before the Truman committee could hear him, and the Faddis subcommittee is one of the most reactionary of the Congressional bodies investigating the arms program. Charles I. Faddis of Pennsylvania, chairman of the subcommittee, is a Democrat, but he is as bitterly opposed to the New Deal as any of the most benighted bourbons from the poll-tax states. J. P. Thomas of New Jersey, one of the leading lights of the Dies committee, is the ranking member of the Faddis subcommittee. The general counsel for the committee, H. Ralph Burton, was counsel to Father Coughlin and the National Union for Social Justice in the 1936 Presidential campaign. So far the subcommittee has turned in three reports—one whitewashing the Aluminum Company of America, the second praising the dollar-a-year men, and the third smearing the Rural Electrification Administration in Arkansas.

It is to be hoped that the Truman committee will soon rescue Guthrie from the Faddis subcommittee and give him the full hearing he deserves. It is important to labor and to the Administration that his case be fully aired, for it will show where the real faults of our arms effort lie and what steps must be taken to correct them.

A Pacific Offensive?

A WAVE of optimism has swept over the United Nations as a result of General MacArthur's assumption of supreme command in the Pacific. In part it may be attributed to the drama of his journey from the Philippines to Australia in the face of supposed Japanese mastery of the sea and air. Psychologically, the people of the United Nations needed just such a remarkable exploit to relieve the pessimism engendered by the seemingly never-ending series of Japanese successes. But fundamentally the optimism is based on a general recognition of MacArthur's abilities. Certainly no other military leader has yet appeared in the United Nations who possesses MacArthur's combination of experience in military leadership, knowledge of the Pacific area, and fighting qualities.

Considerable credit must be given to President Roosevelt for the decision to move MacArthur to his present post. It will be recalled that many of the anti-Administration newspapers had been urging that he be brought home to take charge of America's defenses. There had even been hints that the President was afraid to "save" MacArthur lest the General run against him in the 1944 elections. If anything had happened to MacArthur in his hazardous journey to Australia, we can be sure that these papers would have placed the responsibility directly upon Mr. Roosevelt. Yet the President took the risk because, as he himself pointed out, winning the war must come before all other considerations.

The first reaction in many circles to MacArthur's shift has been the assumption that the United Nations would now take the offensive against the Japanese. MacArthur himself seemed to confirm this assumption when he declared that he was sent "for the purpose . . . of organizing an American offensive against Japan." It would be unfortunate, however, if the public concluded from this statement that a large-scale offensive against the Japanese would be launched within the next few days or weeks. For the moment MacArthur is bound to have his hands much too full defending Australia to initiate any sweeping counterblows. During the coming weeks there may be periods when it will be nip and tuck whether Australia can be held. But if anyone can hold it, Douglas MacArthur is the man. His record in the Philippines shows that he can not only fight a skilful defensive battle against great odds but attack with vigor when the opportunity presents itself. We can be sure that in the midst of essentially defensive action, he will be planning the counterblows to be delivered as soon as his forces are adequate for the task.

More than that, we see increasing indications that American strategy in the Pacific is being shaped in the direction of a more vigorous use of such resources as we have for carrying the war to the enemy. This is evident in the powerful air attacks delivered last week against Japanese convoys off New Guinea. It is perhaps even more evident in the appointment of Lieutenant General Stilwell to direct Chinese and American forces operating in Burma, and concurrently as chief of staff of the Chinese armies in China itself. For it should be obvious that the most telling blows that can be delivered against Japan at present will not be in Australia, where American and Australian forces may soon be battling against odds, but in Burma, Thailand, and China, where action can be launched against Japan's lengthening lines of communication and even against the Japanese islands themselves. An offensive from Australia can be achieved only with naval as well as air superiority. For the moment the disaster in the Java Sea has left the United Nations without even an adequate defense force in the South Pacific—although there are reports that this situation may soon be rectified. In Burma, Thailand, and China what is required for successful offensive action is land and air superiority. On land the Chinese alone have troops which, if properly equipped, could drive the Japanese into the sea; India could provide unlimited man-power. British and American pilots have so far maintained superiority in the air. Given supplies—and they appear to be arriving despite the loss of the Rangoon end of the Burma road—and cooperation from India, a real offensive can be launched in this area. Unfortunately, India's vast resources are tied up pending political action by Britain. Fully effective offensive action may depend more on Cripps's journey to India than on MacArthur's spectacular flight to Australia.

Curb the Fascist Press!

BY FREDA KIRCHWEY

THE fascist press in the United States should be suppressed. It is a menace to freedom and an obstacle to winning the war. To protect it in the name of democracy is an evidence of timidity, not of self-confidence. A self-confident nation takes whatever steps are necessary to secure its existence; it does not allow its institutions to be used by its enemies as weapons for its own destruction.

Many good liberals who support the war believe that the fascist press in the United States is no menace. They think it can safely be ignored or its effect offset by pro-democratic counter-propaganda. They think suppression would be more dangerous than the thing suppressed. They say, The American people can be trusted to reject treasonable, anti-democratic arguments. They ask, How can you draw the line between treason and defeatism or ordinary isolationism? They argue that opinion as such should never be suppressed, that any limitation on the expression of opinion may lead to repression of all opposition to or criticism of the government.

This, roughly, is the position of our Attorney General. Mr. Biddle remembers the attacks on pacifists and "reds" and dissenters generally that disgraced the country during and after the First World War, and he is determined to prevent another epidemic of witch-hunting—legal and extra-legal. His attitude has undoubtedly spared us many nasty incidents, and we have good reason to be grateful for his democratic conscience; but I think his fears of indiscriminate repression have led him to underestimate both the dangers we face and the capacity of a liberal government—with a liberal Attorney General—to distinguish between enemies and traitors on the one hand and loyal critics on the other. Risks are inevitable in war time; a Biddle might be replaced by a Martin Dies. And even a Biddle can make mistakes. But in my opinion such risks are not so great or so immediate as the danger of an unchecked fascist press.

I use the word "fascist" deliberately. It is not a perfect word, and a semanticist would censor it immediately. But it covers better than any other the varieties of opinion I believe should be prohibited the use of the mails. The fascist press includes such out-and-out pro-Axis papers as still exist; it includes also the publications of native fascists like Pelley and Deatherage and of Jew-baiters, Britain-haters, and foes of democracy like Coughlin. There are a lot of these in the country, and their considerable circulation is increased by millions of pamphlets and throw-aways preaching the same gospel. All of them should be suppressed.

It is not enough to watch them and wait till they propose some overt act such as rebellion among the armed troops or the assassination of the President. It is not safe to discount them as the mouthpieces of individual cranks and crackpot minorities. It is necessary to consider them, and the democratic safeguards behind which they carry on their work, in the context of the movement of which they are a part.

Fascism invariably uses cranks and dissatisfied minorities as its fifth column in all the countries it attacks. The treason press in the United States, small or large, is an integral part of the fascist offensive. These miserable sheets are enemy paraphernalia whether they are edited by sixth-generation Americans or first-generation Germans. This war is only incidentally a national war. Primarily it is a war against the whole future society for which these papers clamor. Their attacks on democratic methods, their filthy slanders of the President, their lies about Jews, as well as the open aid and comfort they offer to the Axis, combine to make them fit subjects for suppression. They should be exterminated exactly as if they were enemy machine-gun nests in the Bataan jungle. And in wiping them out we shall be forced to admit that "opinion" can no longer be considered a sacred prerogative of our enemies just because they happen to be fighting within our borders. Opinion is one of their most effective weapons, and to allow them to use it against us is reckless to the point of insanity.

It has been argued that the worst dangers of anti-democratic propaganda can be averted by a policy of forcing full publicity about its source. Morris Ernst, for example, believes that disclosure rather than repression is the best method of control. He would not drive Father Coughlin off the air or suppress Social Justice but would force him to disclose publicly the sources of his funds and the individuals or organizations for whom he speaks. Such compulsory disclosure, like the registration of agents of alien firms or governments, might serve as a check, but it would be a minor one at best. The limits on its usefulness are immediately apparent. Concealment of sources of funds is not difficult; it has been practiced consistently and successfully, and even the threat of federal action would not end it. Undoubtedly, if we had a law compelling exposure, some pro-fascist persons and groups, skulking behind false names, would be exposed and jailed; that would be useful, just as the imprisonment of Viereck is a good thing. But only the careless would be caught. And even when exposure is successfully enforced, the effect may be unimportant. Not every purveyor of fascist poison is paid by Hitler or the Mikado. Many are subsidized by the pennies of their own followers; Coughlin himself must get a large part of his support from sympathizers—isolationists, anti-British Irish, Christian Fronters. Even some wealthy, "respectable" citizens have openly backed pro-fascist enterprises. Publicity would weaken the fascist press but it would not kill it.

Nor can we depend upon the health of the democratic community to throw off the infection. The people of the United States are certainly behind the war and against fascism, foreign or domestic. But the ills of our social system offer the anti-democratic propagandist powerful ammunition to shove into his guns. Racial discrimination, poverty, insecurity are used by the enemy press to attack the morale of large numbers of people. The ills are real; their cure is not to be found in substituting tyranny for an imperfect democracy. But the alternatives are not set forth. Instead, the genuine grievances of the people are inflamed and their unity and fighting spirit undermined. It is foolish to pretend that Americans are immune to this sort of attack. We are neither wiser nor better fortified than were our brothers in countries that today are captive units in the fascist new order.

The best lesson we can take from their fate is the necessity of action while there still is time to act. Tolerance, democratic safeguards, trust in public enlightenment—these happy peace-time techniques have demonstrated their inadequacy. Two methods are open to us: suppression and a vigorous counter-attack. Both should be used. The organs of the party-line fascists are easy to identify and should be put out of business without delay. The fellow-travelers should be watched—and fought. McCormick and Hearst and Patterson are more dangerous than the out-and-out fascists both because they are not out-and-out fascists and because the circulation of their papers is enormous. Their defeatist arguments and misleading information must be met by an unceasing barrage of counter-propaganda; the recent speech by Archibald MacLeish was an excellent example of the way they should be handled. And the moment they skid across the thin line that divides their doctrine from open treason they should face the full blast of the law.

I don't deny that a policy of suppressing enemy propaganda involves difficult problems of differentiation and danger of such errors as the British government has stumbled into in its attack on the London Daily Mirror. But I believe those problems and dangers must be faced. The last ten years are strewed with the wreckage of democratic governments that refused to take strong measures until it was too late. The United States has a healthy instinct for self-preservation, and we have still a good chance to reject the technique of democratic suicide perfected in Europe.

All-Out Against Labor

BY I. F. STONE

Washington, March 22

ADMINISTRATION leaders have rarely been as worried as they are by the growing clamor against the forty-hour week. A batch of newspapers from the Southwest, where the campaign first appeared, makes it easier to understand the letters and telegrams flooding Congress with demands for anti-labor legislation. "The Little People," declares the Oklahoma City Times in a front-page editorial, "are tired of 40-hour-week war production and 168-hour-week fighting." The Memphis Commercial Appeal publishes a Letter from an Arkansas Father in which John C. Sheffield of Helena, Arkansas, asks, "Do our boys at the front get 'overtime' and 'double time' in the fox holes of the Philippines?"

But this is more than a campaign against the payment of overtime. In the appeals being made by the anti-labor press there is a flavor of civil war. "Customarily," the Tulsa World said editorially, "the wrath of the people in a war country is against the military enemy. Now the United States faces domestic foes, and wrath is being turned inwardly instead of outwardly." Where is the real enemy? Roger Babson's article of March 15 was given banner headlines: "End Forty-Hour Week or Be Hitler Slaves." Babson wrote, "Our most dangerous enemy for today is not Hitler. It is not Japan. It is our own refusal to give up selfish privileges for the duration of the war. From the evidence at hand I regret to say that labor seems to be one of the worst offenders." The Daily Oklahoman in the same issue with that article asked, "Are the people of this country fighting for the preservation of American liberty or merely to make the world safe for labor racketeers?" From Brownfield, Texas, five hundred County Terry citizens sent Senator Connally a telegram: "When we hear of strikes and factories running only five days a week it makes us so mad that we are ready to shoot, kill, or murder somebody, if we only knew whom to shoot."

H. V. Kaltenborn's anti-labor broadcasts have been one of the precipitants of this furor, and he is proud of his work. "Oklahoma," he said in his Sunday-night broadcast of March 15, "has touched a match to a prairie fire that will sweep the country." The "objective" Associated Press was as lyrical. Most of Oklahoma's delegation in Congress, according to an AP story, have been "stirred to action by a prairie fire of protest from the state's grass roots" and have taken a stand "for outlawing strikes and suspending the forty-hour week." The prairie fire is being tended solicitously. In Oklahoma City the Civitan Club opened an office "to furnish writing material and stenographers for men and women wishing to express to members of the Congressional delegation their attitude on the war-production effort." Newspapers printed anti-forty-hour-week petitions to be circulated by their readers. Even the school children were drafted. At the Jackson Junior High in Oklahoma City pupils gave up part of their lunch money to send telegrams, and at Roosevelt Junior High 1,300 pupils wrote letters to Congressmen.

It seems that it is not always easy to make people believe that labor and the forty-hour week are the villains. The Dallas Voiture of the 40 and 8, an American Legion unit, couldn't make up its mind whether capital or labor was to blame and compromised on a telegram to the President, Speaker Rayburn, and Senators Connally and O'Daniel which said, "We don't care what it takes to get the plants going twenty-four hours a day, but we want to get it done." Since it is widely known that most defenes plants are in fact working more than a forty-hour week, it was necessary to try to picture overtime pay as a form of sabotage. The Oklahoma City Times of March 12, while praising Nelson's "solid and courageous words Tuesday night," thought, "There is one point he might have made clearer. He inferentially criticized some employers because they did not operate overtime and pay extra. The fact is that most employers having contracts make bids which can be based only on straight time, to give the government the best possible price, and if they were to operate overtime they would soon have to go out of business. That wouldn't help defense, would it?"

The attempt from Washington to get the truth about the forty-hour week and strikes before the people made little impression. One paper called Knudsen and Admiral Land "F.D.R.'s yes men" for their testimony before the Senate Appropriations Committee. Another, unable to dispute figures on how few strikes there were, said their testimony dealt only with "the immediate status of production" and "ignored extensive racketeering in the name of organized labor." In a front-page editorial called Let the Dead Speak, the Dallas Morning News declared, "It is a strange voice that comes from Washington-as-usual to rebuke the people for getting too much in earnest about an all-out war. . . . The blood and tears cannot be limited to forty hours a week." Typical of the way the facts were twisted is the resolution adopted by a meeting at Enid, Oklahoma: "With the head of the New Jersey C. I. O. announcing that a complete investigation shows the war-production plants of that state to be operating at only 50 per cent capacity, and with this same condition prevalent throughout the United States, a Congress bankrupt of public spirit is betraying this country and its armed forces by an abject surrender to conscienceless labor leaders, reinforced by a farm bloc under a threat by the C. I. O."

Few voices were allowed from the other side. On Thursday, March 12, at a "spontaneous" meeting in Oklahoma City announced several days in advance, with five-minute speakers and a brass band, Charles Schwoerke, a local labor attorney who expected to be inducted into the army the following week, managed to speak. "We can't afford to array class against class," Schwoerke said. "There hasn't been a defense strike in Oklahoma since the war period started. How can they say the forty-hour week is keeping industries from operating when there are 6,000 workers in this town today that want to do something for Uncle Sam and can't get a job?"

E. K. Gaylord and the Associated Industries of Oklahoma seem to be the chief local organizers of this anti-labor campaign. Gaylord is an Oklahoma City newspaper publisher who also owns a radio station and a paper mill. Most of the other papers in the state have co-operated enthusiastically. Oklahoma's press was overwhelmingly for Landon in 1936 and for Willkie in 1940; the state itself has been in the Roosevelt column since 1932. The remnants of the America First Committee are believed to have some role in the fight against the forty-hour week. I have been able to find only one link between them. Mack Schrodes, one of the signers of the call for the anti-forty-hour-week rally in Tulsa on March 18, was chairman of the Tulsa chapter of America First and last August tried to get Lindbergh to speak in Tulsa instead of Oklahoma City.

The only answer to a campaign of this kind is a Congressional investigation. The Black inquiry into lobbying showed that Oklahoma was a fruitful source of fake telegrams during the controversy over the Wheeler-Rayburn bill. The La Follette investigation linked the Associated Industries of Oklahoma with the National Association of Manufacturers and showed how adept the N. A. M. is in providing a phony stir at the grass roots. Who has been paying for the circulation of petitions, the sending of telegrams, and the reprints of the New York World-Telegram's anti-labor editorial of March 5, Wake Up, America? This editorial and the Kaltenborn broadcasts seem to have been the principal sparks that set our Ersatz prairie fire.

Attacks on the forty-hour week are being skilfully mingled with attacks on the Rural Electrification Administration and the St. Lawrence project. A Congressional inquiry might well look into the part played in this campaign by the utilities. It might also ask a few questions of Assistant Secretary of the Navy Ralph A. Bard. Mr. Bard has a right to his "personal opinion" that the forty-hour week ought to be extended to forty-eight before overtime is paid. But the country has a right to know whether he still holds the views he presumably had when he became trustee of the anti-New Deal Crusaders before the 1936 campaign. Did Bard discuss his expression of "personal opinion" with anyone before appearing at the hearing of the Senate Appropriations Committee on Friday? This Chicago stockbroker, in any case, hurt the New Deal by his testimony and ought to be eased out of his job. We have enough anti-New Dealers here already.

The campaign against the forty-hour week is spreading throughout the South and into the North. It menaces not only labor's social gains and the New Deal's control of the House in the fall elections but the successful conduct of the war itself. If the Nazis had planned it, they could have hit on no better way to destroy national unity and hurt morale. The whole campaign has ugly fascist overtones of a native variety and springs from greedy souls and twisted minds shrewdly playing on the dismay honest folk feel over the lag in war production. Labor must be discredited, if only to distract attention from the conduct of many big business men; the tide toward labor participation in management must be stemmed—at any cost. This is the familiar suicidal tradition of those who preferred to fight "communism" rather than to fight Hitler. This is the fifth column.

Strategies for Spring

BY DONALD W. MITCHELL

WHILE the Pacific allies have sustained decisive defeats in the Far East, the greatest battle of this war or any war has continued to rage on the snow-covered steppes of Russia. Over a front of nearly 2,000 miles, from the Black Sea to the Arctic, the two largest and best armies of the present war have continued their titanic struggle. And despite the slow, abrasive, almost colorless nature of this conflict, made even less exciting by the reticent communiqués of both sides, it is the only front of the war that at present seems to hold seeds of victory for the United Nations.

Here the last four months have seen a change that at first nonplused the military experts of the West. Even now we probably do not know all the factors which combined to turn back the swift tide of German victories. Hitler's persistence in pushing forward in winter weather when his staff counseled him to form defensive lines well behind the front and the consequent replacement of many brilliant German generals aroused in the Allied public wishful speculation about a possible growing revolt in Germany. The recent recall of many of these same generals—conveniently recovered from their illnesses—is an indication that the Führer's egotism was not entirely triumphant over his common sense.

Even before December the Germans were finding it increasingly difficult to maintain lengthening lines of communication over "scorched earth" and in the face of skilful guerrilla operations. The necessity of detaching more and more troops for the protection of supply lines at a time when the Russians were drawing closer to their own source of supplies took much of the snap out of German offensives. And at the crucial moment of the threat to Moscow the long supply lines and the inadequacy of reserves, as compared to those of the Russians, spelled failure.

Perhaps too little credit has been given to the efficiency of the political and military organization of the Red Army and to its sterling morale and fighting qualities. Its ability to conduct a long retreat over home territory without serious loss of morale or military disaster deserves to take rank as a miracle of human resistance. At the start relatively green Russian troops faced Hitler's veterans. Not all the Red Army generals proved geniuses, and some square pegs were found. Budenny, for example, though a first-class soldier, proved a poor strategist and was transferred to the training of reserve troops, a type of work in which he has been extremely valuable. As soon as the less able men could be detected they were at once removed. Meanwhile under the supreme leadership of Timoshenko and of Stalin himself younger generals were developing their powers in the hard school of actual war.

The often repeated statement that the German defeats were due to the winter means little unless one has in mind the fact that the Soviets had made elaborate preparations to cope with weather difficulties while the Germans completely underestimated both Russian troops and Russian weather. Trouble with lubricating oils for tanks and planes and heavy losses among frost-bitten troops led inevitably to a lowering of German morale.

NEW WAYS OF FIGHTING

An even more important factor has been the complete revolution in the type of warfare that Russian conditions made inevitable. With relatively secure lines of communication, well-built highways, and abundant supplies of fuel, the Panzer combination of planes and tanks in which the German army excelled was irresistible. When the mobility of such weapons was decreased by frozen or non-existent supplies of gasoline and unstable footing, the entire method of warfare changed. The pace immediately slowed down to the speed of troops negotiating difficult territory on foot. Infantry and artillery, in both of which the Red Army had quantitative superiority, once more came into their own. With their best weapons largely shackled by winter conditions, the Germans went on the defensive and were forced to fight Russia's type of war—a slow, hard, costly war of attrition.

Despite the somewhat dragging character of the fighting, the Red Army generals have made repeated use of German tactics. A front of 1,800 miles has necessarily been not continuous but fluid, with considerable gaps between bodies of troops. It has therefore been possible, at least in theory, for either side to make long gains into nominally enemy territory as long as contact with large troop concentrations was avoided. In this way the Russians have been able to use the celebrated pincers tactics on a grand scale, though their tempo has been slowed up by weather conditions. Cavalry, ski troops, and parachutists have operated well ahead of the Russian spearheads, and partisans have done considerable, though probably overrated, damage behind the German lines, but the rate of advance has been determined by the infantry. In many cases these tactics have brought about the encirclement of large forces of the enemy. Such isolated islands of resistance are then left for the artillery to reduce as the main forces push on. However, German troops, though surrounded, have proved fully as difficult to destroy or capture as were Russians earlier in the war. Resistance has been kept up by means of supplies transported by air, and the reduction of pockets has proved costly to both sides.

Faced by an enemy superior in both numbers and artillery, the German army has been steadily losing ground. But even its retreats are ominous. Though forced, they have been orderly and careful; at no time have the Germans been pressed into anything approaching a rout.

After four months of steady progress the Red Army can point to definite and valuable achievements. Between 20 and 25 per cent of the area conquered by the German drive has now been retaken. In the north the Finns have lost most of their earlier gains. The siege of Leningrad has been lifted, and Moscow has been put out of danger for some time to come. More important, some of the bases intended by the Germans for use in launching a spring offensive have been seized; other vitally important points, such as Smolensk, are in peril and may well be retaken before summer weather arrives. In the south the gains are less impressive. The occupation of Rostov and of the eastern end of the Crimean Peninsula has closed, at least for the moment, the easiest paths to the Caucasus, but the rich agricultural and metal resources of the Ukraine are still in German hands. They have so far proved of less value than was expected, and their loss has not crippled the Russian war effort, but continued occupation will afford the Germans a chance to develop them. In the Ukraine every Russian thrust at valuable territory has been followed by sharp German counter-attacks.

Marshal Timoshenko

More serious for the Germans than their relinquishment of conquered territory have been their losses of men and equipment. Reliable figures on comparative losses are of course unobtainable, but there is reason to believe that the German casualty rate now exceeds the Russian. And the Soviets are far better able to repair huge losses of man-power than is Germany, harassed by the problem of keeping in subjection many millions of conquered peoples. The extreme measures used by Hitler to keep up production, such as the employment of the blind and consumptive, give excellent indication that Germany is now under enormous strain in trying to keep both the military and the economic machine working at top speed.

The Russians have gained a less tangible but extremely valuable advantage in their heightened morale. If any possibility of peace between Hitler and Stalin short of complete defeat of one or the other ever existed, the bitterness aroused by German devastation and atrocities has eliminated it. Even in the days of early defeat Russian morale left nothing to be desired; now, aflame with hatred and inspired with a new consciousness of the meaning of success, the Red Army will be hard to stop. At the same time the Germans have lost the aura of invincibility, and Hitler's personal direction during a period of defeat has not raised his prestige. Having accepted for four months a defensive role new in its experience, the German army may have lost some of its earlier keen offensive edge.

OTHER FRONTS

But this is only one side of today's war. The gains from the Russian counter-offensive have been very limited compared to the earlier conquests of Hitler. Nearly all the important Russian industrial areas and most of the strategic bases for a spring offensive are still in German hands. At a high price but nevertheless effectively the Germans have adapted themselves to a new type of warfare and held enemy gains to a minimum. With spring approaching and Hitler committed by both economic interest and prestige to victory in the east, what is the outlook for a German offensive and how may we aid in defeating it?

In Libya the desert war between British and Axis forces has reached a period of quiescence while the two sides repair their forces. The supply problem for both is extremely difficult. In all probability only the connivance of Vichy in the transport of reinforcements kept the Germans from disaster in the late fall of 1941, though the advance of British troops beyond their sources of supply and the able generalship of Rommel contributed to the quick reversal of Axis fortunes. Germany is reported to be making strong efforts to reinforce its air bases in the Mediterranean, possibly in anticipation of a renewed attack. Complete victory in this area for either side will not be easy. Short of a British capture of Tripoli or German success in reaching Alexandria, the Nile, and Suez, the gain or loss of vast areas will not vitally affect the outcome.

Numerous other lines of attack are of course open to Hitler, but the theater of war regarded as the most likely field for a German thrust is the Near East. Either an aerial attack on Cyprus as the stepping-stone to the conquest of Syria and Palestine and then of Iraq and Iran or a push through Turkey aimed at the Caucasus or Iraq is a distinct possibility. In either case fairly formidable obstacles would be encountered. Turkey has a moderately large army and offers extreme difficulties of terrain. And it would probably make its bases available to Britain and Russia if it were attacked. A year ago had Hitler chosen to turn his full energy against the British in the Middle East, he would undoubtedly have won a decisive victory and obtained great supplies of oil. Today such an attack would meet much stronger opposition, and the German forces available in this theater would be more limited.

Obviously the Russian front dominates German strategy in all theaters of war. Unless Hitler can feel secure there, he cannot, even for reasons of prestige, undertake new troop-consuming offensives in other directions. If the Red Army is able to get anything even approaching a stalemate for another year, the machinery of Anglo-American intervention will be completed and Hitler will face his greatest dread—war on two fronts.

Everything indicates that he is keenly alive to the crucial nature of the coming campaign and, by inference, to the power of American intervention. The recent submarine offensive, the stationing of major war vessels in Norwegian waters where they are in a position to attempt forays against the main Allied supply line to the Soviet Union, a war of nerves against Sweden, hurried preparations for a major spring offensive, all are evidence of a desperate need to dispose of one major foe before the other can make its weight felt.

THE COMING INVASION OF EUROPE

Nor is Mr. Roosevelt asleep. Whatever the faults of our High Command in underestimating Japan, it has not been guilty of the same offense as regards Germany. In fact, the major feature of our 1941 plan for total war was the formation of a monster A. E. F. to invade the continent of Europe. This was not intended to be ready before July, 1943, though Russian resistance was expected to be liquidated a year previous.

The unexpected strength of the Red Army and the possibility of victory thus opened up have laid upon us the necessity of invading Europe, if possible, a year earlier than the date fixed in the original schedule. Since our forces should, by preference, operate near those of Russia and as far as possible from the main center of German power, Norway is clearly the battlefield indicated. Norway, moreover, offers numerous possible landing places distributed through an area where scattered German garrisons are handicapped by poor transportation. A successful Norwegian campaign would also cut off much Kiruna ore from Germany and strengthen Allied supply lines to Russia. It is, in fact, in Norway that according to our 1941 war plan we should strike our first blow.

Many requirements for success are lacking. Powerful naval air support will be needed if we are to gain strong footholds for invasion. Our own troops in Ireland at present are not sufficiently numerous, and the two million or more British soldiers are of very uncertain value, for waging an offensive war. We are also desperately short of the merchant tonnage needed to supply a new front. And the Germans obviously expect a blow at this point.

These considerations may delay or even rule out the opening of a new front. But the difficulties should be surmounted if possible. Much of Axis success has resulted from bold chance-taking; the Germans have acted on the maxim that "an excess of caution soon becomes imbecility." We have sacrificed strength in the Far East because of Europe, and it is time this sacrifice started to pay dividends.

War on Top of the World

BY LYN IRVINE

WE TALK a great deal about global warfare, but to study its progress, its catastrophic ebb and flow, you and I and Mr. Roosevelt all use a map of the world based on that manipulation of the facts called Mercator's Projection. It was sitting by such a map that Mr. Roosevelt was photographed delivering his fireside talk of February 23. Yet we all know that if we could peel the surface off the world, it would not form a rectangle; it would not even lie flat. We all know that the North and South Poles measure nothing, and that any map which stretches out that nothingness to a line equal in length to the Equator is not concerned with distances but with the relative position of countries and the directions that must be followed in getting from one place to another. If, as we are often told, the time-distance factor is all important in this war, ought we to trust ourselves to use such maps? Is it not possible that the distortion perpetually before our eyes influences us more than we imagine? To take one example of the way in which Mercator's Projection distorts distances: according to it, from Alaska to Spitzbergen appears to be about 11,000 flying miles, whereas in reality it is 2,200.

In our anxious concentration upon such maps and upon the immense equatorial distances that they truly show—again emphasized for us by the President in his talk—we are forgetting some of the most important facts about the present struggle. It is essential to correct and complete the picture that we have by studying a map of the North Polar regions. The world looks so unfamiliar from this angle that we feel dizzy gazing at it, as though we were hanging head down above the earth itself. And even more unfamiliar is the sight of the anti-Axis powers united so closely by geography. We see about a third of the world's surface, the North Pole in the center ringed round with Russia, the United States of America, Canada and Great Britain, Greenland and Iceland. China, Russia's neighbor, lies just outside the picture. North of Latitude 60° N. this great ring of allied countries is broken at one point only, where Norway and Finland run up into the Arctic Circle. The four major warring powers of the United Nations stand together on the top of the world, back to back against the Pole.

It is a position of such unique strategic value that it must make Hitler sick with envy to think of it. If we only understand and develop our geographic advantages in time, neither Germany nor Japan will have the faintest chance of victory. They have no alternative but to fight around the bulge of the globe and to maintain the longest sea routes for communication and attack, but we can develop northern lines of supply which are a fraction of equatorial distances. From the north we can strike our enemies in their vital parts and thus save ourselves the hopeless task of chopping off the octopus arms that they have twined round the imperial treasures of the south. Even the American people, accustomed to thinking in thousands of miles, are appalled by the distances that their navy must cover. In so far as the war is fought in the minds and hopes of the people we are at this moment losing it fast, because our leaders have suggested no program for victory that is within the grasp of the imagination. We are all spiritually swimming for our lives in the Pacific Ocean, and the hopelessness of it affects everything we try to do. Courage and determination alone will never see us through; we need fresh blood and fresh ideas. The polar winds could do the trick.

The reader will perhaps wonder why this possibility has not been in the forefront of all Allied plans. But he must remember that until December 8, 1941, a vital link in the Arctic chain was colored neutral, and that since the United States entered the war, all thoughts have necessarily been centered on the southeast and not on the northeast. The speed of the Japanese drive has given the leaders in Washington and London no respite. And in spite of the growing demand for attack instead of defense tactics, we are so used to letting the other side appoint the battlefield and the battle hour that it is hard to conceive of opening up a front ourselves, of striking down from the north, from the heart of our own hemisphere. On the other hand, the American and British governments may be secretly at work on a polar scheme as the central long-term, all-out strategy of the United Nations.

The most hopeful sign of American and Canadian realization of the value of the northern route—though it may be inspired by a policy of defense without appreciation of the possibilities of attack—is the agreement now reached for the construction of a road from Fort St. John in British Columbia to Fairbanks in Alaska. In the New Republic of March 2 Benton Mackaye outlined a possible continuation of this to form an "Alaska-Siberia Burma Road" running from Edmonton to Irkutsk on the Trans-Siberian Railway, "roughly 8,000 miles from the arsenals of Detroit to a front on Manchoukuo." There would be a great future for any mainly overland connection between Detroit and Irkutsk. Let us carry the vision of Mr. Mackaye a step farther. From Irkutsk supplies for China could be taken by rail to Alma Ata on the Turksib Railway, from which point a trucking service to Chungking has been in existence for four years. Such a route, in spite of the detour around Mongolia, would be roughly 5,000 miles shorter, and infinitely safer, than the route via Cape Town, Iran, and Alma Ata which, according to a dispatch from Chungking dated February 22, is already under consideration as an alternative to the new road from India.

The least known and most problematic area involved in a plan for polar operations is the Soviet Far East, where over immense distances no regular communication exists except by air. Russia at War for February 28 gives an impressive list of possible all-the-year-round methods of transporting materials from either Kamchatka or Sakhalin to Komsomolsk on the Amur, which port now has a connection by rail with Khabarovsk, on the Trans-Siberian Railway. But all these routes pass so closely under the eye of Japan that their safety depends upon peace between that country and Russia. A sea route not exposed to anything like the same risk, in fact, the safest sea route from America to Asia and Europe that now exists, is the Soviet "Arctic life line," 6,000 miles from Seattle to Archangel, open for just over three months of the year. The establishing of this route has been one of the great recent achievements of the Soviets, whose Arctic fleet now includes more than forty icebreakers. "In 1939 the new Soviet icebreaker J. Stalin in a 12,000-mile voyage of seventy days not only reached the Bering Strait from Murmansk but returned to her western base as well" (The American Review of the Soviet Union, February-March, 1942). Supporting this vital sea route is a new 5,000-mile air line from Moscow to Anadyr on the Bering Strait, inaugurated just a year ago; Bulletin 59 issued by the Soviet embassy at Washington says that "the development of Soviet Arctic aviation has made possible the use of the polar air route, approximately 6,000 miles from Moscow to any part of the northern border of the United States." The airports on the Moscow-to-Anadyr route are at Archangel, Igarka, Khatanga, Tiksi Bay, and Cape Schmidt, stepping-stones sufficiently close together for fighter planes as well as bombers to be flown this way to Moscow, and from there to Alma Ata or even Delhi.

Behind this brief account of routes actual and theoretical, by land, sea, and air, lie the little-known facts about Siberia itself and what Vilhjalmur Stefansson calls the "friendly Arctic." There is much to encourage us and little to discourage in the reports of those who know the land and the seas. In the coldest of all parts, the region round Yakutsk, the summer temperature rises to 80° Fahrenheit. Siberia is rich in coal and minerals, and the Northern Sea Route Administration plans that even polar weather stations shall live off the country, with hothouse gardens, cows, and pigs.

If the American continent is the great reservoir of men and materials in this war, what we need to conceive and construct forthwith is a gigantic piece of global plumbing, a circulating system with many pipe lines leading off to our distant allies. The obvious route for the main flow is the northerly one. It is short by comparison, and safe. It would ease the strain on merchant shipping and the navy since land and air transportation is possible over many thousands of its miles. The period when its capacity would be greatest is just that period when the light nights make the North Atlantic most dangerous. Over land many different forms of transport can be used; dignity and uniformity must give way to the practical and the speedy, as they did in the evacuation of Dunkirk. Hannibal crossed the Alps, and Chiang Kai-shek now proposes to cross the spurs of the Himalayas; we can surely cross Alaska and, with Russia's permission, Siberia too. Both the Russians and the Germans have shown us that men and material can be moved over difficult country without adequate roads or railways in subzero weather. We can be sure that if Hitler had a short backstairs to his allies, whatever the difficulties, he would surmount them—to our eternal astonishment and discomfiture.

What Cripps Faces in India

BY KRISHNALAL SHRIDHARANI

JUST at the moment when his political star shines brightest, Sir Stafford Cripps has chosen to risk his career by going to India to help solve one of the most controversial problems of the day. Those who know both India and England agree that he is the only Englishman who might be able to bring about a solution. Those who know Sir Stafford personally understand that his conscience left him no choice. His love for India and his devotion to the cause of freedom for all men impelled him to take passage to India even though, by remaining at home, he might have reached the highest position in the country. I had the privilege of meeting him in New York shortly before he was appointed ambassador to Russia. He was on his way back from India and China, where he had conferred with the leaders of millions of men. With Nehru especially, an old school friend, he had had long conversations. What he said to me about my country's problems and my country's leaders convinced me even then that in an Indo-British crisis both nations might well ask Cripps to negotiate.

From India's point of view, then, Sir Stafford is the only hopeful feature in what otherwise looks like a gloomy picture. Winston Churchill's promise of post-war dominion status falls too far short of India's expectations and has already been rejected by India's leaders. It is nothing new. The National Congress Party—whose titular head is the Moslem Azad, whose active head is Jawaharlal Nehru, and whose spiritual head is still Mohandas K. Gandhi, in spite of the recent political renunciation of the Mahatma—demands complete independence before it will budge an inch in the direction of war cooperation. Nor will the Moslem League take anything less, for it always insists upon being as patriotic as the Congress Party. Even the "moderates" and the "liberals," whose vociferousness makes up for their small number, led by Sir Tej Bahadur Sapru demand dominion status now and not after the war. When these liberals, masters of the fine art of compromise, become so uncompromising, it should be regarded as the handwriting on the wall. From this point on, dominion status now is the only basis on which any fruitful conversations can be held between Indian and British leaders. Even that will not satisfy India, if I know my country's present temper. Indian leaders have asked to have a definite date set—such a promise as was given to the Philippines by the United States—a date for complete independence or for voluntary participation in an acceptable world order after the war. But it is quite likely that even dominion status for the duration with the promise of post-war independence might be rejected by the Congress Nationalists.

The Churchill statement does not go nearly so far. Sir Stafford has therefore undertaken what would appear to be a hopeless task. It is safe to conjecture, however, that he has taken along with him more radical proposals than have been admitted by Churchill so far. Knowing India as he does, he would hardly have gone otherwise.

But not all Sir Stafford's difficulties are caused by British Tories. India itself is placing stumbling-blocks in the path of his great mission, on the success of which hangs not only India's future but victory for the United Nations in the Battle of Asia. Fortunately, the obstacles offered by India fall into one simple category—internal dissensions. These dissensions however, must be treated as two distinct problems—the Hindu-Moslem problem and the problem of the princes—and it is these problems that Cripps and the Indian leaders must solve.

Before I go into the intricacies of the Hindu-Moslem controversy, I should like to dispel some of the current misconceptions disseminated in the United States by interested parties. The Congress Party, for instance, is not a Hindu organization. It is a national body which embraces Hindus and Moslems, Christians and Sikhs, Jews and untouchables. It is above religion and race, creed and color. It is wholly unlike the Moslem League, which is sectarian; the Hindu counterpart of the Moslem League is the Hindu Mahasabha. In the second place, it is not the Moslem community of India which is apparently at loggerheads with the Congress Party. It is an organization called the Moslem League which challenges the claim of the Congress Party to speak for India. Thirdly, Moslems do not form the bulk of the fighting forces of India. According to British military officials in India, the number of Moslem soldiers does not loom large even in proportion to the number of Moslems in the community. And lastly, the Near Eastern Moslem world, though sympathetic toward the Indian Moslems, is not the champion of the Moslem League. In fact, whatever comments on the Indian situation have come from Iraq, Iran, Egypt, Arabia, Turkey, and Afghanistan have been favorable to the Congress and definitely opposed to the policies of the Moslem League. It is the Congress Party, not the Moslem League, which has semi-official relations with the Moslem nationalists of the Middle and Near East. So there is neither moral nor factual foundation for the argument that the status quo must be maintained because of the Near Eastern Mohammedans.

The Hindu-Moslem problem of India is not insoluble if it is approached with sincerity by both Hindu and Moslem leaders. But even more important is the sincerity of the British. The central authority has played many disruptive tricks, and if it is not ready to part with power, it may still use Hindu-Moslem disputes as an excuse. As Gandhi recently said, once the British change their attitude toward India, the solution will follow as day follows night.

Now let us go into the details of the Hindu-Moslem problem. The real minorities of India—the Sikhs, the Parsees, the Christians, the Buddhists, and the Jainists—are apparently at peace with the Hindu majority, and they do not ask for any special privileges unless such privileges are granted to the Moslems. Theirs is a defense psychology not against the majority but against another minority, a large minority.

There are in India in round numbers 250,000,000 Hindus and 80,000,000 Moslems. Roughly, the ratio is three to one. The Moslems, no doubt, are numerically a minority, but can 80,000,000 people, ask the Nationalists, ever be considered a political minority weak enough to be exploited in a democracy? Moreover, the Northwest Frontier Province is more Mohammedan than the rest of India; 95 per cent of the population is Moslem. Yet the province has been under the complete control of the Congress Party, and Gandhi has always had more devout followers there than in predominantly Hindu regions.

In spite of these facts, the Moslem League claims the leadership of the entire Mohammedan community in India. The Congress, too, confident that a great majority of the Indian Moslems are with it, has committed some indiscretions. It has unduly ignored the Moslem League and thus injured the personal vanity of certain Moslem leaders. Fortunately there are some decisive figures which tell the true story and dispel the exaggerations on both sides. The latest test of political strength was provided by the first national election held under the new constitution in 1937. What happened then? India's 36,000,000 enfranchised voters returned the Congress Party to power by an overwhelming majority and installed its candidates as Ministers throughout two-thirds of India. To be more precise, it captured absolute majorities in seven of the eleven provinces, and within six months brought two more provinces under its banner. And even in the remaining two provinces the Congress Party had the largest single voting bloc, though not a clear majority. This in spite of the fact that the franchise was limited to people with property and education, while the real strength of the Congress lies in the impoverished masses.

What showing did the Moslem League make? The new constitution provides 482 seats for the representatives of the Moslem community in the eleven Provincial Assemblies. Of these 482, only 110 were elected on the Moslem League ticket. That revealed that the Moslem League could claim the support of less than one-fourth of the Moslem community. It also meant that more Mohammedans follow the Congress than the Moslem League.

Thus Sir Stafford will not only have to secure the necessary guaranties for all minorities, but will also have to establish the position that majority rule is no crime in a democracy or in any other form of government. He will have to prevent a minority within the Moslem minority from exercising a veto power over the destiny of 400,000,000 Indians.

His task will not be so hard as is generally believed. The Hindus are the most tolerant people in the world.

Moreover, most Hindus believe that because they are in a majority they should make greater sacrifices than the Moslems in the interest of Indian unity. It is a question of creating an atmosphere of mutual understanding and trust, and it is up to the majority to take the lead. Most young Hindus also advocate and work for the abolition of the caste system, which in many imperceptible ways has worked against a harmonious blending of the two great religious groups of India. A reasonable resolution of the Hindu-Moslem differences therefore should not be difficult. The Congress Party has announced its willingness to grant all proper demands of the Moslems and something more. It has codified its good intentions in official resolutions which proclaim that no decision touching upon the Moslems of India will ever be taken without the consent of the Moslems themselves, and that any disputes will be referred to an impartial tribunal.

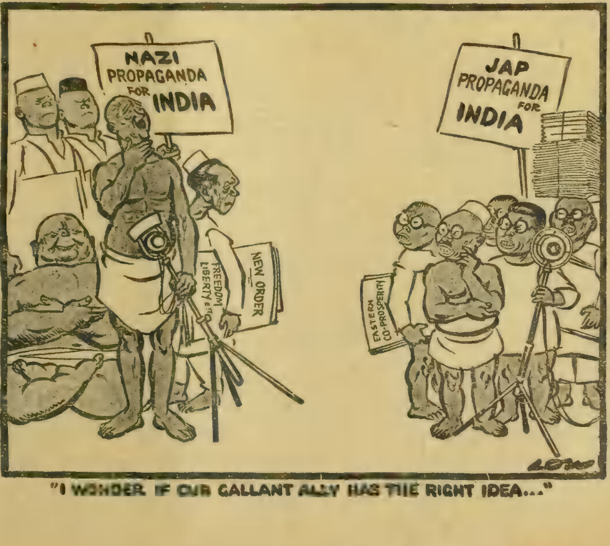
But there is one thing, the Nationalists insist, which cannot be granted, and that is the plan to partition India along religious lines. This is the dream of Mohammed Ali Jinnah, the president of the Moslem League. He refuses to agree to any settlement which is not based upon the idea of two Indias—a Moslem India and a Hindu India. But since both Moslems and Hindus are spread all over the country, tens of millions would have to move if Mr. Jinnah's dream came true. This "Balkanization" of India, fortunately, is dreaded by many Moslems, and for a long time Mr. Jinnah himself used it chiefly as a bargaining point; to Hindus it is naturally anathema.

The personal problem of Mr. Jinnah may prove more difficult for Sir Stafford to solve than the larger issue of Hindu-Moslem unity. But a compromise short of Pakistan, the partition plan, is not only possible but probable, and when it is reached, either Mr. Jinnah will have to change his tune to suit the temper of a reborn India or he will become politically impotent. Lately he has been backing his demand with a threat of revolt, but I think Sir Stafford knows India well enough not to be taken in by that bluff. Bengal and the Punjab are the two provinces which have so far given Mr. Jinnah whatever strength he has, and only a few months ago the governing Ministry of Bengal repudiated him and reformed the Cabinet. Sir Sikandar Hyat Khan, Premier of the Punjab, still backs Mr. Jinnah, but he too detests Pakistan. Thus it should not be difficult to arrive at a compromise which will destroy the illogical and sinister idea of dividing India when the rest of the world is struggling toward closer union.

Sir Stafford can draw his inspiration from either of two historical precedents, and the success of his mission will largely depend upon his choice. One is the English action which divided Ireland and made it a continuously smoldering powder keg. The other is the American example: Abraham Lincoln dealt firmly and resolutely—but with malice toward none—with the threat of secession and created a mighty and united nation.

The problem of the Indian princes should not be difficult for Sir Stafford, for it is no longer an Indian problem; it is purely a British problem. Nobody in India now wants those 560 native rulers; on this point the 80,000,000 "subjects" who live under them are at one with the Congress Party. We all know that Great Britain has promised the Maharajahs protection. But the Nationalists argue that Great Britain has broken so many good promises in the past that it would not do any harm if it broke a bad one for a change. It looks as if Britain were on the eve of compelling its proteges to accede to popular demands; only the other day the Viceroy asked the princes to sacrifice their privileges if these impeded the war effort by perpetuating India's disunity.

India's problems are no more complicated than those of China, or Poland, or the United States. What is needed is foresight on the part of Indian leaders, which there is plenty of evidence that they possess, and sincerity on the part of Britain, of which Sir Stafford should be regarded as a guaranty. Let us hope that neither a few Indian leaders nor the Tories at home will be able to prevent him from inaugurating a great democracy in Asia.



"I WONDER IF OUR GALLANT ALLY HAS THE RIGHT IDEA..."

Blessed Bahamas

BY ARTHUR LIEBERS

WAR may be hell, but the sunny beaches and shaded roads of Nassau are far from the blasted streets of Whitechapel and Cheapside, or the prison camps on Singapore. Not that His Majesty's colony of the Bahamas can be accused of shirking its share of the war effort. The annual social affairs which were the only events of the year have been cut to a minimum, and instead of meeting one's friends at dinners and balls at Government House one has to associate with the most horrible people, who can be seen sitting practically on top of Her Grace at Red Cross benefits.

The Four Horsemen have left their mark on the life of Nassau. One cannot buy American currency or take out any considerable amount of English or colonial funds, which means no more summers spent in the states. One may visit Canada by making some very confusing exchange arrangements, but no one is in Canada now; so one perforce remains in the colony and goes through the summer session of typhoid, which sweeps the island with equinoctial regularity. Fortunately, the typhoid is a mild variety which usually yields to treatment.

However, the Bahamas offer consolations to make up for the sacrifices of war. There is none of that silly rationing business. The finest tweeds from the looms of Scotland, the softest sweaters and doeskins, the rarest perfumes, and the tastiest canned and bottled delicacies are offered in the stores. True, the price may be two or three times what it is in England, but one who needs to cavil over costs shouldn't be in Nassau.

The native population of the Bahamas is just what a white man needs to flatter his ego and dispel any doubts as to the supremacy of the unpigmented. The Bahaman Negro is raised to lead a carefree life untroubled by the doubts which too much education brings to the soul of man. The islands' school of higher education for Negroes, the Dundas Civic Center, turns out cooks, maids, and butlers—the meekest and best in the world.

There seems to be no shortage of gasoline in Nassau. When one becomes bored with the palms and beaches, one can charter a plane and visit the outer islands, or rent a boat and spend a few days cruising among the cays. For the athletic, there are water-skiing and aquaplaning. For the fisherman, the waters are stocked with all good things. Amberjack, kingfish, bonita, mackerel, peto, and other species wait for the sixty-dollar-a-day fishing boat to appear and tempt them with expensive tackle to the dockside scale and photographer.

In Nassau talk of the war, while not taboo, is frowned upon. The daily four-page paper takes a very refined attitude toward the conflict. Four pages don't allow too much space for news, and what really matters is the list of new arrivals from the states and what is happening at the ducal residence. The empire has enough warships to lose one or two without making a fuss, but if Mrs. Muttonly has dinner with Her Grace, while Lady Beefly has to dine at the hotel, that's news.

Perhaps the greatest charm of the Bahamas is the class of people one meets. The war helped in a way, since it eliminated the cut-rate tourists who came to the islands by coastal steamer. Pan-American Airways now runs up to three flights daily from Miami to Nassau during the season. A subsidized shipping company receives $700 a week to run three weekly trips from Miami, to assure a steady supply of food and necessities.

The Bahamas have never fallen for that new-fashioned idea of the equality of man. The famous Porcupine Club on Paradise Beach sets the social and political standards. Property owners alone have suffrage, and the price of a vote has been set by precedent at $15. The precincts of the Porcupine Club have never been polluted by the touch of the son of Ham or the son of Israel, and while the former King was welcomed, there was some question whether his wife should be accepted.

To many an American citizen with March 15 jitters the fact that the colony had no income tax made it a delightful refuge. A few dollars paid to a lawyer, a Bahaman corporation formed, a few more dollars paid in legal fees, a shingle hung up to meet the requirement of local laws: then the United States Department of Internal Revenue could be told that one was now a Bahaman corporation and could not be expected to pay an income tax to any other country. This income-tax arrangement has been a great help to the islands' economy.

Various means have been tried to make the islands self-sufficient. At one time citrus fruits boomed; then the blue-gray fly came and wiped out the groves. There was a sponge industry; an unknown malady which prevented breeding—sponges are animals—crippled that. Tomatoes grow profusely, but they grow almost anywhere. The fish are sport fish, not commercial.

The economy of present-day Nassau is based on the sixty tourists who arrive daily by air and the British who receive regular remittances. Its activities are pictured in Vogue and Harper's Bazaar. Visitors return home inspired by the memory of how comfortable life can be in a country which has been at war for two years.

Amateur Strategists

BY G. A. BORGESE

IT WAS impressive to hear again the rebuke of Consul Lucius Aemilius to the amateur strategists of his time—168 B.C.—as reported by Livy and quoted extensively by Mr. Roosevelt at his press conference of March 17.

There are, however, other stories. One is in Herodotus, I, 84. It refers to events of 546 B.C. when Croesus and the Lydian empire fell to Cyrus.

> Now this is how Sardis was taken. When Croesus had been besieged for fourteen days, Cyrus sent horsemen about in his army to promise rewards to him who should first mount the wall. . . . A certain Mardian called Hyroeades essayed to mount by a part of the citadel where no guard had been set; for here the height on which the citadel stood was sheer and hardly to be assaulted, and none feared that it could be taken by an attack made here. . . . So then it chanced that, on the day before, this Mardian, Hyroeades, had seen one of the Lydians descend by this part of the citadel after a helmet that had fallen down, and fetch it; he took note of this and considered it, and now he himself climbed up, and other Persians after him. Many ascended, and thus was Sardis taken. [Translation by A. D. Godley.]

Another story refers to events of 773 A.D. It is reported by medieval historians such as Anastasius, Frodoard, Agnellus Ravennatis, and the Chronicler of Moissiac.

> Charlemagne, having dismissed all hope of forcing the Chiuse [a kind of Maginot Line at the entrance of Langobardic Italy] and not suspecting that there might be another way for invading Italy, had made up his mind to return the next day to France, when a deacon, called Martin, arrived at the camp of the Franks. This man taught Charlemagne a secret mountain pass to outflank the fortresses and to descend into Italy. Charles, then, sent a picked army to that difficult passage. The Langobards, at the unexpected thrust, turned to disorderly flight, and the King with the bulk of his Franks passed through the abandoned Chiuse.

According to other sources the pathfinder of Charlemagne was an itinerant minstrel. If that is so, he could not even rank with the "editors" whom Mr. Roosevelt, supported by Livy, has taken so severely to task. He was nothing but a poet. As for the conqueror of Sardis, he was a Mardian, that is, one of a nomad Persian tribe, obviously illiterate. Perhaps as a wanderer he had learned to look at things.

Neither Hyroeades nor Martin—deacon or minstrel—had a seat in the Cabinet or rank in the General Staff. The lion of the fable does not know whether or when a little mouse may help him out of the net in which he may happen to be caught. Cyrus and Charlemagne were successful generals. It did not harm them to listen occasionally to "amateur strategists."

WENDELL WILLKIE and Thomas E. Dewey are still fighting each other for control of the Republican machine in New York State. Willkie has told friends that if Dewey is nominated for governor this year, he will bolt his party and support Lehman. Dewey, for his part, is seeking a new base of support in the American Labor Party's left wing, whose hundred thousand votes are often enough to swing a state election. In a move interpreted as an effort to curry favor with the radicals, Dewey recently proposed to the Board of Higher Education of New York City that it permit fifteen college teachers suspended on charges of communism to resign rather than be expelled, thereby permitting them to seek jobs elsewhere in the school system.

AN ADVERTISEMENT of the Neponset Woolen Mills in the American Funeral Director tells of a new material for shrouds called "victory cloth." It is, says the ad, "made for the burial-goods industry so that we may maintain the American way of life."

TWO MORE MAGAZINES have ceased publication because of war-time economic difficulties—the Living Age, a century-old review of the foreign press, and the Kenyon Review, a literary journal edited by John Crowe Ransom.

AN EXECUTIVE of a metropolitan department store told reporters, off the record, that his firm's biggest hoarding story to date was about a $1,200 grocery order placed by a resident of a three-room apartment.

AN ITALIAN Socialist weekly, La Parola, published in New York, is presenting evidence of Fascist activity which the Dies committee had in its possession but refused to release. The paper has reproduced verbatim a rehearsal of testimony to be given by Girolamo Valenti, the anti-Fascist editor of La Parola, before the Dies committee. Although Valenti named men whom the government has since arrested, the committee called off the hearing after reading Valenti's evidence.

A FEW MONTHS AGO several divisions of the Amalgamated Clothing Workers agreed to donate part of their time and labor to making garments for the Red Cross. They requested that they be permitted to sew into each item an Amalgamated union label. Red Cross officials said that it was against organization policy to permit the union label, and so no Red Cross clothes will bear it.

BOOKS and the ARTS

THE NEW "REPUBLIC"*

BY I. A. RICHARDS

NO BOOK except the Bible has had so much influence upon us as "The Republic." In a very real sense we are its creatures. "That book," said the Yankee farmer to Emerson, who had lent him it, "has a great number of my idees." Socrates's words at the end of Book IX have come true; we are citizens of the state he founded. "The greatest of the Greek inventions," said Werner Jaeger recently, "was man himself." He meant Western man of course. The Chinese had Confucius and Mencius to do for them what Plato did for us—give them forever their picture of their true selves. We come short of it endlessly, of course, but it is of Plato's guardian mind that we come short.

Yet we may never have read a word of Plato. It is still true. Most of our serious thoughts have been echoes of his. Every successful student of Plato comes to feel that later literature is a whispering gallery. Plato's thought—miraculously mated with Christianity in the third century—still lights the eyes of every enthusiastic new discoverer of Truth. If this surprises you, read Emerson's "Representative Men," should reading Plato himself seem too much.

Reading Plato himself is a big undertaking. Even among those who are coaxed and coached through it few successful readers will be found. A successful reader is one who knows more about himself and about the good after his reading. It is easy to learn about Plato, harder to learn about these things from him. This is partly because we had already learned so much from him before we opened his pages. But partly it is due to the superb pedagogy in "The Republic." There never was a book of such scope so well designed for its pupils. It acted perfectly on the scholar disciples it was written for. But though we are disciples—witting or unwitting—we are not those scholars. The very spaciousness of the book, the broad introductory sketches, the anticipatory hints, the figurative indications, the minor parallels, the cunningly arranged correspondencies and contrasts, the gambits and the recapitulations, the returns to deeper levels through passages hewn already only for this purpose—all that art entirely misses its effect on us at a first reading. How many, for example, have thrown "The Republic" down toward the end of the first book, unaware that a main ingredient of their dissatisfaction is something Plato intended them to feel. The arguments are bad. Thrasymachus gives up too easily. But Socrates knows this better than we do. We are meant to feel, "This sort of thing will never do!" Unfortunately, "this sort of thing" in this guise is so unfamiliar to us that we miss the point and blame Plato when we should be blaming sundry combative tricks in argument we ourselves use, in other guises, every day.

Again, as Plato develops the great parallel between society and the mind—which has shaped so many societies and so many minds—how many notice that Socrates says, "We shall never reach the truth this way"? This is a parallel, a figure of speech which is perpetually necessary, not an argument. The modern sociologist is apt to take his own arguments so seriously that he overlooks Plato's analysis of method and his hints that in "these things" even a Glaucon—surely the best audience that any man could ever hope for—must be content with parallels. On these and many other fundamental points the temptation to write yet further commentaries is irresistible. I have indulged it by putting what I have to say about "dialectic," and much else that is central here, into my How to Read a Page, which is published with this and is in its latter parts just some more of those "footnotes to Plato" of which, as Whitehead said, "Western philosophy consists."

"The Republic," as it stands in the English versions of the best scholars, is ineffective today for the very reasons which have made it effective in Plato's Greek. The main lines of its thought become lost among the qualifications and preparations and the polite and (to the Greek) persuasive indirections.

The very familiarity, too, of some of the ideas prevents us from seeing their everlasting novelty. They are like our hands and feet; only now and then do we realize them and how much they do for us. Of all media which could guard us from this awakening shock, a translator's English which attempts to follow the Greek meticulously in minor detail and social tone is the most absorbent. Plato's style deployed endless exquisite devices for meeting attitudes and expectations in his readers which sprang from their milieu. These attitudes and expectations never arise in us; we have our own. A dummy discourse in English does not meet them, however well it is trained to ape the alien delicacies of the Greek. Nor does it help us in taking what Plato said to heart. Versions in nineteenth-century idiom did help the nineteenth century to realize itself. Today they have the uncanny effect of making Plato seem mid-Victorian. We hardly know which of two remote worlds we are exploring.

This is unfair both to Plato and to Jowett. But its causes lie deeper than even the perennial moral strife between intellectual generations. It is the effort to get all of Plato's meaning into our English—just that meaning and nothing less—which befogs the translator's prose. It is a wholly admirable effort and ambition from the point of view of scholarship in Greek. To try to say it in English is one of the best means of exploring what the Greek says—though a dangerous means whenever the translator thinks he has said it. What is needed here is a Socratic inquiry into the words "translate" and "say." What does a sentence say—the thing the speaker had in mind or the thing the typical hearer gets? Such an inquiry would show how hard it is for any translator to know what he is doing, and how he must limit this "meaning" he deals with. The meaning, the whole meaning, and nothing but the meaning—that is unattainable, though scholarship rightly makes it an ideal. But when we pass from understanding the Greek as best we can to uttering something partially parallel in English for general readers, the situation is different, and another ideal becomes more relevant.

* This essay forms the introduction to a new version of "The Republic" of Plato founded on Basic English which has been prepared by I. A. Richards and will be published on April 6 by W. W. Norton and Company.

Any version whatever which is conceived in a different language in a different age must depart from the exact meaning. The readings of Plato's friends in his own lifetime departed from it, do what they would, though there was no such refracting linguistic veil between them and his words. Ours must depart far more, at more points and in more dimensions. We can understand this and some of the probable departures more or less clearly. By such understanding we may correct our view. This modern scholarship attempts—the fatal thing in this approach is to forget the gulfs.

But there is another means of interpreting our traditional sources, a much more traditional method. And here interpreting means spreading out, as in irrigation. It is done by wilfully overlooking the gulfs. In all ages Platonists have done this, more or less consciously. They have found in Plato the perfect mirror of their selves and made him say for them what they saw. It is this which formerly made him, with the Bible, the field-determinant of the Western mind. Modern historical philology, like other simplifications which came to power in the eighteenth century, has been extremely subversive in professing to get at "the facts." It has buried our Plato in the dead leaves of a wood which has vanished into trees.

To recover him—our traditional mirroring sun, not the animated waxwork of a realistic history—we have to recognize what we are doing and take from him, as the philologist likewise does, what suits our purpose. But our purpose, which was Plato's, is saving society and our souls. This, as "The Republic" better than any other book can teach us, is the most inclusive of all purposes. This can ignore no mode of knowledge—certainly not philology. Neither can this let any more special mode of knowledge impose its more limited scope. What the greatest schoolbook of all time can teach us, if we make it, is what sort of knowledge it is which is all-mastering, which is its own purpose and action or power as it is its own being.

All talk of this sort sounds hollow; but this is the preeminently practical sort of knowledge which is only arrived at through the extremist developments and reconciliations of theory. Jefferson, remembering his Plato, declared that "a democracy can be preserved only by frequent returns to fundamentals." These fundamentals are here in "The Republic," which laid them down. Here are both the conditions upon which alone a democracy is possible and the most damaging description ever written of the danger to which all democracies are exposed. That this description amounts to a political biography of Hitler (see Book VIII) is no accident. These things are perpetual, being the price we pay for our failure to become in actuality more nearly what we are in essence.

A version of "The Republic" for the general reader interested in these things may be more faithful to Plato by restricting its rendering of other things which Plato is caring for. When the lingo which a strict conformity with the Greek forces upon a translator has become so familiar that its strangeness is no longer noticed, when the formulas and constructions translators must use have become by habit a code we decode at sight, when we expect most sentences to read like "Tell me, in heaven's name, do you not think that such a person would make a strange instructor?" or "I for one most certainly anticipate that a consideration of this question will help us"—when these elaborately articulated garments of simple enough thoughts have come to feel like our skin, then perhaps we will be ready to perceive through English the niceties of Plato's tones. But I doubt it. I believe the scholar responds to the Greek behind these sentences and that the Greekless get little or nothing of this interplay. English—except through rare and happy accidents—cannot help travestying Greek when it tries to reproduce such things by literal means. Thought, on the other hand, as opposed to tone, can be reproduced to the limits of understanding. Feeling too is relatively manageable—how Socrates or Adeimantus feels about a large matter. But not tone: the intricacies of their attitudes to what has just been said and to its speaker we can guess from content and context, but English refuses to let us be explicit about them without using palpably un-English forms, which for the Greekless defeat the purpose.

What can be done? The resource with which this version experiments is to concentrate on the thought, leaving tone, feeling, and intention to show themselves as implications of the thought. This is the mode of the English of the Bible, of Bacon and Bunyan, and of modern general colloquial, as against that of the later Henry James.

The result of shrinking "Shall you have any answer to make to that objection, my clever friend? It is not very easy to find one at a moment's notice; but I shall apply to you, and I do so now, to state what the arguments on our side are, and to expound them for us" (Davies and Vaughan) into "What's your answer to that? I haven't one right now. What are we able to answer?" and so on throughout, is to shorten our version by about one-third. As this experiment in simplification develops, the bones, as it were, of the book show up so much more clearly that Plato's careful prefaces, progress reports, and summaries become no longer necessary. They become, in fact, barriers to any reader in a hurry who fails to distinguish the prefaces from the statements. It is possible to streamline the argument still further by cutting out all but its active movements; and when we are once launched on that operation the ideal naturally comes up of a "Republic" which would keep whatever has made history but nothing else; and of putting that into an English as clear to everyone as possible.

Such a version can be no synopsis or digest. It must keep the dramatic movement, the give and take of the dialectic, the Platonic unction, Socrates's disclaimers of knowledge, the hints of his fate, all his ironies and surprises; for these are what have made and still will make history. However simplified, this must be a "Republic," and without these it would be nothing of the sort. In practice it proves possible to retain the entire argument, all its essential explanations and defenses and every detail that has hitherto generated philosophic discussion, and still to reduce its volume to something under one-half.

Why read Plato at all if you are in such a hurry? Well we are in a hurry anyhow, more is the pity. Perhaps arranging Plato so that he can still be read may help us to become less hurried hereafter. I can, however, imagine the comments of certain sorts of scholars. This is tampering with Holy Writ with a vengeance, and the vengeance is not unlikely to fall. This is doing a thousand things which in terms of scholarly and pedagogical orthodoxy in these days deserve the bonfire. Both the general plan and the detail will come in for castigation, certainly enough. But if Plato's thought flows again in new readers through this version, my publisher and I will think our boldness justified enough. And if we will think less of that ideal "exact meaning" to which the scholar aspires and more of the "actual understandings" to which living readers attain, I think I can readily enough clear my version from charges of impiety. It is not only easier for a new reader to see what Plato was saying through this pruned-down version. It is even easier for a student who has worked faithfully through a complete translation with notes. With minor points absent, the great limbs of the argument show in all their majesty.

Whoever attempts such abridgment must feel pang after pang of regret for what he leaves out for the sake of the clearer movement of the whole. But our aim—as Plato would say—is not to make our rendering of this or that section or interest especially happy but to make the whole thing as good an exposition as possible of the art of ruling and being ruled.

In my choice of the language used—which has been severely controlled in the interests of the widest intelligibility—I have made much use of Basic English. Indeed, this task of limiting my vocabulary to terms which would give Plato the maximum currency would have been impossible without Mr. Ogden's great invention. I have been dependent upon his discoveries—as everyone who attempts anything of this nature must be. If I had been writing for a public to whom English might be a foreign or recently acquired language I would simply have used Basic English. But as it is, I have written in an ampler medium. After profiting from the study which making a complete version in Basic English enforced, I used that as my foundation text, looking for opportunities to simplify Plato in inessentials and at the same time to compress Basic wherever there would be no loss of clarity for an English-speaker.

Of former attempts to do something of the same sort, William Whewell's, made in 1859, seems to have been the most successful. I shall be happy if it can be said of mine—as a reviewer in the Athenaeum said of his—"So readable is the book that no young lady need be deterred from undertaking it; and we are much mistaken, if there be not fair readers who will think, as Lady Jane Grey did, that hunting and other female sport is but a shadow compared with the pleasure there is to be found in Plato."

The World Sea War

THE WAR AT SEA. By Gilbert Cant. The John Day Company. $3.

IT IS difficult to write a book on the present war since censorship keeps much needed information out of reach, and disconnected news announcements, some of which later prove inaccurate, further hinder the task of pinning together existing facts into an understandable pattern. The historian of war, therefore, has to choose between timeliness and accuracy.

In view of these limitations Gilbert Cant of the New York Post has done a masterly piece of work in "The War at Sea." The book is in the nature of an interim report, as is frankly admitted in the preface, but it is an unusually good one, the author having been aided by diplomatic and naval contacts not available to the average military expert. Because of the unusual advantages he has enjoyed Mr. Cant is able not only to add to general knowledge but to fit many apparently isolated items into a central pattern. This reviewer would be willing to hazard a prediction that remarkably few of the accounts will require later alteration as a result of the admission of new evidence.

The time covered runs from September, 1939, to mid-December, 1941, closing with the destruction of the Repulse and the Prince of Wales, the consequences of which are correctly foreseen. The 300-odd pages in between have been divided into seventeen chapters whose rather racy headings—such as It's the Deutschland, David and Goliath, Cunningham's Pond—give an accurate clue to the contents. Though Mr. Cant is not a well-known student of naval affairs he shows an advanced understanding of technical matters combined with a facility for entertaining explanation. For example, his account of the magnetic-mine campaign and its defeat through dissection of several mines and the use of electric degaussing cables makes fascinating reading. Military reputations do not awe him, and he quite accurately points out the blunders that have been responsible for a major share of the naval losses in the present war. One wonders, as he does, why the British used Scapa Flow while it was unprotected and at the lack of alertness that sent British officers back to their bunks with no alarm sounded after the Royal Oak had already received one torpedo. On the other hand, he is ready to give credit where it is due.

The amazing thing about the book is its completeness and remarkably sound scholarship. Though the style is popular, accuracy is nowhere sacrificed for effect, and a number of statistical tables at the back supply detailed information to those not satisfied with a running account of battles.

Not that the book is without errors. A few technical mistakes have crept in, as when he credits the Haruna and its three sister ships with an original thirty-knot speed instead of the twenty-seven and one-half given by "Jane's Fighting Ships" and other standard naval publications. In the battle of the River Plate he fails to mention the destruction of the Graf Spee's spotting plane before it could be launched, a misfortune which contributed to the raider's lack of firing accuracy. A more serious fault derives from the very intensity of the accounts and the author's attitude toward the events he describes. Mr. Cant is frankly and uncritically sure that the outcome of the war at sea will determine the victor in World War II. His battles, therefore, stand as thrilling but isolated episodes, not tied up with any general strategy which might determine success or failure. Naval war appears not as a means for achieving victory but as an end in itself.

But the weaknesses of "The War at Sea" are very minor. The book deserves to rank with the half-dozen best volumes on the military and naval phases of the present war. It should establish its author's reputation as not only an entertaining but an authoritative writer of military books.

DONALD W. MITCHELL

Mexican Classic

THE ITCHING PARROT (El Periquillo sarniento). By José Joaquín Fernández de Lizardi (The Mexican Thinker). Translated from the Spanish and with an Introduction by Katherine Anne Porter. Doubleday, Doran and Company. $2.50.

KATHERINE ANNE PORTER'S introduction to "The Itching Parrot" gives an account of the book which must make us conclude that no work of modern times has had, within its own culture, so wide and so intense an existence. It appeared in its present form in 1830, three years after its author's death; up to 1885 there were eight editions, and since then the editions have been countless. In Spain, before the civil war, it was reprinted "endlessly at the rate of more than a million copies a year"; a statement on the jacket of our translation speaks of 100,000,000 copies sold. In Mexico, where it was exposed for sale at every bookstall, it "was given to the young to read as an aid to manners and morals, and for a great while it must have been the one source of a liberal education for the great mass of people, the only ethical and moral instruction they could have. . . ."

We have in English no book of equal appeal; beside such popularity, our best-loved classics—"Robinson Crusoe," "Tom Jones," "Pickwick Papers," "Huckleberry Finn"—are almost esoteric. "Uncle Tom's Cabin" was once universally read in our North, but it had a narrower reference and a shorter day; up to a few years ago "Ben Hur" was still selling enormously, but it was probably never very important in its readers' lives; even "Pilgrim's Progress," which was once to be found in every simple English home, never attained an influence like this.

And so we approach "The Itching Parrot" with a respect amounting nearly to awe. A book with such a history is almost more than a work of literature. It must contain, we feel, the "secret" of a people. But if it does, the reader of the work in translation can only leave it with the secret undisclosed, even deepened. Its charm will remain a mystery; to him it will seem an extraordinarily dull book. Because its genre, the picaresque, is not at present in general esteem, I ought perhaps to say that I have a special affection for the type, from Lazarillo of Tormes, the primitive ancestor, to Pickwick. But I found "The Itching Parrot" a bore, and I can only hope that, to balance the account of international misunderstanding, Spanish readers are puzzled by what it is we enjoy in "Moll Flanders" and "Tom Jones."

"The Itching Parrot" is all the more disappointing because the story of its author, as told in Miss Porter's admirable introduction, is so very interesting. Lizardi—he wrote under the engaging name of the Mexican Thinker—combined in his character elements of Defoe, Voltaire, Rousseau, and Figaro. It would be impossible to claim for him any great original powers of intellect, but in Mexico at the beginning of the nineteenth century—he was born in 1771, and his literary career seems to have begun in 1811—he was the agent of the Enlightenment. He had a winning touch of the poltroon about him; he confessed to great physical cowardice, and when he was in danger he could not always be relied on to keep his head or hold his tongue. But if he could now and then be bent, he could not be broken. He fought endlessly against political and ecclesiastical oppression; the anonymous and voiceless masses loved him, and church and state hated him. He was always being silenced and always managing to speak out; he was forbidden to publish and he published; he was excommunicated and still he published. To the naivete which marks so much of eighteenth-century liberalism, Lizardi seems to have added a certain provincialism, perhaps not to be avoided by a Mexican intellectual isolated amid the ignorance and obscurantism of the time, but his limitations no doubt made him only the more useful in his time and place. For a short period he was petted by a quasi-liberal government, but through most of his life he lived in dire poverty, and he died in penury.

But the hero of Lizardi's novel is a lesser man than his author. With Lizardi's heroism there is, indeed, mingled, as Miss Porter points out, an element of commonness; it is a peculiarly eighteenth-century mixture and it is rather endearing: the cliché forces itself upon us that Lizardi was Don Quixote and Sancho Panza in one. But the Parrot, the hero of his novel, is all Panza, all belly, all poltroon, yet without the great saving grace of the intellect of the belly. There is no philosophy in the rogue; he is not witty himself nor the cause of wit in others. He cannot justify the life of the belly, as of course we want him to; he cannot defend the pure pleasure of scratching in the sun. The great belly-men—Sancho himself, Falstaff, Diderot's fine creation, Rameau's Nephew—make us laugh at pomp and respectability. But it is worth noting that the Parrot never gets involved with pomp or with true respectability. Of the paraphernalia of the picaresque tale Lizardi gives us only the literal and the petty matters, the filthy jail but not the ceremonious courtroom, the gambling hell but not the elegant drawing-room, the grasping parish priest but not the portly bishop, the village quack but not the successful physician; he has no sensitivity to affectation, from which, according to Fielding, all humor comes.

Then, too, a good picaresque story ought to have a social and moral ambivalence: we ought to condemn the rogue but we ought to be tempted into an alliance with him, and the great rogues—Jonathan Wild, Captain Macheath, Moll Flanders—make us revise our notions of morality. But Lizardi seems to want to involve us in a simple rather than an ambivalent judgment; the prime moral error of the Parrot, in which his parents abetted him, was that he did not bind himself to a middling way of life and learn an honest trade. Well, all picaresque heroes are likely to lament their departure from virtuous industry, but the Parrot seems to mean it. Lizardi, like so many European moralists of the eighteenth century, found the norm of conduct in the tradesman and the merchant; perhaps the sociological point of the picaresque novel is that the life it represents in its ambivalent way is simply the degeneration of the aristocratic ideal, for the picaresque hero wants to live and enjoy himself without work or duties. And no doubt in the history of the Spanish peoples the illusions and compulsions of aristocracy—both Lizardi and his hero sprang from the impoverished gentry—created a crucial social and moral difficulty. But as Miss Porter herself points out, faith in the middling people is not enough; certainly it is not enough for a novel. It makes a dull hero, and Miss Porter, feeling the Parrot's inadequacy, tells us that the "real heroes" are his comrades, Juan Largo, who gets hanged, and the Eaglet, who is killed leading a bandit raid; but it seems to me that these characters are quite as much without moral and intellectual salt as the Parrot himself.

It is disquieting to be unable to respond to a book that has meant so much to so many people—so much, too, to such judges as Ford Madox Ford and Miss Porter. Perhaps I feel as I do because I have not read the same book they read. Miss Porter's translation is a model of firm, simple prose in the manner of the eighteenth-century masters of realism; but she tells us that the allusive and obscene language of the original will not submit to translation. Perhaps in the verbal play of that incommunicable Spanish lies the power of mind which I feel so sadly absent from the translated book. Or perhaps that power of mind lies in the many moral and political tracts which have been cut out of this version. These, to a foreign public, would of course be dull, if comprehensible at all; yet I cannot help wondering whether their inclusion isn't just what endears the book to its native readers, who, it seems to me, might well be charmed by the exposition of serious matters in the setting of a picaresque novel's low actuality.

How Strong Is Japan?

THE JAPANESE ENEMY. By Hugh Byas. Alfred A. Knopf. $1.25.

THE SETTING SUN OF JAPAN. By Carl Randau and Leane Zugsmith. Random House. $3.

THE VALOR OF IGNORANCE. By Homer Lea. Harper and Brothers. $2.50.

JAPAN'S INDUSTRIAL STRENGTH. By Kate L. Mitchell. Alfred A. Knopf. $1.50.

IN GENERAL it pays to look with suspicion on books which are rushed into print to meet the public's demand for information within a few weeks after some cataclysmic event such as our entry into the war. But that warning does not apply to any of the four books on Japan listed above. It happens that with one exception they are careful studies which would have been published regardless of the war. The one exception is the book by Hugh Byas, long the Tokyo correspondent of the New York Times. His book is brief and presumably was thrown together hastily. But as might be expected from an able correspondent like Mr. Byas, it is as admirable a survey of present-day Japan as can be found anywhere.

In "The Setting Sun of Japan" Carl Randau and his wife tell the story of their visit to Japan and the countries that were soon to pass under Japanese rule. The book has a refreshing down-to-earth tang lacking in most of today's books on the Far East. The authors do not profess any great knowledge about politics or military strategy; they are content to talk with the people they meet, business men, doctors, waitresses, and factory workers. Their conclusions may be somewhat superficial but are always interesting. Although Japan had been at war for four years at the time of their visit, they do not give the impression that the civilian population has suffered acutely. True, food is rather strictly rationed, clothes made out of substitutes are of poor quality, and life is a little bleak; but except for certain shortages, it does not appear that the material standard of living has greatly deteriorated. The impact of the war seems to have been felt more keenly in the non-material aspects of life—recreation, culture, and intellectual life. The movies, once the chief recreation of millions, have become little more than an adjunct of the propaganda office. Much the same can be said of the legitimate stage. The authors report that Tokyo had only one box-office success, and that of the four numbers on its bill, three were propaganda sketches and the fourth an ancient formalized dance. The dance was good. The intellectual ferment that once characterized certain circles of Japanese life has disappeared altogether. Thousands of intellectuals are in prison; those who are outside are under constant surveillance.

The chapters dealing with Indo-China, the Philippines, Thailand, Malaya, and the Dutch East Indies provide interesting background for the Japanese conquest. Unfortunately, the authors' sources are somewhat infected with the complacency with which the ruling groups in each country faced the imminent threat of Japanese attack. The British were sure that the jungles of Malaya were impenetrable; the Dutch were sure that with aid they could hold out indefinitely; no one was interested in mobilizing the natives for total war.

Japan's strategy in attacking the Philippines and the presumed tactics to be used in subjugating the Pacific coast states are set forth in terrifying detail in "The Valor of Ignorance," which was first published thirty-three years ago. "General" Homer Lea, author of the book, is reputed to be a military genius, and his reputation is attested to by introductory letters by two high-ranking American officers. This reviewer is not in a position to challenge their military judgment, but the average reader will find Hector Bywater's twenty-year-old forecast of the American-Japanese war far more stimulating and interesting. Lea's reputation might have been better served if the earlier edition of his book had been allowed to continue to gather dust on the shelves of the few libraries where it could be found.

Kate Mitchell's brief volume is perhaps the most up-to-date and complete appraisal of Japan's economic strength available. It is admirably objective in tone, neither stressing Japan's weaknesses unduly nor falling into the opposite error of overemphasizing the undoubted gains of the past few years. Japan has made great strides, particularly in armaments and heavy industry, but it has achieved this advance at the expense of its great export and consumer-goods industries. And despite its conquests in China, its dependence on foreign countries for essential raw materials has increased rather than decreased. The book is recommended to those needing an antidote to the newspaper accounts of unending Japanese military successes. MAXWELL S. STEWART

Bruckner's Life and Music

ANTON BRUCKNER: RUSTIC GENIUS. By Werner Wolff. E. P. Dutton and Company. $3.75.

BRUCKNER criticism had already produced one classic remark when, apropros the Second Symphony, a learned doctor said that even Bruckner's sudden silences were full of formal significance. Dr. Wolff, in this old-fashioned, dully written biography, adds another. Of the Scherzo of the Sixth Symphony he writes that though "it may be less effective than others it discloses the ideal nature of music. The lack of material gives the movement weightless character" (author's italics). In other words, Bruckner is unencumbered only when he has nothing to say. However, this poor recipe for achieving the swift flight of the scherzo of Beethoven's Fourth does contain a germ of critical truth. Developed, it makes clear that the sluggishness of Bruckner's work derives partly from the unsymphonic nature of his themes.

An anecdote on page 129 discloses another source of weakness. During a rehearsal of the Te Deum, the conductor, Ochs, had obtained from the choir the ppp demanded in the score. "Bruckner seemed to be highly delighted with the rendition but asked to have the passage played just a little louder. Astonished, Ochs complied. 'Still a little louder,' Bruckner kept saying. He was not satisfied until the passage was played fortissimo." He could not "realize"; for him a theme had no essential nature, its appearance in a work had no definite significance. There was nothing ascetic in Bruckner's catholicism, Dr. Wolff writes, but of the E minor Mass, which Mr. Haggin says is an impressive work, he remarks, "Even Bruckner's flowing creative imagination appears subdued in this work, for the sake of an almost ascetic style." This is interesting, for it suggests that only liturgical necessity could give Bruckner's thought precise shape. Since the ideal of integral, symphonic form was missing from his mind, there was nothing, in the absence of any control exterior to music, to condense his musical imagination.

Bruckner's life appears to have been as uninteresting as his music. Dr. Wolff, evidently, is somewhat disappointed that there should have been no sharp crisis in it except a nervous breakdown that seems to have been the consequence of Bruckner's exhausting struggle with his shapeless material. Schoolmaster, organist, and an earnest man, Bruckner pined for worldly recognition, and was once swindled by a crook who promised that money would obtain him a doctor's degree from Cincinnati University. Neither in his music nor in any other part of his mental life was there any development comparable to that to be observed in the case of Mozart, Beethoven, and Schubert. Perhaps his rusticity checked him. Had he been surrounded in youth by the critical and technically competent circles of an earlier Vienna, he might have become a petit maître. But his was an age of Wagnerian largeness. He had not the genuine skill of Brahms or the sincere emotion of Tschaikowsky, his contemporaries. He remained a village organist searching for lost chords, a parish sacristan casting himself in the role of St. John, and never quite sure whether he was stumbling upon the Mount of Heaven or faltering at the foot of the Venusberg.

Canada in Perspective

THE UNKNOWN COUNTRY: CANADA AND HER PEOPLE. By Bruce Hutchison. Coward-McCann. $3.50.

CANADA is an economic and political impossibility that somehow happened when nobody was looking. It is a hinterland to which the Tories fled after the American Revolution, peopled first by France, then by Britain, and then by Central Europe. Scattered along the southern edge of a vast wilderness are 11,000,000 people who are divided by geography, language, race, religion, and economic interests. They follow no star, they are bedeviled by clashing loyalties; yet they have managed to weld their country into a great power both industrially and politically. The story of Canada's growth makes fascinating reading, and few Canadians are better qualified to tell it than Bruce Hutchison.

This is an important book because it tries to get the Canadian problem into perspective for American readers, but I doubt that the American public, which has grown accustomed to the fact-filled volumes of the Gunthers, will take to it. Bruce Hutchison is one of Canada's top political journalists, but he is a tale-spinner at heart. When he lets himself go, his lyrical prose becomes a bit florid. This is a polite warning not to be discouraged by the opening chapters, for there is plenty of sound stuff ahead. His analysis of the Canadian people, their politicians, their troubles, and their triumphs, is among the best that have appeared.

Nature, when she designed North America, obviously intended that traffic should flow from north to south. The coal and steel of the Maritime Provinces should go to New England; the power, woodpulp, paper, copper, and nickel of Quebec and Ontario to New York, Pennsylvania, Illinois, and Michigan; the products of the western prairies should help to feed the American cities. But because politicians and selfish industrialists on both sides of the line conspired against nature and their people and raised mountainous tariffs, the traffic has been diverted to flow east and west. The result for Canada has been to concentrate its wealth and industrial production in Ontario and Quebec, and its poverty in the Maritimes and the West. As a result, the people of the Maritimes, the prairies, and British Columbia are outrageously overcharged for their manufactured goods. The Canadian standard of living is much lower than that of the United States. The crowning paradox is that while the Canadian tariff walls were built ostensibly to save Canada from absorption by the United States, American capital now controls most of Canada's industries.

It has taken a world war and the Hyde Park agreement to blast away the barriers and let goods flow more freely across the Forty-ninth Parallel. If a customs union between Canada and the United States can be achieved after the war, Hutchison believes that it will raise the standard of living of the people on both sides of the line to heights never reached before. But achieving that union is going to be almost as hard as winning the war. It will require politicians with the social vision and courage Canadian politicians have never shown. It will require an awakened public opinion in both countries. If books like "The Unknown Country" get a wide-enough public, we may be able to accomplish it. For myself, I have too much respect for the ingrained reaction of both the Canadian politicians and the majority of the Canadian people to expect anything but the worst.

Our Servitude

ANTI-DICTATOR. The "Discours sur la servitude volontaire" of Etienne de la Boétie, rendered into English by Harry Kurz. Columbia University Press. $1.

THE flood of current books about the Nazis may have already convinced the smart reader that the best guide to an understanding of how it can happen everywhere and why you can't do business with tyrants is a slow best-seller by Plato called "The Republic." But other minor Baedekers, even if only a few centuries old, may also prove useful; such as, to name a neglected one, La Boétie's "Contr'Un" or "Discours sur la servitude voluntaire," now available in an excellent translation by Harry Kurz. La Boétie is usually remembered as the great friend—and, so to say, the only love—of the cautious Montaigne; but he was, in addition, on his own way to greatness when his premature death inflicted a major casualty on French culture of the Renaissance.

The point of "Contr'Un"—as Professor Borgese once defined it, and he should know—is that "all servitude is voluntary, and the slave is more despicable than the tyrant is hateful." It is, indeed, the first modern attempt to transfer the attention of the political thinker from the technique of the enslaver to the psychology of the enslaved. "Liberty is the only joy upon which men do not seem to insist," sighs La Boétie, "for surely, if they really wanted it, they would receive it. . . . Resolve to serve no more, and you are at once freed." Our short-wave broadcasters must be catching on, since they recently sent over the air to La Boétie's fellow-Frenchmen an entire script drawn literally from his essay. As counterpoint to every paragraph of his felicitous rendering, Harry Kurz has added streamlined subtitles of his own, to remind the reader that appeasement, the fifth column, and no-foreign-battles-for-our-boys are just new terms for immemorial political diseases.

IN BRIEF

BOOK OF BAYS. By William Beebe. Harcourt, Brace and Company. $3.50.

Mr. Beebe's most recent book is the by-product of an exploration de luxe conducted along the Pacific coast from northern Mexico to Colombia. The party made its home on board the well-appointed yacht Zaca, which the author used on a previous expedition, and everyone appears to have taken time off from strictly scientific work for whatever junkets appeared attractive. In consequence "Book of Bays" is almost as much a travel book as it is a book of natural history, and the general effect is that of a sort of super "nature walk" conducted over a large and fascinating area by a highly competent guide. Mr. Beebe pulls wonders out of his hat—a deep-sea matron trailing the atrophied bodies of her various parasitic husbands is an especially good one—and philosophizes upon them in his most amiable fashion. He also gives highly entertaining accounts of courtship among the fiddler crabs, of the struggle for existence in the genuinely tropical forests of Central America, and of many other exotic marvels. Probably no one else can do just this sort of thing so well.

MUSIC

MY COMMENTS on the operation of commercialized broadcasting have brought thanks and a surprising piece of information from a Pittsburgh reader. After telling me of the C. B. S. station in Elmira, New York, which he once heard cut off the New York Philharmonic broadcast in the middle of Stravinsky's "Firebird" to broadcast a baseball game, he adds: "However, the C. B. S. station here in Pittsburgh is even better; it doesn't broadcast the Philharmonic at all."

Then my discussion of Aaron Copland's "Our New Music" has brought a letter from a Philadelphia musician, who is glad to see me "left unconvinced and cold by the prose writing of a modern composer," and who offers an explanation of the futility of such writing.

It is, he contends, that the writing assumes what is contradicted by fact. Copland, for example, writes—and must write—as though the revolution which certain composers carried out at the turn of the century was successful; as though "the leaders of the revolution . . . having abandoned the classical and romantic idioms and methods of composing, created new idioms and methods whose importance was equal to the old"; as though "all that remains is to have that equality acknowledged by the public and by all the critics." He writes—and must write—on these assumptions in the face of the fact that "composers, in spite of forty years of labor, have been unable to produce significant works along the lines laid down by the revolutionaries, and that the public, in spite of forty years of toleration, patience, and docile submission to an unprecedented barrage of ballyhoo, have been unable to find pleasure or attachment in the works of either the revolutionaries or their followers (Debussy's output and a few other pieces excepted; but they are not numerous or important enough to affect the argument, and in any case they are not universally agreed upon)." Copland must write on these assumptions, he cannot question them, "because . . . the whole structure of his musical life is erected on the success of that revolution which, as a young man, he accepted," and to "question it now . . . would be to admit his career a failure." And the factual evidence against the assumptions must be deflected: "He cannot confess that it invalidates the assumptions and makes continued adherence to the revolution a poor farce. So far as the evidence troubles him, it does so only because it fails to carry the revolution to an indubitable triumph. In other words, he is a True Believer, like a Roman Catholic, or an American Communist. The doctrine is all, the evidence is nought."

My correspondent describes the Copland technique correctly; but he is mistaken when he calls it futile. When Copland has written about contemporary American music he has not tried to demonstrate its sufficient quality, but instead has made demands—for attention, respect, use, compensation—in which that quality was presumed; and while this hasn't fooled my correspondent or a few like him, it has browbeaten a large number of others into giving the music attention, respect, use, and compensation that its actual quality would not have secured it. The technique has been hugely successful—so successful that Virgil Thomson is now using it: let the New York Philharmonic-Symphony Society embark on a five-year program of American music, he says; the composers, the conductors, the audiences—all are here and ready.

Victor's February orchestral releases still have not arrived; so I continue with the March Columbias. When Columbia issued its recording of the Budapest Quartet's performance of Beethoven's Op. 131 more than a year ago I was so relieved to hear an approximation of the normal sound of a string quartet, after the ear-lacerating distortions Columbia had issued previously, that I said the recorded sound was good. And for the same reason I said the same thing about Columbia's further Budapest Quartet recordings. But listening to the March set (489, $3.68) of Beethoven's Op. 135 I am struck by the fact that while the sound I hear could pass as the normal sound of a string quartet it is not what I know to be the unique sound of the Budapest Quartet. Instead of the dark, deep-plumbing sound of Schneider's cello, the rich, warm, beautifully blended sound of the entire group that can be heard in Victor's imported recording of Beethoven's Op. 74, the Columbia recordings—all of them—give us a sound of four separate strands that is voluminous but without depth, richness, warmth. In this one of Op. 135, in addition, the volume-level occasionally is not constant from side to side; and the recording is afflicted with rattles and break-ups not only on a large wide-range machine with a light, sensitive pickup but on a small one of limited range with heavy pickup.

Rodzinski's performance of Berlioz's Symphonie Fantastique with the Cleveland Orchestra (Set 488, $6.83) is more sharply contoured than Bruno Walter's with the Paris Conservatory Orchestra in Victor Set 662—which I would say makes it the better realization in sound of Berlioz's sharply contoured musical thought. The recorded sound of Rodzinski's performance also is appropriately brighter and sharper in definition than that of Walter's, which is however more sensuously beautiful and agreeable to the ear in the way that European orchestral recording is. On a Lafayette Overture with an Audax D-36 pickup and again on a Scott 23 with a Brush PL-25 the Rodzinski recording has occasional rattles and break-ups and the surfaces of my copy are gritty and otherwise noisy. But when I switch to the heavy Astatic Tru-tan pickup on the Scott the sound and the surfaces are quite clean.

Letters to the Editors

American Man-Power

Dear Sirs: Under the title of Man Power and the Draft there appeared in The Nation for February 28 an editorial holding that in the United States "an army of eight million men can be achieved only by a drastic cut in aid to our allies." I should like to offer several objections to this view.

The population of Germany at the outbreak of the war was approximately eighty million. German man-power was adequate to assemble an army of some six and a half million at the time of the campaign in France, and to make that army the best equipped in Europe. If Germany, with a population of eighty million, was able to do this, the United States with its hundred and thirty million ought to be able to train an army of six to eight million, to arm it, and at the same time to supply our allies with arms, particularly since a higher degree of mechanization has increased labor productivity here over that in Germany.

The editorial cites employment statistics to show that American man-power is not large enough to cover both purposes—an army of eight million and aid to our allies. It says, among other things, "Employment in agriculture and non-defense industries will probably drop to around forty million."

At present such employment amounts to forty-four million. Thus the editorial assumes a decline of four million, about 10 per cent. This estimate seems far too small to me. If the war is actually going to be fought as total war on America's side, the decline in consumption and in workers employed in consumer-goods industries will undoubtedly greatly exceed 10 per cent. This will release additional millions for the army or for armament production.

The editorial further states, "Judging by the experience of World War I, these two million workers can be provided by bringing women, retired persons, and youths into productive life."

In my judgment, the experiences of World War I do not apply to the present war. Germany, for example, registered all its women long before this war began, and put the unmarried ones to work in industry, virtually without exception. England has since followed suit. If this is to be total war, we shall have to do the same.

Since the decline in consumption is likely far to exceed 10 per cent—and each additional per cent of decline releases man-power to the extent of 400,000—and since the influx of women, retired persons, and youths will not necessarily be limited to two million but may rise to at least four, complete mobilization of man-power would make possible not only the creation of an army of six to eight million but also full aid to the allies.

It is an altogether different question whether the army can, in the course of a single year, be raised from two to six or eight million. That of course is not merely a matter of man-power but one of organization, military training, and, ultimately, grand strategy.

Let Palestine Mobilize!

Dear Sirs: The futility of British policy in Palestine was never more evident than today. Not one of the Arab states has thrown in its lot with the English; the local Arab "leaders" have moved to Rome and Berlin; the Arab populace is completely indifferent to Britain's need. These are the fruits of appeasement in the Near East. There is no point in speculating now on what a Jewish community of a million or more could have contributed in industrial and military support to the democratic cause.

Rather than recruit a Jewish army in Palestine, Britain brought to the Near East Australians, New Zealanders, South Africans, Indians, while Malaya, Burma, the Dutch East Indies, and Australia had to meet the enemy with a pitifully inferior force. Britain preferred actually to discourage Jewish enlistment for the sake of a discredited political policy. A Jewish army of a hundred thousand would have made a considerable difference to Singapore, and to Australia.

The Near East will soon again be the scene of major hostilities, with all the signs pointing to a Nazi pincer move through the Caucasus or through Turkey and Egypt. The strength of Palestine may decide whether the Germans get through to Mosul and to union with Japan in India. Have we not today the duty to demand that the entire available military potential of the region be mobilized without delay? British imperial policy is a luxury for peace time; in a war which is being lost it is "business as usual" of the most obstructionist sort.

Labor Needs the Long View

Dear Sirs: The article Labor and the Long View by I. F. Stone, appearing in The Nation of March 7 contains suggestions that are realistic, timely, and important, and that should be heeded by both labor leaders and the rank and file.

Several statements culled from Mr. Stone's article are worth repeating and remembering: "Labor leadership, as much as industry or government, needs to shake loose from customary thinking"; "Labor's first task is production"; "It is by gearing itself to these tasks, not by fighting rear-guard actions for overtime, that the labor movement can find safety and fulfil its obligations to the country and to the future."

Labor's present urgent need is "long-view" leaders who, while protecting its present gains, will avoid bartering its future freedom for present pecuniary profit.

District 50 and the Farmers

Dear Sirs: Commenting on the move of the Dairy Farmers' Union, with offices in Utica, to affiliate with District 50 of John L. Lewis's miners, Saul Mills of the New York C. I. O. in a statement published in a great many newspapers recently (and in part in your magazine) said: "The New York C. I. O. is not interested in the type of organization represented by the Dairy Farmers' Union . . . the D. F. U. is dominated today by the same forces and has the same type of program as the monopolistic-controlled Dairymen's League and others of the milk trust's big five." As a former member of the D. F. U., I can say that Mr. Mills is correct in his estimate of what the D. F. U. stands for today. It was for this reason that we found it necessary to reorganize and to form the Farmers' Union of the New York Milkshed, with headquarters at Ogdensburg.

Farmers have a very important part to play in the success of the defense program. None of us want to do anything to interfere with our ability to reach the food-production goals that are necessary for winning the war. That is one of the big reasons farmers do not want to be fooled into joining organizations retaining connections with appeasement groups such as America First.

Apparently John L. Lewis has not severed connections with the America Firsters and still holds to his pre-war isolationist views. With this in mind, one may well believe that his attempt to tie up with farmers in various sections of the country is a move to build political power for himself. If so, it bodes no good for farmers or labor. The irresponsibility of the D. F. U. Utica officials betrays their selfish purpose to affiliate not with the C. I. O. but with the treasury of the United Mine Workers. RUTH E. HILL

Wrongfully Imprisoned

Dear Sirs: Three innocent men—Anthony Panchelly, Edward Woodworth, and Donald Brown—are serving fifteen-year prison sentences in New Jersey. They were framed by the Hague machine for refusing to act as strike-breakers in the seamen's strike of 1936.

Arrested after a fight with a scab-herder, the three men were kept incomunicado for seventy-two days. The police tried again and again to force them to sign a false statement to support the charge of conspiracy made against the strike-committee leaders. But the three seamen remained loyal to their union—and are paying the penalty.

Charged with a patently faked robbery, they were given the maximum sentence, fourteen to fifteen years. They have served five years of that sentence. Now a drive to obtain a pardon for them is being conducted by a committee set up by the Workers' Defense League, with the support of the Civil Liberties Union, the national convention of the C. I. O.—and Judge Robert Kinkead, who sentenced them. The Workers' Defense League is a national non-partisan organization of which Dr. Carl Raushenbush of New York University is chairman.

The New Jersey Court of Pardons has been petitioned to consider the case at its meeting next month. To support that petition you can help: send a letter or wire today to Governor Charles Edison, Trenton, New Jersey, urging him to act favorably on the pardon appeal of Panchelly, Woodworth, and Brown.

Court and Profiteer

Dear Sirs: The Nation's recent editorial Court and Profiteer, in the issue of February 28, was a disappointment to me. I had expected you to take the long-term view of the Bethlehem decision and its effect. Only by a superficial reading of the majority opinion can it be said the court has given a green light to profiteers.

If there is one member of the court who holds no brief for large corporations it is Justice Black, who wrote the majority opinion. Mr. Black chose to allow Bethlehem to keep its profit in order to establish a more important legal principle. And law is, after all, a statement of general public policy or principle, not merely resolutions affecting particular instances. Thus the court ruled that if the terms did not please the government, it should have—and automatically, could have—commandeered the shipyards. The establishment of this principle is worth the $3,800,000 bonus the court awarded to Bethlehem.

The court's decision includes another important statement: "If the Executive is in need of additional laws by which to protect the nation against war profiteering, the Constitution has given to Congress, not to this court, the power to make them." That the present Congress does not seem disposed to limit profits does not alter the fact that the power is theirs; nor does Mr. Roosevelt's reluctance to commandeer any plant alter the fact that the power is his.

This is merely the latest of a series of decisions through which Justice Black and his liberal colleagues are laying the groundwork for the future structure of our law. HRANT AKMAKJIAN

The Shape of Things

IN HIS RADIO SPEECH TO THE INDIAN PEOPLE Sir Stafford Cripps said, "Our object is to give the Indian people full self-government, with complete freedom as to how they will devise and organize their own constitution." The program which he has presented, with the unanimous approval of the British Cabinet, may be criticized in detail, but in general it seems to us to measure up to Sir Stafford's claims. It gives the Indians immediately a greatly increased share in their own government and guarantees dominion status after the war, with the right to break away completely from the empire. It approaches the minorities problem in realistic fashion, assuring each province the right to contract out of the federal system if the constitution to be drawn up by a constitutional assembly fails to satisfy them. There is some obscurity in the treatment proposed for the hundreds of princely states, large and small, in treaty relations with the British crown. Apparently they are to be given representation in the constitutional assembly, but it is not clear whether their representatives are to be elected by the people or are to be nominees of their rulers. Despite its merits, and despite general recognition of the fact that Cripps's recommendation of acceptance is the advice of a genuine friend, it is by no means certain that the program is going to be indorsed by all Indian parties. Once again it may be a case of "too little, too late." Had the British government made an offer like this in 1939 or even a year ago, it would have seemed more generous than it does now, with Japan's armies pushing through Burma.

REPORTS FROM INDIA AS WE GO TO PRESS state that both Gandhi and Nehru are opposed to acceptance of the Cripps plan as it now stands. Gandhi's opposition appears to be based on his pacifism. The plan would commit India to joining fully in the fight against the Axis powers, and the Mahatma believes that India should offer only passive resistance to any invader. Nehru, on the other hand, is willing to fight, but he wants the battle to be directed by the Indians themselves and objects to the provision that Britain shall be responsible for India's defense during the war. In his radio address

Cripps pointed out that the defense of India can only be undertaken as part of the whole war effort and that supreme command must be left in the hands of the commander-in-chief responsible to the British War Cabinet. At the same time an effective share in the control of the war is offered to India through representation on both the War Cabinet and the new Pacific Council of the United Nations. Cripps's proposals for settling the minority problem have aroused the hostility of the extreme Hindu section. It looks upon the contracting-out proposal, designed to provide against coercion of minorities, as the equivalent of a plan for the partition of India. Actually Hindu spokesmen have always claimed that Ali Jinnah, the Moslem separatist leader, represents only the minority of a minority, and if they are right, the predominantly Moslem provinces would almost certainly agree to join the union unless meanwhile the Hindus alarmed them by attempting to concentrate all power in their own hands. We agree that it will be extremely unfortunate if the unity of India is impaired, but any attempt to force minority provinces to adhere to the union against their will would result in an even less auspicious start for Indian independence.

THE SOVIET WINTER OFFENSIVE APPEARS TO have been definitely stalled by heavy Nazi reinforcements. Reports during the past week have told only of minor Russian gains and of the checking of German counter-thrusts. In the Kalinin sector the Nazis essayed an offensive action of their own, but were thrown back with heavy losses after a five-day battle. There is evidence that fresh Nazi troops have been brought up along the entire battle line. Whether these are intended merely to stop the Soviet advance or are initial units for the long-heralded German spring offensive remains unclear. While mud and slush preclude the possibility of extensive military operations on the northern and central sectors during the early part of April, the weather may soon be favorable in the Ukraine, Caucasus, and Crimea. Russia is undoubtedly prepared to meet a thrust in these areas, but its ability to beat back an all-out Nazi offensive must depend to a great extent on the aid it receives from Britain and the United States in the next few weeks. In this respect Britain seems to be doing far better than we are. The R. A. F. raid on Lübeck is reported to have done heavy damage to the harbor which is the chief outlet for shipments to the Russian front. The Commando raid on St. Nazaire served notice on the Nazis that the British are perfectly capable at least of small-scale offensive action on the Continent. The United States, however, has fallen seriously behind in lend-lease shipments to Russia just at the time when those shipments are most needed. Minor army and navy officials are reported to have diverted material intended for front-line use in Russia to use within the United States. It is obvious that the hope for winning the war in 1942—perhaps of winning it at all—rests to a considerable extent on the aid which we succeed in getting to Russia during these next few weeks. President Roosevelt as Commander-in-Chief has ordered these shipments speeded up, but success depends on the loyal cooperation of all officials responsible for deliveries.

THE NAZIS ARE APPLYING TO TURKEY THE sorts of pressure that give sure warning of trouble ahead. Von Papen is in Berlin presumably to tell the German Foreign Office just how much it can hope to get out of Turkey without war. Hitler, meanwhile, has been closeted with King Boris of Bulgaria, and in an address to the Bulgarian Parliament Premier Filov has said that the "destruction of bolshevism" is the prime requisite for the establishment of the New Order in Europe and that Bulgaria must give "the fullest possible measure" of support to its allies, the Axis powers. This sounds as if Bulgaria were at last prepared to send troops to the Russian front, but in view of the strong pro-Soviet sentiment among the people it is equally possible that the whole maneuver is part of the Axis threat against Turkey. New contingents of German troops are said to be arriving daily in Bulgaria, and fortifications are being rushed to completion along the Turkish frontier. An invasion of Turkey would find considerable support in Bulgaria, and if successful it would bring great advantages to Germany, opening a route by which to attack Russia from the rear and gain access to the oil fields of Iraq, Iran, and southern Russia, and making possible a flanking attack on the Suez Canal and Egypt. But it would also mean taking on another redoubtable foe at a time when Nazi resources are severely strained. So it is probable that for the present Hitler will try to gain certain strategic ends—as, for example, Turkish acquiescence in a German attack on Syria—by threat and pressure rather than war.

THE STATE DEPARTMENT SET A NEW HIGH in credulity when it accepted Vichy's bland assurance that henceforth France would keep its collaboration with the Axis in the Mediterranean and Atlantic war zones strictly within the limits determined by its armistice obligations. In addition to earlier pledges not to surrender its fleet or bases, Pétain's government has undertaken not to send more gasoline, trucks, or food direct to Libya and to give prior notice of fleet movements, such as the recent removal of the battleship Dunkerque from Oran to Toulon. Such pledges are in themselves admissions that Vichy has been aiding the Axis in ways which exceeded its armistice commitments. Explaining shipments of gasoline from military stores in North Africa to the Italians in Libya, Vichy maintains that it is obligated to supply its former enemies with this most valuable of all war materials. Delivery at Tripoli, however, was an extra service thrown in to relieve Italy of the difficulties and dangers of carrying the gasoline across the Mediterranean in its own ships. Quite probably these French supplies were an important factor in enabling General Rommel to reorganize his forces and counter-attack, but the State Department is willing to let bygones be bygones now that Vichy has promised not to do it again. Another point arises. Every time Vichy is caught aiding the Axis we are told about some hitherto unpublished armistice obligation. We have suggested before that the State Department insist on receiving a full list of such commitments, together with Vichy's definitive interpretation of their meaning. Until this elementary precaution is taken, any resumption of shipments of American supplies to North Africa—proved to be an important source of food and raw materials for Germany and Italy—would be not merely folly but sabotage.

THE PRESIDENT'S ANNOUNCEMENT OF THE new Pacific War Council to sit in Washington is a triumph for Australia and New Zealand, whose representatives have been insisting for weeks that the center of gravity in the Pacific war has shifted to the United States and that direction and decisions on strategy should be centered here, too. The new council will not replace the existing Pacific Council which meets in London but will collaborate closely with it; just how the two boards will divide their functions is yet to be announced. It is high time that the cumbersome arrangements which have prevailed until now, involving endless discussions between Washington and London with resulting misunderstandings and delays, be superseded by a simpler, more centralized control. Neither Australia nor New Zealand has been satisfied with the aid given them so far. They are particularly disturbed by the inadequate number of first-class fighter planes dispatched "down under." Australia manufactures planes but in quantities far too small for present defense needs. The dominions point out that they did not hesitate to send powerful forces to aid the British in the Middle East and at Singapore, and ask that they be given comparable assistance in their own hour of peril. Britain has already permitted some Australian soldiers, including General Blamey, to return home, but the shortage of ships will prevent any large number from being repatriated. For reasons of geography the dominions know that they must look to Washington rather than London for immediate large-scale aid. The new council should give the dominions the help and reassurance they demand and at the same time provide the concentrated direction required for effective military action.

BY THREATENING TO SUPPRESS THE DAILY Mirror Herbert Morrison, British Home Secretary, has, we believe, committed a bad blunder. His case is that this paper published "scurrilous misrepresentations, distorted and exaggerated statements, and irresponsible generalizations . . . tending to undermine the army and depress the whole population." In a statement in the House of Commons Mr. Morrison mentioned particularly a cartoon implying that British seamen were risking their lives to swell the profits of the oil corporations, but in addition he referred to criticisms of military leaders. Prime Minister Churchill also declared in a recent speech that he drew the line at tolerating "propaganda" which disturbed the army or undermined the confidence of the country "in the qualities and character of our devoted corps of officers." This suggests that the British War Office, smarting under such defeats as that at Singapore, is trying to silence those who have questioned its efficiency. Possibly the critics have not always been fair, and the Daily Mirror certainly appears to have couched its strictures in rather crude terms. There is no question, however, about this paper's whole-hearted support of the war; indeed, it was strongly anti-Nazi in days when some men still in the British Cabinet were intent only on appeasing Hitler. Its suppression could only mean that British leadership had become so unsure of itself that it was unable to withstand honest but pungent expressions of disapproval.

SMALL BUSINESSES WITH WAR CONTRACTS may obtain working capital directly from the army, navy, or Maritime Commission under an executive order issued by the President last week. This step enlarges one of the bottlenecks which have prevented use of machinery in small shops, but it will not solve the problem. Regardless of capital, the small plants cannot operate without orders. So far, no country-wide system has been devised for getting orders through to the small subcontractor. Several localities, including Philadelphia, appear to have tackled the problem effectively. But the War Production Board has never been sufficiently concerned with the situation to devise a workable nation-wide arrangement. The provision for loans seems to have been decided on under pressure from the Senate, which had its own plan for aiding the small producer. It is to be hoped the WPB will soon undertake a complete inventory of idle machinery as a preliminary to full utilization of our industrial facilities.

STANDARD OIL'S ACTION IN MAKING ITS synthetic-rubber patents available to Nazi Germany while denying them to American and British firms has rightly brought down a storm of indignation on the heads of the company's officials. But as Thurman Arnold has pointed out, Standard Oil's record is in no way different from that of several other powerful American firms. What is urgently needed is legislation prohibiting American firms from participating in cartels where such action involves disposal of American processes of possible military or strategic importance. Moreover, as Mr. Arnold recommended, steps should be taken to insure the registration of all patent license agreements and of all agreements between American companies and foreign industries. Mr. Arnold also recommended vigorous enforcement of the anti-trust act, and it is rather unfortunate that almost simultaneously he should have been persuaded to join Attorney General Biddle and Secretaries Knox and Stimson in signing a memorandum, later indorsed by the President, proposing a kind of moratorium on anti-trust prosecutions for the period of the war. But we doubt that this step is of quite such tragic importance as I. F. Stone implies in this week's Washington letter. For one thing, under his war powers the President is able to force the freeing of essential war patents without a lengthy court procedure, and he can also, by commandeering the plant of any recalcitrant firm, circumvent attempts by monopolists to impede war production. Moreover, Mr. Roosevelt stressed the fact that violations of the anti-trust laws would not be dropped but merely postponed and that there would be immediate prosecution where fraud against the government was involved.

IF ANYTHING COULD BE MORE ILL-TIMED and exaggerated than Milton Mayer's article, The Case Against the Jew, in the Saturday Evening Post, it was Ralph Ingersoll's attack on Milton Mayer in PM. Mayer could not have chosen a worse moment to vent his spleen on the sort of Jew he doesn't like—who is, examined closely, merely the sort of person he doesn't like. He believes, it would seem, that only when the Jew becomes a perfect human being, free from the greed and envy and desire for acceptance common to all ordinary people, will he be relieved of the fears that now pursue him. This doctrine, it seems to us, applies with equal effect to the rest of the human race. Mr. Mayer's rather muddled views, expressed in violent language and published in a mass-circulation magazine which until yesterday was bitterly isolationist, can only help to spread or intensify anti-Semitic feeling at a time when such feeling is peculiarly dangerous. But when Ralph Ingersoll indulges in an equally vitriolic attack on Mayer, distorting his opinions on the Jewish question and linking them with opposition to the war, he does the cause of racial tolerance no good either. He not only called widespread atttention to the article but may even have created a reaction in Mayer's favor. It is an unhappy commentary on America's war-time journalism that a sensational article like Mayer's should become a cause célèbre while a sober analysis of the same subject by Waldo Frank in the preceding issue of the Post went all but unnoticed.

Labor and Its Enemies

THE Congressional blitzkrieg against labor standards has been checked with the exposure of some far from disinterested snakes among the grass roots. I. F. Stone in last week's Nation gave a detailed account of the way the "spontaneous" public demand for abolition of the forty-hour week was launched in Oklahoma by a reactionary publisher-industrialist. Since then Senator Thomas of Utah has uncovered the slimy trail of the United States Chamber of Commerce, and light has been shed on the activities of the Southern States Industrial Council, which under cover of war necessity is trying to obtain for its sweatshop members repeal of a law that it opposed bitterly but in vain.

It has also been amply demonstrated that workers in most war industries are in fact putting in far more than forty hours per week and that loss of time through strikes—an issue introduced into the debate in order to stir up feeling against the unions—has been reduced to infinitesimal proportions. Men really qualified to express themselves on the question of the effects of the forty-hour law on production have protested most emphatically against the Smith-Vinson bill. "If we abolish the forty-hour week by law," Donald M. Nelson told the House Naval Affairs Committee, "we do not gain one hour of additional work in our war industries; but naturally we create a widespread demand for increases in wage rates, throw the entire wage structure out of adjustment, and remove an important incentive for labor to shift from non-essential industries into war-production jobs."

Mr. Nelson's views on this subject have been indorsed by so staunch an exponent of the Wall Street view as Barron's, the national financial weekly, which has declared editorially: "What people who rant against the forty-hour week fail to realize is that it has worked itself into the country's wage structure just as completely as the basic hourly rates themselves. Or, to put it another way, it has held down the hourly rates wherever it has provided the overtime means of raising weekly wages." Even William P. Witherow, president of the National Association of Manufacturers, was not prepared to indorse the Smith-Vinson bill or to support the claim that it would increase output. In some areas, he declared, it would speed production; in others, "it might easily tend to slow it down."

In the light of such testimony the agitation against existing labor standards is revealed as a wanton attempt to use the war emergency as an excuse for wrecking the New Deal. Its authors have proved themselves saboteurs of the cause they claim to represent, and they have pushed their campaign regardless of the damage it was bound to inflict on national unity and workers' morale. In the words of a Southern newspaper, the Montgomery Advertiser, which has sharply attacked the anti-labor attitude of some Southern Congressmen, "It is not altogether how long a man works but also how vigorously, whether he puts his 'heart into it.' American workmen are human. They are not going to be as enthusiastically behind the war effort if they know that their well-known enemies are making capital of the war situation. Those who seek personal advantage on this issue now are as much 'gimme boys' as anyone else."

Any attempt to impugn the patriotism of the trade-union movement as a whole is utterly unjustified. By surrendering their right to strike for the duration the unions made a bigger sacrifice than many people realize. And although misleading publicity for a handful of unauthorized strikes has endeavored to give a contrary impression, they are keeping their word even in the face of great provocation. We have recently been informed, for instance, that in a great aircraft works where the United Automobile Workers has organized a strong minority of the employees, a number of its members have recently been dismissed for various alleged reasons but actually for union activities. The union has appealed to the War Labor Board, but that body has such a choked calendar that it cannot promise consideration of the case for many weeks. Meanwhile dismissals continue, and the local leaders are hard put to keep their members from expressing their indignation by a walkout.

Nor is abstention from strikes the only contribution which the unions are making to the cause of increased and continuous production. The A. F. of L. and the C. I. O. have just agreed to abandon the customary contract provision for double-time on Sundays when that day is not the seventh successive working day. Many unions have given up time-honored practices and privileges which tended to check output. Many—for instance, the C. I. O. Shipyard Workers—are fostering training schemes regardless of the effect that a great increase of trained workers may have on conditions after the war when work may not be so plentiful. These are only a few examples of the ways in which organized labor is adjusting itself to the national need for all-out production. And as Robert Lynd points out on another page, labor's contribution would be even more important if it had a real share of responsibility on the industrial front.

On the basis of their war record, then, the unions can easily challenge comparison with any other large group in the country. Yet it must be admitted that they have not won for themselves anything like so assured a position in national life as that enjoyed by the British labor organizations. To some extent this fact may be ascribed to perpetual misrepresentation of labor in the overwhelming majority of newspapers. But the unions themselves are not entirely free from blame. A minority among them have developed practices which undoubtedly provide useful ammunition for labor's enemies. The recent attack by Thurman Arnold was ill-timed, as Attorney General Biddle said, since it coincided with the phony agitation against the wage-and-hour law. It was also unfair because it attributed to all unions various types of wrongdoing of which only a comparative few are guilty. But it remains true that there have been attempts by unions to extend protection of their members to the point of ruthless monopoly; there are unions which act as a cloak for racketeers, unions which use strong-arm methods to coerce employers and even their own dissident members, unions in which democratic methods have been reduced to a farce. And these sins of a minority are visited on the heads of all organized workers. It is more than time that the leaders of the C. I. O. and more particularly the A. F. of L. took vigorous action to purge their ranks of parasitic growths which are weakening the foundations of American trade unionism. Only a labor movement which is democratic in practice as well as in theory, which makes itself the spokesman and guardian of the workers, can hope to achieve an unassailable position in the country—now and when the war ends.

Dies in the Spring

MARTIN DIES has opened the spring drive on progressives by going out gun in hand for the Board of Economic Warfare. In a letter addressed to Vice-President Wallace but "mailed" through the press the Texan claimed that "an initial check" showed that "at least thirty-five high government officials" employed by the board "have public records which show affiliation with front organizations of the Communist Party." An initial check on Dies's initial check shows that his principal source of information is still the same old membership list of the American League for Peace and Democracy published by his committee two and a half years ago.

The prize exhibit in Dies's new researches combines politics with sex. Three pages of his five-and-a-half-page letter are devoted to Maurice Parmelee, and the case against him is worth examining in detail because it illustrates so well the Texan's unsavory methods. Parmelee is held up to indignation as author of a book on "Nudism in Modern Life." It is pointed out that he was born in Constantinople—no doubt a harem voluptuary—that he omitted the nudism study from the books listed on his application for a job as economist with the board, that the book was held obscene by a federal court, and that Parmelee has written "propaganda treatises for communism."

What Dies didn't bother to mention is that Parmelee had the indecency to be born in Constantinople only because his parents were both Congregational missionaries to Turkey from their native state of Vermont, that his book on nudism was not named in his application for a government job because the application blank did not ask what books he had written, that the federal court which held the book obscene was reversed by the Circuit Court in a decision which paid tribute to Parmelee as a writer, and that such "propaganda treatises for communism" as Parmelee's "Bolshevism, Fascism, and the Liberal-Democratic State" are propaganda treatises for the last, not the first or second.

Vice-President Wallace, in an indignant and moving letter, makes a few other points "overlooked" in the Dies letter. Dies deliberately made it appear that Parmelee was employed in the tiny post-war-planning section of the board "because of the chance it gave him to draw utterly false inferences from the book on nudism." The fact that Parmelee had worked for the United States War Trade Board on blockade control in London during the last war and later served as special assistant to Secretary of State Charles Evans Hughes is never mentioned by Dies—for these facts would run counter to his purpose. This purpose is still his old purpose—to hound progressives out of the government. He knows as well as the Vice-President does that Parmelee is not and never has been a Communist—nor has C. Hartley Grattan or Eugene Staley or T. A. Bisson, to select a few others mentioned in the Dies letter.

This unprincipled attack shows the need for organizing immediately to fight Dies constantly, day after day, not merely once a year; to fight now against the grant of an appropriation to him by Congress, and to defend the Board of Economic Warfare. Dies cites with glee the case of Malcolm Cowley, New Republic editor, whose life in Washington was made miserable for three months and who was finally driven out of the OFF by a campaign of lies as dirty as any the capital has seen. The campaign originated with the Hearst press, which worked closely with Dies. The New York Journal-American even ran a long story about an attack made on Cowley by Dies on the floor of the House—an attack which was not made until twenty-four hours after the paper appeared!

The OFF preferred to let Cowley resign rather than face a long and gruelling fight with Dies, but the use made of the Cowley resignation in this new attack proves that there is no safety in retreat or appeasement. In a Washington which has more than its quota of America Firsters, pro-fascists, and anti-Semites among gentlemen presumably engaged in prosecuting the war, the editor of a liberal weekly is regarded as too subversive for public office. Not the least of the services Dies performs for fascism is keeping out of Washington the kind of people most needed for a vigorous democratic conduct of our production and propaganda agencies. Administrative officials have grown fearful of hiring progressives, and progressives have grown fearful of taking government jobs. One of the most pressing campaigns in the war on the Washington front is a drive against Martin Dies.

The Ban on Burlesque

NEITHER the press nor the public has exhibited much interest in Mayor LaGuardia's most recent—and still continuing—attempt to make his whim law in the government of New York City. No doubt he is counting on the fact that few intelligent citizens are interested in burlesque theaters per se, but if his entering wedge stays put we may wake up some morning to find the whole institution of the theater subject to an arbitrary control and all the laws now intended to protect it completely nullified. Where the Mayor plans to go from there remains to be seen, but possibly Archbishop Spellman and Bishop Manning, who are behind the present move, have some further suggestions in mind.

The conspiracy involves the old device of using licensing authority as an instrument for enforcing a completely arbitrary and wholly illegal censorship. For some years now Commissioner of Licenses Paul Moss, apparently acting under the Mayor's direction, has been harassing the burlesque theaters. Some time ago he ruled that neither the word "burlesque" nor the name "Minsky" could be used. He also raised the annual licensing fee from $500 to $1,000 and made the licenses renewable quarterly. Then on the evening of January 23, 1942, one hour and forty-five minutes before the current license of the Gaiety Theater expired, he announced that it would not be renewed. Commissioner Moss freely admits that neither the managers nor any of the performers have ever been prosecuted for indecency. Somewhat less freely he also admits that the Mayor's Committee on Burlesque, composed of representative unpaid members appointed by the Mayor himself, has recommended that the license of the Gaiety be renewed. Yet the only reason assigned for the refusal is alleged indecency, and if one wonders why the indecency, supposing it actually exists, has not been prosecuted under the laws provided, one will find the answer in a broadcast made by the Mayor over the municipal station on February 1, 1942. The legal method, said the Mayor, takes too long. In other words, it is evident that he, like certain other persons now in the public eye, feels that democratic and legal processes have outlived their usefulness. Dictators are more efficient.

Of course the question whether or not the performances at the Gaiety were or were not indecent within the meaning of the present law is not really relevant. The report of the Mayor's Committee would certainly seem to indicate that they were not. But if they were, adequate machinery is provided by the existing laws, and that machinery should be used. If it is not used and if the Mayor succeeds in establishing by precedent the right to refuse licenses purely at the discretion of the licenser, then a censorship of the most completely arbitrary and absolute sort has been established in plain contravention of the law's intention. Greenbaum, Wolff, and Ernst are representing the plaintiff, and Supreme Court Justice Aaron J. Levy has issued an order to show cause why Commissioner Moss should not be required to issue a license. Unless he is compelled to do so, democratic process will have lost an important round.

Handcuffing Thurman Arnold

BY I. F. STONE

Washington, March 29

TODAY'S announcement of the new policy on anti-trust prosecutions is an extraordinary climax to Thurman Arnold's revelations during the past week. Arnold had disclosed the way in which Standard Oil placed loyalty to its Nazi partner, I. G. Farben, above loyalty to the United States. He had shown that the development of synthetic rubber and many other important war materials in this country was stifled by Standard Oil on orders from Berlin. He had revealed, in the top ranks of Standard and its du Pont and Mellon allies, men who appear more interested in protecting their holdings abroad and their monopolies at home than in winning the war. These men and their henchmen are apparently so powerful that, after all these revelations, they can slip the handcuffs on Thurman Arnold. The oil trust is calmly thumbing its nose at the American people.

It seems that the anti-trust laws, not the trusts, have been holding up the war effort. A War Production Board official tells me gravely that one War Department compilation showed that an anti-trust prosecution had lost the country 124 days and 23 evenings of the valuable time of one executive vice-president of an unnamed company! The international-cartel agreements on aluminum and synthetics and magnesium and dyestuffs will cost us precious lives and years. Yet here are the President and Attorney General Biddle and Secretary Stimson and Secretary Knox and the unwilling Arnold himself agreeing that prosecution of these and similar trust arrangements may be postponed for the duration because they take up too much of the time of important executives. The country would be better off if we lost all the time of some of these executives. If the officials of I. G. Farben had dared to act like some of the officials of Standard Oil, they would have been in a concentration camp a long time ago, thanking their lucky stars that they hadn't been shot. Here we put up a sign outside their offices, "Do not disturb."

Inquiries into dyestuffs and magnesium are pending. Both are important in the war effort. Are they to be pinched off under the new policy? Either the Secretary of War or the Secretary of the Navy may veto the Attorney General, and the Attorney General can override their veto on a proposed prosecution only by appealing directly to the President. The Secretary of War and the Secretary of the Navy and the men around them were bred in the atmosphere and the service of big business and finance. Some among them have shown a capacity to rise above their background and training that commands confidence and earns gratitude. But these are the exceptions. Even with the best intentions a man cannot altogether shake loose from the habits and preconceptions of a lifetime. Their sympathies, their old friends, their dinner partners, often their own methods in business predispose them toward the very men Arnold has been attacking. If they had possessed this veto power six months ago, would Arnold have been allowed to continue the Standard Oil-I. G. Farben inquiry? I doubt it.

Had Standard Oil come forward after Pearl Harbor and offered to give up its foreign connections and place its patents at the disposal of the country, no one would object to a "let-bygones-be-bygones" attitude toward our anti-trust laws for the duration. But Standard did not do this. It threatened a libel suit when Nathan W. Robertson, one of PM's Washington correspondents, revealed that Standard was refusing to pool its patents for butyl along with other synthetic-rubber formulas. It sought by underhanded means to keep its German connections even after we were in the war. Most important of all, Standard went right on stifling the development of war synthetics until Arnold got the goods on it and forced it into a consent decree. Who knows how many other cartel agreements hobbling this country's war effort are still in effect? Since the new anti-trust policy covers investigations as well as suits and prosecutions, War and Navy officials will often be faced with a choice between Arnold's suspicions and the assurances of their old friends and business associates. Is Arnold to be bound and gagged?

I asked a WPB official why the decision to suspend the anti-trust laws had not been made by Donald Nelson instead of by Stimson and Knox. He said Nelson didn't want the responsibility. It was felt that it would be wiser to leave the decision with the armed services since the public regarded the War Production Board as dominated by business men. I suggested that the armed services when examined turned out to be as thoroughly dominated by big business men and corporation lawyers as the WPB. The answer very candidly was that the public didn't realize this. One of the sources of this new policy, for example, is a General Walter B. Pyron in Under Secretary of War Patterson's office. Pyron is liaison man between the War Department and the oil industry. He sits in on the meetings of the Petroleum War Industrial Council, a private, not a governmental, body. Suspension of the anti-trust laws for the duration was one of the main objectives of the council's meeting on March 3 and 4, and General Pyron carried the council's wishes to Patterson. The General was until recently vice-president of the Mellon Gulf Oil Company.

The oil trust which was so anxious to accommodate itself to Nazi business methods, and which now has its men in almost every important agency in Washington, is vitally concerned in bringing about a virtual suspension of the anti-trust laws. It wants to kill off the suit filed by Arnold against the trust in September of 1940. It has already disposed of his Elkins Act suit against its pipe lines with a consent decree so weak that the two attorneys who worked on the case for the government refused to sign it, and one of them resigned in disgust. More important than these suits are the protection of its secret world-wide agreements and connections and the precious patents it holds on the multifarious range of synthetic products which can now be made from petroleum. Oil is becoming a chemical industry, and Rockefeller and du Pont are merging their lordly empires. The consent decree on synthetic rubber leaves with them much of their power over the new synthetics, and the country remains dependent on their good faith and good-will. An Administration determined to let nothing stand in the way of victory would seize their patents under the War Powers Act and purge the government of their henchmen, instead of making them safe from the one weapon the people can use against them, the anti-trust laws.

What's Right with Britain

BY RALPH BATES

LORD HALIFAX'S speech of March 19 showed that London has taken note of the sinister growth of anti-British feeling in this country. Let there be no mistake about it; distrust of Britain does increase rather than diminish. Most of this is the consequence of two things—British reverses in the Far East, particularly the loss of Singapore, and the fact that Britain has not yet invaded the Continent. The unjustified defeatism that has resulted is being exploited by the pro-fascists and the appeasers, for it lends plausibility to a charge that, unlike rational criticism, tends to destroy the foundations of trust between the United States and Britain. Quite simply Britain is accused of refusing to fight.

None of the critics offer an analysis of the military problem, for that would show, as Lord Halifax showed in general terms, that far more is right with Britain than wrong. And to put liberal criticism of the production effort in proper perspective, it may be said that had there been as much reorganization as the necessity for preserving national unity permitted, production today might be perhaps 20 per cent higher than it is. To achieve that 20 per cent increase is vitally important for the future, but so far as the past is concerned, it could not have given Britain victory.

Lord Halifax was excellent in that part of his speech which dealt with the Libyan campaigns, the importance of which is not generally understood. But his argument would have been more powerful had it been placed against a background of recent history.

One simple military idea must be kept in mind. Since Britain is a factory-fortress that at all costs must be held, what it must do before it can invade the Continent or pour unstinted forces into far-off battlefields is to reach a state of "over-defense." It is only the surplus of force that can normally be gambled. If the island base were sacrificed, even though the bulk of the German army were destroyed in a battle on the Continent, the security of the United States also might well be destroyed. Wars can be won or lost by the smallest of margins nowadays. It is this simple conception which explains Britain's apparent weakness up to now. That Britain can only recently have reached a state of adequate defense will be proved by a review of the situation at the time of the Norwegian campaign and immediately after Dunkirk.

The following estimate, though it conflicts with that given in Mr. Churchill's speech of June 18, 1940, cannot be far wrong. After the collapse of France about one million men were on the "ration strength" of the British army. At least half of these were practically untrained recruits; only a part of the remainder were sufficiently trained to have been able to take the field had they possessed enough arms. As it was, only the Canadian corps of 60,000 men was thoroughly equipped; one British corps of the same size was nearing that condition.

How many tanks there were is not known, though the dispatch of one armored division to Egypt in July gravely imperiled England. Some 120,000 first-class troops, then, were all that Britain possessed to meet the invasion Hitler had promised. Besides this force, of course, there was the hastily formed Home Guard of half a million men. Armed with shotguns and semi-obsolete rifles rushed to Britain from this country, untrained, immobile, the Home Guard was essentially a civilian militia incapable of front-line duty against an army like that of Germany. The navy, suddenly faced with the defection of the French and the entry of the Italian fleet, and the small but superb R. A. F. were Britain's real defenses. There was no hope of winning effective allies, nor any possibility of getting large supplies of arms quickly. Britain, in those days, lived on its nerves.

That was the starting-point of the country's rearmament campaign. The paralytic hand of Chamberlain had been struck from the wheel in May. Mr. Churchill, adroitly annihilating Chamberlain with what purported to be a speech in his defense, declared that Norway had been lost for lack of arms rather than because of culpable failure on the part of the navy. With the Labor Party and the Trades Union Congress welcomed into cooperation, the response of the working classes was tremendous, and the appeasers were reduced to comparative nullity. It was not rhetoric when Mr. Churchill declared that "thousands of men and women did not remove their clothes for weeks at a time, and men worked until they dropped beside their lathes." The pace set proved too severe to maintain and in the interest of production itself had to be relaxed. How much had been accomplished when next the war flared up is impossible to say. If half a million men or thereabouts had been fully equipped and thoroughly trained by the end of 1940, it was a great achievement. These troops were of course infantry. There could have been no ample supply of tanks. "Over-defense" certainly had not been reached when the pool of forces had to be tapped for campaigns in Libya, Greece, and Crete.

At any rate, the foreseen defeat in Greece at once awakened the cry, "Too little and too late." Competent soldiers have been specific in their criticism of the Balkan campaign. They have pointed to wrongly chosen lines of resistance and indicated alternatives. That is legitimate and useful. At the most, however, given the neutrality of the Soviet Union and Turkey, all that could have been done was to fight a better delaying action. Possibly more than the 58,000 troops that were sent could have been dispatched to Greece. If they had been, the German staff would have smiled with pleasure, for if we put the German army's strength at that time as low as 240 divisions, with 90 to 100 divisions on the Russian frontier and possibly 40 engaged in garrison and police duty elsewhere, it is still reasonable to suppose that Hitler could have swept away an Anglo-Greek army of any practicable size. Again, the British had too few fighter planes in Crete and too few airports. That without endangering the British Isles too greatly they could have supplied enough planes to turn back the bombers that destroyed the Cretan air bases is not to be believed.

It happens that the criticism of the Balkan campaign admirably illustrates the true nature of the problem. Some critics in Britain argued then, as they do now, that any expenditure of troops upon outlying campaigns is unjustified in that it puts off the day of a Continental invasion. For political reasons they were wrong. To have abandoned Greece might have put Turkey in the enemy's camp. The resistance Hitler encountered in the Balkans postponed his invasion of Russia and prevented the German army from closing its pincers around Moscow.

A more radical school of criticism, including Lieutenant Colonel Garsia in his "Planning the War," contended that Britain's purely military potential would always remain so much lower than Germany's that it was unwise to think of sending a B. E. F. to engage the Reichswehr. To do so would be to match Britain's greatest weakness against Germany's greatest strength. These critics demanded, therefore, a deliberate concentration upon air effort. Germany was to be bombed into surrender. And since it was not parity in number of planes and personnel that the R. A. F. would need for this task, or even a two-to-one superiority, but a four-to-one or six-to-one superiority, those who thought this way pointed out that Britain could not build such an air force and at the same time arm a great expeditionary force; that is to say, the idea of a major land invasion was a total error.

The mistake of the Garsia school lay in its root assumption that the war would remain a limited one, between Britain and the Axis powers, with the United States serving as arsenal and check to Japan. Nothing more clearly illustrates the connection between wise production planning and a sound political understanding of the world forces in play. London had reasoned correctly about the war. Throughout 1940 and early 1941 delaying actions alone could be fought if "over-defense" was to be reached. At a later date the temptation to throw away the excess of strength had to be resisted.

One result of the German invasion of the Soviet Union was that an enormous sector of British public opinion at once demanded the opening of a second front. The demand could not be met. There is reason to believe that Stalin himself realized that no major front could be opened by Britain. Nor can he have had any doubt that every tank and plane he accepted from Britain delayed the arming of a B. E. F. It is, by the way, a mistake to imagine that the "second-front" campaign in Britain was merely a Communist affair. The British people's warm admiration for the Red Army and their solidarity with Russia are chiefly sincere expressions of their resolve to defeat the Axis. Relief also enters into it, as well as exasperation at Britain's enforced absence from the Continent. That the Munich appeasers had spurned Russia is another factor. If any political declaration was responsible for British enthusiasm for Russia it was Mr. Churchill's magnificent speech of June 23, in which that pre-war advocate of collaboration with the Soviets rallied Britain, and the world, for the new tasks ahead.

Since June 22, 1941, the world situation has been profoundly changed. But though Britain has gained mighty allies, the Japanese onslaught has again complicated matters and, for a while at least, has slowed up Britain's growth in strength. Nevertheless, and despite the new importance of the Suez region, steady progress is being made.

Anti-British feeling here is, I have said, the result not only of the failure to invade the Continent but of the Far Eastern defeats, particularly the loss of Singapore. In estimating London's degree of blame for these events, the same general considerations must be taken into account. Once France had laid down its arms and Indo-China had become a Japanese corridor, the defense of the Malayan base became extremely difficult. Without the aid of the United States, Britain could not have undertaken that offensive action against Indo-China and Thailand which would seem at this date to have been the only way to hold Malaya. Tactics were poor, doubtless, and again planes were too few and of out-of-date types. Even unofficial critics, however, had no conception of Japan's striking power, which China had weakened far less than most had supposed.

Turning, then to Europe, which for Britain must remain the principal theater of the war, what is the present ratio of strength of the antagonists? It is reasonable to believe that the German army itself contains between 280 and 300 divisions and that their distribution is as follows:

On the Russian front....	Approximately	160	divisions
In reserve for that front..	"	60	"
In Norway	"	8	"
In France	"	20	"
In Italy (the Libyan base)	"	10	"
In general reserve.......	"	30	"
Total	Approximately	288	divisions

A few Italian and Rumanian divisions of poor quality are on the Russian front, as is also the Finnish army. Germany's allies provide much of the police and garrison force required for the occupied countries. Thus in Yugoslavia, the only one where serious military difficulties are being encountered, Bulgarian troops are used to combat General Mikhailovich's guerrilla army.

Assuming that the imperial armies in India, Egypt, and Asia Minor have been greatly strengthened, the forces within the British Isles may be put at 100 divisions, well trained and equipped. There may be another 20 to 30 divisions that fall short of this condition. The Home Guard has become a well-trained force of two million, and the personnel of the R. A. F. has been put as high as three-quarters of a million. On a population basis Russia can probably muster thirteen million men over a long period, but how many it can keep in the field at one time no one outside Moscow knows.

A British force invading France, it would seem, would meet at least twenty and perhaps thirty divisions, assuming the Soviets are still able to engage the main German army. Could Britain alone undertake such a venture? If the B. E. F. ought to be at least twice as large as the army opposing it, the answer must be no. Moreover, it must be remembered that British troops are largely untried in battle; very few of them can have had any experience of the most difficult of all feats, that of landing upon a hostile shore supplied with a splendid system of hinterland communications. Two other difficulties are obvious. The debarking of heavy equipment requires port facilities that the Germans would surely destroy if light or air-borne troops appeared likely to establish a beach head. More important, Britain's shipping problem is a crucial one. The American World War ratio of seven and one-half tons of shipping per man is certainly too high for so short a sea passage, but even at a rate of from two and one-half to four tons, the transportation required for, say, half a million men would seem to be beyond Britain's power to supply. The chosen theater for a Continental invasion would have to be one in which the B. E. F. could so rapidly achieve total mastery that Hitler could be shut out of it, without possibility of his drawing continuously upon reserves. There must be no second Dunkirk. While the Britain of 1942, I believe, will have so far passed the mark of "defense" that it might open a new front, it cannot risk engagement with the total German forces not occupied in Russia.

Moreover, a new crisis threatens. It is unwise to assume that Hitler will necessarily strike at European Russia this spring. With Japan's fingers groping at the throat of India and the Germans still reaching for Egypt, the United Nations must consider themselves menaced by a move which, if successful, would profoundly affect the grand strategy of the United Nations. As Lord Halifax said, it is relatively easy for Germany to reinforce its Libyan army. It is extremely difficult for Britain to do so, for Libya is 12,000 miles distant by sea from the home base. For Germany the Suez campaign would be at once the most effective means of foiling a Continental invasion and of reducing Britain's aid to the Soviets.

Britain's strength is growing steadily. In a certain sense, however, a "hump" has been encountered. It is one that able men in Britain have long foreseen. Modified capitalism, with its corollary of "free" wage- and price-fixing, has provided the framework—and the check—to British effort. The conscription of the entire population is at present enabling the government to put each day 5,000 more women to work in war industries, thus releasing men for the army. Much more needs to be done, though thoroughgoing reform will become possible only as the war drives home its lessons to a majority of the people.

The mood of Britain today is complex. That is the result partly of frustration and partly of the inadequacies of the social system. It is true, as Sir William Beveridge, the British expert on man-power utilization, has suggested, that the system of material rewards itself checks the growth of an all-out crusading spirit. There is still no sign of widespread understanding that the war must be fought as revolution. What exists is a grim determination that is short of blazing fervor. But lest the failure to carry out a startlingly radical social change be utilized by the fascists and their defeatist allies to drive a wedge between the United States and Britain, it is worth while to glance at the changes demanded by Sir William in an article in the London Times of March 17. He asks for nothing short of total state control of industries, prices and wages included, with the state as distributor of income and the trade unions surrendering their autonomy. This is democratic totalitarianism—no small order! Something like this will have to be done, and when it is done it will be without destroying the foundation of British democracy. Until then we must fasten our gaze upon the rock-bottom facts and await events. The facts alone will refute the abominable slanders which defeatists are believing at the prompting of scoundrels.

Three Years of Franco

BY J. ALVAREZ DEL VAYO

IN The Nation of March 30, 1940, I published an analysis of one year of the Franco regime. The title of this article, with the difference of time, is the same, and the main conclusions are the same too. In 1942 the most striking feature of the Spanish situation is still "the incapacity of Franco's government to build even a totalitarian state of the Fascist or Nazi type," as I said in my short obituary two years ago. I use the word "obituary" not from any optimistic expectation of a quick collapse of the puppet state built up by Italy and Germany and nourished by the appeasement policy of the democracies but because everything in Spain today suggests just that—the inevitable decay of one of the most inefficient and unpopular regimes in the long history of tyranny. When I was asked the other day, in connection with the recent dangerous "trade" agreement between Argentina and Spain, what Spain could export, I replied "corpses." That was the shortest interview I had ever given, but I cannot help thinking that, briefly and brutally, it sums up the situation.

It is only in the field of repression that the Franco regime has approached the effectiveness of its Nazi masters. The Phalangist terror more closely follows the example of Berlin than of Rome, and wisely. Once a regime decides to kill as many adversaries as possible, it should follow the most efficient pattern. Nobody in the Ovra, the Italian Gestapo, can pretend to compete with Himmler.

I shall not tire the reader with figures showing how many people have been killed in Spain since my last anniversary comment. But he should know that, in spite of the frequent cables from Madrid announcing general amnesties, the repression goes on, and the shootings have decreased only in the degree that the number of qualified Republican prisoners to be liquidated has diminished. As I write these lines, the Vichy radio is sending out news of the death sentence pronounced against Carlos Rubiera, one of the last governors of the province of Madrid. "Condemned to death in connection with his participation in a Communist plot"—the old discredited story that has been the keynote of Gestapo communiqués from Paris every time the death of a dozen or a hundred hostages has been exacted for the extermination of a Nazi sergeant. Rubiera could never have been implicated in a Communist plot. Of all the Socialist followers of the former Premier Largo Caballero, Carlos Rubiera was undoubtedly one of the most rabid anti-Communists. He was arrested in Madrid when the Franco troops first entered the capital and until now has been held in prison without trial.

The shooting of Republicans goes on in authentic Nazi style. The technique, as I said, is more German than Italian. I know from the best sources that the Phalangists once received a significant rebuke from their Italian comrades in aggression against the Spanish people. After a dinner in honor of an Italian delegation visiting Madrid some of the Phalangist hosts suggested a "rather exciting after-dinner entertainment." Not a Spanish zarzuela or a "star dance." Something more modern, more to the Axis taste. They proposed going to the main prison in Madrid to see "a couple of dozen Republicans shot" in the patio. The Italian delegates politely declined. Previously some Nazi visitors had not only accepted a similar invitation but had taken part in the shooting themselves.

For the rest, the regime is characterized by incapacity and more incapacity, beyond any words. Our constant prediction during the Spanish war that the Franco crowd, left to themselves, would be incapable of organizing the so-called "national syndicalist" state or any other kind of state has been conclusively justified. The only thing they have achieved is terror, death, hunger, and typhus. All the rest is chaos, or grandiose plans—on paper only—for building a great navy, or for reconstructing Spain, or for reconquering America.

Of course Franco and his followers are active, and may even be efficient, in their role as vassals. Under direct German supervision they quite accurately carry out Nazi orders. They send to Germany everything that the Nazis can extract from a Spain economically so utterly disorganized. They send some metals; they send workers from Andalusia and other regions; they send "volunteers" to die for Hitler on the Russian front; they even send the little food that might, if they could keep it, alleviate a state of starvation which can be matched only in Poland and Greece. They have put their ports at the service of Germany's submarines and have sent Phalangist agitators to Argentina to sign a trade agreement that allows Germany to establish itself in the heart of South America.

Similarly, the official attitude of the democracies toward Franco's Spain has changed very little. It is true that Franco has not obtained the often-rumored loan through which certain elements in the various foreign offices hoped to bribe him into the orbit of the United Nations. But their flirtation with a regime committed to a life-or-death support of Hitler has never been given up. It makes no difference that the Franco ambassador in Berlin, Count Mayalde, asserts boldly, "We Spaniards stand by the side of Nazi Germany because we know that the profound transformation in the political economy and social order which the Phalangist revolution is effecting in Spain cannot succeed without the definite triumph of German National Socialism"; that press, radio, and government officials abuse the British and American nations, insulting the British Prime Minister and the President of the United States; that in Latin America the Phalanx has already passed from the stage of mere agitation to active political warfare against the democracies. Ignoring these little matters, Sir Samuel Hoare and Ambassador Weddell can always report a pleasant smile from Serrano Suñer, Franco's Foreign Minister—as if Kurusu, Japan's special envoy, did not also smile during the negotiations in Washington in the week before Pearl Harbor.

One thing and one thing only has definitely changed in the two years since my earlier commentary in The Nation. Inside Spain the opposition to the Franco administration has spread to all elements of the population. The army nourishes its old resentment against the Phalanx, which during the war never betrayed any eagerness to be on the firing line. The Phalanx itself, though it rules the country, is aware of the enemies in its ranks. At the end of the war, before the government left Spain, we gave orders to those of our comrades who could not be easily identified to join the Phalanx. Since then they have worked from inside against the Franco regime and they are still active despite the continuous purge. The industrialists, the Spanish Thyssens, who financed Franco, are dissatisfied and disillusioned; instead of insuring their own interests they are now caught in a situation in which economic life is at a standstill and profits non-existent. The small shopkeepers resent being held responsible by the authorities for the shortages of food and other goods; last November the state began applying the decree which provides the death sentence for retailers who "hide goods"—goods that do not exist. From the beginning it has been clear that the Franco dictatorship could not survive a Hitler defeat; today many people in Spain doubt that it can prolong its existence even until the cessation of the fighting in Europe.

This extension and crystallization of the opposition against Franco has had a very healthy effect upon the Spanish émigrés. Their unification has advanced farther in the last two months than in the previous two years. In Mexico a new organization, the Spanish Democratic Union, has been created in which are represented practically all the parties and labor organizations that fought together during the Spanish war. In Chile, which after Mexico shelters the greatest number of Spanish refugees, the various political groups have united under the direction of Señor Soriano, the last Loyalist ambassador. In Buenos Aires people who six months ago had never signed a joint declaration have issued a vigorous statement supporting the democracies and urging unity among the émigrés. The signers include the former Moderate Republican Foreign Minister, Augusto Barcia; Luis Jimenez de Asua, a Socialist friendly to Indalecio Prieto; and Colonel Galán, the famous Communist commander. Of course some well-known personalities still remain aloof from this united effort against Franco, but as parties and groups move closer together, their "isolationism" becomes every day more difficult.

Spain's relation to the war itself has not changed in the last two years. Today, as in 1940, it is Hitler who holds the decision. Economically and politically Spain is already in the New Order; it will come in as a military partner whenever a setback on the Russian front or some shift in Nazi strategy makes Franco's active participation seem more useful than his present active "neutrality." It is entirely up to Hitler.

Not That Way, Mr. Nelson

BY ROBERT S. LYND

BUSINESS WEEK has just issued a twelve-page special report to executives entitled "1942—the Year to Win or Lose." Donald Nelson warns the country: "This year, 1942, is the critical year in the existence of the United States." What they mean is that events since December 7 have scrapped the plans of the United Nations to hold on in 1942 and prepare to go "all out" in 1943. Now we know that we either go "all out" this spring and summer—or we may actually lose the war. Like the British immediately after Dunkirk, the United States must sacrifice the longer production focus to the stark maximizing of what we have—now.

Meanwhile it is common talk in and outside Washington that the people of this country do not yet have their backs under this war. Washington is concerned over the growing isolationism and aversion to England and to some extent to all the United Nations. If such conditions as these exist, it is for identifiable reasons, and in this portentous year there must be no dodging those reasons if facing them can assure a different mood and the vitally needed increase in production.

Production concerns machines and men. What can be done about more machines in time to alter the next six months' production is sharply limited. What can be done about the human energy applied to those machines in thousands of already going factories throughout the country is, if not unlimited, incalculably great. And yet we face the problem of evoking that energy with an essentially negative and wizened attitude toward labor that grossly underestimates its readiness to act. Human motivation has been so constricted and battered under a system that says men do only what they are paid to do that we have habituated ourselves to expecting men to yield energy only grudgingly and under coaxing.

And so Washington is setting out to coax and beguile men to produce by the Nelson Plan. Ever since last autumn Washington has been watching the production plan of the Radio Corporation of America. The R. C. A. has had pep sessions for its workers, with movie actresses sliding from the factory roof in breeches buoys and all the usual whoop-er-up devices, as well as free midwinter trips to Miami for workers making the best suggestions for speeding up the plant's production. The Nelson Plan has streamlined the general type of procedure and is preparing to put it into mass production in all the war industries of the country.

The plan will be tried out first in some fifty key plants. Consultants from Sidney Hillman's staff will visit each plant and arrange for the organization of a management-labor committee to conduct the production drive. Each plant committee will be furnished with posters, stickers, pamphlets, and an instruction manual. Contests will be run for prize production slogans; stickers will be put on each worker's machine bearing such sentiments as "Every time you twist a nut, think of Hitler"; quota fulfilment for a plant will be dramatized pictorially by such devices as having a bullet move toward a picture of the Mikado every time a quota unit is completed in the plant; and a plan is being worked out to give medals to individual workers who turn in a superior production record.

All this is in the tradition of ballyhoo, of the advertising campaign and sales contest familiar to Americans. As Business Week remarks, it is designed to "put some sex appeal into industrial morale programs."

And it will have effect—that is, as much effect as a sales contest, and no more. But, Mr. Nelson, if 1942 is as crucial as you say, is this enough?

What the plan seeks to do is to get results by avoiding a reality that both Mr. Nelson and the workers on whom production depends recognize. For months the C. I. O. has been proposing that bona fide labor-management committees be set up and given the job of working out ways of increasing production. It has argued that labor will move in on war production in earnest if it is actually given more responsibility. And if the record of the workers and peasants of the Soviet Union since last June means anything, that proposal makes sense. But Mr. Nelson counters with a proposal for management-worker committees which are to confine themselves to putting on plant pep campaigns. According to Business Week, Mr. Nelson "has little interest in or sympathy for" the C. I. O. proposal, and the intent of his plan is "(1) to sell the scheme to labor, warding off the stretch-out label, and (2) to divert the unions from their demand for a bigger voice in the management of industry to what Nelson considers their proper role—stimulation of the individual worker to greater effort." The same business journal, in its issue for March 21, heads its account of the actual opening of the production drive: "Production Drive—with Caution." "The caution," it goes on to report, "with which the problem is being approached was much in evidence at the New York regional management-labor meeting. . . . All of the speeches by WPB's representatives and consultants emphasized, 'This is purely a production drive.' . . . Attendance, around 300, was not so large as expected, and management was mainly silent in the discussion period. Great care was exercised in steering all discussion away from controversial questions. The session, which had been scheduled to run from 10 a.m. to 5 p.m., would up at noon."

If 1942 is, as Mr. Nelson says, "the critical year in the existence of the United States," the year in which we may win or lose the war; if Mr. Nelson can now do little more to step up the number of machines for production this spring and summer; if the big potential is men and their will to work and if those men want something and Mr. Nelson does not like their wanting it and offers them "not bread, but a stone"—then all signs point to our being embarked on a reckless, self-defeating gamble on Mr. Nelson's preferences against the achievable fact of more production. It may seem unfair thus to personalize the bent of the production program by speaking of "Mr. Nelson's preferences," since he obviously reflects the caution of the Administration. But in times like these one must pin responsibility on the executive who actually throws the switch.

Donald M. Nelson

What must be realized, and fast, is that a war involving issues as deep as those in this war cannot be won by the tactics of a sales campaign. Labor's feelings are real, and if labor is the sticking point between us and production, those feelings must be dealt with realistically and generously. Labor has large reason to fear what may be done to its hard-won present status under cover of the war emergency. It reads of this threat daily in the newspapers. This being the case, it will do little good for Mr. Nelson to appeal to labor to give itself to the war effort while at the same time he adroitly circumvents its request that it be made a full partner in the war.

What labor asks is a simple thing—a thing without which the employers themselves have repeatedly refused to participate in the war effort. This simple and entirely proper request is for the right to participate in terms that have meaning to the participant. After all, the war is a long way from Middletown; war issues are vast and confused; and if the workers in Middletown factories are to find meaning in the war, that meaning must be felt by them where they live and in what they do, down there south of the tracks. War organization and morale, like all effective social organization, find meaning in personal idioms of living; they cannot be effectively imposed from without. Slogans, publicity campaigns, and "phony" management-worker committees imported from the remote world of Washington big shots can make people "feel good" temporarily, but such stunt campaigns will not make labor roll up its sleeves and fight.

The fact is that labor does not have to be persuaded to join up and go all out for things. Contrary to the tradition by which we have lived, people are not inert; they do not require to be coaxed into action. They are naturally and inveterately active, rarin' to go; they need no persuasion to participate in things—if given a chance to do something that seems like genuine sense to them. But the sense must be theirs, not Washington's or just the employers'. The vogue of all manner of group joining, from college rituals to the Townsend Plan, testifies to the almost pathetic eagerness of American folk to identify themselves with movements. We mobile, foot-loose, individualist Americans have dis-organized ourselves from social belonging until it hurts; and we know it in our ramifying insecurity. We are called "a nation of joiners," but studies of group affiliation reveal working-class people to be far less tied into group life than are the classes above them. A prevailing mood among an overwhelming share of the American population is hunger for precisely that sort of spontaneous group participation that stretches one "all out."

The fortitude of the British common man in the war has evoked universal admiration. And Americans immediately after Pearl Harbor gave similar copious evidence of their magnificent readiness to stand up under disaster. But fortitude is only a negative virtue when the situation demands positive action. Observers report rapidly mounting restlessness in England, and the same temper is beginning to be apparent here. In both countries it suggests that men want to do more. As a writer in the London New Statesman and Nation for February 14 of this year remarks, "The most deep-seated feeling in England today is one of envy—envy of the Russians, who are being allowed to fight 'all out.' "

If it is true that a great outpouring of popular energy —now—is crucial to our war effort, it is no less true that energy is lying all about us ready to go. All that is needed to trip the switch is the candid acceptance of labor as a full partner in the war effort. And yet it is precisely this that neither Mr. Churchill in England nor Mr. Nelson here is prepared to grant. The fact is that both the English upper classes and their American counterparts fear labor and are determined to minimize its formal share in the war. The repeatedly stated position of the National Association of Manufacturers has made this too clear for labor to have any illusions in the matter. And Mr. Nelson's plan for labor morale exhibits the same animus. On every hand there are appeals by the government and employers to lay aside factional issues, to avoid discussion of war aims, and to get on with the war. But these appeals rest on the unstated assumption that while we fight the war nothing fundamental must change. And on that rock the American war effort may founder.

The temper of the ordinary man in America is not "radical," in any thoroughgoing sense of that word. American workers are deeply American in mood, not committed to foreign ideologies. The future they want is American. But American traditions have taught them to view the future with hope. They will work and fight magnificently for a future that means hope to them. At present they do not even demand pledges regarding that future but are prepared to go all out in an effort in which they can genuinely share. American labor, however, is more sophisticated than it was twenty-five years ago. And it will not be kidded or coaxed into committing its energies whole-heartedly to a program that seeks to freeze, or to shrink, the future for which it fights.

Mr. Nelson has already taken such extraordinary steps to speed up production as the suspension of competitive bidding on war contracts. Washington is discarding the slow, cagey tactic of hedging on its fears; it is putting action first, trusting to its ability to cope with such problems as may arise in the course of effective action. It is doing this everywhere save in its relations with labor. And yet labor, even more than machines, controls the potential level of output in these crucial months of 1942. Defensive tactics applied to labor won't do. The only way out is straight on through, discarding the fear that labor, too, may gain something from this war.

Technocrats in Uniform

BY WILL CHASAN AND VICTOR RIESEL

SEVERAL million Americans, upon opening their newspapers recently, probably stared incredulously at full-page advertisements that had been inserted by Technocracy, Inc. These advertisements, which appeared in more than thirty papers, urged the appointment of Howard Scott, Technocracy's leader, as "Director General of Defense." If the proposal was startling, the revelation that Technocracy was staging a comeback was hardly less so.

The movement, however, is no longer the opéra-bouffe affair of the early thirties whose leaders talked mystically of ergs and joules. It has undergone a thorough remodeling. A beguilingly simple program has replaced the cabalistic symbols; it promises $20,000 a year to everyone and appeals to prejudices ranging from prohibitionism to anglophobia. Uniforms and a salute have been acquired, and founder Scott has become "the Chief."

Technocracy, Inc., has grown mysteriously affluent. Scott told a Cleveland Press reporter that his newspaper advertising would cost "in excess of $50,000," and a New York reporter learned that Technocracy is "buying time on ninety-two radio stations." The organization publishes six expensively printed magazines and other literature, employs fifteen people at "continental headquarters" in a Manhattan skyscraper, and apparently plans to open offices in Washington. "The Chief" refuses to divulge the source of his organization's prosperity.

He is equally reticent on the subject of Technocracy's new trappings. At "continental headquarters" uniformed aides in "technocracy gray" salute him. Fleets of automobiles painted "technocracy gray" escort him to meetings, where the stage setting for his appearances follows an easily recognized pattern. Technocracy magazines, in an obvious effort to invest him with superman qualities, refer to him in idolatrous terms and describe his "rapt" audiences. The organization's by-laws define the functions of numerous subordinate officers and groups in considerable detail but contain no reference to its supreme commander; apparently his powers are unlimited. When Scott was asked how, with no provision in the by-laws for his election, he became "the Chief," he replied, "I got here first." When his attention was called to the contradiction between Technocracy's professed anti-fascism and its sedulous imitation of fascist methods, he refused to comment.

Newspapermen who visited Scott at "continental headquarters" after the appearance of his advertisements found "The Chief" seated at his desk in a chrome-decorated office, flanked by a uniformed disciple and a stenographer. He talked volubly about Technocracy's "specially designed plane" that "will fly 12,500 miles with a bomb load of fifty tons at more than 300 miles an hour and at a 36,000 ceiling." He was also willing to discuss Technocracy's "specially designed tanks." But he was incommunicative on the subject of his organization.

The literature of Technocracy argues that "democratic methods are obsolete," and Scott refers to freedom, justice, and liberty as "empty baubles of the social epoch of yesterday." He is for abolition of the political state on the ground that our modern technological age requires the application of scientific methods to social management. He talks of merging North America, Central America, the West Indies, Bermuda, and Hawaii into the Technate State of North America, and of running it like a "continental telephone system." This Technate State, under which everyone is to receive $20,000 a year, "work about four hours a day, 165 days a year, beginning at the age of twenty-five and retiring at the age of forty-five," is to be managed by a self-perpetuating élite. Individual liberties are to be tolerated only to the extent that they are in harmony with the needs of technology.

Scott regards himself as a fierce realist. He boasts that Technocracy "has no moral philosophy" and is concerned only with the efficient operation of our industrial system. He would like to see all "alien cultural intrusions annihilated" because they conflict with technology. He feels bitterly toward South Americans for the same reason and regards the Good Neighbor policy as "utter stupidity." The only policy South Americans will respect, he says, is "that of force—force powerful enough to be utterly ruthless."

Technocracy's program, which is a fairly persuasive statement, appeals to the pragmatic, "cash value" mentality in such sentences as, "Technocrats are not filled with any love of humanity or influenced by any ethical idea, but are primarily concerned with function." It studiously avoids tampering with American thought patterns and fetishes. Members are instructed to avoid references to capitalism or the profit system; Technocracy literature refers only to the "price system."

Scott, it seems, has tried to work out an "American approach." He emphasizes that Technocracy is the "only social movement born in America and of America's problems and composed and officered by North Americans." Technocracy propaganda cleverly exploits the average American's love of display and ritual and his even more deeply ingrained respect for machines, gadgets, and engineers. Asiatics and Europeans are described as unsuited for life in the Technate State, and there is patent effort to foster a sense of American superiority.

"The Chief," who once demanded the deportation of Lord Halifax, was an isolationist until Pearl Harbor, and his organization was banned from Canada for its opposition to the war. He now wants "total conscription of men, machines, material, and money" to prosecute the war effectively so that "America can remain America." He would also like to be "Director General of Defense" although he is utterly unqualified for the job, having had only an undistinguished career as an engineer, an equally undistinguished one as a floor-wax manufacturer, and brief experience as a research man for the International Workers of the World. He was given the I. W. W. job at the suggestion of "Scientific" Murphy, a prominent Wobbly who was impressed by Scott's ability to talk about Veblen. Former intimates recall "the Chief" as a garrulous fellow expounding odd economic theories in obscure Greenwich Village bars, and Frederick Lewis Allen says that the frenzied interest in Technocracy in 1932 bewildered no one more than its leader. However, at Technocracy gatherings now Scott talks and acts like a man of destiny.

Technocracy has as yet regained only a fraction of the influence it exercised in the early thirties, but it has a more closely knit organization, more strictly disciplined members, and a larger treasury. It has automobile fleets in at least a half-dozen cities, motor-cycle corps, "disaster squads," and the élan that comes from uniforms and salutes. These do not make it an immediate menace, but its spectacular growth in 1932 would indicate that it could become one.

Our war-production drive is making the country increasingly conscious that it has the industrial capacity for a system of abundance; a post-war depression could easily cause millions of "technology-conscious" unemployed, cynical about democracy and the four freedoms, to consider Technocracy a solution. Perhaps Scott is preparing for that day when he tells people that they "cannot wear freedom, cannot eat justice, and cannot ride on liberty."

Everybody's Business

Wall Street in Two Wars

DURING the first two and a half years of the present war industrial stock prices have pursued a course directly opposite to that which they followed from late 1914 to America's entry into the conflict on April 6, 1917. As the chart on the next page shows, a sharp upward spurt of the average in the fall of 1939 was followed by a leveling off and a period of comparative steadiness during the "phony war." The market reacted to the fall of France with a spectacular drop in values, but when it became clear that Britain was not going to be knocked out as well, there was a gradual and moderate recovery. Late in 1940 there began a new seepage in values which, broken by only a very mild rally in mid-1941, has continued to date.

In the first World War stock prices started from the bottom. Even before August, 1914, the market had been suffering from a prolonged slump. The day Britain declared war the Stock Exchange was closed in order to avert a panic. That step was necessary because London was then the financial center of the world and tremendously influential in the New York money and investment markets. The New York Stock Exchange remained closed until December, 1914, when it reopened with quotations well below the level ruling four months earlier. But precautions taken to prevent a further slump proved needless, and in a very short time prices began to sweep upward as Allied war orders came rolling in.

The Commercial and Financial Chronicle in its "Retrospect" of 1915 wrote: "While the year 1915 will forever live in history by reason of the gigantic and terrible war in Europe, with its appalling loss of human life . . . it will in addition hold a distinctive place in American trade annals because of the part the war played in the course of business here and the sudden and wonderful transformation it brought about in the whole realm of industrial affairs in this country."

Sharp as the rise shown in the chart is, it hardly does justice to the spectacular performance of the favored "war brides" in 1915. Bethlehem Steel, for instance, was quoted at 42 when the market reopened; ten months later it touched 600. Throughout most of 1916 the market pursued a more stable course, with speculation curbed to some extent by peace rumors, but there was a new bound forward at the end of the year after German successes in Rumania suggested that the struggle would be prolonged.

The heights of 1916, however, were not touched again until after the war was over. American entry into the war engendered a more sober mood, and when the government made clear its intention to impose heavy excess-profits taxes and refused to pay the fancy prices which had been charged to the Allies for munitions, the inflated stock-market structure toppled. But the average did not fall back to its 1914 low; in fact, that point was never touched again until 1932.

The chart exhibits the contrasts in the behavior of stock prices in the two wars. There are, however, some similarities worth noting in addition to the common reaction to war taxes in both periods. The sharp rise in quotations in 1915-16 by no means fully reflected the rise in profits of the corporations benefiting from the armaments boom. In 1912 United States Steel was quoted at from ten to fourteen times common stock earnings of $5.71 a share. In 1916 its net income was above $48 a share, but the market valuation of the stock was only 1.7 to 2.7 times earnings. A similar tendency to put a low capital value on war earnings is common today. Corporation earnings and stock prices have been moving in opposite directions for the past two years; so that while a stockholder may feel cheerful when he totes up his income, his face falls a mile when he looks at his capital account.

Correction: A typographical error in Everybody's Business of March 21 made it appear that the National Association of Manufacturers had suggested a 9 per cent excess-profits tax. The figure, of course, should have been 90 per cent.

BOOKS and the ARTS

THE GERMANS AND THE NAZIS

BY REINHOLD NIEBUHR

THE literature devoted to a study of the roots of the Nazi mania is becoming tremendous. In it a genuine scientific curiosity about the historical causes of the German tragedy is mixed in varying proportions with a desire to picture our enemies in the most unfavorable light. For some strange reason men seem to find satisfaction in regarding the present evil courses of the Germans as the consequence of congenital defects going back to the dim past. Hitler's theory of a master race offers a particularly tempting opportunity to invert the dogma and discover that the Germans are and have always been a race of sadists, monsters, and rebels against civilization. But though there are obviously very serious defects in German character, it is as foolish to think of the German nation as an example of total depravity as to consider Nazism the consequence of a conspiracy of a few "bad" men against an essentially "good" nation. The truth lies somewhere between these two extremes and is much more complex than either.

The books on the subject written in war time will probably not add much to our knowledge, for the passions of war color the judgment of even the most "objective" historian. Some of them, nevertheless, are interesting though fumbling efforts to account for the nihilistic mania of the Nazis. Emil Ludwig's theory of a conflict between a good German culture and a bad German civilization, or rather between Germany's good men of thought and its bad men of action (as expressed in his "The Germans: Double History of a Nation"[1]), can be dismissed rather easily because there can be no such division between thought and action. The thesis gains a measure of plausibility only because German culture has been as profound in measuring the ultimate problems of human existence as it has been perverse in dealing with the proximate problems of human society, particularly the problem of justice.

A favorite theory, supported by many Catholic authors, is that the Germans never came completely under the civilizing influence of the Roman world and have consequently always been half-barbarian, revolting against the "West" whenever the bastions of civilization became sufficiently weak to invite a revolt. This theory runs through Peter Viereck's "Metapolitiks,"[2] and a variation of it appears in Roussy de Sales's "The Making of Tomorrow."[3] The trouble with it is that it identifies civilization too uncritically with the Roman tradition. Furthermore, its concept of "barbarian" rests upon the most fatuous form of the idea of progress, according to which evil in history is a reversion to a more primitive form of life. Nazism is a destructive fury which has developed in a very mature civilization. It is no more barbaric than insanity is childlike.

Sometimes the explanations seek to make a distinction between bad Prussians and the other Germans. This distinction runs as a subordinate theme through Ludwig's book and is central in Friedrich Foerster's "Europe and the German Question."[4] Foerster's book is significant for various reasons. It is the only one of the many I have read which is written by a German, and the author's critical attitude toward his own nation represents a remarkable achievement in detachment, although sometimes it seems to betray elements of racial self-hatred. The book has in addition the merit of finding the roots of the evil in German history in the unbroken Prussian military tradition rather than in those philosophical tendencies where the more "profound" analysts seek it. Foerster regards Nazism as a natural extension of Prussianism, to which it adds nothing but a crude, popular, quasi-Moslem religious faith that transmutes the old acquiescence of the German common man in the cynicism of a military aristocracy into a positive participation in the brutalities of Machtpolitik.

His theory that the true genius of Germany was expressed in the internationalist ideas of the Holy Roman Empire, vestigial traces of which were present in the Austrian dynastic state, is more dubious. It might be argued that the extravagant nationalism of both Germany and Italy in our own period is due to their belated achievement of nationhood, their tardiness having been caused by the fact that Germany was the seat of the medieval empire and Italy the seat of the medieval papacy.

The most comprehensive analysis of the roots of Nazism has just been published—Rohan D'O. Butler's "The Roots of National Socialism."[5] The young English author devotes himself particularly to discovering the roots of Nazi tribalism and exaggerated nationalism in German romantic philosophy. Here, indeed, is a fruitful source of inquiry. No one can deny that the romantic emphasis upon the particular, as against the universal of reason, is historically related to the Nazi worship of the nation as the final source of all meaning in life, though Herder's idea of each nation cultivating its own genius and living peacefully with all other nations is about as different from Nazi imperialism as anything could be. In Fichte German pride becomes compounded with the sense of German uniqueness, perhaps as compensation for the sense of inferiority caused by the Napoleonic victories. (It must be mentioned incidentally that quite a number of authors refer to the German inferiority complex without explaining it plausibly. I do not doubt its existence, and I believe that it has been particularly important in the relations between Germany and Britain. But it can hardly be given as one of the "causes" of Nazism until its own causes are explained.)

Butler understands very well that Nietzsche's particular type of romanticism, his emphasis upon the will-to-power, was not conceived nationalistically and that Nietzsche was critical of excessive national pride. But he rightly regards Nietzschean cynicism as one of the elements of Nazi politics, in which a cynical glorification of power is mixed with a sentimental glorification of the racial-national community. The best analysis of the conflict between the particularism of German romanticism and the universal standards of "the West," those conceptions of natural law which obtained in both Catholic and liberal Western Europe, was contributed by the great German philosopher Ernst Tröltzsch. In an essay written in 1922 (published in English as an appendix to Barker's translation of Gierke's "Natural Law") Tröltzsch came as close to predicting the Nazi revolt as any prophet. But he did not equate the simple universalism of the French Revolution with "civilization"; and he emphatically believed that there was an element of truth in romantic particularism which, if suppressed, would take vengeance upon the civilization which disregarded it. This comes closer to the truth than Butler's complacent words: "Looking backward over the course traversed, one sees at its head the Age of Enlightenment, the mellow light of reason of the eighteenth century. And one sees how men rose up in Germany to set themselves against that light and called in darkness." Before offering to die for French enlightenment arrayed against German romanticism, it would be well to inquire why, if the latter produced a cancerous growth in Germany, the former resulted in a kind of tubercular weakness in France.

One of the difficulties with all the books dealing with the German mania is that they induce complacency about our own sometimes comparable and sometimes contrasting vices. There is little sense in condemning the worship of force and vitality if we do not also condemn the senseless confidence in discarnate reason, emancipated from all the vitalities of history, by which we have confused the politics of "civilization." It does no good to condemn the aberrations of a false nationalism if we do not understand that a too simple universalism, which regarded national loyalty as a remnant of barbarism, opened the way for Hitler. It is perfectly true that Germans have always found it difficult to deal with the morally complex factors of politics without falling into the abyss of moral cynicism and nihilism. I do not understand just why this is so, for Nietzsche is after all the product, as well as a cause, of this cynicism. But I think the moral sentimentality of the Anglo-Saxon world in the political realm is equally mysterious; and it has been equally perilous to civilization.

Wherever we turn we find the picture of virulence contrasted with weakness. Sometimes the virulence arose out of the weakness; and always it proved itself more destructive when it was opposed by weakness and illusion. Thus the history of our tragic era is a commentary on the text: "Where the carcass is, there will the eagles be gathered together." If we do not understand this, we shall spend our energy hurling invectives at the Germans but shall be defeated nevertheless. For virtue is not so simply rewarded in history as Mr. Steinbeck, to judge by his latest book, supposes.

Mr. Butler and most of the other authors err not only in failing properly to contrast the German insanity with our own feeble-mindedness—if the metaphor may be allowed in order to keep the whole within the realm of psychopathology—but also very frequently in not allowing important voices in Germany, which do not agree with the ultimately victorious tendency, to be heard. Their picture of the consistency of German thought is thus an untrue one. Furthermore, they do not present the evidence of similar tendencies in other nations. National pride has undoubtedly achieved insane proportions among the Nazis, but it is a more universal sin than these indictments admit.

Sometimes the evils of German life are ascribed to tendencies in German thought which in other nations generated quite different consequences. Nazi moral nihilism, for instance, is again and again attributed to the emphasis placed upon historical norms by German philosophical and political thought. This leaves out of account the fact that British democratic development is rooted in this same respect for historical rather than rational norms. From Ireton to Burke and from Burke to the present, British democrats have sought to broaden liberty "from precedent to precedent" and have found the hereditary "rights of Englishmen" more potent instruments of justice than the abstract "rights of man."

Without claiming to penetrate to the mystery, which seems to be unsolved in the various treatises I have examined, I venture to suggest that one of the most potent causes of the German worship of the state, of German cynicism and moral nihilism, which finally culminated in Nazism was the failure of the German middle classes to break the power of the feudal military classes. Whatever may be the weaknesses of the bourgeois world in the present era of its decay, it cannot be denied that the middle classes played a creative role in the eighteenth and nineteenth centuries, and that the liberties which are now being extended beyond their interests were first established in conformity to their interests. But not in Germany. There no business man was ever admitted to the court of the Kaiser until 1914. There the power of the military aristocracy was so great that even the bourgeois-labor Weimar Republic was unable to break it. There the sublimated or unsublimated homosexuality of the officers' corps produced the ideology of a Männerstaat; and there the neuroses of the battlefields of the World War were transmuted into a psychopathic political power in which aristocrats and the lower middle classes finally found a common ground for political action.

This social history of Germany is more important than its cultural history. But if one asks why the German middle classes were so lacking in spirit and resolution, so unable to throw off the tutelage of the military class, one must move again from the level of social to the level of cultural history. May not Luther's particular approach to political problems, whatever his profundity in other fields, have fastened this fatal weakness upon the German people? His cynicism bordering on pessimism, his abhorrence of social anarchy and consequent uncritical acceptance of the authority of the state, his vehement denial of the right of rebellion against tyranny—all these contrast strangely with the resistance to tyranny by which democracy was established in other parts of the Western world, under religious inspiration in Britain, under anti-religious auspices in France, and under a combination of the two in America. Certainly the ineptness of the Germans in politics, whatever its causes, and their uncritical attitude toward the pretensions of government helped to make them the victims of tyranny even before they were harnessed to its most vexatious form and made other nations their victims.

It must be observed in closing that any analysis of the German tragedy, no matter how inconclusive, or perhaps because of its necessary inconclusiveness, persuades us that no simple theory of German depravity squares with the complex facts of history. It is important to remember this so that the hatreds of war, masquerading in the habiliments of historical science, will not lead us into a draconic peace, and so that we shall not seek futilely to build a new world by transforming Europe into a vast jail, full of scared jailers as well as resentful prisoners. More important still, we might lose the war if hatred of the Germans should blind us to the weaknesses of the "civilization" out of which, and in contrast to which, their mania rose, and against which it is still winning victories.

A Study of Robert Bridges

ROBERT BRIDGES: A STUDY OF TRADITIONALISM IN POETRY. By Albert Guérard, Jr. Harvard University Press. $3.50.

"IT HAS long appeared to me," wrote Yvor Winters, "that Bridges and Hardy must be regarded as the two most impressive writers of poetry in something like two centuries, perhaps since Milton. . . ." Dr. Winters then proposes that on "mature consideration" Bridges will be recognized as greater than Hardy "as a result of greater intellectual scope and a wider diversity of artistic mastery." And by this remarkable process of elimination Robert Seymour Bridges becomes the greatest poet since Milton, not excepting William Blake, William Wordsworth, Alfred Lord Tennyson, Alexander Pope, and Samuel Taylor Coleridge. I can only take it that Dr. Winters reserves to himself a private meaning of the word "impressive" and the phrase "writers of poetry." Possibly Dr. Winters finds himself impressed by nothing but propriety, as when he crowns his encomiums of Bridges with the Abercrombie and Fitch observation: "Bridges . . . is the heir of the universities." Possibly he wishes to distinguish between poets and "writers of poetry." I do not know. But I do know that when Robert Hillyer remarks, "I believe that 'The Testament of Beauty' is the 'De Rerum Natura' of our civilization," this represents a condemnation of our civilization and not a feather in Bridges's cap—no matter what Dr. Hillyer meant. For Robert Bridges is not the greatest poet since Milton, nor is "The Testament of Beauty" as good a poem as "De Rerum Natura"—for the following reason: poets and poems are better than verses and versifiers. The former poet laureate—and I quote Dr. Winters's disciple, Dr. Guérard—"compared with . . . the greatest of poets, was narrow, but his evaluation of experience was at every point sound, lucid, and complete." This final phrase constitutes the most penetrating and the most cruel judgment on Bridges, for it is, truly, a judgment that the critic should pass on a handbook for teacup reading rather than a major poet. I defy even Dr. Tillyard to prove that Milton was sound, lucid, and complete. William Shakespeare is unsound, turgid, and incomplete. I know of only one poet to whom these particular three epithets could be applied without immense overtones of irony, and that is not Robert Bridges but Dante Alighieri.

But I would not wish to give the impression that this study is so biased as to vitiate the majority of its evaluations and analyses: in particular Dr. Guérard deserves the applause of the literary for his Appendix on the Prosody of Bridges. This is an exhaustive and sensitive dissection of the poet's technique from which all the log-rolling and the ax-grinding of controversy naturally exclude themselves. The appendix and, indeed, the complete work might be susceptible to accusations of pedantry. (Does it really matter whether Bridges's imitations of classical prosody show no false quantities? Presumably it does, but I can think of no good reason why.) But I observe that an auxiliary characteristic of pedantry is scrupulousness; this appendix is brilliantly meticulous. Where most of the elisions of this scrupulousness occur, they are, unfortunately, the more noticeable: I refer to Dr. Guérard's citations from A. E. Housman—who, as it seems to me, truly possesses all the merits that the critic arrogates for Bridges—and Gerard Hopkins. Thus Dr. Guérard, in dealing with Housman's translation from Sappho, dismisses it as a kind of thing unworthy of the talents of Bridges; "facile and obvious" he remarks of these exquisite verses that begin, "The weeping Pleiades wester." As against this minor masterpiece Dr. Guérard adduces a lyric of Bridges's:

> The hill pines were sighing,
> O'ercast and chill was the day;

nor does it occur to him that sighing pines and o'ercast chill days have become a trifle shoddy as poetic apparatus. The weeping Pleiades, I feel fairly certain, will go on westering; but these pines are going to sigh only a little longer. For where Housman is simple Bridges is crude, and where Housman is moving Bridges is forced; the comparison of the two poems mentioned above elicits this incontestably, to me at least. For the universities to which Bridges was heir left him an inheritance that most poets are much better without—namely, an intellectual self-consciousness that paralyzes the poem even before it is written.

As for Dr. Guérard's lapses of scrupulousness concerning Hopkins, to what removes of aloofness can he have retired that permit him to commit such misdeameanors as, "The greatness of this [the sonnet No, I'll not, carrion-comfort] and other poems by Hopkins does not alter the fact that no other poet has been able to make a similar use of the medium. . . ." The obvious conclusion is that Dr. Guérard has omitted to read any poetry published since the year 1930. The number of poets who have employed sprung rhythm—which Hopkins never claimed to have "invented," as Dr. Guérard assumes, but only to have restored—might conceivably help him to see that all sorts of extraordinary things have been happening since the death of Bridges.

Whitehead's Final Views

THE PHILOSOPHY OF ALFRED NORTH WHITEHEAD. Volume III of the Library of Living Philosophers. Edited by Paul Arthur Schilpp. Northwestern University Press. $4.

WHEN one of the world's foremost logicians and philosophers proclaims that "logic, conceived as an adequate analysis of the advance of thought, is a fake," it is certainly startling news in the realm of mind. When he adds that logic "is a superb instrument, but it requires a background of common sense," it seems to suggest Professor Whitehead's late conversion to Dewey's conception of logic as the theory of inquiry. The suggestion turns out to be deceptive, but it is clear that whatever Whitehead's strictures against logic are worth they hold only against conceptions which deny that logic is an instrument or that it requires a background of common sense. Since many theories of logic insist upon the instrumental character of logic and therefore upon the presence of an existential matrix of inquiry, Whitehead's dictum appears to be much too broad. It is directed as much against his earlier view of the subject as against any other.

The sentences quoted are taken from Whitehead's two essays in the volume dedicated to him in the Library of Living Philosophers—Mathematics and the Good, and Immortality. These essays are in lieu of a commentary or reply to the eighteen expositors and critics whose papers constitute the bulk of the volume and were written in complete independence of them. The volume consequently fails to live up to the underlying idea of the series. But as a kind of Festschrift for Whitehead's eightieth anniversary it more than justifies itself by its contents and as a signal tribute to his influence.

No informed intelligence can read Whitehead without being impressed by the suggestiveness of his writing. His thought is so rich that it is possible to derive almost any variety of philosophic doctrine from it—as the essays in this volume show. If this seems to indicate confusion, the confusion is, so to speak, classical, for like most eminent figures in the history of philosophy Whitehead has followed the lead of his insights even when they have burst the bounds of systematic consistency. None the less, there are certain recurrent ambiguities in his underlying ideas which remain unclassified in this, his freshest writing.

Consider, for example, one of his key statements: "All entities or factors in the universe are essentially relevant to each other's existence." How is this to be understood? If it means that every particular entity in the world in some respect involves or depends upon some other entity, it may be granted. From it the important corollary can be drawn that no particular entity is intelligible except in relation to a pattern which refers to elements outside of the immediate foreground. But if the statement means that every particular entity is necessarily related to every other particular entity, it is a breath-taking but not altogether original pronouncement for which no evidence is adduced. Through this premise a kind of riotous organicism is introduced into Whitehead's system. Yet in fact it runs counter to every piece of reliable knowledge man has ever won. For knowledge as it is empirically acquired is based upon the assumption that not all things are essentially relevant to one another. And although reliable knowledge may be further corrected and improved, it is by virtue of the discovery of specific connections with some other particular entity or entities, not with every other entity. The behavior of the Dog Star does not depend upon the name I give my house dog; the tides in the Bay of Fundy had no relevance—not to speak of an essential relevance—to the Treaty of Versailles.

When Whitehead goes on to deny "the possibility of an adequate description of a finite fact," he reaffirms the second interpretation we have placed on his meaning, and at the same time exposes the questionable root of his entire position. Only if an "adequate" description were synonymous with a "complete" or "final" description, would his denial of the possibility of adequate description be justified. What controls the adequacy of a description is a problem and a purpose; and these arise not out of the omnipresent infinite background but out of a determinate part of it. When Whitehead tells us, "What I am objecting to is the absurd trust in the adequacy of our knowledge," no sensible person will disagree with him. But why must our trust be absurd? Particularly if we leave possession of the claim to complete knowledge to God and to those neo-Thomists who patrol philosophy in his name. Since the test of adequacy is to be found in consequences, our trust can be intelligent without being absolute.

Whitehead's denial of the possibility of adequate knowledge of finite fact does not follow from the recognition that an infinite, unanalyzed background is always presupposed by anything that is given or said. It is the result rather of an unconscious shift from a conception of knowledge which always presupposes a limited perspective or point of view to another conception which treats this limitation as if it were an inherent defect, as if "genuine" or "real" knowledge were knowledge which transcends limited perspectives. But all perspectives are limited. And although it is certainly true that not everything can be seen from one point of view, it is just as true that nothing whatever can be seen from no point of view. To challenge the possibility of adequate knowledge of finite fact is to call into question the only knowledge we know or need to know. The challenge is made not from the point of view of a better or more adequate knowledge but from an emotional yearning.

This raises a question about the way in which Whitehead conceives the continuity between nature and human experience. What can we learn about the world from the character of human experience? Many things, ranging from the bare fact that the world is such that it makes human experience possible, to the specific leads uncovering the multiple ways in which the human mind and body originate from, and react upon, natural activities. So far Whitehead is in line with evolutionary naturalism. But can we legitimately say that the world must be such as to necessitate human experience? Can we, with any plausibility, assert that the distinctive feeling or emotional intensity of human experience is identical with the energetic activity of physical things? Whitehead seems to answer both questions in the affirmative. His reasons are no more cogent than those of the romantic Naturphilosophen who developed similar notions, and his method is just as suspect.

Perhaps of greatest interest to the general reader is Whitehead's present conception of philosophy. The concluding sentences of his essay on Immortality are: "The final outlook of philosophic thought cannot be based upon the exact statements which form the basis of the special sciences. The exactness is a fake." I predict a great career for these words, especially among the detractors of scientific knowledge whom Whitehead would be the first to disown, but their meaning is dark and obscure. If Whitehead is trying to recall philosophy to its ancient pursuit of wisdom, then surely what he means is that philosophy cannot be based only on the exact statements of the special sciences. It must articulate on a reflective plane other modes of experience, and take note of sciences like biology whose basis does not consist of exact statements. But the words "the exactness is a fake" suggest that he is exposing something fraudulent and that the task of the philosopher is no longer the critique of abstractions but their systematic distrust. It cannot be that Whitehead is criticizing exactness in science. None knows better than he that the progress of science reveals that scientists do not mistake exactness for finality, that degrees of exactness are allowed for as we go from field to field, and that the exactness of a statement is important not because it claims to reflect exactness in things but because it helps to unify the knowledge we have and achieve greater fruitfulness in discovery. If Whitehead intended to rebuke the philosophers and not the scientists, it would have been wiser to recommend to them greater familiarity with science and closer analysis of its procedures rather than to hearten irrationalists with an utterance that borders on denunciation of scientific method. Whitehead's own great achievements date from the period when his philosophy was based on a critique of the exact statements or abstractions of the sciences, that is, on an understanding of the ways in which the high-order abstractions of physical science are related to the deliverances of everyday experience and in which they control and are controlled by this experience. As for his latter-day system of speculative philosophy, one may say of it what he has said of his predecessors: "The systematic thought of ancient writers is now nearly worthless, but their detached insights are priceless."

In the nature of the case the papers of the eighteen other contributors are so miscellaneous as to defy unified treatment. To this reviewer Arthur Murphy's essay on Whitehead and the Method of Speculative Philosophy stands out as a brilliant analysis of the futility of the quest for an "ultimate" reality to support or justify the ordinary realities of experience. Positively bizarre is Needham's account of Whitehead which pictures him as being as nearly a dialectical materialist as any non-Leninist philosopher can be. Lowe's long chapter on Whitehead's philosophical development contains useful references to Whitehead's early and out-of-the-way publications. Dewey's very sympathetic study, which is based primarily on Whitehead's "Adventure of Ideas," finds the "substance" of Whitehead's ideas to be a stimulating variety of naturalistic ethical idealism but with "its formal statements" leaning toward spiritualistic idealism. Hartshorne believes that Whitehead has offered "the most technically adequate version of a conception of God" that has been developed since the fifteenth century. Sellars argues the merits of his own philosophy over that of Whitehead. Holmes on Whitehead's educational views begins with that fateful quotation, "Exactness is a fake," and admirably avoids precision of statement from start to finish. Quine and Northrop discuss respectively Whitehead's logic and his philosophy of science. McGilvary asks very searching questions about the philosophy of space-time. Hughes finds Whitehead's psychology to be promising but inadequate. Other essays are by Urban, Richie, Hocking, B. Morris, Goheen, Bixler, and Schilpp. Brief but charming autobiographical notes by Whitehead open the volume, and an extensive bibliography of his writings completes it. SIDNEY HOOK

Richmond Architecture

HOUSES OF OLD RICHMOND. By Mary Wingfield Scott. Richmond: The Valentine Museum. $5.

THE houses of Richmond, Virginia, have more general interest than those of most American cities because of the illustrious persons that have lived in them—John Marshall, Edmond Randolph, Matthew Fontaine Maury, Edgar Allan Poe, Jefferson Davis, Robert E. Lee, Ellen Glasgow. Yet for all the romantic haze that these figures have thrown around it, Richmond has from the beginning been an industrial town and, by Eastern seaboard standards, it is young. It was a village of small tobacco traders when the legislature was moved up from Williamsburg in 1779, and only one small dwelling from that day still stands. From then until it became the capital of the Confederacy its industrial growth was typical of America. Miss Scott's carefully documented, richly illustrated volume portrays the architectural development that was an integral part of this growth.

By the turn of the century Richmond could boast of thriving corn and wheat mills, and of manufacturing soap, coaches, and candles as well as tobacco. The houses of that time varied from the stolid, massive structure later acquired by Poe's foster father to the compact cottage which was built by a free Negro in 1793 and remained in his family until 1905. During the depression which followed the War of 1812 new houses were few and small. The business boom of the 1830's and '40's, which was manifest in iron foundries, rolling mills, cotton and paper factories, canals and railroads, produced a great expansion of building. In the homes of that period—the great houses the industrialists planned for themselves as well as the more modest dwellings they erected as investments—the graceful classic lines of the "Greek revival" predominated. By the middle '50's, when well-to-do Richmonders began to move to the suburbs, the vulgarity which had already left its mark on most phases of American life caught up with its architecture; the new homes were "exuberant," and most of them were hideous. It is there that Miss Scott ends her story.

The more than 300 photographs in this book, of houses that have been demolished as well as those that remain, should prove invaluable to architects and antique fanciers: the chatty tales about the individual houses should delight

Virginians. But the broad interest of the work which Miss Scott began in 1928 derives from the truly scholarly manner in which she has been able to make graphic the early period of America's industrial expansion—an important period too often obscured by the dramatic wars that marked its beginning and end.

GRACE ADAMS

Recent European Historians

SOME HISTORIANS OF MODERN EUROPE. Edited by Bernadotte E. Schmitt. The University of Chicago Press. $5.

A LIVE historian is not quite so big a joke as a live poet, and after death he does not rise so high in glory as the poet: both here and hereafter he attains a certain stature worth estimating. Indeed the historian's industry alone is awe-compelling, and when one reads in sequence about the lives and works of twenty-two such distinguished men—some of them still living though already classics—their unspoken claim to respectful interest is granted without question. This general impression remains even after one has established a scale of merit and applied it to the score of historians whom Professor Schmitt's seminar chose as subjects for these lively and well-informed essays. They are without exception European historians as well as historians of modern Europe, and their generation covers the last hundred years. They are, in short, recent but not contemporary, or else "contemporary" in the French sense of that word.

What is most striking about them is how few are known to the general reading public—exclusive of the guild of professional historians. If in 1900, when most of these men were thirty to fifty years old, one had collected essays about Macaulay, Froude, Prescott, Freeman, Mommsen, Michelet, and a dozen others whom it would not be hard to list, the book would have been read by every educated man. The present volume, I am afraid, will only reach those to whom Mathiez, Kluchevsky, Temperley, and Delbrück are already familiar names. This says something regrettable about the history of history. It is also a good reason for complaining of the fact that a university press sets the prohibitive price of $5 on a book which should be on the desk of every student of history and politics, and not merely on the shelves of the library to which he has access.

A second impression arising from the book concerns the technique of historiography and our usual presuppositions about it. The reader cannot help noticing how frequently the German historians, to whom we commonly ascribe "scientific" impartiality, turn their massive works to the uses of politics and social programs, with very little sense of nuance in the application. The French do the same thing, but we have come to expect it and always ask if a given historian belongs to the right or the left. We also expect from the French something like style or elegance of form; yet of the seven Frenchmen here included there is not one who did not write in the uniform idiom so painfully taught by the French lycée for the benefit of civil servants. With Hanotaux, indeed, the ideas and words are both so commonplace that he might well have been omitted from a group that numbers Croce, J. Holland Rose, Altamira, and Ruffini.

As for the essayists who have contributed to this collection, their skill and zest are uniformly high. I think that Mr. Burks is unfair to Croce, at least in the early part of his essay, and I think he is unwittingly misleading about what he calls romanticism and neo-romanticism. But his propositions are tenable, and he is throughout interesting. Mr. Parry, Mr. Halperin, Mrs. Godfrey have written small masterpieces of research, condensation, clarity, and charm. And this arbitrary naming does an unintended injustice to most of the others, whom Professors Schmitt and Thompson may be proud to own as former students.

I would, however, criticize them in bulk for constantly using two terms that are especially misplaced in a work of biography and literary criticism. One is the word "methodology," which is used with desperate insistence as if it were a synonym for "method." The effect on the conscious reader is something like that of using "bacteriology" for "bacteria": "the patient succumbed to a fresh onslaught of bacteriology" (query: a medical student?). The other objectionable phrase is "analyze critically a document." This pious formula means little or nothing except when applied to medieval texts or more generally to the subject matter of diplomatics. Not only the misplaced and redundant adverb but the whole needless glorification of the historian's elementary caution smacks of a pretense at "scientific" procedure which, at this late date, should not be implied even by a casual phrase.

Novel or Forum?

ONLY ONE STORM. By Granville Hicks. The Macmillan Company. $2.75.

MR. HICKS'S last novel, "The First to Awaken," took us on a tour of the hypothetical future and was therefore necessarily cast in the form of question and answer involving extensive discussion of social organization and economic change. "Only One Storm," unfortunately, follows much the same pattern, but this time under the guise of a realistic story of a small New England town, an up-to-date "Main Street." Actually, it is less a novel than a kind of mental clearing-house for Mr. Hicks's own thoughts, and he makes constant use of his characters—who are so numerous that they have to be listed formally in the front of the book—to dwell upon and explain his own fears and doubts about American society and the state of the world. The problems posed by communism and the Communist Party figure largely of course, the central character being a man who wavers this way and that in his political thinking, almost joins the party, but finally decides to follow the American way and serve democratically as a selectman in the little town of Pendleton in the Berkshires.

When Mr. Hicks frankly editorializes, and refrains from making his characters do so, he is often moving and thoughtful; and he shows, as he did in "I Like America," a sturdy optimism about the world to come. But prospective reader of "Only One Storm" should still be warned that when they buy it as a novel they are really buying a protracted town meeting in disguise.

LOUIS B. SALOMON

IN BRIEF

IN THE NIGHT DID I SING. By O'Kane Foster. Charles Scribner's Sons. $2.50.

There is a "Tortilla Flat" quality about this folk novel of Taos Valley, New Mexico. Like a brilliant Mexican blanket, it gathers together the garish colors of the mountains and the desert and the little town of Sangre de Cristo, the bloody rites of the Penitentes, the unconquerable laziness of the native men, and the glittering hardness of the American road-builders. Its plot is a conglomeration of the lives of the men and women who make up the community. Though Mr. Foster's announced plan for a tetralogy of folk-novels about life in the Taos Valley seems a little over-ambitious for the material, this first book has an abundance of robust charm and pungent flavor.

A MARITIME HISTORY OF NEW YORK. Compiled by Workers of the Writers' Project of the WPA for the City of New York. Doubleday, Doran and Company. $3.

Only one thing is lacking from this orderly and otherwise comprehensive history, and that, rather surprisingly, is an adequate account of waterfront and maritime labor organizations and their problems. The temptations to digression—and the history of a great port offers many—have been resisted, and the result is a singularly purposeful and consecutive work, concentrated and lucid. The thoroughness of the research, as well as its engrossing subject, makes this the best volume to appear so far in the series being issued by the publishers.

DEEP SOUTH. By Allison Davis, Burleigh B. Gardner, and Mary R. Gardner. The University of Chicago Press. $4.50.

This book does for a typical community in the cotton country something similar to what "Middletown" did for a community in the Middle West. The authors lived for two years in Old City. Although it is not identified except as being typical of the cotton South, Old City seems certainly to be in Mississippi, and probably is along the Yazoo. Occasionally the authors labor the obvious, but for the most part they have written a penetrating study of the clash of race and class in the cotton country, and every student of the South can consult it with great profit.

MY UNCLE DUDLEY. By Wright Morris. Harcourt, Brace and Company. $2.50.

A brashly picaresque novel about a trip across the country with nine men in an old derelict of an automobile. Fast-paced, delightfully humorous, sometimes Rabelaisian, it zestfully follows the adventures and mishaps of as madly assorted a crew of individuals as you might find in a circus sideshow—down-at-the-heel, underprivileged men who do not even realize that they are underprivileged. The author's acute ear for dialogue helps to enliven a story that has a slightly mad quality to start with.

DRAMA

"The Furies" at Fordham

ONE of the most curious and fascinating events of this season was the production of "The Eumenides" of Aeschylus by Fordham College. Amateur theatricals have a rare way of offering sudden and unexpected delights. Naturally, local conditions must be assumed—uneven acting, inconsistencies of style, and a lack of polish. Also, lately, many of the heavily endowed schools of the drama try to make their shows as much like Broadway as possible—"artistic," to be sure, but the standard is no longer the ideas of Gordon Craig or Stanislavsky, as it once was, but rather the surface finish of Gilbert Miller or, at best, Guthrie McClintic.

The Fordham "Furies" had a number of distinctions. First of all, for an amateur performance, it had exceptional polish, and a lack of self-consciousness in the acting—not the conception—which was healthy and moving. Harvard, Yale, or Princeton undergraduate actors often imagine themselves already typed by the Guild for a Lunt-Fontanne production. The Fordham boys have probably little interest in further professional careers. Their acting evolved from an understanding of the text as propounded by their director. They have fine voices; their utterance was admirable. It is rare to hear unaffected choral speech, the normal voice projected evenly and disciplined to the correct metrical beat of the choral odes. Few persons in the audience may have understood the original Greek in which the play was spoken. But the words themselves were so sonorous and they were spoken with such complete authority that one had never a doubt that at least the actors were at home in the language. The ancient Greek suddenly became a live language.

"The Eumenides" is the third of the Orestian trilogy, resolving the guilt which started with the murder of Agamemnon on his return from Troy. In this play Orestes, the murderess's son and her murderer, is pursued by Furies. Protected by Apollo from the implacable demands of his guilt, he is finally released after the first jury trial in the Western world. Its deadlock is broken by Athena. The outraged Furies, robbed of their rightful prey, are placated by reason.

Those of us who have not enjoyed a thorough classical education continue to be amazed by the power and freshness of the tragedies. Last year Fordham presented the "Oedipus" as an unforgettable mystery. Fordham is a Catholic college. The Greek plays given there are sermons. In "The Eumenides" we find Orestes as Adam-Jesus, the Leader of the Furies is the Fiend of the Pit, and Pallas, who was herself virgin-born, assumes her logical role as the Mother of God. In the program note we read, "We of this play would have liked to think that Aeschylus would have recognized our pain and would have seen how much greater than his own answer is the pity of Christ and the inevitability of the Good Shepherd."

It is pointless to quarrel with the concept of the play as given by Fordham. Every text calls for an interpretation, and this Jesuit reading is certainly neither jesuitical nor illogical. It has a consistency of purpose and a deliberate line, an inevitability and fatality that are surely rare in the presentation of classic drama. Too often a well-known Broadway actress avows a sudden interest in the classics, and what apparently is love for the finer things of the theater turns out to be a naive interest in a prestige vehicle for herself. This was not true at Fordham. The acting and particularly the speaking were exceptionally fine. Richard Burgi, the Leader of the Furies, has an extraordinary theatrical gift, a release on stage, a wild, sweet, terrifying hysteria, that recalls the very best early performances of Orson Welles. He is the type of actor's actor. No small naturalistic effects for him. He moves like a trained dancer, without affectation, with no trace of narcissism, and was transparently identified with the evil he personified, at least for the duration of the performance. His errors arose from lack of experience. The range of such violent and extensive emotion was too much for so young an actor to sustain without some monotony.

William F. Lynch, S.J., deserves the great credit for these productions at Fordham, for his insistence on speaking the Greek and in general for his remarkable philosophical logic in planning the plays. John Colman's music for the choral odes was most impressive. Feder did a lighting job recalling his palmiest days at the Mercury Theater, and the stage as a whole worked well. The college performs a real service in permitting the classics to be heard as well as seen.

LINCOLN KIRSTEIN

RECORDS

THOSE February orchestral recordings of Victor still have not arrived, but I have received a few March items, including the featured set (875, $5.50) of Brahms's First Symphony played by Toscanini with the N. B. C. Symphony. It is a performance of characteristic tonal beauty and plastic perfection, which for my taste has the merit of giving a just statement of the meaningless sound and fury in imitation of Beethoven in the first movement, the saccharine sentimentality in the second movement—as against the usual exaggeration in performance of what is excessive in the music to start with. Taken by itself the recorded sound is impressively brilliant and expansive (with a few rattles or buzzes); compared with the sound of Toscanini's 1936 Wagner recordings it has the fault I mentioned when I discussed his new "Götterdämmerung" set: with the brightness and liveness and brilliance of the new recordings on top there is a lack of the depth, the body, the warmth that is to be heard down below in the 1936 recordings (and that is also to be heard in the recent Monteux recordings). Several sides of my review copy have noisy, crackling surfaces, and the fifth side wavers in pitch.

Victor issues the first recording of a major work by Loeffler—the Pagan Poem, played by Hanson with the Eastman-Rochester Symphony (Set 876, $3.50). It may be as much as fifteen years since I last heard the piece, which used to be played in the twenties; and I find that it no longer has the emotional impact for me which it had then. I suspect that this has something to do with the lack of continuity and coherence which I hear in the progression of the material despite the Franckian thematic manipulation and transformation that sounds mechanical and arbitrary at times (the three-note motive misterioso at the beginning, which is heard allegro later on, etc.). But I enjoy the effective writing, the loveliness of individual bits of the material. The performance seems good; but much of what is so fastidiously and subtly contrived in the work is lost in the noisy confusion from the surfaces of my copy when it is played on a wide-range machine with an Audax or Brush pickup. With the heavier, less sensitive Astatic pickup the surfaces are quieter and the sound cleaner.

Chausson's Concerto for violin, piano, and string quartet (Set 877, $4.50) also has its Franckian three-note motive and Franckian manipulation and transformation and other Franckian characteristics; and it is again a work in which I find only occasional passages mildly enjoyable. The performance by Heifetz, Sanromá, and the Musical Art Quartet is excellent, except for traces of the Heifetz wail; and it is excellently recorded.

Felton's Organ Concerto No. 3 is a pleasantly inconsequential piece in the style of Handel which—for reasons that apparently escape me—is played, simply and adequately, by Biggs with Fiedler's Sinfonietta, and recorded, as adequately, by Victor (Set 866, $2).

Stokowski has returned to Victor, recording now with the N. B. C. Symphony; and at the quiet beginning of his record (18497, $1) of the unfamiliar and lovely music of the Prince and the Princess from Prokofiev's "Love for Three Oranges" one hears the authentic sound of the Stokowskian sonorities that Columbia has been unable to put on records. But with increasing intensity more and more grit gets mixed in with the rich sound—on large and small machines, with light and heavy pickups; and the loud sound of the Infernal Scene and the familiar March is hard and brash. But even harder, thinner, colder, and less recognizable is Columbia's reproduction of Stokowski's performance with the All American Orchestra of two diverting pieces by Americans: Morton Gould's "Guaracho" and Paul Creston's Scherzo (11713-D, $1.05).

On another Columbia single disc (17300-D, $.79) are Brahms's charming "Ständchen" and all too popular "Wiegenlied," well sung by Lehmann, and well recorded (there is an unusual amount of blank surface on each 10-inch side). And on still another single (17298-D, $.79) are "Voi che sapete" and "Non so piu cosa son" from Mozart's "Marriage of Figaro" sung by Risë Stevens: the voice is beautiful and well reproduced, the phrasing is musical, but there is a tremulousness in the singing that would be less noticeable in the opera house than it is at the close range of the microphone.

Letters to the Editors

All Credit to the FSA

Dear Sirs: Beginning in 1935, government help was extended to the most underprivileged farm families in the country—the small farm-owners, farm tenants, and share-croppers of the Dust Bowl, of the South, and of the played-out farm areas throughout the country. This help was not administered by the regular Agricultural and Home Extension workers in the Department of Agriculture but by a new set-up that came to be known as the Farm Security Administration. Eventually the FSA was made a part of the Department of Agriculture, but the "feeling" between the two services did not improve noticeably. The FSA not only received larger appropriations—and better salaries—than the regular "Extension" workers, but lured some of the best workers away from "Extension," did a more outstanding job, and—most unforgivable of all—received most of the popular credit for bettering the lot of the farmer.

And well it should get credit! By loans, by grants, by technical farming advice, by education in better home management, by encouragement of home food production and preservation, by help in organizing cooperative activities and community services, by the promotion of sanitation and health, by the provision of needed arrangements for medical care, by the adjustment of debts, and in a host of other ways, the FSA has "rehabilitated"—taken off the relief rolls and helped to independence and health and self-respect—an increasing number of underprivileged, depressed, low-vitality, low-income farm families, white and black, North and South, East and West. It has helped share-croppers to become tenants and tenants to become farm-owners. It has helped them to better farming methods better living, better citizenship, and, last but not least, greater production.

But the Farm Security Administration has by no means as yet reached all who need its services—or completed its work for those whom it has reached. Just now the services, the loans, the advice, and the material help are needed more than ever. "Food," says the Secretary of Agriculture, "will win the war and write the peace." Our country needs maximum production now from all farmers, from those who are at the bottom of the economic ladder as well as from those who are near the top.

At a time when this enhanced public health, economic well-being, and good citizenship, and this increased production are needed so urgently, the so-called farm bloc in Congress—most of whose members did not hesitate to vote themselves "pensions for Congressmen"—is whittling away at this year's appropriations for the Farm Security Administration in a way well calculated to kill its usefulness.

Apparently the leader in this reactionary movement is Edward A. O'Neal, president of the Farm Bureau Federation, the organization set up by Agricultural and Home Extension workers some twenty years ago primarily for relatively well-to-do white owners of moderate or good-sized farms. Mr. O'Neal is a native of Alabama, where Negroes constitute a large proportion of the underprivileged farm families aided by the FSA. He has been a leading figure in the promotion of government services looking to the improvement of the lot of "big" white farmers throughout the country. He has not been so outstanding in advocacy of reforms in behalf of "small" Negro farmers. Can it be that Mr. O'Neal is willing to let the country's need of increased production go unmet rather than see the Negro farm-holders and tenant farmers and share-croppers of his poll-tax state helped out of their penury and subservience?

HARVEY LEBRUN

Chapel Hill, N. C., March 27

Dr. Menninger on Dr. Fromm

Dear Sirs: In my opinion Dr. Karl Menninger's review of Erich Fromm's "Escape from Freedom" in your issue of March 14 is in a number of ways distinctly unfair and unscientific. It is of utmost importance to me as a psychiatrist and psychoanalyst that discussions of psychological, psychoanalytic, and sociological problems be carried on, as far as possible, in a rational, intelligent, and scientific manner. That Dr. Menninger did not achieve this is not surprising in view of his broad hint, at the end of his first paragraph, that he could not be completely objective and that he could only give his "impressions" of the book. The reviewer is to be congratulated for his frankness in stating this. However, he is not to be congratulated for his various insinuations directed against refugees in general and Dr. Fromm in particular.

What I find most unfortunate in Dr. Menninger's article is the tendency to attack the author with psychoanalytic interpretation rather than to criticize and attack the contents of the book. Dr. Menninger's simple and quick method of demolishing the concepts of the author is that of implying that they are symptoms of Dr. Fromm and that they therefore are not to be taken seriously. The danger of this procedure may be indicated by quoting from Freud:

> Analysis is not suited, however, to be used in controversy; it presupposes the consent of the analyzed. . . . Anyone who presses analysis into the service of polemics must therefore expect the person analyzed to use the weapon upon him in turn, so that the discussion will reach a state which entirely excludes the possibility of convincing any impartial third person.

I trust that Dr. Menninger, the eminent author of "Man Against Himself," will agree that it would be unscientific and unseemly for a critic to attack his book by interpreting its title or contents as subjective symptoms of the author. Such a procedure is equally deplorable whether directed against refugees or against native Americans.

GEORGE S. GOLDMAN

New York, March 16

Dear Sirs: I have reread my review and I cannot see that I have made any unfriendly insinuations against refugees. I said, in substance, that they were in a difficult position and, naturally, felt lonely. I connected this with the fact that one of them had written a book on loneliness. My position in regard to refugees and my efforts in their behalf, both within and without the medical profession, are, I think, sufficiently well known. Several refugees to whom I showed my review before sending it to The Nation not only agreed with the contents but felt that the problem of the intellectual refugee in America urgently requires more intelligent consideration than it has received. The sympathy with which the refugees have been greeted and the gratitude they have shown cannot disguise the resistance on both sides to the impact of unfamiliar customs and beliefs.

Dr. Goldman is entirely correct in saying that it is unfair and unscientific to interpret unconscious motives in a person not one's patient and, therefore, not subject to psychoanalytic technique. But I did not assume that Dr. Fromm's loneliness was unconscious, and it is certainly not exceptional for a reader to interpret the bias of a book in terms of the author's well-known experiences. An author learns a part of what he knows about other people from observing himself; if he is successful in generalizing and objectifying his theme, he has written a good book. In my opinion Dr. Fromm was only partially successful in doing this.

Dr. Goldman refers to loneliness as a "symptom" of Dr. Fromm's; this implication is his, not mine. Loneliness may be a symptom, or, on the other hand, it may be a normal reaction to a situation, as Dr. Fromm points out.

Cold Mornings Have Been in Bensonhurst

Dear Sirs: Benjamin P. Safran of New York City writes me that he has just read The Nation's seventy-fifth anniversary number (dated February 10, 1940) and is shocked to discover that in that issue I attributed the authorship of a parody of The Nation's first prize poem, Hot Afternoons Have Been in Montana, to Robert Benchley. This deathless parody, entitled Cold Mornings Have Been in Bensonhurst, he tells me, first appeared in F. P. A.'s Conning Tower on February 12, 1925, over the signature of Benjamin Pinney, a name which, for some reason, Mr. Safran used instead of his own.

It is, as Mr. Safran says, a bit late, but he feels that Bob Benchley doesn't need the advertising, and he does. And isn't it nice to know that back numbers of The Nation are read and studied with such care?

Miss Boyden's Birds

Dear Sirs: In her review of my satire "The Pink Egg," Katherine Anne Porter writes: ". . . there is a hint that once the birds find their way to the island, they will put out the light." There is no such "hint" anywhere in the book. May I respectfully refer Miss Porter to the passage at the foot of page 171?

It's Not the Poll Tax

Dear Sirs: I disagree most emphatically with your views on the poll tax, as expressed in your issue of March 21.

To say that the poll tax is disfranchising the voters is preposterous. I have lived in the South and worked at many tasks which brought me in contact with the workers. If a citizen cannot save up 150 pennies a year to help pay the cost of holding elections in a democracy, then he is not worthy of the privilege of voting. Let him take a few drinks of whiskey less, let him smoke a few packages of cigarettes less, let him spend a few dollars less in shooting craps.

It is not the poll tax which you should attack. It is the ignorance in which these people are steeped, the laziness with which they are afflicted when it comes to public affairs, and the lack of leadership to bring them out of their miserable state.

The Shape of Things

THE JAPANESE AIR ATTACK ON COLOMBO ON the island of Ceylon and raids along the east coast of India supply at least a tentative answer to the frequently asked question: Will Japan strike next at India or Australia? During the past fortnight there has been little action along the approaches to Australia except a few light aerial attacks on Port Moresby and Port Darwin. But the seizure of the Andaman Islands and the attack on Ceylon are precisely the moves that must precede an offensive against India. The powerful air and land forces which the enemy has dispatched against Upper Burma also lend confirmation to the belief that an attack on India is imminent. While it would be impossible to send a large invasion army through the mountainous passes separating Burma and India, the transfer of air forces from the Australian sector to the Burma front would be a natural step in preparation for the invasion of India. Whether this concentration on the India front is dictated by political or military considerations is not clear at this time. It is quite possible that the Japanese are interested primarily in assuring the failure of the Cripps mission—although it may be argued that the threat to India has played directly into Cripps's hand. Whatever the reason for the attack on Ceylon, the loss of twenty-seven planes may force a reconsideration of Japanese strategy. For it is both bad politics and bad military tactics to have a third of the attacking force shot down.

AS SPRING SPREADS NORTHWARD ALONG the Russian front, both armies are gathering their forces for what promises to be the most terrific battle of the war. Until the ocean of mud which follows the thaw hardens, neither side can employ its mechanized forces or its heavy artillery on a large scale. The Red Army, however, shows no intention of giving its enemy any respite. It continues, in conjunction with swarms of guerrillas, to drive deep wedges into the Nazi lines, but it has been unable so far to reduce any of the major German "porcupine" positions, such as Staraya Russa, Rzhev, and Kharkov. These appear to be too strong to be captured without the use of heavy guns. The first Nazi spring task will be to reestablish communications with these outposts before the Russians can pound them into surrender. Meanwhile spring is also approaching in Manchuria, and although Moscow seems to deprecate discussion of a possible Japanese onslaught on eastern Siberia, it is too realistic to overlook this contingency. Should the coming German offensive misfire, Hitler would undoubtedly urge his Eastern ally to deliver a stab in the back. The Japanese, however, are much more likely to risk war with the Soviets if Hitler succeeds in driving the Red Army farther back. On page 416 of this issue G. A. Borgese outlines a plan by which we might not only develop an offensive against Japan's backyard but also reinforce Russia east and west. There have been many unofficial suggestions to the effect that Russia "ought" to lend us bases to use against Japan, but their authors have not brought forward proposals for buttressing Russian defenses in the Far East. Dr. Borgese's scheme for the dispatch of an American army to Siberia provides for an offensive spearhead against Japan and a strategic reserve to bolster the European front. The mutual advantages it offers to both Russia and America make it, in our opinion, worthy of full consideration.

RECOGNITION OF THE FREE FRENCH REGIME in central Africa by the United States might be an occasion for rejoicing if it could be interpreted as a step toward the ultimate recognition of Free France as one of the United Nations fighting against the common foe. But there is no evidence that the establishment of an American consulate at Brazzaville in any way implies a weakening in the State Department's policy of appeasing Vichy. On the contrary, such a step just a week after the conclusion of a general understanding with Vichy over shipments to North Africa suggests that the gesture to Free France was meant merely as a sop to United Nations unity. That the gesture will not suffice was made clear in a remarkable speech delivered in London recently by General Charles de Gaulle. The Free French leader pointed out that continuation of French resistance depends on keeping France and its great traditions alive as a reality to fight for. He asked how Frenchmen can be expected "to suffer death and torture in their resistance" if they are "treated neither as allies nor even as belligerents, how [they can] be persuaded that in victory lies resurrection, in capitulation lies dishonor . . . if their allies . . . accept the neutralization of France as dictated by Hitler at Vichy." The State Department insists that its policy has prevented Vichy from becoming an outright ally of Hitler's. This claim is based on the assumption that Vichy possesses an existence independent of Hitler's will. But even if the assumption were sound, what profit could there be in appeasing the shadow at Vichy and destroying the spiritual substance of the illustrious French Republic.

PIERRE LAVAL'S ATTEMPTED COME-BACK HAS proved a flop. Writing in the pro-Axis Paris paper Nouveaux Temps, Jean Luchaire declares that the United States is to blame, thereby, we suspect, conferring on the State Department more honor than is its rightful due. The chief credit for this setback to the leading French collaborationist, as well as for the persistent failure "to take" of the policy he inaugurated, should be given, we think, to the French people as a whole. However much the Vichy government would like to work for the New Order, it knows that collaboration cannot be made a reality so long as 95 per cent of the French are bitterly opposed to aiding the Axis. Pétain does not wish to exchange his shaky popularity for the hatred and contempt that is shriveling Vidkun Quisling. And this probably accounts also for the fact that the Germans are not pressing Pétain harder, for if they forced him to take action which would brand him as a traitor in French eyes—such as surrendering the French fleet—they would also end his usefulness. Meanwhile Vichy has raised the appeasement stakes by revealing that it now has at its disposal, thanks to "special permission" of the Nazis, about a thousand modern warplanes, or more than France possessed at the beginning of the war. The implication is that they could be used against Britain if Vichy were provoked too far. But could the pilots be found to man them for such a mission?

ALTHOUGH PROFESSOR CARLTON J. H. HAYES can hardly fail to better the record of his predecessor as ambassador to Madrid, Alexander W. Weddell, it is unfortunately impossible to welcome his appointment without reservations. We are bound to recall that in October, 1937, he was among the 175 signatories of a Catholic statement supporting Franco and declaring that the vast majority of Spaniards backed the rebellion. The same document denied that the church in Spain was in any way committed to the government or ideology of Nazi or Fascist auxiliaries helping Franco. Dr. Hayes is a distinguished scholar whose studies of nationalism have received the honor of suppression in the Third Reich. He has publicly denounced totalitarianism as "a revolt against the whole historic civilization of the West," and he is well aware that a Nazi victory would mean death to the Catholic church. Events since 1937 can hardly have failed to convince him that the war in Spain was not a civil war but a preliminary campaign in the Nazi struggle for world supremacy. When he reaches Madrid he will be able to see for himself what three years of Franco have done for Spain, and we find it difficult to believe that his intellectual integrity will not overcome any lingering prejudices. In that event the State Department should receive more objective reports from Madrid than it has enjoyed in the recent past and less support for its appeasement policies.

THE SENATE PLAN FOR LIMITING PROFITS ON war contracts would appear to be even less satisfactory than the dubious House proposal for restricting them to a straight 6 per cent. In an effort to encourage small business to accept a greater share in the war effort, the Senate Appropriations Committee whipped together a graduated scheme that would permit 10 per cent profits on contracts not exceeding $100,000, and a maximum of 2 per cent on contracts of more than $50,000,000. Both the Senate and the House plans are open to overwhelming objections based on our experience with cost-plus contracts in the last war. This experience shows conclusively that efforts to limit profits by contract provisions lead to inflated costs and, in the end, uncontrolled profits. While it is possible for the government to hold down costs on any single contract by carefully checking each item in the producer's books, it is physically impossible to check each item of costs in the thousands of contracts that are concluded every month. Nor can any over-all system of profit limitation take into account the differences in the different types of war production. On some items the turnover is rapid, and a company may earn the maximum profit many times during the course of a year. On other items—such as battleships—the profit may have to be spread over several years. Similarly, the ratio of earnings of a company requiring a small amount of capital would be far higher than those of a company requiring a large amount of capital.

IN DEVISING THE SCHEME THE SENATE apparently assumed that the large contracts would go primarily to large companies and the small ones to small business. Actually many large corporations handle small contracts, and if the Senate plan were enacted, the large companies would undoubtedly insist on breaking down all their contracts into a number of small ones—a course scarcely calculated to accelerate the war effort. The alternative to the Senate and House plans is not the creation of a new crop of war millionaires, as some Republicans have suggested, but the enactment of an effective excess-profits tax which would recapture all exorbitant profits after the productive process had been completed.

MARTIN DIES, THE TEXAS DON QUIXOTE, may have met his match in that Iowa windmill, Henry Wallace. The Dies committee's attack on Wallace's Board of Economic Warfare was no more unscrupulous or inaccurate than the attacks it has made on other persons and groups. Armed with the same old sucker list of the American League for Peace and Democracy, which went out of existence long ago, the Dies committee reeled off charges of communism, without proof, against thirty-five members of the board; and as usual it made a stupid mistake—listing as a "Communist" a Wall Street banker named Vaughn, now with the BEW, whom the committee had got mixed up with a professor named Vaughan. In spite of its outrageous practices, the Dies committee has continued to get appropriations from a House full of Representatives who were afraid that if they didn't support Martin he would tell the folks back home that they had failed to vote against communism—which would be as fatal as not voting against sin.

IN THE PRESENT CASE, HOWEVER, THERE IS a chance that Dies's spell may be broken. The life of the committee has been extended, but the appropriation has not been made, and we suspect that the anger of Henry Wallace is being applied where it will do the most good. The White House released the other day a report by the FCC pointing out that Berlin was using Mr. Dies's indiscriminate and idiotic charges of communism with great gusto; and the revelation by Jerry Voorhis, a member of the committee, that its latest attack was launched not only without his knowledge but without so much as a meeting of the committee should also have its effect. The conduct of the Dies committee in its investigation of alleged "communistic" influences should have been enough, long ago, to bring about its end. But this is not the worst. For years now The Nation has been pointing out that Dies's conduct in not investigating fascist organizations except in a few "token" instances has something to do with Dies's own friendly contacts with such unsavory outfits as the Christian Front. If the FBI is as efficient as it should be, it must have a dossier on Dies more than sufficient to prevent any further appropriations for his un-American committee.

DESPITE PROTESTS THE STATE DEPARTMENT continues to give encouragement to Tibor Eckhardt, who, as readers will remember, in the course of a journey last year from Budapest to New York underwent a strange metamorphosis from anti-Semitic fascist to anti-Nazi leader of "Free Hungary." In a recent letter Harold B. Hoskins, executive assistant of the State Department, asserted: "The activities of Mr. Eckhardt's committee and those of the American-Hungarian Federation are fully known to this department and have been worked out in close cooperation with us. . . . Their set-up is entirely in line with the government's policy." On March 26 Dr. Reinhold Niebuhr, chairman of the Union for Democratic Action, wrote to Sumner Welles, Acting Secretary of State, pointing out that in view of his questionable past Mr. Eckhardt was hardly entitled to such consideration and confidence and asking for an investigation of his record. In his reply Mr. Welles declared that the phrases quoted from Mr. Hoskins's letter referred only to the organizational procedure recommended for all "free movements," and did not imply any "recognition, formal or informal, of Dr. Eckhardt's movement." This, it was further explained, was in line with the department's policy of keeping currently informed about the activities of all "free movements" but not extending recognition to any of them. Our satisfaction at this statement of policy is tempered by realization that it still gives Mr. Eckhardt a great deal more standing than he deserves while doing much less than justice to some other free movements. Apparently the State Department is still unable to make clear distinctions between our friends and our enemies. Otherwise it would know in which category to place Mr. Eckhardt—one-time leader of that prototype fascist organization, the Awakening Magyars, and supporter of Nürnberg laws for Hungary.

WILLIAM DUDLEY PELLEY, FOUNDER AND leader of the Silver Shirts, is the fifth person to be arrested by federal agents for sedition since our entry into war. Unlike George Sylvester Viereck and George W. Christian, who was seized last week, Pelley was not accused of direct connections with the German government or with an attempt to undermine the morale of the services. His offense was simply the publication of defeatist propaganda in a fascist magazine of general circulation. The distinction is important, for it is the center of a debate that is going on in these pages and elsewhere over the wisdom of suppressing the openly fascist press. The Nation has taken a stand in favor of curbing those newspapers which clearly take the Nazi line, whether they are financed by Hitler or are owned by American fascists. If the government follows that policy, as apparently it will in the case of Pelley, it will be a simple matter to deal with Father Coughlin's Social Justice and Edward James Smythe's Our Common Cause.

How Long Can Men Work?

ONE of the vicious aspects of the recent controversy over the forty-hour week has been the fact that avowed opponents of the forty-hour week have not been concerned about the length of the working week at all. Their concern has been to reduce wages—and increase profits—by eliminating the time-and-a-half wages now paid to employees working more than forty hours. On that issue The Nation has made itself reasonably clear: we see no reason at present for changing the Labor Standards Act, and we regard the moves which have been made in that direction as ill-concealed efforts to undermine confidence in the Administration.

There remains, however, the question of what is the optimum work week in war time. In view of the impending shortage of man-power this question should be faced realistically. Unfortunately, there is little scientific information on which to form a judgment. The criteria we have ordinarily used cannot be applied without modification when the country's safety is at stake. In time of peace the health and well-being of the individual workers must be the first consideration. In time of emergency our first interest must be production. Human considerations become secondary, but we dare not ignore them.

War or no war, men still tire after a long and arduous day. As they tire, the number of accidents and mechanical breakdowns increase. There is, therefore, a definite limit beyond which the work week cannot safely be stretched even in periods of dire emergency. Just what this limit is remains a matter of dispute. But its existence was convincingly demonstrated when the British government sought to increase production in the period right after Dunkirk. The disastrous results of that experiment deserve wider publicity than they have had.

In Britain, as in this country, the basic work week has not been changed as a result of the war. Payment is made on an overtime basis for all hours above the standard. Prior to Dunkirk workers in British war industries were working, as an average, a six-day, fifty-six-hour week. After Dunkirk all war industries were placed on a seven-day week. The average work week was 69.5 hours in June, 1940, and many industries worked their employees 73 and 77 hours. Under the spur of the emergency, output rose more than 10 per cent. After a few weeks, however, it began to decline. The amount of sickness among the employees increased sharply; absenteeism also rose as workers sought relief from the intolerable strain; there was an appalling rise in the number of accidents and preventable breakdowns. As a result, the actual number of hours worked—as distinct from the length of the working week—began to decline. In August the working week remained at about 68.5 hours, but the average employee worked only 51 hours as compared with 53 hours before Dunkirk. Industrial output showed an even greater decline, falling to 88 per cent of the pre-Dunkirk level. While part of this decline may be attributed to the effect of the night air raids which began at the end of the month, the weekly trend prior to the bombing was so sharply downward that the government became alarmed and hastened to restore the six-day week. Recovery did not come immediately, but by the beginning of 1941 industrial output, on the shorter week, had risen above the pre-Dunkirk level.

Largely as a result of this experience, the British Medical Research Council has recently recommended that weekly hours for men should not exceed sixty or sixty-five and that women's hours should not exceed fifty-five or sixty. The British work week now averages about fifty-five hours.

No comparable study has been made in this country. But it is generally agreed that the tempo in American factories is faster than in England, and that the optimum work week in this country is consequently considerably shorter. A recent survey made at Princeton University suggests that most American industries reach peak efficiency with a forty-eight-hour week for men and a forty-hour week for women. This, of course, is an average. There are certain types of light work in which a sixty-hour week is not harmful; there are others—such as coal mining—in which the forty-hour week has been found too long.

Many war industries are already operating close to the optimum levels. The machine-tool industry today operates on a fifty-five-hour basis. Shipbuilding and all government-owned war plants are on a forty-eight-hour week. The steel industry has found four forty-hour shifts to be the most efficient method of operation. But some war industries are still not working a full week. Where they are not, management and not labor is responsible. The cost of overtime is at best a lame excuse. If any company were unable to pay time-and-a-half, we can be sure its case would have been thoroughly aired in the past few weeks. As a matter of fact, most companies find that the savings in overhead in the longer week more than cancel the additional labor charge.

A clear-cut national policy with regard to the work week in war industries is badly needed. But before we fix that policy, the entire situation should be carefully studied on the basis of present-day American conditions. Why not initiate such a study now while there is yet time?

When Will the "Heads Roll"?

HOW much longer is Donald M. Nelson going to keep Merrill C. Meigs, ex-Hearst Chicago publisher, in charge of aircraft at the War Production Board? The new report made by the Truman committee is only the latest of several pleas, some public, some private, for the reorganization of this crucial sector in the board. Meigs has been in charge of aircraft since the NDAC and has survived all the alphabetical reshuffles through OPM, SPAB, and WPB, although he has yet to produce a single constructive idea and has a completely undistinguished record. Meigs survives, as do so many of the original dollar-a-year men, through one loudly ballyhooed shake-up after another, despite Nelson's promise weeks ago that heads would roll when he tackled the job of reorganization.

The importance of aircraft makes the case of Meigs an outstanding one. The Truman committee, to which we already owe so much in the way of courageous exposure and constructive criticism, shows the kind of planning and thinking needed in this industry. Its subcommittee on light metals and aircraft and its chief counsel, Hugh Fulton, have just come back from a tour of West Coast plants. The subcommittee was made up of Senators Wallgren (Democrat) of Washington; Kilgore (Democrat) of West Virginia, and Ball (Republican) of Minnesota. They sought to sift the disquieting rumors of a deliberate "slowdown" by aircraft manufacturers. The big plants are primarily assembly plants, and the subcommittee found that shortages in critical items made it impossible to operate them at full capacity. "Rather than work trained crews at top speed until materials are exhausted and then lay men off for a few days, with probable loss of morale and trained mechanics, the aircraft plants have simply refrained," according to the subcommittee, "from turning on full pressure for peak production, which was their wisest course."

The subcommittee says that "a poor job of over-all planning, from aluminum ingots to finished aircraft, by the armed services and the old OPM must be blamed for the present situation." But the "old" OPM, in so far as aircraft and light metals are concerned, is virtually the same as the "'new" WPB. The subcommittee itself reports that the "WPB still does not have a single top-notch aircraft-production man in its organization." In aircraft Meigs is still responsible for the condition uncovered by the subcommittee. "When the big expansion of aircraft plants was undertaken a year or more ago, no attention was paid to the necessity of expanding at the same time the facilities of the thousands of subcontractors who supply parts and sub-assemblies. As a result, in some vital airplane parts production is not up to the capacity of the big assembly plants to absorb them."

Part of the lag in aircraft production behind full capacity results from shortages in aluminum and magnesium, in neither of which is production being expanded as rapidly as it should and could be. The evidence gathered, the subcommittee reports mildly, "indicates that there is still something seriously wrong in the light-metals section of the War Production Board, successor of the old OPM section which failed so miserably to anticipate and prepare for the greatly increased demand for these metals." The subcommittee means the aluminum and magnesium branch. In the OPM this branch was headed by Arthur D. Bunker, dollar-a-year man for the government and $60,000-a-year man for Lehman Brothers. The Truman committee itself exposed his partiality for Alcoa and his continued connection with the banking house. The same Arthur D. Bunker is still head of the aluminum and magnesium branch of the WPB. That is the something still "seriously wrong" in light metals as in aircraft, and it will not be corrected until Nelson, who is as faint-hearted as the President about firing people, gets out the ax and keeps the promise he made when he became head of the WPB. When, Mr. Nelson, will the heads roll?

India's Zero Hour

BY FREDA KIRCHWEY

FOR the first time in their long and bitter struggle for freedom, the leaders of the Indian people have power comparable with that of their rulers. They are not strong enough to dictate terms to Britain, but they are in a position to drive a hard bargain. To expect them to resist the temptation to do so is to demand almost superhuman detachment and wisdom. They have waited long for this hour. Their natural desire to take full advantage of the situation is heightened by emotional resistance to an offer born, not of Britain's willing acknowledgment of the justice of the Indian claims, but of its own eleventh-hour desperation. Add to this feeling the conflicting claims of party and caste and class and religious group, and the reasons for hesitation and delay stand out clearly.

But hesitation and delay may prove fatal. Today Japanese planes are dropping bombs on Ceylon and towns along India's east coast, Japanese ships are moving through the Bay of Bengal, and Japanese troops drive slowly but relentlessly across Burma toward the borders of India. The hour which has given India such immense new bargaining power has brought dangers much greater than any concessions its leaders could possibly win. To procrastinate in these circumstances, to fight for minor concessions, is to invite a disaster in which the future freedom of India would be one of the lesser casualties. Today, with Japan hammering at every gate, more is asked of India's negotiators than normal political wisdom and ability. They must shed, suddenly, overnight, the preoccupations of subject people struggling for their nation's freedom and must assume the stature of free men prepared to collaborate with all the forces fighting on their side against the final eclipse of freedom. This is a mighty challenge. Mahatma Gandhi,, clothed in his impenetrable faith in non-violence, has retired from the field. It remains for all of India's leaders, but particularly for Nehru and Azad, to meet the challenge with a sense of responsibility that reaches far beyond the borders of their own country or the empire.

For India must realize that its decision is almost as important to the United States as to England or to India itself. Today no nation can live in isolation. This country tried to, stubbornly and stupidly, yielding bit by bit to a necessity that should have been apparent months before the bombs fell on Hawaii. India has a right to demand a responsible share in the direction of its own defense, but in this hour of crisis it has not the right to demand full freedom. Not even the years of exploitation and oppression it has endured give it that right. The war has reduced the independence of all nations; today each one must subordinate its trade, its finance, its military arrangements, even some measure of political sovereignty to the necessities of the greater group with which it is joined in the struggle against Axis domination. There is good reason to believe that Britain's offer to India was itself in part the product of British-American consultation. At least it can be said that the United States had every right as a major member of the United Nations to urge such a policy on Britain. And by the same token the United States, with Britain and the other nations fighting the Axis, has a right to ask India's acceptance of a freedom which is qualified only by the demands of the war itself.

Complete independence when it comes will bring India a swarm of problems and conflicts no nation could be asked to tackle while plunging simultaneously into a great war. Even to list the difficulties that lie in the way of a workable plan of self-government would demonstrate the hopelessness of the idea. To give India its full self-government now would be to give India to the Axis. The offer brought to New Delhi by Cripps, modified to meet such reasonable demands as that for an Indian Minister of Defense, provides as much freedom as is compatible with the stable administrative processes required by war.

Whether it provides enough freedom to stir the Indians to strong resistance is not so certain. Drugged by years of pacifist teaching, obsessed with their age-long animosity toward Britain, the people of India must fully believe in the new future that is held before them if they are to fight as they must. The longer the negotiations, the sharper the bargaining, the less will be the chance of winning their support for the terrible struggle that lies ahead. Only prompt, vigorous, confident leadership will work the necessary miracle in the minds and emotions of the powerful, sluggish Indian population.

As this issue goes to press, a few portents give reason to hope that the miracle may be performed. Nehru has apparently promised the American emissary, Louis A. Johnson, that if Britain agrees to an Indian Defense Minister the Congress will accept the British offer and India will fight all comers. The British government is said to have given Cripps an almost completely free hand in the negotiations. And it is even rumored, though vaguely, that President Roosevelt may intervene more directly, perhaps to "guarantee" the carrying out of Britain's promises. If a settlement is in the making, great credit must be given to the patient, wise efforts of Britain's negotiator: the character and behavior of Sir Stafford Cripps may prove as good a guaranty of British intentions as the word of Mr. Roosevelt. But the final responsibility—and the fullest credit if success comes—rests with the popular leaders of India. It is they who must balance the just claims of their country against the terrible pressure of events. It is their influence alone that in the end can persuade their fellow-Indians to take up the burden of war in the hope of saving freedom for the world as well as gaining it for themselves.

"Not to Be Attributed"

BY I. F. STONE

Washington, April 6

SOME officials in the State Department seem to be terribly anxious to cover up for the Standard Oil Company, and I think the Truman committee ought to find out who they are. In a prepared statement before the committee on Tuesday, W. S. Farish, president of Standard Oil of New Jersey, set out to answer seven charges against his company. Of the third, "that Standard made shipments to Italian and German air lines in Brazil, contrary to the wishes of the State Department," Farish said, "This is also unfounded." Hugh Fulton, counsel to the committee, then asked him, "Does that mean that the State Department knew that your Brazilian subsidiary was furnishing aviation gasoline to the Italians?" His reference was to the Italian "Lati" air line through which the Nazis sent spies, medals, and propaganda films to the Americas, receiving certain important strategic materials on the return trips. Farish's answer was, "Yes sir, and the State Department approved of every delivery that was made."

On the following day the State Department issued one of those "not to be attributed" statements usually reserved for delicate matters of international policy in regard to which the department would not want to be quoted even indirectly. The effect of this statement was to support Farish and to make it appear that the Standard Oil Company had done a meritorious deed. It was said that at the request of the department the Standard Oil Company made no deliveries to the aviation lines except with the approval of the department, and then only out of certain stocks. The aim, the department release went on, was to reduce the supplies of gasoline available to the lines and so force them out of business. The plan worked so well, the statement said, that the Axis aviation companies quit business soon after the attack on Pearl Harbor.

The State Department not only issued this unusual release but took unusual steps to make sure that it got into the papers. The press-relations division of the department actually telephoned correspondents to tell them about the statement, and offered to, and in several cases did, dictate it to them over the telephone. The calls were not limited to men who cover the department regularly, and at least one of the correspondents so honored rarely goes near the place. Inquiry at the Truman committee brought the response that "some of the Standard crowd had got to the department"—no very difficult task. Those committee members who knew about the statement said they didn't ask Assistant Secretary of State A. A. Berle about it when he appeared before the committee on Friday because they didn't want to embarrass him.

No one in Washington knows the art of the weasel word better than certain officials in the State Department, and the statement issued seems to have contained no untruths, but it did succeed in giving the newspapers a completely false impression. To make the long hop across the South Atlantic, Lati had to have aviation gasoline of from 87 to 100 octanes. It could only obtain it from Standard Oil or its subsidiaries. The State Department was worried about this line, but the best it could do, in its feeble way, was to get a voluntary agreement with Standard Oil in April, 1941, to limit the supplies of the air line at any one time to just enough for thirty days' operation. Thirty days' supply was sufficient, of course, to keep the line running, and the department's action was hardly vigorous enough to answer the question this whole affair raised in the minds of Latin Americans. As William La Varre, chief of the American Republics Section of the Department of Commerce, testified, "The Latin Americans couldn't understand how we officially could say we wanted to rid South America of Nazi German agents and still provide the only means by which they could go back and forth."

Standard Oil found even this thirty-day agreement irksome. Six months later, according to the testimony of Assistant Secretary Berle, the department was informed by counsel for Standard Oil that the company had a contract with the air line for larger quantities of aviation gas and oil and could be sued if it failed to deliver. The lawyer wanted to know whether the American government could indemnify Standard for any loss incurred through breach of contract. When Berle replied that the government had no power to do so, he was informed that under these circumstances the board of directors of Standard would not agree to breach its contract. A question by Senator Harold L. Burton of Ohio and the answer by Berle will show just how misleading was the "not to be attributed" statement issued by the State Department.

> Q. Before you leave that, does that mean that at that time Standard Oil took the position that they could make any contract they wanted as a private company against the vital interests of the United States, and then stick to it, because to break the contract they had made would cost them money?
> A. The position they took was that they were going to keep any contracts they had made, irrespective of the interests of the United States. . . .

No one at the State Department seems to have thought of asking Standard Oil to show the contract, but La Varre testified that he had tried for three years to trace down "the so-called Standard Oil contract" and that there wasn't any such contract in existence. When Senator Mead said this didn't "seem to conform with the most cooperative spirit expressed by the Standard witnesses to the committee," La Varre said:

> My only experience is, I have spent many years in Latin America and have seen Standard Oil operating in all the countries, and there is never any cooperation with our foreign ambassadors or with the State Department or with the Commerce Department.
> Senator Mead: Never any cooperation?
> Mr. La Varre: Never any.

I dwell at some length on this story because it is typical of what the Truman committee hearings on Standard Oil are revealing. One incident after another has shown that neither the government nor Standard's own partners have been able to rely upon its word. The case of Lati is not the only one in which Standard Oil showed itself much more ready to cooperate with the Axis than to cooperate with its own government. The State Department's release of Wednesday is only one example of the way in which a government department, after being defied and stepped on by Standard, can be persuaded to come to its defense. High officials of the Navy Department have asked the Truman committee to "go easy" on Standard Oil, and testimony in the hearings show the Army-Navy Munitions Board dutifully making the recommendations that best serve Standard's purposes. Standard has been as arrogant in dealing with our government as it has been subservient in dealing with the Nazis, and there is good reason to suspect that it pleaded nolo contendere to the Thurman Arnold anti-trust charges and paid the maximum fines because a trial would have exposed its friendly relations with the Third Reich.

A. E. F. to Siberia

BY G. A. BORGESE

IF WE want to win the war it is high time to inquire where, and when, and how we plan to meet victory. The record of the professional strategists so far is not so thoroughly triumphant as to inhibit the layman who knows his own limitations. He may humbly hope to be no less fortunate than the poor Persian nomad who taught Cyrus how to storm Sardis, or the little clergyman who showed Charlemagne the way to outflank the Langobardic fortresses and to seize Italy. (The stories of these amateur strategists can be read in The Nation of two weeks ago.)

The time of passive strategy is over. We can no longer accept with easy satisfaction the temperate doctrine of assimilating the blows and "wearing down the enemy," while Time and Production—those two allegorical deities flanking the democratic Mars—work for us. Production may be on our side, or on the side of the enemy, or impartially on both; and we are becoming not a little suspicious that Time may work against us. The tenet that defense will not win the war has risen to popularity, and the request for new fronts is daily gaining momentum.

General Wavell is reported to have said that strategy is a matter of common sense—even though, one might add, common sense is not so common as the idiom implies. If that is so, the fronts that have been publicly proposed to this moment need but brief comment.

Western Europe is notoriously in the grip of the German forces. Coups like the heroic raid on Saint-Nazaire, even if frequently and expensively repeated, are no more than pin-pricks in the grand manner; able no doubt to torment the monster but insufficient to slay it. They may compel Germany to divert a certain number of divisions from the Russian front to the west; they can hardly exhaust the German resources for defense and offense. Retaliation also, with the technique of the commando applied by Germany against British bases and cities, is easily conceivable.

A landing in such proportions as to carve a route of invasion from the Atlantic coast to the Rhine and beyond is, in the present state of the shipping facilities and of the Nazi occupation, nothing more than a daydream. It is not likely that anything decisive can be tried via

Burlingame, Calif.

Western Europe unless miracles happen within Germany or the Nazi war machine is extremely damaged on other fronts. The hope that the Russians alone might do the job is on the wane while this most glorious, if dolorous, Russian winter is yielding to the ominous spring.

Dissatisfaction, we are told, is fermenting again in Spain, and Allied forces might find help there. A bridgehead, we may add, could be built more successfully in Portugal, open to a large-scale landing and comparatively distant from an immediate German countermarch. But apart from the problem of shipping, we all know the passions and interests which thwart the will of the Western powers whenever the necessity of the fight points to those shores. They are the same passions and interests, obdurately conservative or clerical, that impede all action against Vichy. To this conflict within ourselves we owe a most distressing aspect of this war. The enemy fights to the hilt; we fight, as it were, to the button—with a number of actions prohibited by ourselves to ourselves.

An African march via Dakar has been repeatedly suggested. It would be more feasible if we had taken Dakar. At any rate this proposal is rather pointless if it is directed at North Africa alone. Colonel Kernan's idea of invading Italy would have been excellent two and a half years ago. But Fascist Italy was cherished by too many in the cabinets and general staffs of the "democratic" powers. A larger and speedier bus was never missed.

There is somewhere a baby, not much older than a year, a rather precocious walker and climber. She is fond of climbing the stairs between the first and the second floor of the house where she lives. Unwatched excursions might be dangerous; therefore a gate has been placed at the entrance. She stops at that. Although, she romps freely around and has keen eyes, she has never come to the conclusion that she could reach her objective just as easily by way of the backstairs, which also lead to the upper floor. No second gate has been needed. That approach, though unprotected, is not tried.

Sometimes the mental processes of the military mind seem akin to those of such a child. One wonders whether the shapeless immensity of Asia is a reason sufficient to explain the absent-mindedness of the strategists, professional and amateur, all of them peering spellbound toward the Atlantic or Eurafrican approach to victory, though common sense discovers the gate that forbids that approach.

It is probable that in Asia and nowhere else lies the battlefield for victory. It is a legitimate hope that this notion may penetrate the mind of the military High Command before it is too late.

A layman, long before the invasion of Russia and the attack by Japan, drafted a scheme which he called the Columbus plan. It was founded on the neglected notion that the earth is round. He proposed initiative against Japan, occupation of Indo-China, junction with the Chinese armies, double-pronged pressure toward Russia and the Middle and Near East, and, finally, appearance of the combined armies on the eastern shores of the Mediterranean, via the backstairs, when a convergent action from east and west would make the Nazi stronghold crumble. That plan received some authoritative indorsements. It now belongs to the past.

The same layman, immediately after Pearl Harbor, became Alaska-conscious. He became Siberia-conscious. He realized that the move from Indo-China, suggested in the Columbus plan, could and should be castled north on the chessboard of war, toward and beyond the lands of Marco Polo. Indeed, everybody became Alaska- and Siberia-conscious soon after Pearl Harbor. As early as last January an article in Free World, based on apparently serious information, gave in detail the German plan for an invasion of the United States via the northern Pacific. Subsequently there has been much public discussion of Alaska both as a crucial sector of defense and, with or without the support of Russia's Siberian bases, as a base for an attack on Japan.

Defense will not win the war. Its chances in Alaska are probably slighter than in most other sectors. It is highly questionable whether that enormous expanse of wilderness could long be successfully held against invasion thrusts whose objectives the Japanese war lords would not confide to us beforehand. There is no reliable way of parrying a blow at our Pacific defenses unless we make of Alaska and of the northern pockets of the Pacific a base for a full offensive, thus forcing Japan to concentrate on defensive positions in Asia.

But when the latter proposal is made, what is generally meant is a "grand air attack" on Tokyo, on Japanese centers of production and population. Air attacks have not conquered Britain so far; nor did they, for that matter, conquer Madrid. It is fairly probable that no air attack would ever grow grand enough to knock out Japan. Its centers of production can be decentralized; perhaps they are being decentralized while we talk. Its people make a point of indifference to wounds and death.

The appraisal of the air force as a decisive factor in warfare has gone the full swing of the pendulum. For a number of years many military men used to think of the airplane as little more than a kite. Now many of them think of it as a winged deity. Overcompensating past errors, they fancy that the god from the machine will close the tragedy.

The air force is to modern warfare, more or less, what cavalry was in the past. This war, like most others, will be finally won by the infantries, that is, by the passion of the common man inspired by the genius, military and moral, of his leaders—a truth that was manifest long ago to that strange prophet, Homer Lea.

The corollary should be obvious. We cannot expect Russia to lend-lease us its bases on the coast of eastern Siberia for grand air attacks while its armies, caught in a double war, would bear alone the assault of Japan's land army. An A. E. F. large enough to tip the scales of destiny should be conveyed to Siberia, there to effect at last a junction, in body and soul, with the armies of Russia. From a pivot along the Trans-Siberian Railroad its right or northern wing would point to the Russian front in Europe and to its final goal, Berlin; while the pressure of its center should relieve whatever pressure might be exerted meanwhile by Axis forces on the Near and Middle East. The left or southern wing of the A. E. F., after a junction with the Chinese armies, should envision as its final goal Burma, Thailand, and Singapore, with the armies of Japan enveloped from the rear and squeezed toward the sea.

This is possibly the "where and how" of victory. The problem of when victory can be won is not irrelevant either. It is not a matter of indifference whether we win the war in a reasonable time or in an indefinite future. The purpose, heroic though it be, of "carrying on the fight from year to year," is no plan at all. A long war of attrition, conducted according to the butt-and-bleed strategy of frontal defense and frontal counter-attack, may well consume our enemy. It may also consume most of the values we are fighting for. A third candidate for victory, neither Nazism nor ourselves, is lurking in the dark. He is half plague, half chaos.

The roads of Asia are proposed as possibly leading to a victory timely enough to make sense for our generation with full realization that a double march through Asia is no jaunt. The layman himself realizes some of the terrific difficulties. Humbly and gladly he would forget about it if a more sensible scheme were offered. But no other plans that have been submitted so far to the public mind are more comfortable than this or half so promising.

The first difficulty in it is the conveyance of a large expeditionary force from this continent to Siberia while the ratio of the naval forces in the Pacific is unfavorable to us. The outdated critic, feeding on the textbook geography of his high school, looks askance at a frightening map and drops his discouraged arms. The up-to-date geographer, the tactician who has kept pace with contemporary exploration and research, is in a quite different frame of mind. He knows the difficulties, but he also knows that they are not insurmountable. He admits that an expeditionary force, even as large as half a million men with the full equipment of mechanized warfare, can be conveyed to Alaska and from Alaska to Asia if our will grasps the means.

While strategy, however, is common sense plus imagination plus will to victory, tactics is a specialized craft. We shall not discuss here today the assets and liabilities of the alternative and complementary routes (stepping-stones of the Aleutian Islands to Kamchatka and the Amur, Bering Strait–Arctic route to the Siberian rivers); nor shall we scrutinize the reticent or contradictory Russian maps, designed rather to mislead the enemy than to guide an unexpected friend; or, finally, compare the Arctic route as it is today since Schmidt definitely opened it in 1932 and 1933 with what it was in the days of Nordenskiold and still is in the minds of the uninstructed. Information of this kind is not around the corner, but neither is it guarded in impregnable vaults, and a study—as competent as it was heartening—of the system of communications and of the military opportunities "on top of the world" was contributed by Lyn Irvine to The Nation of March 28.

It will suffice here to say that strategy cannot be the handmaid of tactics, and that where there is a will there is a way. Imaginative conceptions, no doubt, entail stupendous risks. But it is only the automatic thinker to whom the earth is as flat as his mind who can offer us plans exempt from every danger except the danger or certainty of consumptive defeat and slow doom.

The upshot of all inquiries to this date is that the real obstacles to a global strategy in Asia are not of a technical nature. They are political. The most authoritative observers regretfully state that no Siberian plan is conceivable in practical terms as long as the Russians do not want to "play ball."

It is credible that the Russians are not particularly anxious to see the armies of the Western democracies—which they mistrust—encamped on their own soil. Neither are their suspicions particularly allayed by the diplomatic situation of these fateful days. Unwisely the Russians are asking for territorial guaranties when the war is over. A thousand times more unwisely we hesitate to accede to their demands. It is more than credible that the Western democracies are not particularly eager to join hands openly with Russian communism—which they condemn. This mutual disaffection explains the self-imposed blinkers which obscure from both parties the sector or sectors of the war in which full cooperation is possible.

But the truth is dawning on many minds that if America-Britain, Russia, and China do not hang together, they may hang separately. Whatever the obstacles, political or technical or both, in the way of a fully operative alliance between the three powers, they must be overcome ere the black sun rises to usher in a Nazi summer. The snows on the Russian battlefields and the ice on the northern routes will soon thaw. Decision must be sought, everywhere in the world, in the long days and short months that are ahead of us.

Ships for Our Offensive

BY DONALD W. MITCHELL

LIEUTENANT COLONEL KERNAN'S "Defense Will Not Win the War" has fallen in with the popular mood. People are at last becoming aware of the danger of thinking only in terms of defense. However, in this volume as elsewhere there is little or no realization of the factors that have impeded offensive action.

The difficulty of the task of transportation and supply rather than any mistaken preference for defensive warfare has been the principal cause of our failure to take a more active role in the present war. Munitions from the "arsenal of democracy" have to be sent to every battle front, and the problem of logistics involved finds no parallel in previous wars. Our loss of the Far East was mainly due to our inability to surmount the obstacle of distance with sufficient rapidity.

Today the United Nations' merchant tonnage is being spread so thin by the demands of war in many areas that even vital needs are not being adequately cared for. Despite the fact that for probably eight months ship construction has outstripped submarine sinkings, the food situation in England has steadily grown worse. More important, we have succeeded in fulfilling only about half of our comparatively modest commitments to Russia under Lend-Lease. And if we are to win the war, our shipments to Russia as well as to other fields must be rapidly expanded. For these reasons any Axis threat to our sea lanes is extremely serious. Recent sinkings, particularly in the Atlantic, have gone far beyond the nuisance stage.

Despite official silence on the subject, no genuine mystery is attached to the successes of the U-boats along our own eastern coast. They are mainly due to the surprisingly large number of enemy submarines engaged in the effort, the insufficient number of defensive warships available, especially plane carriers and destroyers, and the great areas which must be patrolled by inadequate forces. The inadequacy of the forces at our disposal has in turn resulted from the necessity of restoring to the Pacific enough naval strength to give us a reasonably strong position as regards Japan.

Though the navy is saying very little about it, the improvement of aerial detecting devices which apparently operate on the same principle as the hydrophone should make aerial patrol by big bombers increasingly effective. Freighters have, no doubt, been too careless in neglecting such precautions as proceeding without lights, zigzag steering, and camouflage. If necessary, we can restrict shipping to certain lanes which can be patrolled or require merchant ships to go into harbors at night. Arming them will help, but it requires time. In case of absolute necessity patrols could be withdrawn and the same ships used for convoy duty. We have been reluctant to consider convoys largely because their use reduces the speed of individual vessels and the resulting delays are equal to rather large shipping losses. As a larger number of warships and patrol planes becomes available, the depredations of U-boats can probably be brought well within control.

Another threat is offered to our northern supply line to Russia by powerful German surface raiders capable of wiping out an entire convoy. Shipping in Norwegian waters will doubtless have to be escorted by capital ships or plane carriers until these raiders can be destroyed.

Partly because of the immense distances of the Pacific Japanese submarines and surface raiders have not—since Pearl Harbor—attained any striking success. A greater peril to our supply line to Australia is constituted by the Japanese island bases immediately to the north, from which aerial raiders can take off. The activities of our carrier-cruiser striking forces in these areas have evidently disrupted Japanese plans for their use, but until these "stationary aircraft carriers" are in American possession they will continue to be a menace. Once in our hands and rearmed, their threat will be turned against Japan. A bolder course of action in the Pacific upon the part of our navy would probably have produced better results.

Allied communications with India and the Near East are also threatened. Until Japan has obtained naval bases closer than Singapore it can hardly hope to cut off such trade completely, but it can seriously hamper it by sending cruisers and other warships into this zone. One task of our Pacific fleet should be to keep the Japanese sufficiently busy to prevent their sending more than an occasional raider into the Indian Ocean.

It would be ironical indeed if the war were lost for lack of ships, for in few fields of the war effort have we achieved greater results, after overcoming initial obstacles. Two years ago naval shipbuilding was the concern of three separate overlapping bureaus. Blunders, red tape, lack of cooperation, and interminable squabbles held up completions. Charles Edison, whose work as Secretary of the Navy has been generally underestimated, consolidated the offending bureaus and enacted other salutary reforms. Early rather than delayed delivery is now the rule. However, warship building under the best conditions is such a tedious process that only moderate strengthening of our navy for a three-ocean war can be looked for in 1942, with a somewhat greater increase in 1943. For some time, then, ships will continue to be spread out too thin for the best results.

Merchant shipbuilding presents a similar picture. After preliminary failure to grasp the magnitude of the tonnage needed to defeat the Axis, our war planners adopted a program very nearly or entirely adequate to probable needs. Between the early fall of 1941 and March, 1942, the building schedule for 1942 and 1943 was increased from 17,000,000 to 22,000,000 tons. When it is recalled that the nearly 5,000,000 tons we turned out in 1919 was regarded as an industrial miracle, the full import of present plans is apparent. Shortages of certain types of machinery and skilled labor, reluctance on the part of both management and labor to use the 168-hour work week, and racial discrimination have prevented our getting the greatest success theoretically possible. Nevertheless, the planning of the Maritime Commission has been of a high grade, and we are now reaping the benefit in the standardized but well-designed merchantmen being launched in quick succession at more than two hundred shipyards.

A full-fledged offensive is of course completely dependent upon this shipping program, and completions in 1942 will not be sufficient to enable us to undertake one. We should, however, be supplied with enough ships and troops for diversion or nuisance attacks, and possibly we can gain footholds to be exploited later.

Can Lewis Wreck the C. I. O.?

BY JAMES A. WECHSLER

JOHN L. LEWIS has submitted his bill to the C. I. O.; the angry, eloquent leader who directed labor's great rebirth has become a nagging creditor. Refusing to pay the per capita tax of the United Mine Workers for March and April, he has demanded that the C. I. O. instead deduct the sum from its "debt" to the Lewis treasury. The move dramatizes the complete estrangement between the C. I. O.'s ex-president and the organization he once ruled. It is also an undignified afterthought. The so-called debt consists of funds which the United Mine Workers contributed to C. I. O. organizing campaigns. The money was never recorded as a loan on the C. I. O. books. Lewis himself said to the last A. F. of L. convention held before the C. I. O. was formed, "Why not make a contribution to the well-being of those who are not fortunate enough to be members of your organization? The labor movement is organized upon the principle that the strong shall help the weak." That was seven years ago. Now Philip Murray leads the C. I. O., and Lewis, supported by yes-men, plug-uglies, and his relatives, wages undercover war against it.

There is a danger that Lewis's increasingly bitter struggle with Murray, and with the overwhelming majority of C. I. O. leaders supporting Murray, will be viewed by the public as merely another personal clash in the long record of labor rows. George Sokolsky says the only problem is whether Lewis or Murray will get the workers' dough. Yet this conflict is in some ways more deep-seated than the one which brought the C. I. O. into existence. The issue dividing Lewis from the C. I. O. is the issue of labor's role in war time—whether unions should fight a sniping, rear-guard action against real and imagined evils in the war effort or seek leadership and responsibility in the struggle against the Axis. As an unreconstructed Roosevelt-hater and an old isolationist, Lewis must pursue the first course. He may buy a hatful of defense bonds and pledge allegiance to the flag, but he cannot tolerate a full partnership with the Administration—and F. D. R. This feeling was the source of his original conflict with Murray.

For a short time after Pearl Harbor it looked as if Lewis were prepared to make peace with the C. I. O. and to effect some sort of truce with the White House. He paid his pious respects to the war effort. He participated attentively in the labor-industry peace conference which created the War Labor Board. Murray was visibly hopeful that his former boss would at last accept the role of loyal associate. Murray left Washington for a badly needed vacation; on his way back he saw a newspaper which brought him his first word of Lewis's sudden move for "labor unity" in January. In his caucuses with certain A. F. of L. leaders Lewis had assured them that Murray was aware of his plan to reunite labor, with George Meany, secretary-treasurer of the A. F. of L., as nominal head and with Lewis as kingmaker. Murray knew nothing of the scheme except what he read in the newspapers. The episode shattered any plans for peace between Lewis and the C. I. O.

Now the battleground steadily enlarges. Lewis agents within the Steel Workers' Organizing Committee are trying to arouse opposition to Murray's leadership in advance of the S. W. O. C. convention in May. Lewis emissaries in the automobile workers' union are trying to exploit resentment over the C. I. O.'s abandonment of premium pay for week-end work. Murray sympathizers within the United Mine Workers are being sent to the guillotine; a "commission" has been appointed to "investigate" the affairs of District 17, led by Van A. Bittner, a long-time ally of Lewis's who refused to join the conspiracy against Murray. A whispering campaign against Murray spreads through the U. M. W. Lewis men are also active in the farm areas and many other unorganized territories; the fantastic growth of District 50, the division of the U. M. W. which Lewis, through a combination of nepotism and strong-arm tactics, is building into a minor empire for himself, was described in The Nation recently by Will Chasan and Victor Riesel. Gunmen and "strong boys" filter into the Lewis pay rolls as veteran organizers desert to Murray. The United Construction Workers' Organizing Committee, led by A. D. Lewis, recruits florists, laundrymen, and restaurant workers. It has been involved in more jurisdictional squabbles than any other C. I. O. union.

There is little likelihood that Lewis can effectively undermine Murray's grip on the S. W. O. C. or on the Automobile Workers. In important areas of the United Mine Workers also Murray commands deeper allegiance than Lewis among the men in the pits—if not among those who count the ballots. Yet the cumulative effect of these far-flung Lewis projects is not to be minimized. Some labor leaders say that Lewis will become a real threat only in the event of major post-war turmoil. But as a "diversion" from the urgent business of war, as a perpetual and insistent challenge, Lewis is an important character now. He remains only nominally in the C. I. O. His agents in Illinois, led by Ray Edmundson, have severed all connection with the state C. I. O. council, and similar moves are imminent in other states. Lewis's final break with the C. I. O. will depend on whether he can most effectively promote a new Lewis-run movement from inside or outside the organization.

Outwardly Lewis's status today recalls his desolate situation in 1932, when his chief claim to press notices was his support of Herbert Hoover's candidacy. But the weapons now at his command are the weapons which any "oppositionist" holds in war time if he is prepared to play recklessly, if he has money, and if he has imagination. Murray has undertaken a labor leader's most difficult task—to spur the full prosecution of the war without being buried in the process, to steer a course between the necessary sacrifices which labor must make and the exorbitant demands which labor-baiters will seek to impose. But the shadow of Lewis lies across his desk, a reminder that "Big John" is prepared to exploit every retreat and compromise.

Labor's relations with the War Labor Board dramatize the problem. The survival of this board is vital to industrial peace. It is headed by men who are prepared to give labor as equitable a hearing as it could get from any other group that could be assembled. The most serious case before it involves "Little Steel," in which the S. W. O. C. is demanding a dollar-a-day pay increase and a union security agreement. If the board's decision is less than favorable to the union, Murray will face the same terrible dilemma as in the captive-mine case. There are few disputes in which the case for union security seems as strong in the light of the companies' past records; will Murray be forced to proclaim again that labor can expect only mistreatment in the mediation setup?

Labor's withdrawal from the board would precipitate at once the enactment of drastic anti-labor legislation in Congress. It would destroy the one instrument which offers any real hope of industrial-labor amity during the war. Yet if Murray suffers defeat in this case—and takes it—Lewis agents will at once carry the word to the steel towns. And even if Murray wins in Little Steel, there will be another time when he will lose. Whatever the case, the issue will remain the same, and Lewis's power of disruption will remain intact. The United Mine Workers' Journal has already jibed belligerently at the War Labor Board and joined in the reactionary clamor for a "national labor policy." The truth is that any "national labor policy" enacted by Congress now would be aggressively anti-labor.

In larger terms it is apparent that Murray is genuinely seeking to give labor a full sense of participation in the production effort. He is visualizing an expanded industrial democracy designed not to promote narrow labor interests but to insure maximum national effort. The President has encouraged this trend; Donald Nelson has underwritten it by calling for labor-management committees. As labor takes up this role, it faces mounting sacrifices. Surrender of week-end premium pay is not the last that will be required before this war ends. Every time production—not selfish employer interest—demands some concession by labor, Lewis will say, "I told you so." And as long as the sacrifices seem unequal, as long as price control and profit curbs are shadow rather than substance, Lewis's hand will remain strong. Didn't he prophesy that war would enslave labor? And isn't he the only major labor chief not plainly identified with the war effort?

So the outlines of Lewis's grand strategy take shape. His "underground" movement will harry the C. I. O. leaders, but he may avoid a head-on collision until they force his hand or until his lines have been reformed. There is little disposition in the C. I. O. to precipitate the showdown now. At the recent meeting of the executive board the issue of the per-capita tax was dropped into the lap of Murray, James B. Carey, and the six vice-presidents; the rowdy and irresponsible behavior of the Construction Workers' Organizing Committee did not come up. The decisive conflict may occur at the convention of the S. W. O. C., provided Lewis agents can elect enough delegates to make any noise there. It may come within the U. M. W. if Bittner resists his execution and Murray is prepared to risk a struggle in the mines. Signs of the approaching storm are clear, but its arrival may be a matter of days or of months.

In the meantime Lewis, still an adroit campaigner, carries on his "war of nerves." He has delivered no public orations since Pearl Harbor and held only one press conference, at which he blandly ducked all questions about his future plans except those for the organization of farmers. The District 50 newspaper ran a cartoon which showed Lewis emerging through the clouds to rescue the oppressed; the same newspaper likened attacks on him to the persecution suffered by Christ. All this is presumably a build-up for the Second Coming of John L. Lewis.

Lewis's chance of recapturing supremacy remains slender; the possibility that he may create widespread havoc is great. His behavior, however, is partially, if inadvertently, responsible for the most hopeful development now taking place—the growing cooperation of A. F. of L. and C. I. O. leaders in the "War Labor Cabinet." Created to offset Lewis's one-man "unity" offensive, this cabinet has achieved real and significant success. It has formulated joint A. F. of L.–C. I. O. policy on wage-freezing and on man-power mobilization; more important, it has slowly healed many of the deep wounds of labor's civil war. One member of the group said to me: "We've agreed not to discuss organic unity yet, but we're moving in that direction. It's like a man and woman who have separated and then begin to see each other again; they want to be damn sure it will work before they start living together again."

Lewis's current offensive is certain to hasten this process. Although he still maintains a powerful ally in A. F. of L. councils—William L. Hutcheson, czar of the Carpenters—the Lewis-Hutcheson axis has been enormously weakened by the achievements of the War Labor Cabinet. It was Hutcheson who worked most closely with Lewis in fashioning the abortive "unity" plot; now unity can come only through the Murray-Green cabinet. This may prove the final answer to Lewis's challenge. Meanwhile, Murray's most effective course is the prosecution of a vigorous war program. If labor becomes unified in time, and if it obtains a decisive place in the war councils, Lewis may come under the heading of a remote post-war problem.

Peace with Hitler's Generals?

BY LUDWIG LORE

OF ALL the mistakes the democratic Allies have made in the war, the greatest has been their reliance on the internal weakness of the Axis. We no longer believe, as did the men about Chamberlain, that the blockade will move the German people to overthrow their despotic Führer, and the voices of the "experts" who saw the Axis strangled by its lack of oil and coal and iron and food have all but subsided, but we still grasp eagerly at every new suggestion of disunity in the Third Reich.

The struggle between Hitler and the old Reichswehr leaders, the most commonly advanced reason for hope, is not a personal conflict. Nor is it fundamentally a struggle for power. In their aims the Führer and the generals are united, and to believe that the latter would voluntarily take their stand with the democracies against Hitler's pan-Germanism is a dangerous delusion. They differ from him only in their evaluation of the means by which the end is to be achieved. They are the products of the First World War, and because they have not forgotten its lessons, they ask for a reasonable guaranty of success before striking a new blow. Above all, they are military men who resent Hitler's reliance on extra-military measures.

Otto Strasser, Hitler's famous antagonist, declares in his recent book, "Germany Tomorrow," that many of the essentials for a revolutionary situation exist—widespread active and passive dissatisfaction with the existing government, fear of defeat in spite of military victories, and the possibility of creating a united front of independents, majority Socialists, Democrats, Centrists, German Nationalists, Strasser Black Frontists, Catholics, Protestants, Jews, and dissatisfied capitalists. Admit for the sake of argument that the leaders of all these groups could be persuaded to pool their forces in an all-out fight against Hitler. Admit also that the National Socialist Party contains serious critics of Hitler who, given time, might gain enough strength and influence to destroy its solidity. And admit further that Hitler and his closest aides might be removed by some coup. What chance of success would a revolt have?

Most of us accept the thesis that Denmark, Norway, Holland, Belgium, and even France are powerless to break the hold of the Nazi conquerors without outside help. But the Germans are the victims of a conquest even more cruel and complete. At present the National Socialist Party of Greater Germany is a compact body of at least two and a half million men and women organized in cells and local groups, in city, district, and national organizations, and in the S. A. and S. S. guards. This huge apparatus is not an extra-governmental instrument. It is the government itself. Hitler's rule of Germany is so much a part of the daily life of the masses that it can proceed on its own momentum, guided by a bureaucracy of more than a million persons. These officials—the thousands of little Hitlers who owe their jobs to the party—are the pillars of the regime. Without them it would crash under its own weight. And this bureaucracy has committed so many crimes in Hitler's name that it must, in its own interests, oppose any and every change in the nation's political structure.

The social and political lives of all Germans are so thoroughly controlled by the many interlocking organizations into which they have been regimented by terror, bribery, and cajolery that the development of an effective revolutionary group has become all but impossible. In the last World War the German masses had the Social Democratic Party and the trade unions and a comparatively free press; these became the foundations for a new existence when the empire collapsed. Today no such sources of leadership exist. Wilhelm Sollman, a well-known Socialist leader in pre-Hitler Germany, not long ago reminded us that not too much should be expected from German labor in any case. Middle-class elements, hopeless peasants, and disillusioned intellectuals, he declared, are much more likely to rebel than the organized workers, whose pre-Hitler training made for the creation of efficient union executives and political reformists rather than of revolutionary heroes.

It is certainly doubtful, to say the least, whether the German people want Hitler overthrown as long as he leads them from victory to victory, whether even those who dislike the Nazis feel that defeat would be preferable to Hitler's iron rule. We must remember that the German people are incredibly ignorant of what is happening in this war. The majority really believe that the Austrian people called in the Nazis to save them from Schuschnigg, that the Germans in the Sudetenland were slaughtered by the Czechs, that the Poles were at the point of invading the Reich. The underground movement, which tried for a while to dispel their ignorance and organize the nation for resistance, has broken down; what little is left has neither plan nor direction.

Could the army leaders persuade the German people to rise against Hitler and his all-powerful Gestapo in order to put an end to the war? Would the army itself survive this revolution? The German generals harbor no illusions. They know that even if starting a revolution were conceivable, no person on earth could predict its outcome. The Russian revolution of November, 1917, and the German revolution of 1918 are classic examples of the unpredictability of mass reaction to a revolutionary situation. The generals know also that the first sign of revolution in the Reich would bring open rebellion in the conquered countries. No peace negotiations which did not accept the policing of Germany and the rest of Europe by Allied soldiers until "stable conditions" were restored could stave off the vengeance of the oppressed.

But even if the cards were less obviously stacked against them, what could one expect—have Germany's generals ever shown outstanding courage? Examine the record since 1918. It is a story of patient cunning and deception. They deserted the Kaiser and allowed the German "revolution" to take its course, maintaining themselves in power behind the scenes by political trickery. When they did strike a blow against the republic—in the Kapp putsch in 1920 and in the Hitler-Ludendorff Brauhaus putsch of 1923—they abandoned the fight at the slightest show of resistance. In the years that followed they built up the influence of the Reichswehr by a thousand small political maneuvers; they were successful not because they were courageous and determined, but because their democratic opponents were torn between the desire for internal peace and the equally strong desire to make Germany powerful again.

The old Reichswehr leaders have always hated Hitler and all he stood for, but they have never seriously challenged his rule. In 1933 they could have overthrown him. The democratic masses would have followed them to a man. But they preferred to let him take over. Indeed, I doubt whether, even today, the German generals would know what to do with the German government, were it by some freak of fortune to fall into their hands. Their role has always been, and still is, a silent, tenacious, and unscrupulous struggle for self-preservation. They will fight for power within the framework of the Nazi state, but they will remain loyal to Hitler as long as they are the pampered pets of the Nazi regime.

"We're supposed to be there before the Congressional elections."

This is not pessimism. Hitler's collapse lies written in the pages of German history, but Nazi Germany's destruction will be the work of its own hands. For it has all happened before. Prussian Germany's capitulation in 1806, after the Battle of Jena, has mystified historians as much as it surprised Napoleon's marshals. The German army had met no real defeat. The Battle of Jena was a single incident—not even on Prussian soil. But the news of the surrender broke the back of German resistance. The fortress of Hameln surrendered to a troop of second-rate foreign hirelings fighting under the French flag when its commanders received a false report that Stettin had fallen. Stettin, Spandau, Küstrin, and Danzig followed. It was an unparalleled collapse.

It happened again in 1918. Observers of the German Zusammenbruch have described the orgies of defeatism that swept the German ranks. General Ludendorff, the "strong man" of the German army, bombarded his reluctant government with telegrams urging immediate peace negotiations and fled to Sweden before the armistice was declared; soldiers and sailors in Kiel raised the red flag and proclaimed the revolution. Yet at that moment Germany's military situation was anything but desperate. True, the Allied army under Foch had won a victory which completely disorganized the German front in Flanders, but no enemy had yet set foot on German soil. Conditions at home were bad, but not nearly so tragic as they were to become two years later when the people of Germany bowed unprotestingly to a government-manufactured inflation. It was simply that the magic spell of the German army's invincibility had been broken. Thousands of soldiers deserted and made their way home, plundering supply trains for food, spreading terror over devastated France and Belgium in a veritable paroxysm of defeat. More than one officer of the old school committed suicide in the face of this incredible self-abasement.

That is the price the Germans will have to pay again. The peasant folk of the Balkans and the democracies of Scandinavia and the Low Countries can survive defeat. But dictatorships feed on success; defeat means destruction. Dimly the German people see the fate that awaits them, and their hearts are filled with foreboding. They are tired of their exhausting burdens, but they know that the peoples of Europe regard them with loathing and would have to be superhuman not to visit their wrath upon them if they were to admit defeat. So they fight on. The day of defeat will come when a series of setbacks releases the latent forces of opposition in a wave of unrestrained surrender. When that day comes, the German generals may sign the armistice treaty, but they must not be allowed to negotiate the peace. A peace that recognizes the power of Hitler's partners in this struggle could only be the prelude to another war.

WASHINGTON IS STIRRING with plans for the fall Congressional elections. In order to maintain national unity during the campaign it has been proposed to set up a national elections committee led jointly by a Republican and a Democrat. Presumably the committee's purpose would be to confine the debate as much as possible to local issues and to urge on all candidates full support of the war program. At a recent meeting of political leaders in the capital the two men suggested to head the committee were Wendell Willkie and Al Smith.

IN THE MARCH NUMBER of Architectural Forum are photographs and plans of an airplane-engine factory whose location is given only as somewhere in the Middle West. On another page of the magazine the same plant is shown in an advertisement and its address is given.

THE LOS ANGELES C. I. O. has banned the sale of left-wing anti-war papers—the Socialist Call, Labor Action, and others—inside headquarters and on the street outside.

THE NATIONAL SINARQUIST UNION, Mexican counterpart of the Christian Front, has issued a long statement urging all countries in the Western Hemisphere to cooperate. This windy homage to solidarity, however, says nothing of what the Americas should cooperate for—except "to combat Communist propaganda."

LEND-LEASE OFFICIALS have discovered that shipments to Russia have frequently been tampered with before leaving American ports. Tanks and airplanes have arrived in the Soviet Union with vital parts missing, and cargoes have been so badly loaded that they shifted and forced the ships to put back to port. It is suspected that much of the meddling is done by Coughlinites, who are numerous among the longshoremen in some coastal cities.

G. E. R. GEDYE, formerly Central European correspondent of the New York Times, was reported a month ago to be a prisoner in Turkey, on charges of conspiracy in the von Papen bombing incident. Gedye is not a prisoner and was never arrested. . . . Another story, printed in this column and elsewhere, reported that Harper's would not publish Gedye's book on his experiences in Russia. The publishers report that the book has not been suppressed; it has merely been postponed because the manuscript has not yet arrived in this country.

BOOKS and the ARTS

"NEW YORKER" FICTION

BY LIONEL TRILLING

RECENTLY, reading Fielding and Dickens again, I was struck by the change that our time has brought about in the relation of writer and reader. The old literary relation was a "polite" one—literature was assumed to be a means of social intercourse, the reader and writer were supposed to be aware of each other as friends engaged in a matter of common interest. But since the end of the nineteenth century there has grown up a competing—and by now largely victorious—assumption according to which literature is thought to be not so much a social as a scientific or religious activity; the reader, though permitted to be present at the research or ritual, is naturally not to be noticed.

One of the indications of the changed attitude is the decrease in lightness and humor in work which pretends to seriousness. The contrivance of a comic incident and the turning of a witty phrase are in effect a kind of flattery; they suggest direct notice of the reader, an avowed social effort on the part of the writer. Shaw was perhaps the last great mind to think with laughter and to invite his public to join him. American literature of the past three decades is largely solemn, even lugubrious, and its prose seems to be consciously at war with wit. The scientific and religious assumption has made the social one seem almost frivolous; for example, the important novels of E. M. Forster have never received adequate recognition because their polite, colloquial relation with the reader casts doubt on their seriousness, and a few years ago the pleasant small talent of S. N. Behrman had to advance specious reasons why there is always time for comedy.

It is one of the admirable things about the New Yorker magazine that it insists on continuing the old polite tradition of literature. The New Yorker is always aware of its readers and knows just who they are—the intelligent, comfortably-fixed, urbane, moral people who dress in good taste, enjoy all the arts but also all the sports, and in their politics are liberal but not rash. This, at any rate, is what we become as we read the New Yorker, and if the magazine flatters us by supposing that we are better off or more genteel than in fact we are, it also supposes that we are literate, intelligent, and quietly public-spirited.

And just as Dickens, having established a perfect social communion with his public, introduced into his novels the most withering indictments of the ideas and institutions by which his public lived, the New Yorker publishes along with its more genial contents, with its anecdotes, its comic drawings, and its excellent journalism, a kind of short story the main characteristic of which is its great moral intensity. Every week, at the barber's or the dentist's or on the commuting train, a representative part of the middle class learns about the horrors of snobbery, ignorance, and insensitivity and about the sufferings of children, servants, the superannuated, and the subordinate, weak people of all sorts. From these weekly stories sixty-eight were recently selected for the volume "Short Stories from the New Yorker" (Simon and Schuster, $3); they make one of the most "socially conscious" and one of the most grimly moral books lately published.

There can be no question about the talent of all these stories or about the brilliance of many of them, and their impulse to serious moral judgment is so urgent that to the future historian of the middle class they will inevitably seem documents of prime importance. But perhaps the first thing one remarks when these stories are taken out of their polite setting and brought together in a single volume is that, by some editorial anomaly, they deny the polite tradition the rest of the New Yorker maintains. Almost all the authors subscribe to the myth of their personal non-existence or of their merely corporate existence; they are all the same anonymous person, and you feel about them that, just as any scientist might take over another's research or any priest take over another's ritual duty, almost any one of these writers might write another's story in the same cool, remote prose. They all stand at about the same distance from their subject—perhaps Irwin Shaw a little closer than most or John O'Hara a little farther away—and all make similar sharp, sad observations about people with about the same degree of silent objectivity. And somehow, despite their admirable technical skill and despite their high earnestness, their stories have a mortuary quality; they are bright, beautiful, but dead. They all have point, but on that point they seem to impale not only the specimen to be observed but themselves as well.

In some part, perhaps, this effect may be attributed to the length of these stories; they have just room enough to make the sharp perception but not room enough for a play of emotion around it. The perception, to be adequately dramatic within this confining space, must be uncompromising and unmodulated; and because finality is always moving, these stories like to bring life, through some triviality, to a crisis and then a full stop. Even when we have such fine sensibilities as those of Kay Boyle or Louise Bogan, and even when they declare themselves in the service of affirmation, we feel that they have embalmed life for our inspection.

And behind the urgent morality of many of these stories I cannot help suspecting something very like cruelty. It is a peculiarly modern cruelty, unconsciously allied with the humanitarian sentiments and exercising itself by subtle moral perceptions. It is inherent in these stories in varying degrees of complexity, but it appears with a naive simplicity in Dorothy Parker's Arrangement in Black and White, of which the intended point is that a young woman's expressions of liberal "tolerance" for a Negro singer are actually the expressions of her intense snobbery; but certainly the further and concealed point of the story is the great pleasure Miss Parker gets from her pursuit of this easy victim, the moral grandeur she offers her readers at small emotional expense. Surely the clue to the value of these emotions lies in Miss Parker's other story in the collection, in which, comparing herself with a group of Spanish Loyalists, she indulges in the luxury of self-contempt.

All satire has, of course, the pleasure of attack; what keeps the great satirists from cruelty is their open expression of anger, their clear avowal of their pleasure in the attack. But in many of the New Yorker stories—for example, in all three of Sally Benson's, in Mark Connolly's, in Marjorie Kinnan Rawlings's, in Mark Schorer's, in Tess Slesinger's, in Benedict Thielen's, even in Sherwood Anderson's (it is significantly unlike his characteristic work)—the authors avow nothing; indeed, in their defense of virtue they do not condescend to attack at all, they merely lay traps of situation into which the doomed characters must inevitably fall. In these stories immorality is exposed not by the author's aggression but by the character's unwariness; the author allows us to view the result but disclaims all responsibility, having made clear by his style that he is not really a person at all.

Most of the stories in "Short Stories from the New Yorker" are serious; but something of the same effect appears in the comic stories too. Arthur Kober, for example, writes his Bronx chronicles—they are collected in "My Dear Bella" (Random House, $2)—with a detachment so great as to be almost an animus. For a writer to withdraw so much of his feeling from his characters is to leave them shivering and naked; for Kober to record without comment and with so little expressed emotion the turns of speech and the tricks of behavior of his people is not to refrain from judgment but to make a judgment of contempt. And in Kober's case it results in a kind of inaccuracy; his method seems to accommodate nothing but the pettiness and ill-temper of his Jews, and Daniel Fuchs and Jerome Weidman surpass him in telling the literal truth about a similar group. I find the same unexplained animus in Benedict Thielen's "Stevie" stories (Dial, $2). In a rather foolish preface in which he assures us that he has higher interests than Stevie, Thielen explains that his ill-natured vulgarian deserves to be written about simply because he exists; but it is not convincing—we want to know why. We do know why Flaubert pursued Bouvard and Pecuchet, and the reasons were large and good. But it is hard to see in Thielen's pursuit of Stevie any other motive than the pure pleasure of mousing.

Three collections of New Yorker stories avoid the quality of cruelty which I have referred to. John Collier's "Presenting Moonshine" (Viking, $2.50) is full of the most ingenious sadism which addresses itself in open and friendly terms to the Perfect Murderer in each of us; it seems to me considerably less fierce than the literature of ingenious moral traps. Sally Benson's "Junior Miss" (Random House, $2) does not give me the pleasure it gives so many, but I prefer these slight stories to her weightier three in the New Yorker anthology; her adolescent girl cannot be written about without some affectionate responsibility. And James Reid Parker's "Attorneys at Law" (Doubleday, Doran, $2) is so very explicit in its animus and speaks with so much contemptuous gusto of a world in which immorality is so taken for granted that it is quite without moral ambiguity.

But of the New Yorker writers certainly the most gifted and morally the soundest is Ludwig Bemelmans. His "Hotel Splendide" (Viking, $2.50) contains much of his best work and one of the most successful stories I know, The Magician Entertains the Ballet. Bemelmans is wholly in the old polite tradition. He courts the reader with the wit of his surprising prose, and of all the writers I have mentioned he is the only one who has an affection for his characters. Out of some humility or courage he has no need to speak with the authoritative voice of anonymity; he consents to exist as no more than a person and to admit that it is he, Bemelmans, who is at work.

The result is that his moral judgments are far less intense than his colleagues' but far more just; they are never bleak and desperate; even when they are adverse they are warm and forgiving. It is, I feel, an important aspect of his peculiar moral tone that he alone of the New Yorker writers creates a world that is colored, palpable, and full of smells; the others, for all their remarkable sensibility, are not aware of the senses; their perception is ascetic, and their characters, conceived in a kind of worldly puritanism, have no real bodies. But Bemelmans thinks with his senses and allows even his disagreeable characters the privileges of bodily existence, the magician with his stale cakes and passions quite as much as the ballet girls with the lemon slices between their toes and their adoration of Pavlowa.

Bemelmans is, in the good sense of the word, a modest talent, possibly not much more than a quaint one. It can scarcely benefit such a talent to inflate it beyond its true proportions, and yet it seems to me that his work is important because in these days its characteristic quality is so rare. Bemelmans, without ever descending to loose emotion and without ever losing his worldliness and his satiric eye, has a kind of healthy contentment with human nature; and in a world in which literary sensibility seems almost to depend upon the frustration of high hopes and to find its easiest expression in bleakness, his work, with its bright humanism, stands as both protest and affirmation.

Winter and Summer

BY STEPHEN SPENDER

Within my head, aches the perpetual winter
Of this violent time, where pleasures freeze.
My inner eye anticipates forever
Looking through naked trees and running wheels
Onto a blank transparent sky
Leading to nothing: as though, through iron aims,
It was stared back at by the filmy surface
Of a lid covering its own despair.
Thus, when the summer breaks upon my face
With the outward shock of a green wave
Crested with leaves and creamy foam of flowers,
I think the luxurious lazy meadows
Are a deceiving canvas covering

Burlingame, Calif.

With a balmy paint of leafy billows
The furious volleys of careering power
Behind the sun, racing to destroy.
And under light lawns, heavy in their soil,
I hear the groaning of the wasted lives
Of those who revolve unreflecting wheels.
Alas, I prove that I am right,
For if my shadowed mind let in the light
It would return to those green foolish years
When to live seemed to stand knee-deep in flowers.
The winter was an indoor accident
When, with head pressed against the glass, I watched
The garden falsified by snow
Waiting to melt and become real again.

The Indispensable Century

KINGS AND DESPERATE MEN: LIFE IN EIGHTEENTH-CENTURY ENGLAND. By Louis Kronenberger. Alfred A. Knopf. $3.50.

MANY seem to regard the eighteenth century as many seem to regard women—that is, exclusively as a subject for generalization. No doubt one does occasionally hear that the thirteenth century was this or the seventeenth was that, just as one does, occasionally, hear that "men, generally speaking, are . . ." But women and the eighteenth are much more often summed up in a phrase, even though the phrases are by no means compatible. The century is at times the Age of Reason and at times the Age of Sentimentality. Once the whipping horse of romantics, it later became the object of a Bloomsbury cult, to be thought of as full of proto-Sitwells; and one actual Sitwell did something which neither Lady Mary nor any of her female contemporaries seem ever to have managed to do—namely, fall in love with Alexander Pope. It is also, of course, the Age of Brutality, as well as, less frequently, the Age of Humanitarianism. Perhaps it was actually the Indispensable Century, and at least many seem to have found it such, but its denizens were certainly, like women, also people. They did not always agree with one another in opinion, taste, or temperament, and even at this late date some of them, say Dr. Johnson and Horace Walpole, are really quite easy to tell apart.

Perhaps one of the chief virtues of Mr. Kronenberger's extremely entertaining and often brilliantly written book arises out of the fact that he so thoroughly realizes all this and has described, or rather illustrated, not the eighteenth century of this or that person's wishful imagination but as much of its variety as could well be got into a bit over 300 pages. He pretends to no primary research, and his method is neither that of chronological history nor of isolated essays on a group of figures, but rather something in between, namely, not quite isolated treatments of typical figures, classes, and types of activity. Moreover, the method works better than one would perhaps be inclined to anticipate. The book is picturesque, rich, and varied without being scrappy; and, indeed, I do not know where one would find in equally modest compass a more informative or better-written presentation of a fascinating subject.

Mr. Kronenberger obviously admires the century he has chosen to write about more than he cares to admit or perhaps is even himself aware. With amusing persistence he denies its right to its renown and then, willy-nilly, builds up that renown again. He speaks of "that Augustan Age, which enjoys a reputation far from its merits" and again remarks that "the Age of the Augustans, stamped for two centuries as dignified and elegant, was in truth as noisily quarrelsome an era as history will reveal." "Bath had pomp and elegance and a kind of magnificent dulness, and they are preserved in its stone and its gardens and its crescents. . . . But Bath dear to sentimentalists, a city ripe for gaiety and pleasure, very likely never existed." He even quotes with approval Lytton Strachey's judgment on the Johnson of the "Lives": "Johnson's aesthetic judgments are almost invariably subtle, or solid, or bold; they have always some good quality to recommend them—except one: they are never right." All these pronouncements except the last are not only defensible but perhaps just. Yet the century remains a subject which Mr. Kronenberger, like most of its students, finds fascinating. It was so magnificently competent in achieving its own ends, however little it seemed to care about others which we may find worthier.

What shocks Mr. Kronenberger most is what shocks nearly every modern—that is, the calm acceptance of an unspeakable degradation at the bottom of society, a degradation which not even tender-hearted people like Samuel Johnson thought it possible to relieve except by individual acts of charity. But Dr. Johnson was typical in harboring a deep-rooted and sincere, rather than merely comfortable or hard-hearted, conviction that the human lot is not subject to radical improvement, and this conviction is perhaps related to the fact that—here comes the inevitable generalization—the eighteenth century was, of all centuries, the one which had the least interest in any sort of transcendentalism, whether in religion or art or philosophy. If in our own age the key words of disparagement include "unjust," "cruel," and "unimaginative," the key words of disparagement were then "enthusiastic," "visionary," and "fanatic." And whoever brought schemes for the remaking of art or religion or society was forthwith suspected of being all these things. The age had its visionaries; some of them began movements which bore later fruit; but Mr. Kronenberger himself cannot admire them, as he admires less admirable men, since they were not, like these latter, so magnificently what they were. The eighteenth-century garden was a very formal and very restricted one. Its keepers paid a penalty for being resolved to stay in it. But when one contemplates political nationalism, romantic-decadent art, and the mystical religion of race, one can hardly deny that we also have paid a penalty for exploring the wilderness.

Two other things, one minor and one major, should be credited to Mr. Kronenberger's book. The first is a group of unhackneyed illustrations. The second is a wittily compressed style in which epigrammatic expression is used not so much for the purpose of getting something off as in order to make generalization memorable rather than dull. Having space for only one example I choose this: "Walpole's merit is that he made England prosper: his vice, that he made England value prosperity too much."

The Goals of Democracy

STRATEGY FOR DEMOCRACY. By J. Donald Kingsley and David N. Petegorsky. Longmans, Green and Company. $3.

IN THIS volume Mr. Kingsley, the able editor of the Antioch Review, and, Mr. Petegorsky, a young man who has recently established himself as a social philosopher by his admirable history of the radical sects of the Cromwellian period, have made a comprehensive survey of the problems of democratic civilization and sought to define our foreign and domestic goals. They see the problems in terms which will appeal to most readers of this journal. With the assistance of Pierre Cot, Max Werner, Albert Guérard, Oscar Janowsky, and Mordecai Ezekiel, each of whom contributes one chapter, they explore the complexity of the world crisis.

They believe that we cannot win the war without a unified military and political strategy and that an adequate political strategy requires a more resolute democratic purpose in both foreign and domestic policy. Every chapter of the book contains counsels which true democrats will receive gratefully. When the authors explode the theory of the "managerial revolution," the theory of an oligarchy which will manipulate society with no other power or authority than that which inheres in its managerial techniques, they will be hailed with special gratitude.

The book is the first real attempt in America to state the goals of democracy in both domestic and foreign terms, and it contains so much that is good that it seems ungenerous to be critical. Nevertheless, honesty compels the recognition of some obvious defects. Sometimes a confusion of counsel is offered by the various contributors, a weakness which symposiums seldom avoid. Mordecai Ezekiel, for instance, looks forward to a post-war world in which the hiatus between production power and consumption power will be bridged primarily by adequate taxation policies, and he declares that "if measures of this type are not sufficient to close the gap between goods made and goods sold, direct government expenditures can be used to make up the remainder in the deficit of buying power." Other chapters assume that radical changes in the property system will be required to cure modern society of its malady; and they even envisage the possibility of rather stubborn counter-revolutionary movements against the proposed changes. This debate is inconclusive and unsatisfactory because conflicting views are not brought to grips with each other.

Some of the authors fail to define their program with sufficient precision. Pierre Cot's chapter on international organization is the most obvious example of this weakness. He looks forward to "some federative organization in which the national states will lose their sovereign rights and attributes, so that they will become primarily cultural and administrative centers with local governmental functions." That is a pretty large order. The complete abridgment of national sovereignty means the creation of a real superstate. But the specifications for such a state are not given. We are told that it will be "built upon the foundations of regionalism," but we do not learn whether it is the regional or the world organization which will be the primary locus of power and sovereignty. Nor is the relation between regional and world organization quite so simple as M. Cot seems to assume. A federated Europe, for instance, would probably be dominated by Germany and would not find it easy to integrate two quasi-continental powers, Russia and Britain, into its political mechanism. Since these would be the two victorious powers in the event of a German defeat, it is rather plausible to assume that it is going to be easier to create a world organization than a European superstate. We cannot foresee the post-war organization of the world with any clarity, but we ought at least to know which of the various possibilities are compatible with each other.

The chapters written by the two authors occasionally betray a tendency to maintain certain pet dogmas of the left without the reexamination which the tragic history of the past era might well have prompted. One example must suffice. We are told that "the labor unions can become the driving force of a dynamic progressive organization that will have the strength, the courage, and the statesmanship to undertake the far-reaching transformation of our social order that alone can solve the problems we confront. Can such a movement enlist the support of the middle classes, the professional and agrarian elements which will be so vital to its success? . . . We believe that it can."

The authors are aware of the tendency of trade unions to lose political perspective in the day-to-day struggle for hours and wages within the present framework; but they attribute this weakness to the mood which a period of expansion prompted. The tendency of trade unions to forgo political tasks in favor of more immediate and limited economic objectives is a more serious hazard to economic reconstruction than the authors admit. The man who is making history for the British left at the moment is a middle-class intellectual who was outlawed by the British trade-union movement only a few years ago.

But this mistake is not as serious as the idea that it is only necessary to "enlist . . . the support of agrarian elements" for a radical movement, the purposes of which are defined by labor, hoping rather lamely meanwhile that the farmers will forgo their "individualistic traditions." This is to make the old mistake of the industrial left which has helped to betray the agrarians into the arms of reaction in every modern country. The farmer's individualism is something more than a tradition. He sees property primarily in terms of a farm he would like to own, or would like to own without the burden of a mortgage. The worker confronts property as a vast industrial concern in which he has no rights. The difference between agrarian and urban property conceptions is ineradicable. This does not prevent political cooperation for objectives which maximize the common purposes and minimize the differences between farmers and workers. Within a limited sphere the New Deal has proved such cooperation to be possible. But the fact that the property which the worker knows is the cause of his insecurity, while the property which the farmer knows is the hope of his security renders abortive any simple political policy defined by urban industrialism without regard for distinctive agrarian perspectives. The survival of democracy depends upon a statesmanship which harmonizes common purposes without unduly sacrificing legitimate individual interests and values to dominant ones.

REINHOLD NIEBUHR

Books and War

THE effect of reading too many headlines or listening too much to the radio, is not only to produce undue jitters on defeats or elations on victories, but also to obscure the larger issues in our war effort. An excellent antidote is for every reader to have as full and complete knowledge as possible of the pattern that underlies daily events. Certain books, including five published currently by Farrar and Rinehart, present facts which have not even been mentioned in newspaper reports and give, each of them, a complete picture of an important aspect of the world front.

For example, only a week before this issue went to press the New York Times headlined a report by Brazil's finance minister that "Unity of Americas is now held established." Yet Hitler's penetration of Latin America goes right on—despite the Rio Conference, the blacklisting of German firms, the expulsion of Axis-owned airlines in some countries. In THE NAZI UNDERGROUND IN SOUTH AMERICA, Hugo Fernández Artucio, a native Uruguayan who has taken the lead in investigating and exposing the Nazi penetration, shows that thousands of Nazi agents are still at work in every country to the South of us—spreading their propaganda, fomenting political strife, securing property close to airfields and oil lines—all under close direction from Berlin. He shows how the efforts of the Spanish and Italian fascists, and of the Japanese, are coordinated by the Nazis. And despite "hemisphere solidarity" he shows that in some countries the fifth columnists are actually collaborating with government circles and parties.

Artucio's own single-handed exposure of the plot, in June, 1940, to make Uruguay the German "Manchukuo" in Latin America resulted in a sudden marshalling of democratic opinion in that country which resulted in the arrest of the Nazi agents. But Artucio shows that the same job needs to be done in the others, as well. He names names, gives specific locations of Nazi centers. Just one instance—a map shows the location of 43 Nazi-prepared airfields in Colombia within striking distance of the Panama Canal. It need hardly be added that Artucio is no casual visitor; he has been on the ground, has been working on this problem for years and he knows absolutely what he is talking about. For a full understanding of the preparations for attack on us through Latin America, THE NAZI UNDERGROUND is required reading.

Until the nations of Europe had fallen one by one, no one would believe the military danger that lay under everyone's eyes to see, and until now no one has had the self-protective curiosity to find out what the Germans intend to do to them, and how they intend to do it. The totalitarian plans for a totalitarian world are given in THE AXIS GRAND STRATEGY, prepared from the official writings of the German military, naval and air officers and originally appearing in German military publications over a period of years. Like THE NAZI UNDERGROUND, it supplies the only possible means of defeating our enemies—by understanding their plan of attack in full detail.

Let us not deceive ourselves. The Germans have laid their plans for years in every field of political, economic, military and psychological relations, and they have done it on a world scale. So far they have out-thought as well as out-fought us. We cannot muddle through this war by dealing with each problem as it comes up and with no relation to the others, to the sum of the others. If we do, we will lose either the war, or the peace, or both as surely as Germany conquered France. To see the size of the problem, to realize the caliber of the enemy we must destroy; in short, to find out the steps we must expect and to prepare counter-steps, THE AXIS GRAND STRATEGY must be read and assimilated.

MEETING these threats involves not only grand strategy in a military sense, and intensified political-economic action, but defense on the home front. From this standpoint a most valuable book is CIVILIAN DEFENSE OF THE UNITED STATES. It is practically a primer of war for civilians. Its purpose is not only to give the individual the best techniques for protecting himself and his family, but to guide each community in its preparation for meeting sabotage and arson, the evacuation, of civilians, emergency feeding, etc. Health, morale, and labor's part in the war effort are other subjects discussed. This book will be found most helpful by public authorities and by every man or woman who is asking, "What job can I do best? And how shall I go about doing it?"

We are all apt to get discouraged at times at the seeming confusion, the cross-purposes and the conflicting voices that accompany each step of our war effort. The Nazis are working hard to convince us (and have succeeded with some Americans) that this confusion is inescapable with our form of government, that democracies can not act efficiently or unitedly. It is therefore salutary to read a book like Pendleton Herring's THE IMPACT OF WAR, which traces the relationship of the country and its military machine. Professor Herring shows conclusively that at every real danger point in our history we have achieved unity, and that we have the seeds in our character and institutions for a far stronger effort than is possible under any totalitarian regimentation. The New York Herald Tribune said of it: "Its history is sound; its political probing is brilliant and imaginative; its economics is bold yet realistic."

ONE reason for the cynicism that prevented our arming effectively before Pearl Harbor was the conviction held by many that "Europe took us for a buggy ride" in the last war. To prevent that happening again, Dr. P. E. Corbett makes a searching examination in POST-WAR WORLDS of the basic requirements of peace and international security. POST-WAR WORLDS is not a Utopian blueprint of an enthusiastic idealist, but is the result of the hard thinking and experience over the past twenty-five years of leading serious students of international affairs. It is good medicine both for cynicism and for wishful thinking. Some may say, time enough to talk about reconstructing the world when we've won the fight. Well, it isn't going to hurt our fight any to know where we want to go, and it may save us from following down blind alleys in the unpredictable days ahead.

The French Bourgeoisie

THEY CALLED ME CASSANDRA. By Geneviève Tabouis. Charles Scribner's Sons. $3.

DEADLINE. By Pierre Lazareff. Random House. $3.

THESE two memoirs, by French journalists now in exile in the United States, are important because their authors were well situated to observe what went on between 1930 and 1940 in the Parisian bourgeoisie, which was connected with big business and politics.

Geneviève Tabouis and Pierre Lazareff belong to the Paris bourgeoisie by birth, education, and profession. Geneviève Tabouis is a small, frail woman, always ill, whose moral courage is as great as her health is poor. As foreign editor of the paper L'Oeuvre, for ten years she denounced the dangers of fascism. She is rightly called Cassandra. On four occasions—at the time of the invasion of Ethiopia, the war in Spain, the Czecho-Slovakian crisis, and the French-Soviet pact—Cassandra Tabouis displayed more clairvoyance than the Prime Ministers of France and England, but her warnings were ignored. Pierre Lazareff became at thirty-three chief editor of Paris-Soir, which attained a circulation of 2,000,000 and stood at the head of the French press.

Both are talented journalists; they are not historians whose business is to classify facts or sociologists whose business is to trace the causes of events. Their testimony is limited, for just as New York's Fifth Avenue is not all of America, so the great bourgeoisie of Paris is not all of France. The France of the workers, the farmers, the artisans, and the thinkers is worth more than that of the Parisian salons and editorial rooms. The evil is that France during the last twenty years was a democracy only in name, subjected to the dictatorship of the bourgeoisie.

It would be unjust, then, to judge France as a whole from the testimony of Mme Tabouis and M. Lazareff. Their books do serve to show up the intellectual and moral decadence of this Parisian bourgeoisie, and they bring us a certain amount of unpublished information which, if correct, permits us to establish more completely the responsibility of the bourgeoisie for the defeat of France. After these general considerations, let us discuss the qualities and faults of the books.

Emigrés are too likely to be told that the American public craves personal and even scandalous anecdotes. Mme Tabouis and M. Lazareff have chosen to gratify the public's taste. This has led them to forget that "on lave son linge sale en famille." It has also led them to give exaggerated importance to feminine influence in French politics. To attribute to Mme de Porte and Mme de Crussol the fall of the Daladier Cabinet and the weakness of Paul Reynaud in ceding power to Pétain is little less mistaken than explaining the French Revolution by the coquetries of Marie Antoinette or the Russian Revolution by the perversions of Rasputin. If we believe our authors, French politics were decided in part in the salons of Mmes de Ludre, de la Rochefoucauld, de Porte, de Carbucia, and de Crussol. I spent twelve years in Parliament; I was a minister seven times; yet with the exception of Mme de Crussol, whose lawyer I was at one time and whom I have not seen for several years, I have never known any of these women. And I think that Léon Blum, Marx Dormoy, and many others were in the same position.

Happily there are other qualities in "They Called Me Cassandra" and "Deadline." A specialist in foreign politics, Mme Tabouis was well qualified to judge the Ministry of Foreign Affairs. She admires Herriot, Paul-Boncour, and Barthou; she judges Flandin severely, and Pierre Laval and Georges Bonnet even more severely. She exposes the duplicity of Laval, who from 1935 on contributed to the destruction of democracy in France and of collective security in the world and proclaimed his admiration of fascism. She shows Georges Bonnet to be one of the biggest liars in the world, a Machiavellian guided by fear—fear of responsibility and fear of bombs—who, after having engineered the Munich affair, destroyed the Franco-Soviet pact by his agreements with von Ribbentrop and thus assured Hitler the diplomatic situation which he needed to let loose the war. She mentions in passing that since 1935 Marshal Pétain has agreed with the general orientation of the Laval-Bonnet politics.

Having been chief editor of the greatest Parisian paper, Pierre Lazareff is well qualified to describe the functioning of the French press; he performs the task ruthlessly, and his study will enlighten the American public about the unbelievable corruption of that press. He points out that the great French papers, with the exception of certain political journals such as Le Populaire, L'Aube, or L'Humanité, were entirely dominated by industrial and financial interests. He shows these interests as gradually preferring "Hitler to Léon Blum"; according to Lazareff, their views were likewise accepted by the Royalists, who saw in a military defeat the means of getting rid of the republican regime. He reveals, as does Mme Tabouis, the play of German propaganda directed by Otto Abetz and his friends—De Brinon, Jean Luchaire, Philippe Boegner, and others. He underlines the importance of the Cagoulard plot formed in 1937 by the industrialists, the army, and the most active elements in fascist organizations; in his last chapter, apropos of the fall of France, he does not hesitate to speak of the "Pétain plot," whose origin dates back to 1936.

By striking examples, by facts of which they have personal knowledge, Mme Tabouis and M. Lazareff expose the steps in the disintegration of the French bourgeoisie. Mme Tabouis reports the statement made by General de Castelnau in 1935; "If there is a war with Italy, we will refuse to fight"; she also informs us that in 1938 two French generals were seriously discussing "the question whether it were not really better for France to be beaten by Hitler than rescued by Stalin."

The most important fault of these books arises from the failure of their authors—a failure common to the greater part of the French bourgeoisie—to know and appreciate the strength of the people. It is not their fault, but it reveals the mind of the bourgeoisie. In these books in which duchesses and marquises are so often discussed, the name of Léon Jouhaux, head of the Confédération Générale du Travail, who in 1937 had more than 6,000,000 followers, is mentioned only once by Mme Tabouis and not once by M. Lazareff.

I shall be told that these books are concerned with only one aspect of France. But because they ignore popular movements, the authors commit errors of sight and of judgment. When they speak of Léon Blum and Daladier, both of whom had their faults as have all men, they are unjust because they forget that Daladier and, especially, Blum represented and still represent, as the Riom trial is now disclosing, the healthiest part of the French nation. Furthermore, M. Lazareff, when he speaks of the events of February 6, 1934, of the Spanish war, and of the Popular Front, is dominated by a curious indulgence toward certain fascists—Chiappe, for example—and by hatred of communism. This is somewhat odd since M. Lazareff reveals to us some "instructions" of the German propaganda office which declare that "the French are to be terrified by the threat of Bolshevism"; he himself falls into the trap whose existence he denies. M. Lazareff does not take into account the fact that if the French masses had been able to impose their will, France would not have been conquered and he would not be in exile.

It is perhaps partly by reason of their gaps and faults that these books by Mme Tabouis and M. Lazareff will contribute to a better understanding of the present situation. The world needs France. But the world cannot have confidence in a France dominated by a bourgeoisie which Mme Tabouis and M. Lazareff show to be corrupt and light-minded. It is to the masses that we must turn if we wish to make France what the Popular Front tried to make it in 1936—a nation "strong, free, and happy." When America understands the French masses it will regain confidence in the French genius.

Stories by Ralph Bates

THE UNDISCOVERABLES AND OTHER STORIES. By Ralph Bates. Random House. $2.50.

THESE three novelettes are, on the whole, reminders of Ralph Bates's talent rather than additional evidence of it. Only the title story has much of what made "Lean Men" exciting and "The Olive Field" impressive; and even there one finds—as one does far more in the other stories—an unevenness, a lack of sustained power, even a certain ebb and flow of interest. All through the book there is this ebb and flow; one is by turns impressed and irritated, brought close to reality and thrown back into a world of words. There is no want of talent, but there is a decided want of achievement.

Ralph Bates is by nature an intensive writer whose work gets its effect rather by weight than by thrust, whose stories close in from all sides on their subject rather than march forward. In a sense they lack emphasis, the emphasis we are trained to expect—though possibly we are wrong to demand it—of the narrative form. One scene is "bigger" or more climactic than another only because of its content, not because of any more highly orchestrated manner of presenting it. This puts a legitimate but added burden on reader and author alike; because there are no signposts, the reader dare not miss a word, nor the author waste one.

In the title story, although it is hard to work into and has its trying moments thereafter, Mr. Bates is on the whole successful. The Undiscoverables (which was serialized in The Nation) tells what happened in a remote Sicilian fishing village a week after Italy entered the present war. It describes the clash between the Fascists who come from the mainland to take over and the natives who resent and oppose them. Ultimately the story centers in the Fascist major who is in charge, the passionately rebellious shepherd who kills and is killed, and the farmer who has become a Fascist underling from poverty and frustration. "Where, in any land," Chiesa tries to justify his defection, "had the peasants ever got an extra mouthful of bread out of broken heads and exiled sons?" But in the end he goes back to his own people, the "undiscoverables," the defiant undercover workers against fascism. In a way The Undiscoverables is a more convincing dramatization of the theme of Steinbeck's "The Moon Is Down." Certainly the life of the village—the thoughts and emotions of the villagers, the passion for independence of a primitive people—has an organic force, a pulse and a heart about it, that the Steinbeck story lacks. What prevents the reader from responding as vigorously to the story as he should is his difficulty in absorbing it. It is a little too involved and curiously wrought for a tale of fear and hate and violence; and it certainly isn't helped by bits of prose like "If Chiesa was playing cunning or playing wary he was overplaying in that suggesting readiness to discuss his going to the farm."

The other two stories, though not without interest of their kind, don't come off. The Burning Corn, a Mexican story of violence and treachery, of a primitive community in the early stages of enlightenment, of revolution and human beings and a marital relationship, lacks, for me at least, a center; it is enough like The Undiscoverables in impulse and subject matter to reveal its marked inferiority in skill. The final story, When the Man Comes, Follow Him, is an adventure yarn of a hunt for hidden gold conducted by an educated blind racketeer and his henchmen. The blind racketeer, at once sensitive and cruel, is a "literary" projection in the style of, say, Gutman in "The Maltese Falcon"; and the first half of the tale—which indicates that when he cares to, Bates can tell a story in bread-and-butter prose—is beguiling enough. But after that the whole thing becomes over-extended and dull, arousing more impatience than suspense. I'm not sure that this kind of story really belongs in this kind of book; but in any case it ought to be more skilfully turned.

LOUIS KRONENBERGER

Dickens as Historian and Reformer

THE DICKENS WORLD. By Humphry House. Oxford University Press. $3.

THE critical rehabilitation of Dickens which appears to be in progress—Mr. House's book comes in the wake of Edmund Wilson's provocative revaluation in "The Wound and the Bow"—promises to be valuable as a test not only of the aesthetic and historical values in Dickens's work itself but of the standards in fiction which were initiated largely as a resistance to the tradition he crowned by his Victorian triumphs. The sentimental hero-worship attending Dickens's immense successes a century ago stimulated a reaction of contempt which came to enlist even those artists who, like James, Conrad, and Gide, had felt the powerful appeal of the untidy colossus who dominated the imaginative literature of his time from England and America to Russia. But Dickens was always too much the creator of a world, the all-embracing exponent of a moment in the moral and social consciousness of modern times, to submit to the declining fortune of a Thackeray or Eliot. Moreover, critical detraction, in the heat of its special aims, came to show as much disregard of the specific force, scope, and detail of Dickens's powers as did the devotional indulgence which brought into being a vast literature of myth-making adulation calculated to suffocate any but the ruggedest triumphs of the human imagination. It is by this ruggedness of substance, as much as by his verbal and imaginative resources, that Dickens has survived, and both now make their claims on the astuteness of his latest generation of readers.

Mr. Wilson spoke of the "pseudo-poetic booziness [of the kind sponsored by Chesterton] which verbalizes with large conceptions and ignores the most obtrusive actualities" in Dickens's novels; an opposite kind of laxity appears when the sophisticated critic becomes so impatient of popular tradition that he destroys the hero with the hero-worship and deflates the novels to the point of inanity because of the abuses they have inspired in manufacturers of popular fictional entertainment. Yet Dickens has had a consistent, if underground, claim on serious critical attention. Gissing's book of fifty years ago, despite its devotional excesses and crudity in dealing with the specific gist of the novels, suggested most of the major critical arguments; Shaw, Conrad, Santayana, Eliot, and Lubbock have proposed his aesthetic stature; T. A. Jackson has recently set him up as a prophet of the Marxist revelation; and even Henry James, who in 1865 reviewed "Our Mutual Friend" as the work of an exhausted mechanism and helpless victim of popular compromise, could acknowledge in his old age the ineradicable mark laid by Dickens on his creative development and showed, in ultimate refinements of his art like "The Wings of the Dove" and "The Golden Bowl," the fruition of methods of indirection and suspense, of the slow surrounding of event and fact by the processes of conscience, moral curiosity, and retributive justice, which placed the author of "Bleak House" and "Little Dorrit" unmistakably in their artistic lineage. Now that masters like Dostoevsky, Tolstoy, and Proust are seen in their radical affinity with Dickens; now that Dickens can be viewed in the objective light made possible by declining popularity and a more realistic sense of social and psychological difficulties; now also that he may be seen, as Mr. House emphasizes, as "still the only one of the great English novelists who is read at all widely among simple people," as a reformer whose "adherence to fiction as a means of propaganda for thirty years revolutionized the attitude of the common reader to novels," and as the only man of his century to make "out of Victorian England a complete world, with a life and vigor and idiom of its own, quite unlike any other world there has ever been," the opportunity is ripe to apply our tested insight and critical methods to the imaginative creation and moral criticism which Dickens manifested above any other writer of his kind and rank.

The first task of rehabilitation is to determine the scope and authenticity of a writer's content. Where Wilson's essay aimed chiefly to recover the personal and psychic origins of the novels, House's book annotates Dickens's authority as a historian and reformer. It is, he says, their "minute attention to the business of life [that] gives Dickens's novels their immense solidity," and he makes it his business to determine the fidelity and richness of that attention, the almost official responsibility Dickens felt in recording the social revolution he witnessed and the processes and abuses of change that were bringing it about. He gives a chapter each to Dickens's treatment of history, benevolence, domestic and political economy, religion, social change, and politics. (He found himself technically unequipped to discuss Dickens's treatment of the law, which has however been recently analyzed by William Holdsworth in "Charles Dickens as a Legal Historian," and unable to do the necessary research on his treatment of education.) He not only reconstructs the conditions out of which grew Dickens's hatred of evangelical cant, moral humbug, and Biblical authoritarianism (Chadband, Pecksniff, Mrs. Clennam, Stiggins, Mrs. Nubbles, Mrs. Cruncher, the Reverend Melchisedech Howler), his detestation of organized philanthropy (Luke Honeythunder, Mrs. Jellyby, Mrs. Pardiggle's Puseyism), his contempt of Malthusian cynicism and sectarian charity ("Oliver Twist," "Our Mutual Friend," "Edwin Drood"), his "destructive Benthamism," his loathing of the casuistry of Victorian morality and economic hypocrisy (old Casby, Mrs. Gowan, Dombey, Fledgeby, the Veneerings, the Merdle connection), his rage against government machinery and nepotism (Chancery, the Circumlocution Office), his dislike of the magistracy (Nupkins, Fang), and his dramatization of the vast industrial and monopolistic forces that were transforming the English world from its legendary taverns, stage coaches, country houses, and generous manhood to the railroad-racked, factory-darkened, speculative and piratical nightmare that appears as the sinister milieu of the later novels. He shows in full detail Dickens's lifelong concern with reform movements in his public speeches, petitions, circulars, and articles in Household Words and All the Year Round—a continuous flow of pamphlets and protests that punctuated his fiction-writing. He reveals what is more important still in the artistic ingenuity of the books—the devices of anachronism Dickens perfected in order to expose the scandals and public outrages of the immediate present in a setting of the more remote past and thus to heighten the critical advantage of his moral indictments without sacrificing his prestige as a propagandist. Thus he placed the Merdle financial swindle, based on the débâcles of promoters like Hudson and Sadlier in the 40's, in a novel ("Little Dorrit") laid in the 20's; he satirized the excesses of Chartism by translating them into terms of the Gordon riots of the 1780's; he pilloried the injustices of Chancery the more effectively by placing them in the setting of the 1820's and of class inequality by reviving the French revolutionary drama of 1789; he continuously heightened the absurdity or enormity of modern evils by couching them in the barbarism or predatory violence of historical distance. He wrought, out of the crude matter and decadent conditions of his art, his complex methods as an ironist, a social critic, a satirist of manners, and a rebel against institutions. Thus Mr. House shows Dickens in a far more convincing historical role than that advanced by T. A. Jackson's Marxist thesis because he shows him creatively independent in his methods and experiments, continuously eclectic in arranging and invigorating his materials, unshackled by social or political special pleading, at the same time that he kept his intimate authority over the public he aimed to reach: "He seemed topical to thousands; he was not too topical for them to see the point, nor too advanced to have the public conscience on his side . . . he so exploited his knowledge that the public recognized its master in knowing."

When a writer, however public in his fame and appeal, maintains that kind of independence, he stands the only real chance permitted to him of surviving in the interests of posterity. He keeps himself free as a moral force through his integrity as an inventor and craftsman. Mr. House stops short of examining the art of Dickens's novels, but his book—like Wilson's essay, which goes much farther in this direction without tracing out fully its lines of critical interest—will be called on to give substance to future examinations of these values. One hopes such revaluation will now proceed intelligently. Inane conventional judgments and opinions on Dickens still crowd textbooks and literary histories. To reread him today, no longer for his plots and popular effects but for his writing, his methods of satire, his feats of stylistic contrast and critical implication, his symbolic powers, his obliquity of vision and the astonishing poise of his sympathies (revealing often quite the opposite of the crude moral antithesis he is still accused of standardizing), his prodigious atmospheric evocation and his feats of historical condensation, is to realize that traditional accounts of his humor and sentiment, his treatment of the rich, his handling of manners and social accents, and his whole encyclopedic variety of documentation stand in need of a revision from which none of Dickens's weaknesses or compromises exempt the serious critic. What Wilson and House permit us to see of his greater stature as a historian and acutely disturbed creative conscience demands extension into his full powers as a literary artist. In the lull now apparently at hand between yesterday's literary problems and tomorrow's, the opportunity for restoring a great experimentalist in words and human experience to his proper rank has arrived.

The German Art of War

THE AXIS GRAND STRATEGY: BLUEPRINTS FOR THE TOTAL WAR. Compiled and Edited for the Committee for National Morale by Ladislas Farago. Farrar and Rinehart. $3.75.

SHOULD this collection of excerpts from recent German military literature be used as a sort of secret-service report on the strategic plans of the Axis or the new tactical methods which the Germans will employ this spring, its value would be very limited. Even if we accept the editor's patent overstatement that "the men who are quoted can be believed implicitly" and that "the Germans indulge themselves in open discussion of what other peoples consider deep military and diplomatic secrets," it would still be true that only generalities are publicly discussed in Germany and that those discussions are couched in terms which make their real implications intelligible only after the event has occurred. On the other hand, the editor himself is careful to emphasize the various contradictions and conflicting schools in German military thought, and he also points out that some of the writers either wield no influence or are in opposition to the High Command's doctrines. Finally, all these publications were written before the Russian war, and none of them deal with the Battle of Britain—two events that changed the German military outlook in a fundamental way. America's military leaders can be reasonably sure of never having to fight a German army using the tactics of May, 1940, or June, 1941.

However, if this book is used as a source of information on modern, and for that matter German, military thought, its value is enormous. It makes available in the English language the most important military ideas, such lasting contributions to military theory as Colonel Schaefer's "Art of War" and "The General and the Art of Generalship," Colonel Braun's "Strategic Attack," and General Erfurth's "Cooperation of Separate Units of the Army." For American and British readers, Captain Sorge's "Invasion Across the Sea" will be of particular interest. It is noteworthy that the articles which deal with the nature and art of war, with generalship, and with land warfare are incomparably more instructive than those dealing with air warfare and the non-military aspects of total war. The editor, in his laudable endeavor to present a complete survey of German opinion about all problems connected with modern war, has included some publications and political speeches which are of little interest. In my opinion, it would have been more useful if he had concentrated on those German writings which actually show originality and make a real contribution to military science. I hope that in the next edition, if not Moltke and Freytag-Loringhoven, then at least Schlieffen, Groener, Seeckt, Ludendorff's "Total War," Erfurth's "Surprises in War," and, if available, Blau's "Propaganda" will be included in the volume. It might also be useful to remember that Italy and Japan are not only members of the Axis but also possess an extremely interesting military literature.

The translation of the often involved German texts is on the whole excellent. Still, some errors occur. Frederick II, for instance, never waged a "warfare of position" or a "war of exhaustion," but a war of attrition, which is the correct translation for Ermattungsstrategie. Moltke did not call strategy "a system of supplementary help," but a system of expedients. The editorial comment should have been cleared of some flagrant historical errors. For instance, the editor writes, "Were Clausewitz living now, he probably would be a refugee . . . writing his book on the war against Hitler." As a matter of fact, Clausewitz was a political refugee, but he did not write his book during his exile, being employed by Czar Alexander more usefully than present-day refugees are employed. He had an active command in the Russian army and was one of the authors of the Russian war plan of 1812, which in 1941 was to be repeated with formidable success against his own country. Nor was it the First World War which proved the correctness of Clausewitz's doctrines, as the editor maintains. Clausewitz's European reputation dates from 1870 and was rather imperiled by the course of World War I. With respect to the Schlieffen plan, the editor states that Schlieffen "did not actually figure upon Russia as an adversary." But he did just that! The Schlieffen plan was a plan for a war against France and Russia. The editor also asserts that "the younger Moltke and Ludendorff were in agreement that, contrary to Schlieffen, it was the left wing of the German army that should be stronger," and that this "opportunist strategy" "made real the peril of a French break-through on the weakened right." This is incorrect. Never was the German left wing in 1914 stronger than the right wing. Even though the left wing was slightly stronger in 1914 than Schlieffen intended to have it in 1905, still the right wing had the maximum possible strength. No danger of a French break-through on the right wing ever existed, but the modified Schlieffen plan eliminated the danger of a French break-through in the German center and on the left wing.

These remarks may sound more critical than they are intended to be, and it is only fair to point out that Mr. Farago and the Committee for National Morale have done a very good job in publishing this book. Some of the editorial comments, such as the introduction to the air-war chapter, are very illuminating and pointed. The collecting, translating, and editing of this material was a gigantic task, and in comparison with the usefulness of the whole undertaking a few flaws do not count. It is desirable that all those persons who at present are concerned with making war against the Axis read carefully the important German military doctrines included in this volume. Much can be learned from these pages. STEFAN T. POSSONY

Principle and Poet

OUT OF THE JEWEL. By Rolfe Humphries. Charles Scribner's Sons. $2.50.

THIS collection, overdue, of the poems of Rolfe Humphries should be of considerable interest to anyone who is concerned with the achievements rather than with the novelties of contemporary poetry. Mr. Humphries has apparently devoted himself humbly and honestly, if sometimes unadventurously, to the study of the craft of poetry, and even the more undistinguished items in this collection manifest his integrity and show the fruits of his discipline. Further, the real achievements in the volume seem more solid and satisfying than the more pretentious work of some of Mr. Humphries's flashier and better-advertised contemporaries.

The volume bears the motto, "A minor art needs to be hard, condensed, and durable." Mr. Humphries has aimed at such an art. He has wanted his poetry to be clear, self-contained, and finished. He has eschewed violent effects, cacophonies and incongruities, surprises and eccentricities. His characteristic rhythms are mellifluous rather than bold. Though they are capable of rather subtle gradations, they are rarely exciting. All in all, he has aimed, one assumes, at traditional poetry, a central poetry—a poetry which does not intend to be caught out on any of the various limbs on which contemporary poetry is sometimes caught. At this question of a "central" poetry I shall glance again shortly, but for the moment I wish to say that whether or not Mr. Humphries's ideal is central, he has sometimes achieved, in the terms which he has set for himself, a specialized and, in this period, rare type of excellence.

To begin, if Mr. Humphries has aimed at mellifluous and subtle rather than bold and exciting rhythms, his ear is capable of detecting them. For instance, the reader discovers a number of lines such as these:

> Slumber on stone, and on awaking rise,
> Somber obsidian in their open eyes.

Or there are passages which hint of the Elizabethans, Campion, for example:

> Sigh no more that silence, given grace
> By music, comes to grief as music ends.
> Render to music's echo, lost in space,
> The compliment that ease of heart extends
> To sain the lonesome areas of air.

Or there are stanzas with the gradation of rhythm and richness of verbal texture, sometimes a little less than discreet, which is found in All on a Summer's Day:

> Moving like music over the dull water,
> Double device upon the shield enlarged,
> With a golden wake that goes where he has gone,
> Or poised below the willow along the margin
> Before the gaze of the bronze maternal angel,
> Looking down at the lake of silver, lingers
> Lovely and proud and innocent, the swan.

Primarily, Mr. Humphries's rhythms are "mood" rhythms, rhythms that operate as a general conditioning factor in the total poetic effect and that are rarely sharpened to specific dramatic contingencies.

This rhythmical practice is to be associated with the fact that most of the poems are not dramatic in conception. The emphasis on situation is generally slight. Description bulks large. A good many poems represent single observations. Most of the poems are constructed to a single "turn" or "point." There is not a great deal of shading of tone in any individual poem, or ironical qualification. In fact, the translations, of which some half-dozen or so are included in the book and which, by the way, usually come out definitely as poems and not as mere translations, tend to be more dramatic than Mr. Humphries's original compositions. That Mr. Humphries is somewhat suspicious of the more obviously complicated effects in poetry may be indicated by some critical comments which have made their way into his work. For instance, he says, "Never overweight a phrase," and again, after the description of the play of light over a valley, "Beyond this pleasure let the mind not tarry." And in the poem called Imperative Address we may find something of a credo:

> Unweave these overwoven intricacies,
> Unsow the salt-sown areas of ground,
> Put the pure image where the blank page lies,
> Cultivate sight and sound.

We do not know how far Mr. Humphries the critic would care, in the cold blood of prose, to push the principle which

Mr. Humphries the poet has enunciated in the hot blood of poetry. And it is true that the defects of the virtues of contemporary poetry have been "overwoven intricacies," confusion of structure, and, on the one hand, vagueness, on the other, an arid pseudo-intellectualism. But beyond the "pleasure" of "sight and sound" the mind is not infrequently determined to "tarry." Even the great masters of the "minor art" in which Mr. Humphries finds his personal ideal frequently tarried beyond that "pleasure." Sidney, Campion, Marvell, even Herrick, even Waller, Carew, Blake, Bridges, and Yeats "tarried," and with some profit to themselves and us. These writers are masters of the "minor art," and we think of their work as being essentially "lyrical," essentially "pure." But poems like Campion's "Blame not my cheeks," or Carew's "Ask me no more," or Waller's "Go lovely rose," or Herrick's "Delight in Disorder," are rather complicated structures. Their "purity" is achieved not by the rejection but by the conquest of complication. And perhaps the fact that these poets "tarried" may partly account for the fact that their minor art is "hard, condensed, and durable," that they are, for us, central.

We do not know, as I have said, how far Mr. Humphries would care to push the principle which he has given in the quotations above. Certainly we do not know that he would care to legislate for other poets. And in any case it is important for any poet to determine the limits within which he himself can profitably operate. But perhaps Mr. Humphries is too much of a strict constructionist in interpreting his own principle. The poet in the poet, however, may sometimes happily forget the critic in the poet, as, I believe, Mr. Humphries has done in his best poems. I quote Proteus, or the Shapes of Conscience, in the hope that others will share my admiration for it:

> This is Proteus, a god. He comes from the ocean
> Sometimes, at hot noon, and crosses the beach
> Looking for inland shade. If he comes within reach,
> As he may, dive at his knees; do not be afraid
> To bring him down to the sand with a flying tackle
> And bind him, overthrown, with the rude compulsion
> Of manacle, shackle, chain. And even so,
> Ride him hard with your weight. Do not let go.
> This god is worse than sly. In your hands he will turn
> To utter fire, and roar in your face and eyes;
> Or burn, burn like a beast, lion or tiger, bright
> And hot and rank; or a lewd and ugly boar;
> Or some unshapely horror, moist and brown,
> Repulsive pulp to touch, and foul to smell;
> Or he may be a lovely river of silver
> And blue and green, with delicate wave and ripple
> Over the mottled pebbles.
> Hold him down.
> Until the miracle do not let him go.
> The final change you will never understand.
> You will not know how he ever managed to rise,
> Nor how you rose yourself, to find him there,
> An upright natural presence, facing you,
> As tall as you, in the soft ambrosial air,
> Smiling, and looking you straight in the eyes, like a man,
> And telling you what it was you wanted to know.

In this poem it seems that the mind has "tarried."

"And Men Decay"

AMERICA'S OWN REFUGEES. By Henry Hill Collins, Jr. Princeton University Press. $3.

ILL FARES THE LAND. By Carey McWilliams. Little, Brown and Company. $3.

THESE two books derive principally from the same sources, the hearings on migratory labor before the La Follette and Tolan Congressional committees. They supplement each other remarkably. McWilliams's approach is rather grimly that of the scholar. He strives to appear cool even when he is flaming angry as he seeks to penetrate beyond degradation to causes. Collins is more plainly the crusading reporter and outright exhorter. He brings more living people into his story and lets you hear their voices. He can describe a dust storm, "the earth-breathing wind," in the general accents of the old-time Western thriller.

"Another whiteskin bit the dust," I scrawled in the margin at this point and wondered if that were funny. It isn't. At one point, toward the end of his more extended analysis, McWilliams remarks that the Populist farmers, with their outcry against Wall Street and monopolies, were not so far from the main cause of farm distress and dispossession, even now. The general beat and color of Collins's narrative, even when he is talking statistics, has the Bryan ring.

Despite an occasional extravagance of style, or perhaps because of it, Collins sounds forth a warm counterpoint to McWilliams's professional prose. But McWilliams, publishing some months after Collins, gets around in the end to saying much the same thing, with multiplied instances. Both books, I read in some newspaper reviews, may be said now to be outdated. Collins, writing before Pearl Harbor, undertakes to dispose of this view in advance:

> Rather than assuaging the ills of migration, the bugle cry of defense seems likely to make them worse. . . . Portents multiply that when the present emergency is over the stories told in the pages ahead will seem simple of solution compared with those that will lie before us. . . . Many a reader of this book, now comfortably lounging in his favorite evening chair, well fed, well dressed, well housed, is a potential candidate for migration.

Considering both urban and rural migrants, ranging the whole scene of increasing American dispossession from California to Ohio to Puerto Rico and the slums of displaced Puerto Ricans in New York City, Collins sometimes strikes off sentences that sum things up in a way McWilliams never can. Of Puerto Rico: "Cane has gobbled up the fertile plains while people scrabble and starve on the crumpled uplands." From a Puerto Rican migrant stranded in New York City's slums Collins reports committee testimony:

> We want work and we can't get it. We find that the small island is in the hands of two or three centralized corporations whose only ideal in life seems to be profit regardless of human welfare, and we are confronted with the problem that we either get away from the island or we starve there.

"Any exploration of the land-holding situation in Puerto Rico," Governor R. G. Tugwell writes in a recent report to the Secretary of the Interior, "has obvious implications for the South." It has; and for the Great Plains wheatland also, where great man-and-machine combinations swept freehold family farming almost away in World War I. The pattern of displacement and of the descent from ownership to peonage seems different, more spacious, here than in Puerto Rico. But the effect is not so different in the end.

Faced at home with the unrelenting antagonism of the Associated Farmers and other big operators, McWilliams, who is Immigration Commissioner in California, seems at times to be conducting a counter-persecution rather than an inquiry. But his work is so well documented and his reportorial integrity so manifest that you have no doubt he is telling the truth.

The truth, in detail, is staggering. Millions of our own people have been forced by the Industrial Revolution's encroachments on agriculture into lives of insecurity, suffering, and utter indignity. Someone, presumably, took care of the slaves; it paid to take care of them. The plight of these men, women, and children is worse. They are uprooted, harried, and hunted from state to state. They are disfranchised and miserably underpaid. They have no stake whatever in this country and its future. "Move on," the cops and vigilantes tell them, "move on!"

"What is Senator Byrd thinking of, he and those other landlord-Congressmen?" a mildly liberal Southern editor asked me indignantly during the recent push to wipe out the Farm Security Administration, the National Youth Administration, and the Civilian Conservation Corps. "We almost had a revolution down here after the last crash. People were squatting on private land and wouldn't move. They were breaking in bands into grocery stores and taking what they needed. We're going to need more government services for the rural poor after the next crash, not less. We need more right now, not less."

I was raised here where I live now in Maryland, gently, among landlord-minded people. I subscribe to their views as to the desirability of so charming a life. I must say, though, that in the light of accelerating dispossession the country over, increasing homelessness, and a rising mutter, I find a great deal here that is disquieting, to say the least.

People will haggle about prices fairly peacefully. The so-called parity legislation of Triple-A, dating from 1933, was the imperfect outcome of a long urban-rural haggle about prices. I ask all landlord-minded Congressmen and business representatives to recall that it was not until waves of downright foreclosure and outright dispossession beat high in the Corn Belt, around 1930, that actual local rebellions occurred.

Less sharply, but more widely, those waves of displacement are beating ever higher and faster now. Men and their families cast out from their homes, denied access to the earth even as self-respecting tenants, scattered to the four winds to do deadening and joyless labor in other men's fields and plants, will prove dangerous Americans to have at large.

If anyone thinks that I am indulging here, myself, in mere Populist oratory, let him see the American documentary film "The Land," made by Robert Flaherty. It opens at the Museum of Modern Art in New York on April 9 and will be shown throughout the country. It proves that Steinbeck, Collins, and McWilliams really know what they are writing about.

IN BRIEF

TWO CAPTAINS. By Benjamin Kaverin. Modern Age Books. $2.75.

A longish romance by a popular Soviet author, in which an unsuccessful expedition to the Arctic at the turn of the century is dramatically contrasted with a similar adventuresome expedition of the present day. The story is that of the captain of the second expedition to the North, who is enamored of the first captain's daughter and avenges his death. Written more in the manner of an American best-seller than of a Soviet propaganda piece, the story has a colorful, fast-moving plot, depending at times upon startling coincidences but full of lively pictures of the effervescent Russian spirit.

WHAT IS MATHEMATICS: AN ELEMENTARY APPROACH TO ITS IDEAS AND METHODS. By Richard Courant and Herbert Robbins. Oxford University Press. $5.

The various recent books professing to teach the layman something about mathematics indicate a considerable popular interest in the subject but great difference of opinion concerning how it may best be satisfied. The books vary all the way from highly popularized accounts of what, in the most general terms, mathematics "is about" to much more technical attempts to instruct the laymen concerning specific mathematical processes. At one extreme is Eric Townsend Bell's "Men of Mathematics," and almost at the other is the present stiff but luminous volume, which is, in effect, an elementary textbook of general mathematics. It bristles with those figures and formulas without which any attempt to explain mathematical processes is something of a snare and a delusion, and it demands of the reader the willingness as well as the ability to do a good deal of hard thinking of a genuinely mathematical character. It differs from the pure textbook in omitting those drills in technique necessary to anyone who is going to use mathematics as a tool and, more importantly, in disregarding both the arbitrary subdivisions of the subject and the tendency to treat only certain branches which owe their preeminence to little except the rather rigid traditionalism of schools and colleges. There are, therefore, extremely interesting sections on projective geometry and topology, neither of which the average student ever hears of, and a general tendency to see the subject as a growing rather than a purely traditional one. The book would make invaluable supplementary reading for anyone studying mathematics at the college level. Laymen had better attempt it only if they have a good deal of time and mental energy to spare.

WHEN PEOPLES MEET: A STUDY IN RACE AND CULTURE CONTACTS. Edited by Alain Locke and Bernhard J. Stern. Progressive Education Association. $3.50.

The editors of this interesting and important book have provided selections from a wide range of authorities on racial, international, and minority problems arranged in a definite plan with introductory chapters by the editors. From them there emerges a clear picture of the connection between current social and international difficulties and the direction of the world revolution now going on. The problem can here be seen to carry its own solution. Whether or not it will be allowed to work itself out is another question.

WESTWARD THE COURSE! THE NEW WORLD OF OCEANIA. By Paul McGuire. William Morrow and Company. $3.75.

From Vancouver to Hawaii, Fiji, and New Zealand, across Australia from Sydney to Darwin, from Bali through Java and Sumatra to Singapore, the author travels on this informative journey—informative historically and geographically, that is. The book went to press two days after Pearl Harbor. If the author had waited as many months he would have found some of his political and military facts no longer true, and his view of empire—a view which has lingered on since Kipling overshot Disraeli—given the coup de grâce. Mr. McGuire is a very well-informed and enlightened imperialist, but an imperialist he is. In spite of all this, however, his book is still enjoyable and still informative. The thirty-two photographs and three maps are excellent.

GEORGE B. McCLELLAN. By H. J. Eckenrode and Bryan Conrad. The University of North Carolina Press. $3.50.

History has not been kind to George B. McClellan, and the authors have set out to correct what they regard as injustice. Since they write with enthusiasm, and also with intimate knowledge of the battles in which McClellan was engaged, they have fashioned an interesting book, but they have not proved their thesis that he was "the man who saved the Union." McClellan was a great military leader, but even the authors recognize that he was politically dangerous. It still seems true, as it must have seemed to Lincoln and other Union leaders, that one could admire McClellan's ability, but it was difficult to trust him.

Art Note

150 YEARS OF AMERICAN PRIMITIVES. The Primitives Gallery of Harry Stone. Until April 15.

This collection of about forty works, few of which are first-rate in their genre, seems to support my contention that the best American art has been, and perhaps still is, primitive or naive. These pictures have a first-hand quality, an immediacy, which cultured American painting lacks. This quality alone is not enough for great art, but there is no great art without it. Incidentally, it is curious to see how the paintings here, most of them of the nineteenth century, reflect the influence of their academic contemporaries, with their tonal monotony, brown sauce, and all. RECORDS

MY REMAINING two March recordings from Columbia include a set (X-215, $2.63) of Rossini's Overture to "Semiramide" played by Beecham with the London Philharmonic. Beecham produces beautiful playing with his orchestra, but not the breathtakingly subtle colors and nuances, transparent textures, sharp attacks and contours that Toscanini produces with the New York Philharmonic-Symphony in the Victor set; in style too Beecham's performance is good, but pale and ineffectual after Toscanini's; the sound of the Beecham performance is excellently recorded, but so is the Toscanini (its only defect is that the drum at the beginning is almost inaudible).

In contrast to this set, with its performance and recording that are the product of good taste and good sense, is the set (X-216, $2.63) with Stokowski's bloated performance of his orchestral version of Bach's Passacaglia with the All-American Orchestra (there is nothing less loud than forte in the entire concluding fugue), its bloated, shrieky recorded sound (the volume control has to be turned far down from its position for the Beecham set).

A few more March recordings have arrived from Victor, including a second one (18498, $1) made by Stokowski with the N. B. C. Symphony, in which the tendency to elephantiasis is evident in a performance of Bach's Arioso that merely expands and contracts string sonority from p to ffff and back repeatedly, and in a recording that necessitates turning the volume control even further down than for the Columbia set of the Passacaglia. On wide-range Scott machines with light, sensitive pickups the rattles, distortions, and surface noises are appalling; with the heavier, less sensitive Astatic Tru-tan pickup the sound becomes quite clean; but even then it is brash and unnatural.

On another Victor single disc (13809, $1) is the fine Andante from Bach's Sonata No. 3 for unaccompanied violin, continently arranged for string orchestra by Bachrich, well played as an Adagio by Fiedler's Sinfonietta, and well recorded—with an arrangement of a less interesting Bach Fantasia from an unfinished work for organ on the reverse side. Another single (18413, $1) offers four moderately enjoyable small pieces for organ—Trio: Organum Triplex by Perotin (1180-1236), "Le Moulin de Paris" by an anonymous fifteenth-century composer, Fantaisie sur l'air "Une Jeune Fillette" by du Caurroy (1549-1609), and a Chaconne by Louis (not the great) Couperin (1658)—which are well played by Bonnet and well recorded. And on still another (2206, $.75) is Nocolau's Good Friday Music in a Catalonian Church, about which I cannot say much, since it is hard for me to hear anything beyond the poor singing of the Augustana Choir.

Victor also offers Dvorak's Symphony No. 1 (actually his sixth) which, despite occasional engaging themes and passages, and despite what Tovey finds to say for it as a program annotator, is one of Dvorak's less interesting works. The performance by Talich with the old Czech Philharmonic is excellent and agreeably recorded (Set 874, $5.50). My copy has a couple of sides with noisily defective surfaces, and one with wavering pitch.

If you like native Brazilian music

you will find it well performed and recorded in two Columbia sets (C-83 and 84, each $2.63).

President Roosevelt's December war message is well reproduced on a Columbia single (36516, $.53), and Churchill's December 26 address to Congress in an album (C-85, $2.63).

Repression vs. Propaganda

Dear Sirs: Miss Kirchwey is taking on a pretty sizable order in urging the wholesale suppression of the "fascist press." On the basis of her argument it would require the government to deny the use of the mails, the express companies, and hand-to-hand distribution—with criminal prosecutions to insure results—to all publications found to be pro-Axis, anti-British, anti-democratic, anti-Semitic, or playing up the evils of our democracy in a way to give aid and comfort to our enemies.

Aside from the obvious obstacle of the Bill of Rights, the proposal is as impracticable and dangerous as it is fantastic coming from The Nation. It is impracticable because it would apply to a vast and vague range of opinions among which it is impossible to draw the distinctions which appear to Miss Kirchwey so easy. She would include the "more dangerous" influences of Hearst, Colonel McCormick, and the Pattersons, and heaven knows how many more. Such great enterprises cannot be suppressed. If a few of the weaker were suppressed, they would only be driven underground into a secret conspiracy harder to deal with. The proposal is dangerous because the machinery of suppression once set in motion would rebound ultimately against the liberal and labor press.

The only democratic way, and the only sure way in the long run, to beat the enemies of democracy is by our united strength and determination. We are not yet armed with the enthusiasm and power that should be ours because our goals are not clear and our ranks are therefore divided. Our chief enemies are to be found not in the "fascist press" but in the ranks of those who put their privileges above patriotism and their class above their country; those who would rather make peace with the Axis than win the war with Roosevelt, who would rather fight "communism" (in which category they would include The Nation) than Hitler and Japan. Certainly the "fascist press" includes some of them, but the most powerful and most numerous don't advertise. They just fight labor, the "reds," and the New Deal.

We cannot suppress them, but united democratic forces can resist and overwhelm them. Counter-propaganda is our best weapon. The Nation should be the last to betray a loss of faith in democratic power by proposing to beat the Axis with Axis methods.

ROGER BALDWIN

New York, March 25

[How can our old friend Roger Baldwin talk such nonsense? Doesn't he really know an out-and-out fascist paper when he sees one? Freda Kirchwey did not advocate suppression of "all publications found to be pro-Axis, anti-British, etc." She specifically pointed to the publications of "native fascists like Pelley, Deatherage, and . . . Coughlin." Has Mr. Baldwin any doubts about these? The arrest of Pelley and several other fascists and supporters of Hitler gives reason to hope that the Department of Justice, from now on, is not going to find such discriminations impossible. Is the Civil Liberties Union planning to defend Pelley, Coughlin and Company? It would make us very unhappy to think that Mr. Baldwin and his associates knew so little about the realities of political warfare.

We recognize the difficulties involved in any sort of legal coercion. We also recognize the fact that this total war cannot be fought without it. The concentration camps of Europe are filled with those democrats who were afraid to infringe the "rights" of their fascist enemies lest they set a precedent for the invasion of their own rights.

As regards McCormick, Hearst, and Patterson, Mr. Baldwin completely, though no doubt unintentionally, distorts Miss Kirchwey's argument. She did not "include" their publications in the fascist press. In fact, she pointedly excluded them, describing them as "fellow-travelers" to be watched and subjected to attack—just as Mr. Baldwin urges. She said "their defeatist arguments and misleading information must be met by an unceasing barrage of counter-propaganda. . . . And the moment they skid across the thin line that divides their doctrine from open treason they should face the full blast of the law." Does Mr. Baldwin disagree with that? This quotation seems to us also to satisfy rather explicitly Mr. Baldwin's demand for counter-propaganda. We fear he did not read the editorial with the care such severe criticism would seem to require.

We cannot believe that Mr. Baldwin thinks The Nation has failed to pay sufficient attention to those other reactionary forces he lists as the "chief enemies of democracy." But if he does, we refer him confidently to pages 413 and 415 of this issue and to a large part of all past and future issues of The Nation.—EDITORS THE NATION.]

"Sun's" Friends Still Hope

Dear Sirs: Chicago friends of the Chicago Sun are grateful to The Nation for publishing Milton Mayer's attack on the Sun. If all he says is true—and we know that some of it is—this is the time to speak, in the hope that the paper may yet be remade into the altogether fine one that we had hoped for.

It is far from being a total disappointment. We are indeed grateful for the straight, untainted reporting of the national news, for many a gallant editorial, and for the stirring columns of Knickerbocker, Fodor, Grafton, Lippmann, and others. Our satisfaction in these fine features and a stubbornly persisting hope that the Sun will yet be our dream-come-true should together serve to save the paper from the sad fate of useless things long enough to give its managers their opportunity to make it a real force in Chicago.

Certainly any degree of commitment to Mayor Kelly has the opposite effect. For the Sun management to have remained editorially silent on the recent act of taking the school for crippled children out of the hands of honored experts to pay political debts puts it on the low civic level of the Tribune. For another newspaper of that kind there is no need in Chicago. May Mr. Field see the light and find the way.

Touché

Dear Sirs: Touché! It was the conversation on page 132 of Miss Boyden's satire that threw me off. By the time I had got to page 171 I was so convinced of the wickedness of her sparrows I misread the speeches. Everything is so confused in that book the reviewer got confused too. Sorry. But even with this straightened out a little, my opinion remains the same, alas.

The Shape of Things

PIERRE LAVAL IS BACK IN POWER AS A result of a German ultimatum to Vichy. Nervous about the increasing pro-United Nations sentiment in France, fearing the effects of expanding British raids or even attempts to establish bridgeheads on the French coast, Hitler has insisted on a 100 per cent pro-Nazi administration in Vichy. In this way he hopes to provide some security for his rear when he launches his spring campaign in the east. Probably also he is counting on getting the use of the French fleet, the potential menace of which has recently been multiplied by British necessities in the Indian Ocean. Laval returns to office as Deputy Premier, which in effect places him in full control of the Cabinet, as Minister of the Interior, which means control of the police and the local authorities, and as Foreign Minister. Admiral Darlan, who remains in charge of the armed forces, is hardly less of a pro-Nazi than Laval. The change at Vichy, indicating as it does complete subservience to Berlin, represents a severe diplomatic defeat for the State Department, the effects of which can only be offset by a complete reversal of its appeasement policy. We should no more maintain relations with Laval than with Quisling; Admiral Leahy should be recalled immediately, and full recognition should be given to General de Gaulle and the Free French. All economic assistance to France must be suspended. Finally, we should at once direct the most intensive propaganda toward France and appeal to the French people to resist collaboration with the enemy and to fight traitors in their own government. It is the French people and only the French people who can thwart Laval's plans for the adhesion of France to the Axis.

THE FALL OF BATAAN CAME SO SUDDENLY after weeks of gallant defense that the American people felt the loss more acutely than more serious reverses. Strategically, Bataan was not of first-rate importance. Until the Japanese take Corregidor, their other conquests on Luzon are of little value. And even Manila Bay itself is no longer vital to the Japanese now that they have Hongkong, Singapore, and the French bases in Indo-

China. From the standpoint of prestige, however, Bataan was of the utmost significance. The Japanese had boasted that they would conquer Luzon in a week. The repeated failure of their offensives not only damaged their pride, but because of that pride tied up a considerable part of the Japanese invasion forces in a relatively minor operation. No one knows how long Corregidor can hold out. Its fate is sealed by the blockade, which precludes the possibility of relief or reinforcement. But its small size provides protection against direct assault and its powerful guns present a constant threat to the attacking force. Several hundred miles to the south of Luzon, the Japanese appear to have been successful in a large-scale attack on the island of Cebu. Although this attack might come under the head of a mopping-up operation, it gives the Japanese another good harbor and increases the difficulties of an eventual American counter-offensive.

EVIDENCE THAT THE NEXT JAPANESE DRIVE will be directed against India accumulated during the past week. Prime Minister Churchill reported that the enemy has an extremely powerful fleet in the Bay of Bengal, consisting of at least three battleships, five aircraft carriers, and a number of smaller vessels. British naval forces in the Indian Ocean have been strongly reinforced, but they will be severely handicapped by the loss of the aircraft carrier Hermes and the 10,000-ton cruisers Dorsetshire and Cornwall as a result of Japanese air attacks. On the Burma front, only a few hundred miles from the Indian frontier, the Japanese continued to make steady progress toward the oil fields. In this campaign the enemy has maintained virtual domination of the air despite the arrival of new planes from Britain and the United States. The one hope that the tide may soon turn is provided by the reappearance of the Flying Tigers of the American Volunteer Group, with new equipment. Protected by these American fliers the Chinese have been able to offer more stubborn resistance than the nearby British troops operating virtually without air support.

THE VICTORY PROGRAM OF THE AUTOMOBILE Workers (C. I. O.) is a remarkable and worthy answer to the recent anti-labor campaign in Congress and the press. Recognizing the necessity for sacrifices in an all-out war effort, the U. A. W. agrees to suspend all demands for extra pay for work on Saturdays, Sundays, or holidays, reaffirms its pledge to refrain from strikes, and commits its members to an effort to increase production to the utmost. The union agrees to go even farther than this and to accept all wages for time over forty hours a week in non-negotiable defense bonds if the government will adopt a comprehensive program for assuring an "equality of sacrifice" in the war effort. Specifically, the U. A. W. urges a 3 per cent ceiling on corporation profits, a $25,000 ceiling on individual incomes, over-all price-fixing, rationing of necessities, the adjustment of wages to meet increases in living costs, a "living wage" for the dependents of the men in the armed forces, and labor representation in war and post-war planning. Although there are certain items on the list, such as the ceiling on war profits and over-all price-fixing, which are open to criticism on practical grounds, the program as a whole is well worth Congressional attention.

OVERTIME PAY, WE ARE TOLD BY THE MANY voices of organized capitalism, is a brake on production and an unwarranted burden on the taxpayer; demands for increased wages are a selfish attempt to cash in on the national emergency. If these things are true, what are we to say about the really fancy increases in salaries which many corporation executives have been voting themselves? Publicity has recently been given in Senate hearings to this matter, but some of the most flagrant cases have not hitherto been brought into the light. We are indebted, therefore, to an article in Your Investments, organ of the American Investors' Union, for the following samples:

		Total Remuneration
		1940	1941
Aviation Corporation	Victor Emanuel	$25,000	$79,150
Bethlehem Steel	Eugene G. Grace*	298,144	357,724
Burlington Mills	J. Spencer Love	91,939	179,652
General Electric	C. E. Wilson	135,000	175,000
Newport News Shipbuilding and Dry Dock	H. L. Ferguson	70,400	127,080
Nash Kelvinator	G. W. Mason	126,092	225,731
Republic Steel	T. M. Girdler	176,000	275,000
Sperry Corporation	T. H. Morgan	147,243	181,480
Timken Detroit Axle	W. F. Rockwell	24,300	77,250

* Special remuneration only, exclusive of salary.

All these companies are holders of large government contracts, and the increased salaries they pay help to swell costs for the taxpayer. No doubt these executives are working long hours, but their "overtime" rates seem somewhat more excessive than the time and a half paid to a dollar-an-hour mechanic.

ARTHUR KROCK AND THE EDITORIAL PAGE of the New York Times have been whipping up a typical Times frenzy—intense but dignified—against the War Labor Board's decision in the Walker-Turner case. That decision, it seems to us, was a pretty successful attempt at a decent compromise. The employer, in the words of the board, had refused "to take the slightest step toward more cooperative relations" with his employees. Since the union, the United Electrical, Radio, and Machine Workers, had, like other unions, given up for the duration its only real weapon, the right to strike, it had been unable to enforce its demands, and the union itself had begun to disintegrate. The board awarded the employees an 8 per cent increase in the hourly wage and prescribed a grievance committee. However, the important clauses in the decision are those which provide (1) that employees who were in good standing in the union on November 27, 1941, as well as those who have become members since then shall remain in good standing for the period of the contract, and (2) that "the union shall not coerce any employee to join a union and any employee who claims he has been coerced shall have the right to impartial trial by an umpire." Needless to say, it is the first of these that has raised the temperature of Krock and Company. The union's demand for maintenance of membership, which is voluntary to begin with, does not seem to us an excessive price to ask in return for a pledge not to strike. Even from the employer's point of view it is desirable, since it operates against excessive labor turnover. But the unctuous Mr. Krock sees in it a threat to the Bill of Rights. The closed shop is not involved, but the Times headed its editorial Toward a Closed Shop. We suspect that what really worries Mr. Krock and the Times is the possibility that the big boys as well as little ones like Walker-Turner may be forced to grant maintenance of membership.

THE CONGRESSIONAL RECORD HAS ITS moments. We should like to quote, for instance, from a speech by Representative Nichols of Oklahoma:

> Camp Gruber, in my Congressional district, is being constructed. As most of you know, we have in Oklahoma a power project in operation known as the Grand River Dam Authority, which project was built by the state of Oklahoma and recently taken over and put under the control of the federal government. Bids were asked a few days ago for the power that will supply the lights for this camp. The Grand River Dam Authority offered to supply the power to the camp at 5 mills per kilowatt-hour. The Oklahoma Gas and Electric Company, a private public utility, bid 10.8 mills per kilowatt-hour to furnish the same power. It is going to be necessary to construct approximately eleven miles of line no matter which one of the bidders gets the contract. The Corps of Engineers awarded the contract to the Oklahoma Gas and Electric Company.

Mr. Nichols reported that he had done some telephoning to people in Oklahoma and in Washington as well. All he got was confirmation of these outrageous facts and a few additional ones. He discovered, for instance, that the private company and the Grand River Dam Authority exchange power with each other on peak loads. If the private company gets the contract, "in peak loads they will be buying power from the federal government . . . at 4 mills a kilowatt-hour and selling it back to the same government for 10.8 mills. . . ." Mr. Nichols ended his speech by saying that "there had better be forthcoming a good explanation of this thing or a country boy from Oklahoma is about to start a one-man investigation that is going to blow somebody's head off." More power to him—preferably public.

TWO BLOWS HAVE BEEN STRUCK AGAINST racial discrimination in the last week. Secretary Knox has announced that Negroes, who up to the present have served in the navy only as messmen, will hereafter be admitted to some regular units. The President's Committee on Fair Employment Practice has ordered ten manufacturers in the Middle West to stop barring Jews and Negroes from work on war contracts. Of the two actions the second is the more satisfying, for it allows no discrimination whatever and it carries the threat of government intervention if an employer fails to mend his ways. But while such a solution is workable in industry, the problem is more difficult in our caste-ridden navy. Race prejudice runs deep not only among the officers, a disproportionate number of whom are Southerners, but among the men themselves; therefore a widened range of opportunity, even though it falls far short of equality, must be considered a step forward. From now on Negroes will be enlisted in reserve components of the navy, marine corps, and coast guard. Presumably they will be used chiefly for shore duty near home bases, but at least they will be given work previously limited to whites.

What Next in India?

IT IS obvious that the plan for the future independence of India which Sir Stafford Cripps carried in vain to New Delhi was hopelessly prejudiced from the start by the fact that it was at least two years overdue. Nevertheless it did, we feel, present an opportunity which has been fumbled by the Indian leaders, who insist they must have full responsibility or none at all. For they were offered a large part in the defense of India, and in organizing resistance to Japan they would have begun to organize their own future and thus to reinsure themselves against the possibility of a later British attempt to dilute the substance of freedom.

The negotiations which Cripps engaged in so pertinaciously and with such evident good faith have revealed to the world how great are the internal obstacles to Indian independence. That it is not just a matter of Britain's surrendering its sovereignty is implicit in the statement of the working committee of the All-India Congress rejecting the Cripps plan. On the one hand the committee objected to the principle of non-accession, which would have permitted unsatisfied minorities to remain outside the proposed federal union; on the other, it admitted that

BURLINGAME PUBLIC LIBRARY Burlingame, Calif.

Congress "cannot think in terms of compelling the peoples of any territorial unit to remain in an Indian Union against their declared and established will." There is no suggestion, however, of the means by which the dilemma can be solved, of how the minorities are to be satisfied that by consenting to join in the business of constitution-building they are not binding themselves to majority decisions. As Cripps pointed out in recommending his plan, it is much easier to persuade a suspicious negotiator to sit down and talk if you leave him a door for escape.

But if Congress was vague on the minority problem, the Moslem League was downright intransigent. Its major objection to the Cripps plan was that it did not provide explicitly for a separate Moslem India. Dissatisfied with the proposal which would ultimately leave the question of a province's adhesion to the union to a vote of the adult male population, it declared that in provinces where the Moslems are in a majority the decision must be left to them alone. That is to say, the fate of Bengal, where there is a bare Moslem majority, might be settled by the votes of less than 30 per cent of the population. It seems clear that Mr. Jinnah's statement was drawn up with the knowledge that the Congress Party would reject the Cripps plan and that hence the Moslem League could lose nothing by reiterating its full demands.

But at this stage, with Japan raiding the Indian coast, recriminations and attempts to fix the blame are to be avoided. The urgent task is the defense of India, and that is as much the concern of the United Nations as a whole as of India and Britain. Despite his obvious disappointment, Sir Stafford Cripps stressed the fact that the failure of the negotiations had left no feelings of rancor between him and the Indian leaders. Nor did he believe that their discussions had been fruitless. "They will leave their impress," he said, "a good, clear, healthy impress which will influence the future." Congress, too, has shown a desire not to slam any doors. In a letter to Cripps, Maulana Azad, its president, declared: "We are agreeable to postponing the entire issue so that the largest possible measure of unity may be achieved in the present crisis for India's defense."

The impression of good-will made by this statement was fortified by Jawaharlal Nehru's promise that "we are not going to embarrass Britain's war efforts in India, or those of our American friends who may come here." Nehru went on to make clear his rejection of the suggestion that only passive resistance should be made to Japanese aggression and to disavow in the strongest terms the idea that Japan could or would "liberate" India. Those who were led by bitterness against Britain to voice Japanese views were, he said, expressing "slave's sentiments."

In the light of such statements it is difficult to believe that some basis of cooperation between the nationalists and the British government for the defense of India cannot be found. Is the Churchill Cabinet big enough to swallow its chagrin at the rejection of its proposals and make a new gesture to Indian aspirations? It could declare that, although its plan has been withdrawn, it stands by the central feature—the promise of independence after the war. It could, as the London Times has suggested, abolish the India Office—that symbol of imperialist bureaucracy—and turn over the handling of Indian affairs in London to the Dominions Office. It could finally offer Nehru and other Indian leaders an opportunity to assist in the defense of India, for instance, by asking them to organize Home Defense and a Home Guard. If such an offer were made, after the other suggested steps had been taken, we feel sure it would not be refused.

I. G. Farben and Jesse Jones

THE time has come for some Congressional body to make a thorough investigation of the contracts negotiated by Jesse Jones and his Defense Plants Corporation. Past revelations by the Truman committee have shown scandalously one-sided contracts in aluminum and steel, and our Washington letter this week shows the extent to which Jones is collaborating with the oil and chemical interests in his synthetic-rubber program. To these complaints are now added serious charges on the floor of the House and Senate about his magnesium contract. A subcommittee of the Truman committee recently called the DPC contract with Basic Magnesium, Inc., "one of the most flagrant attempts at war profiteering to come to our attention."

Worse than the profiteering, if true, is the fact that this contract rewards an enemy of this country. Production of magnesium in the United States has been stifled and an artificially high price maintained through cartel and patent agreements between the German I. G. Farben Industrie and the Aluminum Company of America. These two concerns owned jointly the Magnesium Development Corporation, a patent-holding company which licensed only the Dow Chemical Company.

Production of magnesium in this country at present is largely in the hands of Dow and Basic Magnesium, Inc. The latter, as pointed out by Congressman Anderson of New Mexico, is controlled by a British company, Magnesium Electron Limited. Magnesium Electron was half-owned by I. G. Farben under a restrictive patent cartel agreement similar to the American agreement. The British and American Alien Property Custodians have taken over I. G.'s interest in these companies, but the German share of the profits may go back to I. G. after the war is over.

Whether I. G. Farben gets its share of the profits or not, war production of this vital light metal will be in the hands of companies which connived with the Germans before the war to restrict American and British production. "Does it not seem unfortunate," Congressman Leavy of Washington asked, "that this great nation in its hour of peril must depend upon a group whose misconduct will have been officially established in connection with strangling production by contract agreement with our enemies?"

Senator Bunker of Nevada sees "sinister" influences at work in the favor shown these two I. G. Farben partners by the Defense Plants Corporation. We should like to know what part these influences have been playing in thwarting development of alternative methods for obtaining magnesium, such as the ferro-silicon process. It is time the whole story of the DPC's contracts were brought into the light.

Taxes and Prices

CONGRESSIONAL complacency received a rude shock last week when Leon Henderson, federal price administrator, announced that the pending $7,600,000,000 tax bill would absorb only about one-half of the "inflationary gap" between purchasing power and available consumers' goods. For weeks the House Ways and Means Committee had been dilly-dallying over the Administration's tax bill. Its protracted hearings had served only to crystallize opposition from interested groups to each of the Treasury's specific proposals. Alarmed at the possible political repercussions of raising taxes in an election year, some Congressmen had begun to talk of scaling down the Administration's program and relying to a greater extent on borrowing to defray the costs of the war. The National Association of Manufacturers and other representatives of big business have taken advantage of the delay in Congress to push an extremely vigorous and apparently well-financed campaign for a sales tax to replace the Treasury's proposed levies on business profits. This campaign has undoubtedly made headway despite strong opposition from the Administration.

In stressing the need for immediate and even stiffer increases in taxes than were called for in the original Treasury proposals, Mr. Henderson has served notice on Congress that it is time to stop playing politics and consider the well-being of the country. There can be no question of the need for this sharp reminder. With the drastic curtailment in the production of consumers' goods and the tremendous increase in government expenditures for arms, purchasing power is bound to outdistance the supply of goods unless the surplus is drained off in one way or another. As Mr. Henderson has repeatedly pointed out, no system of price control can possibly succeed in the face of such an accumulation of unused purchasing power. An over-all price ceiling, such as is advocated in some circles as a substitute for the present system of selective ceilings, could not hold against the rising pressure. Lacking flexibility, the over-all type of control would be more likely to give way completely than the present piecemeal system. However, it is possible that the Administration will impose a rigid ceiling on prices and rents as part of a desperate effort to check the inflationary rise in living costs.

Sales of war bonds serve a useful purpose because they drain off some of the surplus purchasing power. But although bond sales have been consistently high since Pearl Harbor, no one would pretend that they are high enough to relieve the inflationary pressure materially. Only a huge tax bill can do that, and its effectiveness will depend to a large extent on who is to bear the burden. The tax bill must be adapted so as to drain excess purchasing power where it is most likely to spill over. It is at this point that the conventional arguments for the sales tax fall down most completely. Its proponents are quick to insist that it is anti-inflationary because it mops up purchasing power from the entire population rather than from any one sector of it. This, of course, is perfectly true. But all the studies that have been made of income distribution show that some two-thirds of the population are living so close to a subsistence level that every cent of their earnings is spent for the necessities and minor comforts of life. Taxes levied on this group are almost certain to be taken out of their expenditures for food, health, and necessary clothing—all of which are important for maintaining efficiency and morale in war time. Practically all the savings of the country—all the surplus purchasing power—are in the hands of the upper 20 per cent of the income group, which is, by and large, the income-tax-paying group. It follows, then, that increases in the levies on personal incomes and corporation profits, such as have been advocated by the Treasury, are admirably adapted for absorbing the surpluses in purchasing power. For it is these upper income groups which are most likely either to save their money or to spend it for needless luxuries.

All this is very elementary economics. But it involves concepts which apparently are quite foreign to Congressional thinking. Congress appears to understand only one thing, particularly in an election year, and that is votes. Fortunately, the type of tax bill which is best for the country as a whole in this crisis is one which should alienate the fewest votes. Mr. Roosevelt learned years ago that while the National Association of Manufacturers and its allies make the loudest noise in off-election years, their power at the polls is very small. We can only hope that a majority in Congress are astute enough to grasp this bit of political wisdom.

Questions for Martin Dies

BY FREDA KIRCHWEY

AT THE end of this week a hearing will be held by the Committee on Accounts of the House of Representatives to decide on an appropriation for the work of the Dies committee during the coming year. This is a major responsibility. For Mr. Dies, always a nuisance, is today a menace. He is an ally, valuable and much praised, of the entire anti-Administration, pro-appeasement clique, in Congress and out. His admirers range from isolationist Congressmen to Nazi Bundists. He is not only a tool to be used against every progressive element in the government; he also serves as a mouthpiece for the variegated Quislings in the country. Mr. Dies may be stupid, as his best friends aver, but he is a genius at capturing headlines.

So today Representative Cochran of Missouri, chairman of the Committee on Accounts, has a unique opportunity to serve his country. By curtailing its funds he can end the Dies Inquisition and return the Grand High Inquisitor to more modest Congressional duties.

Will he dare? Dies has somehow built up the myth that to refuse his committee an appropriation is equivalent to treason and betrays at least a tenderness for communism. But just in case the committee decides to give Mr. Dies's record a real overhauling, I have set down fifteen questions which I hope its members will put to him. With the country at war against the fascist forces of the world we may as well find out what the head of a Congressional Committee on Un-American Activities has done and thought about fascism in America.

Here are the questions for Mr. Dies:

1. When, Mr. Dies, do you plan to investigate the activities of Father Coughlin, and how does it happen that you haven't done so already?

2. Why have you never investigated the Ku Klux Klan?

3. Why was the testimony before your committee of Gerald Winrod, Kansas fascist, called off shortly after it began and the investigation of his activities terminated?

4. More than two years ago Girolamo Valenti, editor of La Parola, laid before one of your agents a mass of material on Italian fascists in America, showing their penetration into the school system, their semi-military activities, all their propaganda tricks. You canceled the hearing at which Valenti had been scheduled to testify. Why did you suppress this evidence, Mr. Dies?

5. Why have you never investigated fascist "front" organizations such as the American Coalition of Patriotic Societies, which shelters a collection of anti-Semitic, anti-democratic groups, or the American Union for Nationalist Spain? When you publicly commended the American Coalition in 1940, did you know it was affiliated with the Nazi-controlled International Anti-Communist Entente in Switzerland? If not, why not?

6. Allen Zoll, Coughlinite and anti-Semite, was leader of the picket line at Station WMCA when Father Coughlin was banned from the air. His fascist connections were mentioned at a hearing. Why did you never investigate his activities? Was it because a member of your committee, J. Parnell Thomas of New Jersey, was a speaker at one of a series of luncheons arranged by Zoll? (The speaker at Zoll's next luncheon was Joe McWilliams, New York fascist rowdy, later arrested for anti-Semitic provocation. You didn't investigate him either.)

7. Why did you make public appearances with Father Edward Lodge Curran, Christian Front agitator, after he had been revealed to your committee as a member of General Van Horn Moseley's prospective fascist government? And why did you give further evidence of your approval by allowing yourself to be photographed with your arm around Curran?

8. On November 29, 1939, at Madison Square Garden before a crowd of Christian Fronters, Coughlinites, and pro-fascists, you said that "the Communist influence imported to Spain from enslaved Russia doomed the Republic of Spain. . . ." It is a historical fact, accepted by all, including the Italians and Germans, that the Spanish Republic was defeated by fascist arms. Why did you try to whitewash the Nazis and Fascists? Was it to please the chairman of this meeting in your honor, Merwin K. Hart, one of our leading pro-Franco propagandists?

9. Why did you not investigate the activities of John Eoghan Kelly, major in the United States army reserve and paid agent for Franco, who was accused before your committee of working with native fascist groups? Was it because of Kelly's close friendship with Hart?

10. Why did you challenge the assertion of a witness before your committee that Franco was a fascist?

11. Why did you go to Hollywood in 1941 and try to persuade the motion-picture companies to quit making anti-Nazi films?

12. Why do you think the Berlin Nazi organ Contra-Komintern published in full the testimony before your committee of J. B. Matthews, the turncoat who afterward became your chief investigator?

13. In your dislike of all Communist tools, past or present, how do you manage to overlook the record of Mr. Matthews, who as first chairman of the League Against War and Fascism was as close as any other fellow-traveler to the Communist high command?

14. Why do you think such American Nazi and fascist organs as the Deutscher Weckruf, Coughlin's Social Justice, Gerald Winrod's Defender, the Ku Klux Klan's Fiery Cross have gone out of their way to commend you?

15. Were the articles signed by you in Liberty magazine in the winter of 1940 written by George Sylvester Viereck?

The Truth About Rubber

BY I. F. STONE

Washington, April 12

IT WOULD be unwise to assume that our rubber troubles are over. They have just begun. In the excitement over the Standard Oil–I. G. Farben revelations, certain factors have been overlooked or remain unknown. I should like to mention a few of them.

1. The consent decree which ended the Standard–I. G. Farben anti-trust case was the result of an ultimatum. Curiously enough, and this indicates the real balance of forces, it was an ultimatum from Standard Oil to Thurman Arnold, not one from Thurman Arnold to Standard Oil, which brought the case to an end. Through the War Department, Standard Oil brought strong pressure on the Department of Justice to induce it to forget about the case. Attorney General Biddle supported Arnold, but the pressure was so strong that Arnold had to make it clear that he would resign and tell the whole story to the Truman committee if he were forced to drop the suit.

Standard Oil knew that Thurman Arnold had evidence on which some of its officers might go to jail if they had to face a jury under war-time conditions. The company was adamant, however, on several points. It would not accept a decree which made its future relations with I. G. Farben subject to the veto of the Attorney General. It would not permit an agent of the Department of Justice to go into its laboratories and make sure that the "know-how" on its rubber and toluol patents was made fully available to other companies. And it did not want to pay a large fine. Although the maximum fine under the anti-trust laws is $5,000, Standard Oil could have been forced to pay from $2,000,000 to $3,000,000 in fines. Each officer and each director of the company and the subsidiaries involved might have been fined the maximum amount on each of many different counts.

John W. Davis handled the behind-the-scenes negotiations for Standard Oil, and his final "take-it-or-leave-it" offer was $50,000 in fines and the consent decree as it now stands, without government supervision over future cartel arrangements or Standard's laboratories. The company preferred to go to court rather than pay more than $50,000 or submit to those two conditions. In court it could have dragged proceedings out for many months, if not years, and during this period vital patents for synthetic rubber, explosives, and other war materials could have been kept from the government. Arnold's decision was influenced by anxiety to avoid just this situation.

2. In the matter of rubber, the consent decree does little more than give the government the privilege of investing its money in the production of the synthetic product. No business man, unless assured in advance of Standard Oil's approval, is going to risk his own money in this business despite the patents offered "free" for the duration of the war.

This needs to be understood. The consent decree makes the patents available, but the patents themselves, as was explained in the Truman committee hearings, are kept purposely obscure. One needs the "know-how" to use them. The transfer of "know-how" is not a simple process. There can be a mumbled explanation or full and patient instruction in the use of the patent. For the latter, one is dependent on the good-will and good faith of Standard Oil. Both are dubious.

Standard Oil is allowed to charge the "cost" of the know-how, and this again is likely to be a source of controversy. In the case of butyl, the best rubber patent it has, Standard can charge not only the cost of the know-how but a "reasonable compensation" therefor. In case of dispute over failure to deliver know-how, alleged overcharge of cost, or an unreasonable demand for compensation, one can—write a letter to the Department of Justice and wait for the courts to decide.

If a capitalist is intrepid enough to brave these risks—and the average capitalist sees Standard Oil through no such rosy spectacles as the average newspaper editor—he faces two others. The first is that he is embarking in a new business on the basis of patents for which he must pay "reasonable royalties" as soon as the war is over, and "reasonable royalties" may mean long litigation with Standard Oil. In the field of patent law the ordeal by litigation is about as likely to be productive of justice to small business men dealing with financial giants as was the ordeal by drowning to old ladies suspected of witchcraft. It is cheaper and safer to join up with the trust and take its orders.

Another factor will also give the entrepreneur pause. The report of the chemical division of the old National Defense Commission to Stettinius, made public for the the first time by Jesse Jones at the Truman committee hearings, contains some very illuminating observations. Of the synthetic-rubber problem the report says: "If the plants are to be designed by the companies but built at government expense, the tendency will inevitably be to design on a more expensive basis in order to make entirely sure that the plants operate satisfactorily instead of taking reasonable engineering risks and adopting new and promising alternatives which may not have been 100 per cent demonstrated. The effect of this in the direction of raising estimated costs is apparent." Plants built on this luxury scale discourage private capital from entering the field. "One large company," the report pointed out, "has already indicated that it would be willing to put substantial private capital into building larger plants if it was reasonably sure that it would not have to meet the excessive competition from government-financed plants." We may rest assured that no little business men will rush in to ask for "free" patents under the circumstances.

3. If the RFC were not in the hands of a Jesse Jones, government financing would not bar independents from the making of synthetic rubber. But of the twenty-five companies picked by Jones to produce 650,000 tons of the new 700,000-ton rubber program, all belong to the inner circle of the Rockefeller-du Pont-Mellon oil and chemical ring, and include some of the most notorious American industrial collaborators with Nazi cartels. Jones promises to let smaller companies make the remaining 50,000 tons. We shall see which companies he picks.

4. Last January 5 the Supreme Court in a unanimous decision by Chief Justice Stone in the Morton Salt case seemed to push our patent law back toward the days when a patent was regarded not as an absolute property right but as a franchise which could be lost through abuse. It gave new meaning to the principle that the courts might refuse to enforce a patent right when it was being used "contrary to the public interest." Standard Oil gave as much as it did in the consent decree because it feared this decision. The consent decree, however, leaves title to these patents in Standard Oil's hands, and it does not end the cartel, though it may drive some of its operations farther underground. So long as Standard owns the patents and can look forward to resumption of relations with I. G. Farben, it has a stake in so controlling use of these patents during the war as to lay the basis for a profitable monopoly afterward. The first requirement is to keep the exploitation of the patents in the hands of companies allied with Standard Oil. This Jesse Jones is doing. The second requirement is to keep the most valuable patent of all in the background.

5. Under the 700,000-ton program as now planned by Jones, du Pont will make 50,000 tons of neoprene, a high-cost specialty synthetic rubber, Standard will make 60,000 tons of butyl, and the other big companies will make 540,000 tons of Buna-S. To make Buna-S, one must first manufacture butadiene from a gas by-product, butane. Badly needed critical metals must go into the making of the butadiene plants. The Germans themselves haven't learned how to make tires wholly of Buna-S, and its cost will run from 25 to 30 cents a pound.

6. Our best bet is not Buna-S but butyl. It will cost from 6½ to 7 cents a pound, but its cheapness is the least of its recommendations. Its real virtue is that it can be made directly from a common gas-refinery by-product, isobutylene, saving the time and the materials which must go into butadiene plants to produce Buna-S. Standard won't admit it yet publicly, but it has already made all-butyl tires which can run 10,000 miles at fifty-five miles an hour. If it can develop butyl quietly, "on the side," as it were, it can take out patents on the improvements, it can undersell Buna-S when the war is over, and it can control a synthetic rubber which can compete in price, perhaps also in quality, with natural rubber. This may slow up the war effort, but it will help Standard Oil.

7. Progressives should fight immediately for the bill introduced in Congress by Senator Murray of Montana and Representative Beiter of New York for government ownership and operation of 400,000 tons of synthetic-rubber production. The Buna-S program may prove a colossal and costly failure, and it would be better to cut down Buna-S, increase butyl production, and intensify research into it under government auspices. The Petroleum War Industry Council, a private body dominated by Standard Oil and the other major oil companies, is trying to head off the bill by a committee "to study the problem of butyl rubber." The membership of this committee is made up of leading members of the big companies, with a sprinkling of little fellows known to be under their thumb.

8. The Nazis developed Buna by pouring government funds into compulsory research. We must do the same. Private research is totally inadequate. Here is the testimony by Howard of Standard Oil about its research expenditures on butyl: "In 1937 we had four men on the job and we spent $20,000. In 1938 we had ten men on the job and we spent $48,300. In 1939 we had twenty-one men on the job and we spent $106,400. In 1940 we had forty-eight men on the job and we spent $322,000. In 1941 we had seventy-three men on the job and we spent $505,000." Five million dollars spent this year on research into butyl might solve our rubber problem.

9. If we are to free private enterprise in this field as in others we must have compulsory licensing of patents in peace time and full power to seize patents in war. The patent is the instrument with which international cartels have used the courts to prevent the democracies from using their own resources and their own brains in the national interest. The patent hearings which begin tomorrow before the Bone committee are of the utmost importance for the ending of the cartel cancer and the winning of the war.

Can India Defend Itself?

BY DONALD W. MITCHELL

WITH the liquidation of American resistance on the Bataan Peninsula, Japan successfully completed the most difficult and costly of the mopping-up operations following its original conquests. The surrender of General Wainwright's forces should have occasioned neither surprise nor especial gloom among Americans. Surrounded by vastly superior forces, receiving no naval or air aid, without any but the most intermittent supplies, the American position in the Philippines was long privately admitted to be hopeless. After the rapid Japanese gains elsewhere destroyed all chance of rescue, only the amount of loss caused the enemy, not the length of time the defenders could hold out, remained of any tactical importance.

Largely owing to misleading press reports Americans have recently been building false hopes regarding possible campaigns from Australia. We are committed to the defense of Australia by every consideration of kinship, sympathy, and common ideals; further, we should prove able to defend at least its more valuable areas successfully. But success here will be at best a negative achievement, for despite carefully calculated propaganda to the contrary, northern Australia does not—and cannot for long months or probably years—afford adequate bases for anything more effective than commando raids or air attacks.

Japan's principal drive is directed against India, which offers greater economic and strategic rewards. Here is the closest and most adequate source of iron, of which Japan has an insufficient supply. And here success for Japan, either acting alone or in coordination with a German push to the Middle East, would do much to make the position of the Axis virtually unassailable. This campaign, however, must achieve quick results if it is not to encounter the severe weather hazard of the approaching monsoons.

India is by no means defenseless. The recent focusing of attention upon disputes regarding its future status has given the impression that the cooperation of all classes of its people is a prerequisite to defense. Such unity is valuable, but it is far from the most important military factor. Despite the non-cooperation policy which the All-India Congress pursued until the end of 1941, there has never been any difficulty in recruiting for the Indian army all the volunteers, and more, that it has been possible to equip.

Traditionally India's strongest defenses have been geographical. The Baluchistan deserts to the west, the Himalayas to the north, dense jungles and rugged terrain to the east offer serious though not impassable obstacles to a large-scale invasion. In southern India the continuous rugged chain of the Eastern and Western Ghats, standing slightly back of the coastal plains, bars any easy penetration into the interior. Other ranges lie between southern India and the Ganges Valley. Land communications between Burma and India are especially inadequate and tortuous. The very vastness of the country, coupled with the geographical obstacles and the enormous native population divided into widely differing groups, makes the complete conquest of India a task comparable to the conquest of China or Russia.

India, in fact, given native opposition to the enemy, should be somewhat easier to defend, for a very fair network of interior railroads enables a defending power to operate on shorter lines of communication and to concentrate troops in any sector with comparative rapidity. This should be an especially great advantage against Japanese forces operating at the end of increasingly long transport lines.

The military forces now stationed in India are reported to be large. On December 7 the Indian army was in process of being expanded from a million to a million and a half troops. Though not to be compared with an army such as the German, these troops are fairly well equipped and where they have been used in the present war, as in Ethiopia, have proved of good fighting quality. A weakness exists in the fact that the technical and highly skilled personnel is only 20 per cent native and hence is not easy to replace.

From the economic angle also India has certain points of strength. With a population of 389,000,000 its supply of man-power is a factor to be considered. It is self-sufficient in food and in most of the key metals, though the British policy of keeping it as a supplier of raw materials has not conduced to a healthy or sufficient development. In spite of the neglect of its vast iron and coal reserves, its steel production of 1,250,000 tons, 90 per cent earmarked for military use, is more than 20 per cent of Japan's pre-war manufacture of steel.

Unfortunately, the country has enough weak spots to be definitely vulnerable to attack. Save possibly in Ceylon there are no coast defenses worthy of the name, or were none until recently. The great ports of Bombay and Madras are 100 per cent exposed to naval bombardment; Calcutta is only less so. With the liquidation of Allied sea power in the Far East Japan has gained at least a temporary dominance in these waters. And naval supremacy implies ability to interrupt seriously or to stop the transport of vital supplies. For India remains dependent upon Great Britain and the United States for replenishment of machine tools, aircraft and tank engines, certain high-test grades of steel, and so on. Automotive and plane assembly plants are located in the interior but are of small capacity. The necessity of supplying these war needs places an immense burden upon the already overstrained transport lines of the United Nations.

Facing the enormous area of India, the Japanese are likely to strike at strategic points without making any attempt to digest all of the country until a later date. The most valuable region economically, because of the location of the Tata iron and steel works, is the Ganges Valley, especially the neighborhood of Calcutta. From bases in western Burma aerial harassment of some of this region is possible, but any effective occupation would probably require a major naval expedition since the mule trails leading from Burma to India would be insufficient for large bodies of even the light-traveling Japanese. Once Calcutta had been seized, a campaign up the Ganges Valley would offer a minimum of natural obstacles and the greatest gains. Ceylon, because of its strategic position at the crossroads of the Indian Ocean, is certain to be attacked in force, especially since the cocky Japanese suffered heavy casualties in their first aerial attacks, made with insufficient forces. If the Allies are able to hold Ceylon, effective Japanese penetration into the western Indian Ocean to interrupt convoys to the Near East will not be easy.

In the defense of India the United States, which has more vital interests elsewhere, cannot play the leading part. But we can and should so increase naval pressure in the Pacific that Japan will run enormous risks in transferring major units to the Indian Ocean. Such measures can afford important but probably not decisive aid. It may be poetically just but it is certainly not comforting that the main defense of India must rest with the power to whose mistaken policies are due both India's economic incapacity to fight and its lack of will to do so.

Russia Behind the Lines

BY ALEXANDER WERTH

THE German invasion of Russia stirred me perhaps more deeply than any other event since the war began. June 22! Exactly a year had passed since the evening when I landed at Falmouth on board the Madura, at the end of that melancholy voyage from Bordeaux. Since then I had lived through the Battle of Britain and through the grim nights but exhilarating days of the London blitz; but when we learned on June 22 that Russia had been invaded, it was clear that, for a time, at least, the center of the world war had shifted to the east. It also became apparent, almost at once, that there was going to be no walk-over for the Germans. Obviously, a successful, long, and extensive Russian resistance would enormously increase our chances to win the war quickly, and from what one heard, the mood of the Russian people for such a resistance was admirable.

I felt I had to go to Russia. I had spent my childhood and boyhood years in St. Petersburg; the Russian half of me was clamoring to "go home"—after twenty-four years. I had always kept up my Russian, especially during my years in Paris; I had continued to read Russian books and papers, and had followed as closely as possible the political events of the Soviet Union and whatever was new in Russian thought and literature. Not always with approval, but always with interest. To see Russia again—and in its hour of supreme national trial; how could such a chance be missed?

Moscow, Sunday, July 6, 1941

Funny things are happening about religion in Russia. Most of the churches I passed yesterday seemed to be used as warehouses, and there are no signs of much Sunday churchgoing. . . . But in the office yesterday I looked at the latest copy of the Bezbozhnik, the anti-God paper, and the whole of it was devoted to indignant denunciations of the Nazi persecutions of the Protestant and Catholic churches in Germany! There were several long articles on the subject. Clearly, Stalin is working for the greatest unity among the Russian people, and anti-religious propaganda is one of the things which has completely vanished since this war began. However, the volte-face of the Bezbozhnik is just a trifle blatant.

One of the Americans told me today about his recent interview with the Metropolitan of the New Church. He looked a sly old fox but talked very eloquently and, apparently, sincerely of the Russian fatherland, of Alexander Nevsky and Russia's great national tradition, and of the general acceptance of the Soviet regime. The man has a large income from the faithful, pays heavy taxes, lives in a luxurious flat, with "Professor So-and-So" written on the name-plate, and owns several admirable Murillos, of whose value he is perhaps unaware, for

I think it's highly indicative of a better disposition on the part of the Russians that they should have published my article on the London blitz without delay, and not just in some rag but prominently in Izvestia. I talked in it a lot about the spirit of the British people during the blitz. It is something that is almost new to the Russians, for during their "appeasement" period they paid us very few compliments in their press. Nor did the Russians fully realize the difference between Chamberlain's England and Churchill's England. The fact that I am allowed to explain all this in Izvestia is a very healthy sign. Cripps is much pleased about it.

People tell me that on June 22 many of the Russians believed that we had given leave to the Germans to attack Russia. This was absurd, and could only have arisen from a complete ignorance of Churchill England.

And yet, if they still distrust some of our people—which is quite different from distrusting the whole of England—one can hardly blame them.

Monday, July 28

What is it, I often wonder, that makes the Russians fight like this? They are defending something—their country, their regime, which, whatever one may say, are part of the same thing. There is no longer a dividing line between "Soviet" and "Russia." Even the old people have accepted it, have become reconciled to it, especially since it has become a national regime. And though it is ruthless in some ways, even the most critically minded feel that, at least potentially, it is a good regime, with the Stalin constitution as a basis for the future. The army's resistance is, of course, strengthened and supported by iron discipline. Timoshenko has the strongest views on that subject; but anyone who makes wisecracks—and I have heard some—to the effect that this war is "run by the GPU" is just a fool. A thousand problems will, of course, arise when Russia ranks among the victors over Germany—as the chief victor, or as England's equal. Perhaps, almost certainly, some of our Tories are already getting cold feet at the prospect. They will not carry much weight, but our Labor Party will get alarmed at the idea of the Communists cashing in. Not that Harry Pollitt and Willy Gallacher, leaders of the British Communist Party, deserve the slightest credit for Russian resistance and an eventual Russian victory. They don't know much more about Stalin and the Russian people than I do about the Fiji Islands.

Much depends on whether, after the war, the Comintern will be allowed to play any part in European affairs. It has seldom done Russia's national policy any good and often a lot of harm, notably in Germany and France, and has played into the hands of fascists and reactionaries. But the Comintern is one thing and Sovietism another. The post-war competition (and the ultimate choice for Poles, Czechs, and even Germans) may be not between capitalism and communism but between two forms of democracy—capitalist democracy and Soviet democracy, with a progressive application of the Stalin constitution. The social regimes of both England and Russia are going to evolve in the course of this war; they may become very similar in many respects, with Britain becoming more "socialist," in the wide sense of the word, and Russia adopting more and more of those democratic liberties which its people would welcome and which they will expect from a full peacetime application of the Stalin constitution. Perhaps the real difficulty will be America, which may for a long time persist in being stubbornly capitalist.

Moscow is taking an increasing interest in England and in the R. A. F. There is a new poster showing an R. A. F. man and a Soviet airman shaking hands over Berlin; English grammars are sold in the bookstalls; an exhibition of English books "from Chaucer to Shaw" has been opened in the West European Library; a new newsreel about British anti-aircraft defenses is showing in the cinemas; the Moscow Art Theater is playing "The School for Scandal"; and good prices are offered for English books by the second-hand bookshops.

Somebody told me that winter clothes would be scarce this year, and since I am probably going to be here a good part of the winter I decided to go on a shopping expedition, taking Misha with me as my guide. Shops in Moscow are very unattractive-looking just now, for all the windows are either sand-bagged or boarded up with rough planks. We went first to the Stoleshnikov Lane; Misha said it had the best shop for winter clothes. . . . The attendant said that their stocks were low just now but that they might get a consignment of reindeer coats from Archangel in a week or two; he was rather indefinite about it, and I thought I had better see what they had. The few reindeer coats they still had—pretty light-brown fur with a soft silky texture—unfortunately didn't fit me, and I was left with the choice between some second-hand long, padded cloth coats with fur collars, at about £30, and a fairly short jacket (a polushubok) made of some kind of white fur with a rather doubtful astrakhan collar. I tried it on; it looked rather like Father Christmas, but it fitted. What kind of fur was this? I asked. "Dog," the assistant said, "Siberian dog." Siberian or not, it smelled like any other dog. He assured me it was "the warmest fur in existence," and a bargain at 337 rubles—which worked out at about £7.

Miliutin was an old Leningrader and loved the city. He was a typical Russian intellectual and spoke the good old Leningrad Russian, without the Moscow singsong intonation. The man was so friendly that I ventured to touch on one of two sore subjects. . . .

"You've made mistakes," I said, "but in spite of it you have built up something which is magnificent. Soviet Russia is a great country. You've achieved that. I've been away for twenty-four years, and I know in my bones that this is still Russia—in many ways a better Russia, though in some respects a Russia that is less good. I'll talk to you quite frankly. I think if you had a satirist of genius like Saltykov, you wouldn't, like the czarist regime, allow him to write all sorts of scurrilous things about you. You'd simply lock him up in a concentration camp or shoot him."

"Yes, probably we should," said Miliutin. "But you've got to remember that, for the present, we can't afford the luxury of such freedom. In time all that will change, but not now; there are too many things to build up, too many things to do; anything that undermines the collective effort, the collective enthusiasm, is bad. But remember," he continued, "we've got the Stalin constitution, out of which a democratic Soviet Russia is going to evolve. It answers the aspirations of our people. Its application would be in full swing by now but for the present war and the menace of war that has hung over this country for years. And when I say democratic Soviet Russia, I mean democratic Soviet Russia, not a strict imitation of your parliamentary bourgeois democracy."

"What is going to be the position of the party?"

"Well, the Communist Party is the apparatus of national policy which will bring into full existence that Socialist democracy, that Soviet democracy—I mean democracy without private capitalism—which is Stalin's aim. There is no dividing line any more between the party and the nation; the two are becoming more and more parts of the same thing. And in this war you have seen how our people, who are easygoing in many ways, have had their discipline and morale constantly kept up to scratch by the party."

"Yes, I entirely agree. But the Comintern?"

"Well," said Miliutin, a little evasively, "we don't really see much of the Comintern these days, do we? And have you seen the last issue of the Comintern monthly?" I said I had, and that I couldn't help chuckling at the glowing tributes it was paying to the British people and the British government. "So you see," Miliutin laughed, "there isn't much to worry about." "Well," I said, "not at the moment. But you will admit that the British Communist Party pursued a pretty absurd and anti-national policy before June 22." And I quoted a few examples. "I dare say," said Miliutin. "But, frankly, I don't think anybody in this country is in the least interested in what the British Communist Party is doing. We never even hear about it these days."

"Do you mean to say you don't care whether the ban is lifted from the Daily Worker or not?"

"What's that?"

"You know, the Communist Party paper."

"Oh, I don't know about that. But I don't think anybody worries. No, the way I look at it is that the world is going to change a lot in the course of this war; that we are going to become increasingly democratic—though there will inevitably be a few years' reconstruction after all the damage the Germans have caused; and that you too will develop a new kind of democracy, which may be quite a big departure from the present capitalist democracy. But I don't think the Communist Party or the Comintern need worry you. . . ."

Wednesday, September 10

I spent the forenoon at one of the Russian artillery schools in the Krasnaya Presnya district of Moscow, where we were taken by our friend the pince-nez colonel. They looked such fine earnest fellows, all these young cadets with their closely cropped heads, as they attended their ballistics and higher math classes, and answered questions, and worked out angles and distances in front of a miniature battlefield inside a large glass case, with a voice behind the case registering "in," "out," or "hit." Many of these cadets were clearly of proletarian origin; one didn't feel, judging from the keenness with which they were working out difficult problems, that an intellectual pedigree was of any importance. We went through the clean but very Spartan-looking dormitories, with small iron bedsteads and thin mattresses; we looked at the menu in the refectory; the menu for the four daily meals seemed very adequate, and it also showed the number of calories contained in the dishes—a daily average of 3,538 calories for cadets and of 3,200 for soldiers. This does not include the bread, which is unrestricted. Impressive display of red and black charts and maps of important battles like Ismail, Borodino, and Perekop in the library. This also had its Lenin corner. The corridors of the school were decorated with pictures of famous Russian artillery experts of the past—in czarist uniforms. There were also numerous pictures of Stalin and Timoshenko. . . .

London, December 22, Looking Back—and Forward

Russia has made more sacrifices in its fight against Hitler than any other nation. It has sacrificed not only the lives of countless soldiers; in its determination to defeat Germany it has sacrificed the lives of many civilians. The "scorched-earth" policy that Stalin proclaimed in his speech of July 3 is a ruthlessly heroic policy. It has meant not only the destruction of things like the Dnieper Dam, the fruit of ten years of concentrated labor and one of the proudest achievements of present-day Russia; it has also meant the destruction, as far as possible, of the existing crops and food reserves and fuel dumps, lest they fall into the enemy's hands. The population left behind is consequently condemned to months, possibly years, of hardship and even famine.

It was a bitter sacrifice which the Russian government found it necessary to make. No doubt hidden stores in the villages will keep most of the rural population alive until the hour of liberation, but in the German-controlled towns the situation is tragic. The Russian government, taking a long view of the war, also took the ruthless measure of preventing the Ukraine from growing food next year, and so strengthening Germany's war capacity, by removing the tractors from the Ukraine. Many a time I saw hundreds of them travel down the streets of Moscow. By reverting to primitive methods of cultivation the Ukrainian peasants may be able to grow just enough to keep themselves alive; and they will probably not be unduly disturbed by the German troops, who prefer not to depart from the well-guarded main roads of occupied Russia. But in any case, even if they had the tractors, the Germans could scarcely afford to spend any of their precious petrol on Ukrainian agriculture.

Russia's policy of sacrifices was described by the Germans as "devilish." They have to bring almost everything from their distant bases to keep their armies alive. How unlike France, where the newly arrived German tanks could refill at any village petrol pump, and where the soldiers could gorge themselves on French food! But this policy also has its terrible repercussions on the local population which has remained behind.

And what fearful sacrifices are yet in store in 1942?

Return of a Native

BY JOHN T. WHITAKER

TO WIN this war we must take the measure of ourselves as a people and the measure of our foes. How good are we? How good are they? For in this struggle, as Mussolini has said, it is "we or they." Some sentimentalists may still imagine that in modern times "nobody wins a war"; but they should know by now that the Czechs, the Poles, the French, and others have learned that you can lose a war.

Coming back to this country after ten years abroad—many of them spent in Berlin and Rome—I was struck most forcefully by the optimism and comfortable complacency of the American people. Apparently learning nothing from the fall of France or from Dunkirk, we have carried our complacency, like a priceless piece of bric-a-brac, through the bombing of Pearl Harbor, the burning of the Normandie, and the loss of Singapore and the East Indies.

Did the Japanese, the Italians, and the Germans make war on us because they thought we could beat them? Of course not. Counting most of all on our over-confidence and complacency, each of the Axis partners feels sure of ultimate victory. It was neither in the language nor in the spirit of hara-kiri that Major General Kenryo Sato, addressing a committee of the Japanese Diet, said that the fall of Gibraltar, Suez, India, and Australia was "only a matter of time." In both diplomacy and military strategy, he added, the Anglo-American camp "has been the victim of gross miscalculation, the like of which has seldom been witnessed."

Even the Italian leaders believe that America's military effort will be contemptible. Before I was expelled from Rome one of Mussolini's confident lieutenants said to me: "You Americans like your luxuries too much. You are incapable of the sacrifices and discipline required to wage a modern war. When the Axis rules America, I personally will see that you are in a concentration camp." Count Ciano, Mussolini's son-in-law and Foreign Minister, was no less explicit. When I said to him, "Time is on the side of the democracies," he shot back, "Yes, time is on your side—if there is time enough!"

German military men told me they felt sure that in this war they had too big a jump on us for us to catch up. This spring we have two million men under arms; the Germans have nine million, a proper percentage of them seasoned veterans, with more being called up regularly. The German General Staff believes, moreover, that American industry has been laggard and that Germany has been producing more arms than America and Great Britain combined. The only arms factories not operating in the occupied countries of Europe are those which fail to measure up to German standards of efficiency. France alone has supplied to Germany more than America has sent to Great Britain—according to an estimate given me by three German sources and confirmed by William L. Batt of our War Production Board. The Germans, basing their calculations upon espionage reports, see no danger from American arms production before the end of 1943.

German officers with whom I talked before Pearl Harbor believe that for the next two years America will not have the trained armored divisions or the preponderance in arms or the merchant shipping necessary to mass military superiority against the Axis on any front. In that period they think that Germany can drive through southern Russia and effect a junction with the Japanese in India—so fabulous in its resources. Aided by Italian man-power they expect to conquer Suez, Gibraltar, Morocco, and the west coast of Africa. From there they hope to gain footholds in South America that will enable them to close the Panama Canal and bomb American factories.

Behind all these dreams of conquest is the conviction —which should be insulting to Americans—that once the going becomes really rough, or if Britain is successfully invaded, America will have no stomach for war. And if America fails to capitulate, the Nazis say, Germany will be secure against attack while it outbuilds American naval power in preparation for invasion. With the resources of the Dutch Indies, India, the Middle East, and Africa, the Axis, they argue, will be vastly richer than the Anglo-Americans in raw materials, and can settle down at its leisure to the building of a huge invasion fleet, while American morale deteriorates under the necessity of sacrifices.

I have ground my teeth in futile rage many times as these plans have been patiently propounded by German and Italian Cabinet ministers, generals, and secret-police agents. I thought then, and I think now, that they were wrong in writing us off as nothing but wrangling materialists, divided by racial differences and class greed, rendered impotent by comforts. None of the German officers foresaw the selflessness and heroism American boys would show in "the foxholes of Bataan." "Americans lack the military tradition," they used to say. We've got to prove them wrong.

If German calculations and hopes fail, it will be largely because of a 100 per cent effort by the American people—by industry and labor, by the farmer and the white-collar worker. Can America pull out of its lethargy? Can the American people as a whole give up their complacency and come up fighting? Or will they be led by fifth columnists and traitors into defeatism? The German-controlled Axis is a redoubtable and resourceful foe. How good are we? How good must we be? The Germans think we have got to be a lot better than we are on our record.

Our complacency appears to be rooted in three fallacies of judgment shared from coast to coast—fallacies which bewilder an observer familiar with Berlin and Rome, London and Moscow. The American public (1) underestimates very seriously indeed the eight years' head start in militarization which enables Germany to keep the initiative; (2) blinks at the essential and fundamental weakness of Great Britain since the collapse of France; and (3) in sheer delight at German reverses in Russia exaggerates Russian successes beyond all reason. To these three major fallacies might be added the comforting notion that occupied Europe will rise almost any day now in revolt, an idea held by those who forget that the most courageous man, if denied arms and hope alike, falls silent before the chattering eloquence of the machine-gun.

In 1935 Germany was spending five times as much on arms as Great Britain and more than twice as much as Britain and France combined. By 1938 Germany was spending £1,470,000,000 on arms annually as against a British expenditure of only £391,000,000. With this lead in arms production, Germany has been able to concentrate a superiority of guns, tanks, and planes against its enemies at any given moment on any given front. And Germany will not lose this advantage until American superiority in aircraft design and production smashes German factories and communications, or until American expeditionary forces over-extend and exhaust the German military machine.

In recent months Americans have frequently demanded, "Why doesn't Britain invade the Continent?" Starting its rearmament eight years late, Britain has never had the arms or the men to take the offensive. That it has been able to maintain several fronts and to prevent its own invasion is a miracle. The fall of France lost Britain the use of vital naval and air bases and gave them to the enemy. Consequently, to send a shell or drop a bomb against the Germans anywhere has called forth roughly three times the effort in money, material, and men required by a similar German blow. The discrepancy has been balanced somewhat by sea power, which still outstays its critics, by the superior training and personnel of the R. A. F., together with quality aircraft engineering, and finally by the sheer dogged heroism of a people which "never knows" as the Berlin radio sneered, "when it is beaten." But the desperate military predicament of Britain has been registered in the crushing defeats at Dunkirk, Greece, Crete, Hongkong, and Singapore. There was only one reason for these—want of man-power and equipment. As Americans at war we play into the hands of Germany if we blink the difficulties which our ally still faces and take comfort from, without giving meaning to, the words, "There'll always be an England."

It is true that the German time-table in Russia went all wrong. The Germans knew that Stalin's purges and his brutal denial of consumers' goods to the people had made his popularity a hollow thing. They were confident that Russian morale would crack under sledge-hammer blows from the panzers and the stukas. But they forgot that nationalism is a greater force in modern Russia than communism. They forgot that when the foreigner treads on Russian soil, all Russians cry out in anguish.

For millions of Americans the thrill of headlines which proclaimed the defeat of Hitler's troops was too much. It made us light-headed. The German armies have suffered defeats and retreated, but in no instance have they been routed. Americans must not underestimate the dangers of a renewed German offensive.

It is no service to our Russian ally to exaggerate his prowess or to forget his need of American aid. The Russian has not yet proved that in weather conditions favorable to the Germans he can meet the panzer divisions and best them.

What Stalin will be able and willing to do from Vladivostok to aid us against Japan will depend upon our own actions. It will depend upon our national unity, the rhythm of our production of tanks and aircraft, the capacity of our merchant tonnage to take these arms to Russia or wherever else they are needed.

As a people we are still displaying a peace-time rather than a war-time psychology, studying the communiqués from the war fronts as if we were spectators. It is time we realized that we cannot win this war on potentialities alone, that to win will require the active effort of every citizen. It is time we stopped political bickering about fan dancers, whispering campaigns against American minorities, and cowardly sniping at our allies. It is time we showed our enemies that they were wrong, dead wrong, in thinking us incapable of unity and sacrifice, a lesser breed of men than our forefathers. For in this most titantic of all wars we or they survive. And the sands are running out.

New Phase in China

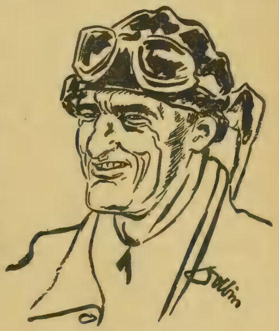
BY GILBERT BAKER

Kunming, February

SINCE the fall of Hongkong, China can only look west, and with Burma threatened, Chinese engineers and strategists are already looking for new ways and means of direct contact with India. A road branches off the Burma highway to Sikang Province on the borders of Tibet, but it will be a long time before there is anything faster than mule transport from there to Assam or Bengal. Airplane service between Chungking, Kunming, and Calcutta began in January, and at Calcutta it connects with a direct service to America.

The Japanese have been too busy to pay much attention to Kunming. Last winter raids and alarms were frequent, but the city has had only one bombing since last August, and that was on the day that the American Volunteer Group of airmen arrived. When the Japanese tried to repeat the attack a few days later, they lost nine out of ten planes; since then the American pilots have scored their remarkable successes in China and Indo-China, as well as in Burma and Thailand. The Chinese government made thorough, almost lavish, preparations for the volunteers. Chinese university students were enlisted as interpreters, and the best modern accommodations were provided; each man has a room of his own, and a fleet of automobiles is always at their disposal. Though this scale of living is in marked contrast with that of the Chinese soldier, there is no doubt that people here think "our airmen"—they wear Chinese uniform—more than worth their salt. It certainly gives a sense of security which few people have ever had in China to see these fast fighters go up whenever there is an alarm.

Troop movements have been heavy during the last few months in the direction of Indo-China and Burma, and the danger that the provincial authorities would be unwilling to allow China's central government to move troops into Yunnan is now forgotten. The "A. B. C." alliance has, in fact, greatly magnified the problem of cooperation, and what now has to be settled is the way in which Chinese forces are to fight alongside their British and Indian comrades in Burma. On this side of the border, too, the Chinese have become acquainted with British army uniforms, for some parties of specialist troops have been passing through on their way to the Chinese fronts, where it is believed they can both learn from the Chinese soldier and teach him new ways of fighting.



Claire Chennault
Commander of the A. V. G.

These personal contacts between the fighting forces of the three countries will be a valuable test of the reality of the democracy which they are defending. The American aviator and the British Tommy are not given to any sentimental enthusiasm for China as such, and China's war effort will be judged by them strictly on the results they notice. China's soldiers will in turn judge American and British strength according to results and not prestige; American and British reverses in the Orient have made many Chinese here pat themselves on the back for their four and a half years of resistance to Japan.

The British naval party which escaped from Hongkong brought high praise for the Chinese guerrillas in Kwangtung Province. I met some of the party here on their way down the Burma road after a month in the interior—ragged and bearded, some of them wearing Chinese soldiers' padded coats, rather short in the sleeve but still very serviceable for winter nights. Both men and officers were enthusiastic about the way the guerrillas had met them on the shore according to a prearranged plan and steered them through the Japanese lines—a party of more than sixty—without their ever seeing a Japanese soldier. The guerrillas of one district passed them on to those of the next until they reached Ku-kiang, the capital of Kwangtung. The British sailors only regretted that Admiral Chan Chak, the one-legged veteran who had organized the escape, had not been empowered to deal more drastically with fifth columnists in the colony during the siege. It seems that sniping in the streets of Hongkong began as soon as the Japanese approached the borders of the colony and long before they landed on the island; it is believed that a certain dam was mined even before war was declared. From the bodies of dead Japanese soldiers it was discovered that each one possessed a map marked with every defense position the British had prepared. Hongkong probably would have fallen without such treachery, but the British sailors believed that the Chinese attack on the Japanese rear might have saved the city if they could have held out two weeks longer, and if the defenders had not been completely without planes.

Hundreds of people here have relatives and friends in Hongkong, and its loss, together with events in Malaya and the Philippines, have set people wondering with a vague uneasiness whether America and Britain mean business, or as much business in the East as they do in Europe. This may account for the restlessness and recklessness of economic and social life here, which may in turn excuse the foreign observer for wondering how much the Chinese middle class really means business in this war—unless such business yields an immediate and handsome profit. Prices are soaring to the extent, almost, of open inflation. The Chinese dollar is quoted at 30 to 40 to the United States dollar, although it is officially pegged at 18 to 19. Since the cost of living is based on the first, or black-market, rate, foreigners receiving salaries from America which have to be changed at the official rate are losing approximately half their income in terms of purchasing power. A class of "new rich" has appeared—tough-looking truck drivers with leopard-skin collars on their coats, who sell their smuggled cans of coffee, patent medicine, and cosmetics to little "trading companies" which spring up like mushrooms and sell anything they can get hold of at excessively high prices. There seem to be plenty of people who can afford to buy; Kunming streets are full of expensive American automobiles. There is no adequate taxation of wealth, no effort to prevent profiteering, and no control of gasoline consumption. The Chinese have done marvelous things in this war, but the appearance of this city is certainly not that of a population engaged in a war of total resistance. It is probable that the free spending and speculative trading are due to the general feeling that the currency is worthless. It has been suggested that the Chinese dollar will be withdrawn and a new currency started on a par with American gold. The ideas on this subject attributed to Sumner Welles at the Pan-American Conference have been discussed with great interest here.

This is not the whole picture, for behind the immigrant and prosperous bourgeoisie are the sturdy, independent peasant people of Yunnan itself. But they are also floating on the economic tide which for the moment leads on to fortune, and they are losing no opportunity to make money; prices, for instance, are always higher for "foreigners"—which includes Chinese from other places—than for local people. The only persons who really suffer are the salaried workers, teachers, university professors, and the like. Rice allowances and family allowances are made for this class, but even so it is hard for them to keep pace with the rising cost of living.

All these things make thoughtful Chinese anxious about the future of their country. Can the democratic forces in China stand the strain? Cooperative workers, for example, know that in many parts of China their colleagues have been imprisoned by fascist elements. Students in Kunming started a demonstration against the Finance Minister; it was quickly suppressed but it revealed the discontent of young people at the way the finances of the government are being handled. Many who have watched the wastage of trucks and cargo on the Burma road through carelessness, or have heard of the continued thefts of government property—for instance, the American Volunteer Group has lost a good deal of important equipment—or have seen ambulances donated by the American Red Cross or such bodies as the Scottish Rite Masons of Oklahoma being used by other than medical units far away from any battlefield may wonder whether the money sent from America is being well spent. A group of young English conscientious objectors in the Friends' Ambulance Unit, financed from the United States, is doing good work on the road battling with these problems, but they are finding, as their colleagues in the Chinese Red Cross have found, how hard it is to bring medical care to those who need it most—the soldiers at the front.

These reflections should not blind us to the magnificent fight which China has put up in the last four and a half years, or to the steady planning for the future which may be seen in the construction of factories, schools, research institutes, and universities in the interior. In view of the recent Japanese successes, more credit should be given to the resisting power of the Chinese soldier. But it is becoming clear to us all, as it has been to the Chinese for some time, that continued resistance depends on breaking Japanese sea power, that the Battle of China must be won by China's allies on the Pacific. The Chinese will play their part, and they will play it better if their democratic allies keep steady pressure on Chungking to give free expression to the real source of Chinese strength—the Chinese people.

Our Not So Precious Metals

AMONG their resources the United Nations can include at least 90 per cent of the world's stock of gold and not far short of 100 per cent of the known unmined gold reserves. For purposes of waging war, however, this wealth is no help at all. On the contrary, it may prove very much of a hindrance, for gold-mining absorbs labor and materials which could be employed to far better purposes in extracting metals that are not so valuable but are very much more useful.

To some extent silver-mining may also be considered uneconomic under present conditions, but it is less open to attack since silver has a far wider range of industrial applications than has gold. Were it rather less precious than it is we could use a great deal more of it at the present time. The difficulty is that the artificially high price of domestic silver repels all customers except the unfortunate taxpayer, who, thanks to the Western bloc in Congress, is forced to accept it at 71.1 cents per ounce. This is just about double the market price at which current supplies of foreign silver are being fully absorbed by industry and the arts.

Silver has many of the physical properties of copper and some of those of tin—both metals now in acutely short supply. Because of its high electrical conductivity and resistance to corrosion it can be used as a substitute for copper in electrical contacts and even for wiring appliances and small motors. Silver can also replace tin in the making of solder, which used to account for about 16 per cent of the new tin consumed annually. According to an OPM statement issued July 10, 1941, "66,000,000 ounces of silver annually should be sufficient for 'all-out' replacement of tin in solder. Forty to fifty pounds of tin may be replaced by two and one-half to five pounds of silver, and at present prices for tin and industrial silver the raw-material cost of 2½ per cent silver solder is practically identical with that of an equal volume of solder composed of 45 per cent tin and 55 per cent lead."

Now that the Japanese have captured the world's major sources of tin we have to husband our stocks of that metal with miserly care, and there should be cause for rejoicing in the fact that our annual production of silver—70,000,000 ounces in 1941—is sufficient to save 16 per cent of our annual consumption of tin. The catch, as I have noted above, is that the Treasury must buy all this silver at a price which prohibits its use for solder. Worse still, the vast stocks of silver held by the Treasury, totaling 3,280,000,000 ounces on December 31 last, or enough to supply us with solder for forty-seven years, are condemned to sterility.

The Treasury is forbidden by law to sell any of this silver at less than the statutory price at which it can be monetized—$1.29 per ounce. All that can be done with it, therefore, is to pile it in the vaults and issue silver certificates against it, thus adding to excess bank reserves, which are already excessive. Fortunately a considerable fraction of the Treasury holdings has not yet been monetized, making possible an ingenious scheme for conscripting it for war purposes. Arrangements have been made for renting out 960,000,000 ounces, or 40,000 tons, of silver for use as "busbars"—the main conductors in the electrolytic reduction of aluminum and magnesium ores. Employed in this way the metal is 100 per cent recoverable and after the war can be replaced by copper. Thus the Treasury can retain title to its silver and keep within the law. Obviously, however, it cannot release silver for such purposes as solder manufacture, where ultimate recovery is not possible.

Since the industrial use of gold is limited and we already have a great deal more than we need for monetary purposes, and since the price of domestic silver bars it as a substitute metal, gold and silver mines must be regarded as contributing nothing to the war effort. If we were really organized for total war we would close them down except in cases where the production of precious metals was ancillary to the production of essential metals. The War Production Board has, however, adopted a much milder measure. Recently it has amended a priority order which gave all mines an A-1 rating for all necessary repair materials so as to reduce to a lower classification companies whose production is more than 30 per cent gold or silver. Such mines will now have to file a special request every time they need some restricted material or equipment.

This action has been assailed by Western mine operators with a violence which would be funny did it not indicate a dangerous ignorance of our urgent war-time necessities and a reckless determination to stick to business as usual. At a large meeting of gold- and silver-mine operators held at Denver on March 12, Senator McCarran of Nevada charged that the priority order was "a grave threat to the gold- and silver-mining industry, if not to the entire economic system of the country," that it was "probably in line with the communistic thinking of some of our Administration leaders in Washington," and that it was part of a plan to circumvent silver legislation by shutting down every silver mine in the country. Commenting on the same meeting, the Mining and Industrial News of San Francisco declared: "Officials of the WPB . . . need to be impressed with the importance of gold and silver in the present and future conduct of the war. Without more of these metals neither the war nor peace can be won. England understands the importance of monetary metals under present and future conditions, and because England understands she is pushing gold production to the greatest possible limit in South Africa."

The first half of this statement is unadulterated nonsense. The only possible use we could have for gold during the war would be for shipment to South America should our imports from that continent exceed our exports. But our enormous reserves would be barely touched by any foreseeable demand of that kind. As for silver, domestic production could, as we have seen, be profitably employed in industry if the silver interests were willing to accept the unsubsidized market price. Let them agree to a repeal of the Silver Act and then they can claim priority for necessary equipment with some grace.

The reference to South Africa in the editorial quoted is a reminder of the international ramifications of this question. In a recent letter to the WPB the Mining Association of Montana asked:

> 1. In the event that our gold and silver mines are presently compelled to close down, will the United States Treasury still continue to pay $35 an ounce for gold produced in the British Commonwealth, especially in Canada?
> 2. Are the British maintaining gold and silver production in Canada and in South Africa while the United States' gold and silver mines are facing shutdown, and are we under Lend-Lease providing machinery and supplies for this, or permitting them to do so, which is much the same thing?

For the British Empire gold still has importance in relation to the war effort in so far as it is a means of payment for purchases in this country that are not covered by the Lend-Lease Act and for an excess of imports from Latin America. In Australia, however, the gold-mining industry is being fairly rapidly closed down, since in the present emergency neither labor nor materials can be spared for it. But in Canada and South Africa it is going full blast, and it is natural enough for our mining operators to raise the question of equal treatment. So far as Canada is concerned, it should not be impossible to arrange that its gold mines be gradually closed down provided that special steps were taken to enable it to meet its bills in this country. The labor that would be displaced could easily be absorbed by base-metal mines and war industries. South Africa, however, is a different proposition, for it is a country whose whole economic life is built around the huge mines strung along the Witwatersrand Reef. Their closure would bankrupt the government, which draws a large part of its revenue from the mines, put half the population out of work, and precipitate a political crisis with dangerous consequences for the United Nations as a whole. The question of South Africa's gold in relation to the war deserves more than summary treatment, and I shall return to it in my next article.

SHORT-WAVE BROADCASTS to Europe have now become so numerous that often two stations are sending talks to the same country at the same time. Since listening to American broadcasts involves heavy risks in fascist and occupied countries, it has been suggested that the radio companies cooperate on time schedules. One proposal was that every broadcast give the time and wave length of other programs for its group of listeners. A major network vetoed the idea because of a standing policy never to mention its competitors.

"State Department officials," ran the report as published in the Baton Rouge, Louisiana, State Times, "said the negotiations have a threefold purpose: (1) to supplement depleted stocks in this country; (2) to ease the severe economic plight of the people in those islands; and (3) to demonstrate further collaboration with the Axis."

Hitler's Latin American Front

THE NAZI UNDERGROUND IN SOUTH AMERICA. By Hugo Fernández Artucio. Farrar and Rinehart. $3.

TO THIS reviewer, who knows South America only from the books of men like John Gunther, Carleton Beals, and Hubert Herring but who has had some first-hand acquaintance with Hitler's technique of conquest, this is a revealing book. It is also a frightening book, for Professor Artucio, one of the purest and bravest democrats in South America and a Nazi-hater of the highest order, confirms as fact much of what in Berlin we used to think was merely the inflated boasting of the brown-shirted world conquerors.

The real architects of Nazi strategy for the conquest of South America—such as Ernst Wilhelm Bohle, boss of the Foreign Organization of the Nazi Party, and General Faupel, Hitler's able expert on Latin America (Artucio reminds us that Faupel was once a professor in the Argentine Military Academy and later technical adviser to the Brazilian and Peruvian armies)—were much too clever ever to reveal their designs. But the lesser Nazi fry who worked under them occasionally did. They used to tell us that they could take South America any time they wished. They said they had the organization, the men, and the arms. Most of us correspondents, I confess, dismissed such talk as drivel. But here comes a young man who probably has done more than any other South American to expose the Nazi designs on Latin America to warn us that such talk was not drivel at all. He presents an avalanche of evidence to show that Hitler already is waging an undeclared war in South America, and that this war is being conducted with fearful efficiency.

Professor Artucio is not hysterical about it. He frankly admits that Hitler is not the only villain of the piece. The social, economic, psychological, and moral state of South America provides, he concedes, fertile soil for Hitler's barbarian doctrines. "Democracy in Latin America," he laments, "has not been very deep-rooted or very sincere," and he fairly scorches the machinations of the unprincipled criollo politicians and their "unbridled tyrannies," which have made it so easy for the Nazis to prepare for der Tag. The mere liquidation of the Hitler movement in South America, he acknowledges, will not solve the great problems facing the southern continent. However, in this book he confines himself to exposing that movement and pointing out its dangers.

The extent of the Nazi Bewegung in South America as outlined by Artucio will shock many American readers. The 900,000 Germans in Brazil were organized as tightly and as ruthlessly by the Nazis as in any Gau in Germany. Fortunately, since the publication of this book Brazil has broken off relations with the Axis, and several hundred of the top Nazi agents have been arrested. Artucio gives a first-hand account of the Nazi plot organized by Arnulf Fuhrmann to seize Uruguay and convert it into an agricultural colony of the Third Reich. It was nipped in the bud on June 19, 1940, by energetic action on the part of the government, which seems to have been encouraged by the timely arrival of two American cruisers in Montevideo harbor on a "good-will" mission. But it took almost superhuman efforts by the author—he broadcast every day for six months on the subject—and a handful of his colleagues to awaken the Uruguayan government to what was up.

It is, however, in Argentina and Chile, and especially in that vast wilderness which comprises the southern part of those two countries, that Artucio believes the Nazi threat is the most dangerous. Buenos Aires, he says, is today the general headquarters of the Nazi High Command for South America. In the Argentine capital alone the German Nazi Party has 30,000 members and 400 regular meeting places. A Congressional investigating committee found that in eleven months in 1940 the German embassy in Buenos Aires distributed in Argentina 1,245,313 pieces of mail weighing 56,765 pounds. From January 1 to August 14, 1941, the figure was 1,305,656 pieces of mail weighing 58,231 pounds. It was all Nazi propaganda. In fact, Artucio finds that throughout Latin America it is from the German embassies, legations, and consulates that the Nazi schemes are hatched, organized, and directed.

One gathers from this book that few people even in South America know anything about the wild and sparsely populated area in southern Argentina—twice as large as pre-Munich Germany—known as Patagonia. Barely 200,000 people inhabit this immense and fabulously wealthy region, and half of them are foreigners. And it is here and in neighboring southern Chile, the author tells us—it will be news to many norteamericanos—that Hitler plans one of his most ambitious projects, a totalitarian United States of the South. Already a Nazi-inspired separatist movement in the region has made progress.

But if the Nazi threat is greatest there, Artucio does not offer much comfort when he looks into Chile proper, Peru, Ecuador, and Colombia. In each of these countries the Hitlerites are well organized—the author gives you the names of the Landeskriesleiter, the Ortsgruppenleiter, and so on—and usually they control the press and radio. In Colombia, the most cultured of the South American republics, the activities of the Nazis were concentrated on a military plan to attack the Panama Canal. Countless airfields for German bombers were laid out by German commercial aviation companies. One of the small lines, Arco, was discovered to have constructed since the beginning of the war no fewer than twenty-six landing fields in Colombia within easy bombing range of the canal. The German companies have now been forced out of business by the Colombian government. But Artucio still feels that Colombia could be more alert.

If the author of this book continues his good work, perhaps many others, including the governments of Argentina, Chile, and Peru will really wake up to the little fact that if you open your door to Hitler he will take over your house.

WILLIAM L. SHIRER

After October

THE NEW DAY. By Jules Romains. ("Men of Good Will," Vol. X, Book XIX, Promise of Dawn; Book XX, The World Is Your Adventure.) Alfred A. Knopf. $3.

THE year 1922: post-war disillusionment and nervous fatigue; a Thermidorian period; an enfeebled organism seeking recuperation through feverish pleasure. The past is tragic, the future impenetrable, the present futile. In that sultry murk there rises a gleam in the east. Not a clear light, not the certain promise of dawn: it may be a brief conflagration that will leave the night more hopelessly dark; it may be the final angry twilight of our world; but it may also be the new day. All faces, even those that are wilfully averted, are illumined by that strange glow—profiteers, politicians, journalists, teachers, and those craftsmen of the old school who are still devoted to honest work and the ideals of Michelet. Throughout Book XIX in the "Men of Good Will" cycle the Russian Revolution is the distant invisible protagonist. In this, at any rate, Jules Romains has achieved his purpose: to give us the epic of European civilization through the lives of average men.

In Book XX Jallez and his jolly colleague, the English journalist Bartlett, go to Russia. What they find is not the magic glow of hope but an atmosphere of distress and oppressive anguish. Remember the date: the formidable effort of the civil war is over, the joyous work of reconstruction has not begun. Russia, still an Ishmael among the nations, is utterly ruined, and devastated by famine. No wonder the air is heavy with intolerable misery, with sullen universal distrust. Jallez compares the achievements of the czars, who made Odessa an imperial city of noble vistas and palaces, with the squalor of the new regime. He sees nothing beyond this discouraging hour. We know Jallez by this time; he is the pretentious bourgeois intellectual, proud of his neat style, his elegant clothes, his good manners. He has just been enjoying an adultère de luxe in the congenial setting of the Riviera, scrupulously in accord with the Paul Bourget-Allory tradition. He is ripe for Le Figaro, "journal des élites." Jerphanion, the sturdier twin, also goes to Russia, as the secretary of Bouitton, a fat, kindly, open-minded statesman who closely resembles Edouard Herriot. Jules Romains is too honest a historian to give them the opinions they probably held ten years later. At any rate, they seek to understand.

The tenth volume is well up to the average of this interminable chronicle. It lacks the undeniable greatness of "Verdun"; it rises far above the insipid sophistications of "Aftermath." Everything that Jules Romains writes can be read with self-respecting pleasure; his unfailing competence makes him an eminently safe writer. But "the promise of the dawn" that we once hailed so eagerly, the hope that, with a fresh technique, there might be revealed to us a new Titan, a Balzac, a Tolstoy, even a Zola—that elusive gleam has faded long ago. In style and thought this immensely elongated creature is decidedly pedestrian. A few times we had a revival of faith: "At last, it is about to grow wings, and soar"; but it only acquired another pair of legs.

Even in these tragic times I could still appreciate a tale of ardent physical passion, but I have no stomach for tepid sensuality. I am not in the least interested in the fact that the blameless Clanricard was duly cuckolded by Laulerque, or that Elizabeth met Jallez at the Yorkshire Bar. I could forgive all these characters for being so mediocre if only they were alive, even as modestly alive as the heroes of Duhamel or those of old Romain Rolland. It would be cruel to evoke Marcel Proust; but the longer I drift with "Men of Good Will," the better I appreciate "Jean-Christophe."

The persistent admirers of Jules Romains defend his amorphous technique on the plea that "life is like that." No, it only seems like that to those who lack organizing power. We are tired of muddling through somehow, in literature as well as in politics. It is a dangerous fallacy that art should yield to confusion in an age of confusion—a fallacy shared in various degrees by men as different, and as great, as Whitman, T. S. Eliot, and Thomas Wolfe. The nature of art is to conquer confusion; in the very act of depicting, it defines. If I want confusion undefiled, my daily newspaper is at hand.

Roots of the Conflict

THE MAKING OF TOMORROW. By Raoul de Roussy de Sales. Reynal and Hitchcock. $3.

THE title of this profound book is not altogether apt, for the book is weakest when dealing with "tomorrow." In estimating future prospects the author's critical intelligence betrays him into a skepticism that is unable to sustain his faith in any of the visions of a better world in which he would like to believe. It is most valuable in its searching analysis of the historical roots and the present problems of the world catastrophe.

Roussy de Sales, a French journalist resident in America since 1925, is a passionate devotee of the democratic cause and a profound student of contemporary history. He sees the conflict between democracy and tyranny against the background of the conflicting forces of nationalism and collectivism, and traces the complications which they introduce into the struggle. He rightly regards the tendency toward collectivism as inevitable in a technical society; but he is as critical of the abstract collectivism and universalism of Marxism as of the vain effort of the capitalists to preserve "free enterprise" against the logic of history. He is certain that the potency of nationalism in our period has refuted the Marxist slogan "Workers of the world unite," that the Socialists really lost faith in the slogan before the First World War, and that Stalin's national policy leaves Communist internationalism in a sorry predicament. The capitalists, on the other hand, are frequently tempted by their fear of the extension of collectivist principles through the pressure of war to betray the democratic cause. This betrayal could be made plausible, for "since the present world conflict is taking place in several dimensions it is always possible for a particular group to justify betrayal by stepping from one dimension into another." The similarity between the policies of the Chamberlains of Britain, the Daladiers of France, and the Roosevelt-haters of this country is convincingly portrayed. De Sales thinks that the Nazi strategy of harnessing technological knowledge, industrial plant, and labor to maximum capacity is vitiated only by its purpose of destruction. It was bound to win over conservatives and radicals who fought each other and the Nazis "without realizing that they had nothing but antiquated weapons to fight with."

One might raise the question whether the problem of collectivism and democracy is not more difficult than this analysis suggests. Nazi collectivism, and Russian collectivism for that matter, has more serious defects than merely the destructive purposes of the former. However erroneous the identification of democracy with "free enterprise," and however pathetic the temptation of the proponents of free enterprise to betray democracy, the problem of maintaining essential freedom in a state powerful enough to bring the economic process under its control remains a vexing one.

The weakness of the democracies is not attributed solely to the internal conflict within each nation. De Sales understands the impulse of irresponsibility in modern nations, particularly in America, and wonders whether we have really permanently overcome our isolationism. He attributes democratic weakness in part to the illusions which arise in a stable civilization and expose it to the thrust of a vigorous barbarism. "The French," he declares, "were part of a world which actually believed that the oldest dream of classical civilization, the elimination of war, had come to pass, a world which had come to deny what it feared the most and trusted in the mere virtue of denial to abolish the danger."

De Sales's skepticism, which is natural enough in so critical an intelligence, reveals itself variously. Though he knows that unless Germany is related creatively to a new European organization there can be no real health in Europe, he nevertheless inclines to Vansittart's thesis of the congenital political defects of German life. "Hitler . . . is the final product of a very long Teutonic will to rebel against the rule of the West." Thus his hopes of a New Europe are of the slightest. Here perhaps French bias is mixed with faint-heartedness.

More interesting is the fact that though he places his whole faith for the future of democracy in America, he has no real faith in the spiritual basis of American politics. He believes, I think rightly, that the idea of progress and the idea of the natural goodness of man are inadequate presuppositions for realistic democratic politics. But here he makes his only serious miscalculation of American social and political history. He thinks our American democracy has the same optimistic basis as French democracy. This is not quite correct. Let him read the papers of James Madison. Rousseau had less influence upon our thought than he imagines. We have, indeed, gone through fatuous decades recently. We have not understood the sorry and sometimes tragic realities of the struggle for political justice; and we were consequently not prepared for the rise of the monstrous perils of our epoch. But our tradition is sounder than he supposes.

At any rate his hopes are rather lame. Despite his effort to see the world of "tomorrow" hopefully, he retires behind a kind of spiritual Maginot Line and is content to save civilization from barbarism. We may forgive him this final lapse, however, since his superb analysis suggests what our own experience tends to prove; namely, that we cannot save civilization from barbarism at all if in the process of saving it we do not move forward, in terms of domestic and foreign

The Mormons . . .

Here is a fascinating, accurately-documented picture of a social experiment unique in the annals of American history—the Mormons. The author has had access to many sources of hitherto unused information: public records, personal diaries and journals, church documents, which make this work a milestone of its kind. From these day-by-day accounts of hardships, journeys from place to place in search of Zion, pitched battles with the forces of persecution on the field and in the courtroom, and the forces of nature on the march, emerges one of the most dramatic pioneer tales of our nation.

This book neither whitewashes nor condemns the Mormons, but gives as thorough a background of the Mormon problem as it is possible to give. Mr. Anderson was a convert to Mormonism, and is a trained sociologist as well. His historical descriptions are permeated with the color of America's pioneer era; his treatment of the polygamy question and the front-page notoriety that kept it alive long after its usefulness to the Mormon experiment is studied and reasonable. 459 pages, containing many rare old photographs. $4.00

In thinking of the future we may well remember that "if hopes are dupes, fears may be liars." We shall not have a Utopia after the war. REINHOLD NIEBUHR

No Parole

NEVER COME MORNING. By Nelson Algren. Introduction by Richard Wright. Harper and Brothers. $2.50.

NELSON ALGREN'S background, subject matter, and method of utmost realism identify him closely with the Chicago school of novelists. He shares their qualities of toughness and dreariness, as well as their compulsive feeling for low-life phenomena; and in one respect at least he is more extreme than they are. Farrell, for instance, deals with people who still have some kind of stake in organized living, whereas Algren scrapes the bottom of the social barrel to get hold of his characters. They are Lumpen proletarians all—a hopeless, sodden mass of human beings, forever mutilated, forever damned, in jail or out "doing time on a bum rap, with no parole."

This new novel shows somewhat more clearly even than his first work, "Somebody in Boots," that Algren has achieved a remarkably integrated approach to his theme. He neither exploits it for purposes of sensationalism nor impounds it politically in the manner of the left-wing novelists of the past decade. The impulsion behind his portrayal of sordid scenes and brutal lives seems purer and more sensitive to the possibilities of literary control. His concern with such things stems from his personal experience, and he has succeeded in turning this experience into a forceful thematic equivalent of his way of feeling and grasping the world. In this sense Richard Wright's introductory note, in which so much is heatedly said about sociological implications, strikes me as quite beside the point. These implications are all in the book, to be sure, but they are hardly the source of its value; they are much too obvious for that and nowadays a drug on the market anyhow. Its value lies, rather, in its utter sincerity and psychological truth. It is a novel about depressed people by a depressed man, and it is most convincing in its complete unity of action, mood, and form.

Its protagonist is a petty gangster and pugilist by the name of Bruno (Lefty) Bicek, an eighteen-year-old boy of Chicago's Polish colony on the northwest side. Lefty is formed by the harsh lot of his immigrant family and by the city folklore of tabloid fame and violence. His code is to play straight with his gang, even at the cost of perverting his girl, Steffi, and forcing her to enter a brothel. "To be regular was all he had ever been schooled to accomplish. Beyond being regular there was nothing expected of a man." Dreaming of becoming a champion, of seeing his name in the headlines, he in the meantime plunges deeper and deeper into a career of aimless crime; and his end comes soon enough, when he is arrested for murder after his first real triumph in the ring. Involved in this story and later running parallel to it is the story of Steffi, the description of whose life at Mama Tomek's house is in its way quite as sharp-sighted and precise as the brothel scenes in Faulkner's "Sanctuary."

The whole narrative is pervaded by a feeling of loss rather than of bitterness or horror. And Algren's realism is so paced as to avoid the tedium of the naturalistic stereotype, of the literal copying of surfaces. He knows how to select, how to employ factual details without letting himself be swamped by them, and, finally, how to put the slang his characters speak to creative uses so that it ceases to be an element of mere documentation and turns into an element of style.

Russian Resistance: 1812, 1942

NAPOLEON'S INVASION OF RUSSIA, 1812. By Eugene Tarlé. Oxford University Press. $3.50.

ARE historical events really repeated on a higher winding of a spiral line, as Goethe told us? If they are, the future suggested by the parallel between Napoleon's and Hitler's invasion of Russia would appear hopeful. Eugene Tarlé's book, written before this war began, presents a psychological parallel which seems to be of even greater importance than the superficial similarity of events.

It is still a current belief that General Cold and General Frost destroyed the Grand Army, but according to the "Encyclopedia Britannica" "it has been forgotten that the utter lack of marching discipline in the French army and not the Russian climate was responsible for the appalling disaster." From Tarlé's book it is evident that something else has been forgotten.

Scarcely a one of Napoleon's campaigns has inspired more books by historians and military authors than the Russian invasion. Caulaincourt's contemporary account and Marquis Chambray's monumental work seemed unsurpassable in their conscientious scrutiny of all details. Eugene Tarlé, in a masterful volume, demonstrates that the last word had not been said on a subject which is just now more intriguing than ever. He had access to a vast number of documents never before available—including letters of Czar Alexander, Kutuzov, the commander in chief, and Rostopchin, governor general of Moscow, and his conclusions reveal an entirely new aspect of the campaign.

Not cold and starvation but the Russian people defeated Napoleon—this is Tarlé's thesis. And he offers ample evidence to prove it. "Napoleon had gambled on terrorizing Russia," and he lost "because the Russian peasants treated the French as their ancestors had treated the Mongols." Napoleon did not even think of liberating the Russian serfs; he came not to break the old chains but "to add new chains to the old." That is why the war became national in every sense. From the end of September to the end of November, when Napoleon crossed the Berezina, the guerrillas rendered "great and indisputable services," just as they have done in the current war. Determined peasants helped to make a scorched-earth policy successful. Napoleon himself admitted, in exile, that at Borodino, where the Russians lost half their army, "the French showed themselves worthy of victory, and the Russians of being invincible." No doubt the morale of the Russian people could stand military defeats better than the French army could bear the setbacks at Tarutino or Krasnoye. According to the authors of the Decembrist generation the people indeed believed that by their heroic struggle they had "earned their freedom." They received instead a single line in the Czar's manifesto: "The peasants, our loyal people, will be recompensed by God."

Tarlé shows that now, as in 1812, it is the morale of the Russian people that enables them to offer successful resistance to the invader. Napoleon, like Hitler, could overrun but never conquer Russia. Napoleon was fully aware of his failure and from Moscow, where he was "besieged by an ocean of flames," sent one envoy after the other to Kutuzov to negotiate peace. His attempts came to nothing because the Russian nation, as Chernyshevsky wrote, had been "awakened by the glorious perils in 1812 to new life"—a new life which produced the Decembrists, Pushkin, Herzen, and other heralds of freedom. Tarlé's stress on the national character of the resistance has led one reviewer to make the unjustifiable assumption that the Russians intend to stop at the frontier after they have chased Hitler's armies from their soil. There was no reason for pursuing Napoleon's beaten army in 1812; there is a strong one for pursuing the Nazis.

Tarlé's book contains a detailed account of both the campaign and its political background and is delightful reading, for like most genuine scholars the author is an artist as well. Intensive research and vast knowledge have gone into it, but they never obtrude upon a narrative thrilling in itself and extremely well told.

Monster Modified

JOHN STEINBECK'S "The Moon Is Down" (Martin Beck Theater) gets nowhere with its novelty, which consists in the suggestion that a Nazi conqueror may be a man with heart and human memories after all. Its hero-villain, one Colonel Lanser who is played by Otto Kruger, is old enough to remember the other war and to know in his individual mind that this one cannot be won against the odds of universal hatred. Coming into a town, apparently Norwegian, which it has been his duty to invade, he encounters in the mayor (Ralph Morgan) and indeed in every citizen except the Quisling Côrell (E. J. Ballantine) the simple and unkillable courage his private experience had schooled him to expect. He knows before he arrives, for instance, what one of his lieutenants will go all but mad with learning, namely, that at the most his army has "conquered flypaper."

Mr. Steinbeck does of course make something of this novelty, and the play has its points of interest, one of these furnishing the somewhat ghastly spectacle of the Colonel proceeding to order executions not only of persons whom he respects and likes more than he does his own people but of persons whose deaths he is certain will do no military good. The spectacle is perhaps too ghastly, too inexpressible, to be of use in tragedy, which cannot afford to leave too much of its meaning unspoken. At any rate Mr. Steinbeck is unable in the writing to put his finger on the point of conflict which will yield him as dramatist the maximum effect of power. The entire town hates the invader, yes; but the invader is divided and obscure, so that, at what should be the climax, we have the Mayor walking out of his house to be shot as a hostage by one who is merely bored with shooting, not to say sick of slaughtering good friends. The Colonel so far agrees with the Mayor as to be one who can prompt him as he rehearses the farewell speech of Socrates; the conflict is not between them at all, any more than it is in the mind of the Colonel alone, which remains a mind that Mr. Steinbeck has not concretely or intensely imagined. The Colonel, in other words, is no more a man than is the customary monster of the anti-Nazi drama. He has been modified in idea only. The ingredient added has been added to what is still an abstraction. So with the Mayor, who is nothing whatever in addition to what he needs by formula to be; and so with all the others who assist in the working out of a humanely conceived but woodenly written play.

The wood is partly in the dialogue, which rarely sounds natural or is spoken with the peculiar personal emphasis we can miss so much when it is not there. This is probably the reason that so many commentators have been free to discuss the tendency or moral of the play; to wonder, for example, whether Mr. Steinbeck has done well to suggest that all a conquered country has to do is wait until the conqueror remembers his humanity. It does not matter that much. Were the play better than it is, we should simply believe it; were it worse than it is, its effect would not matter at all. Just as it is, it seems to me to prove nothing either about its own characters, whom I do not believe, or about Norway in 1942, which it leaves hypothetical and remote.

IN BRIEF

THE CHILDREN. By Nina Fedorova. Little, Brown & Co. $2.50.

The author of "The Family," the Atlantic's $10,000 prize novel, has written again a book that is vivid with real people facing real and often terrible problems. The scene shifts from Tientsin to America, and the story is that of the helpless plight of White Russian refugees fleeing Japanese terrorism. Despite, or perhaps because of, the hunger and heartbreak that Lida, the appealing, intelligent, and sensitive central character, has to endure in the endless flight from war, she is able to see beyond the evils of the day. There is an implied warning in this work, and even an explicit one, put into the mouth of an old soldier: "Neither might nor right wins —but patience, persistence, and courage."

THE PLAIN DEALER: 1842-1942. One Hundred Years in Cleveland. By Archer H. Shaw. Alfred A. Knopf. $4.

This inside story of one of America's great newspapers by one who was on the staff for thirty-nine years is perhaps too detailed to interest the general reader. Clevelanders, newspapermen, and future social historians will find it valuable. Illustrated.

MUSIC

STIEDRY ended the New Friends of Music orchestral series with a repetition of his orchestration of Bach's great "Art of Fugue"; but his other all-Bach program was devoted chiefly to the deadly dull contrapuntal exercises—except for the superb closing six-voiced Ricercare—of the "Musical Offering." This concert also offered the motet "Jesu, meine Freude," in which Stiedry conducted a chorus he might have used in a program of cantatas like the wonderful "Christ lag in Todesbanden" in Victor Set 120. So with the all-Mozart programs, which represented the New Friends' persistently undiscriminating search for the unfamiliar, its persistently erroneous notion that since the G minor Symphony K. 183, the Concerto K. 299 for flute and harp, the Overture in Italian style K. 318, and so on were written by the composer of the G minor Symphony K. 550, the Piano Concerto K. 453, the Violin Concerto K. 219, the Symphony K. 200, they are as interesting and worth playing. It is true that the New Friends must attempt to interest the public to a large extent with the music which the big orchestras leave unplayed; but this must be music which is worth the public's attention. It would have placed us in its debt by offering several more performances with Schnabel of those infrequently heard masterpieces, the piano concertos—K. 271, 450, 491, 595 this time—instead of only the one it did offer, K. 453. If financial reasons made this impossible we might have been given other infrequently heard masterpieces, albeit not by Mozart: the New Friends has repeated one or two of those marvelous Haydn symphonies that it resurrected three years ago; it might have repeated some of the others; it might have added some new ones. And it might have played some of the beautiful music it has left untouched—the music of Handel, Vivaldi, the superb Fantasias of Purcell which Lange performed with the Philharmonic-Symphony Chamber Orchestra several years ago.

In performance the high point of the series was reached with the playing of Mozart's Piano Concerto K. 453—and this for reasons which I have discussed before, and which are important enough to be repeated. Conductors regard concertos not as part of the orchestral—or perhaps I should say the conductor's—repertory, but as display pieces for soloists; they do not decide to play a concerto and then engage a suitable artist for the solo part, but engage a soloist for his box-office appeal and choose one of the concertos in his repertory. That is why some of the greatest works of Mozart are almost never heard: the conductor has no interest in a work that shows off the soloist, and the soloist prefers to make a bigger noise with Beethoven or Brahms—to say nothing of Rachmaninoff. That is why, also, when they are heard they are not played as well as they could be: to mould contours and refine textures in the orchestral part, to achieve integration of style, phrasing, execution in the interplay of orchestra and piano—these require the care and time that a conductor is willing to give to "his" performance of a Mozart symphony, but not to a soloist's performance of a Mozart concerto. There are rare exceptions—Toscanini's performances of K. 466 and 467 with Iturbi, of K. 595 with Serkin, a few years ago; Barzin's performances of K. 595 with Schnabel, of K. 450 with Aitken, among others; Stiedry's performances with Schnabel. The mediocre performance of K. 482 by Schnabel with Bruno Walter and the New York Philharmonic-Symphony last fall was the result of a mere hour's rehearsal; an entire two-and-a-half-hour orchestral rehearsal produced the marvelous performance of K. 453 by Schnabel with Stiedry and the New Friends Orchestra. Similar careful preparation was evident in the performance of the Violin Concerto K. 219, in which Szigeti's tone was disturbingly wiry in the first movement, but its restored sweetness and his superb phrasing produced a wonderful statement of the slow movement.

The orchestra's playing in these concertos testified to Stiedry's musical and technical accomplishments as a conductor; but in other performances—of Mozart's G minor K. 550, of Bach's "Art of Fugue"—there was occasion to notice his tendency to break the easy flow in the orchestra's playing and in the music by suddenly pulling the orchestra back to a tempo just behind the one that had been established, or driving it to a tempo just ahead. The reasons why a guest conductor was engaged for one concert of this little series of five—and for the opening concert at that—were not apparent in the explosive dynamic contrasts and harsh sound of Szell's performances.

Victor's March set (869, $2.50) of Haydn's Quartet Op. 54 No. 1 has turned up, with a delightful work played by the Budapest Quartet of a few years back (Ipolyi instead of Kroyt) as this group alone seems able to play, and with the performance beautifully recorded (in England). My copy has a third side with a scraping surface; but you may be luckier.

I also have managed to hear the set (852, $3) of Beethoven's Sonata Op. 12 No. 3 for violin and piano—the uninteresting one of the Op. 12 group. Heifetz's playing is beautiful in sound and acceptable—that is, with fewer swells and wails than usual—in style; but either he or the recording director seems to have thought that even a mere accompanying violin figuration played by Heifetz is more interesting than the melody of the piano which it accompanies and, on these records, obscures.

Another set I have managed to hear is the one (873, $2.50) of Debussy's Sonata No. 2 for flute, viola, and harp. This work is one of the group that includes the Sonatas for violin and piano and cello and piano; it is of the same year (1915) as the Twelve Etudes for piano that Aitken played recently; and like these other late works it is an exercise of Debussyan style in a musical vacuum. The performance by Moyse, Merckel, and Laskine is excellent. In the DM set that I heard the label for side 1 was on side 2, and vice-versa.

Letters to the Editors

London Feels the Strain

[We print below excerpts from a letter recently received from London.]

. . . Many of us are very busy changing our views about Sir Stafford Cripps. I have always had a great regard for him and admired his independence even of his own party, but I now find some very Tory friends straining hard to adjust themselves. Everyone was greatly impressed by his broadcasts about Russia. They are building up a legend round him of course, but that probably has to be for the easier digestion of him. He did seem to bring with him a breath of the frightful struggle in Russia. We are really beginning to have to go without things, but he said of Russia, "There aren't any pots and pans," so total is the war effort.

I should have been very sorry if Churchill had been overthrown. Of course the last two years have been an incredible strain for him and it was time for other arrangements, which he has been elastic enough to make. In war nothing is justifiable but success.

Coal rationing has just come in for London. We are to have 112 pounds a week per house, which is rather little unless you have some in store, and there isn't much room for storing things here. We are just beginning to feel the effects of clothes rationing too. The sixty-six coupons buy very little, and if you had to start from scratch you would be very sparsely clad. You give up eighteen, for instance for a suit and eighteen for a coat. Shoes take six and anything woolen takes a lot. The stuff simply isn't here. There are also pretty grim forecasts for next winter. The Far East of course makes an immense difference to us as regards supplies. It will be hard on the very old and the young, but I don't think it matters much otherwise. It is useful to achieve a sense of proportion about material things.

If you are able to find a kettle that you can buy, it is a triumph for a year. Frying-pans can scarcely be come by and to break china or glass is a crime of the first order—especially when it is somebody else's stuff that is broken, for you can't replace it. If the laundry loses anything, you make a frightful hullabaloo, and in furnished rooms people are now asked to bring their own sheets. Soap is the burning question of the moment. People who live in a house of rooms and flats have to give up so much a month of their soap allowance to keep the main house going. That leaves you about six ounces a month, which I believe is generous compared with Switzerland or elsewhere.

The meat ration can still be made to last about three days a week if you are careful. There is a sort of unrationed border line in horse meat, which the refugee continentals eat a good deal, and—I regret to say—cat meat! I went to get some cat meat the other day for a tabby that looks disgracefully sleek, and a woman in the queue said brightly, "And I gave my husband a lovely stew of it—you wouldn't believe!" But until bread is rationed, as I suspect it must be before too long, I don't think we do badly, and it is extraordinary how soon you adapt yourself to almost anything. If I seem to give the impression that things are hard, that is wrong. They are only more difficult than they were two months ago.

One of the main troubles about the war is the way it puts many necessary things into the background. Housing, for instance. If you came to London now, you would get a shock. Not so much perhaps because of the shattered buildings, which have been tidied up and almost have the respectability of ruins, but because all the railings are gone. This is a tremendous improvement in the parks and gardens, but in the streets it has been very badly done, and all the curbs round the areas look ruined and untidy. London still has a wall eye. Windows are blocked up or have substitute glass. The Civil Service Stores have a whole façade of different patterned linoleums to replace the shattered windows. Our own house hasn't a sound door or window, which makes it very drafty, but we are well off compared with most. Smith Square, which had lovely Georgian houses, looks shattered, especially as the Church of St. John the Divine was gutted. The church was always called the dining-room table because it had four fat towers in the air, like legs. It once had a very lazy parson who wrote of himself, "Sleep at my bidding crept from pew to pew"; so it was a church with a rather ribald character. But now this has turned completely to pathos—as though the funny man had been made to cry. M. H.

Not "Poor White" but Poor

Dear Sirs: Your editorial on the poll tax printed on March 21 stated that the tax disfranchises the "poor white" and the Negro. To most persons "poor white" means the white tenant farmer, the man who gets his living from land of miserable quality. Outside this classification, however, is a vast reservoir of potential voters who are also disfranchised by the poll tax, and it is to these that I should like to call your attention.

The South is peppered with small businesses. There are a great number of laundries, myriads of corner groceries, innumerable saw mills, cotton gins, tiny lumber yards, coal yards, coke furnaces, mattress factories, paper mills, marble works, potteries, and so on. Each employs from one to twenty or in some cases a hundred or more individuals—bookkeepers, checkers, and other white-collar workers, as well as what we call common labor. Again in the cities and towns Woolworth, Kress, department stores, chain stores, and the like employ countless clerks, drivers, office help, window dressers, sweepers.

These people do not fall into the classification of "poor white," though of course they are poor; the wages everywhere are low. Can they pay poll taxes? Take my neighbor, a man of forty, a floor manager in a middle-sized department store. Twenty years ago when he reached voting age he got a job. Like thousands of others he did not realize the importance of voting. The years slipped by. Now he is faced with an accumulation of back poll taxes of $40 if he wants to vote. If his wife wanted to, and incidentally she does, it would take another $40. His salary won't permit such an expenditure. He is disfranchised. But he is infinitely better off than the little girl across the street behind the counter in Woolworth's five and ten. She can't ever manage to take $2 out of her week's earnings to pay the tax.

I believe that if the Southern politicians had the choice of giving the vote to the "poor white" and the Negro or to these other disfranchised, they would unhesitatingly give it to the former group, which is made up of people so sunk in prejudice (poor white) or so scared (Negro) that their votes could easily be controlled. The other group would vote for progressive measures, and the control of the minority would be ended. In short, the poll tax has its most injurious effect in preventing the growth of political consciousness and action among a group that could provide a broad base to free the whole South, including the "poor white" and the Negro.

Pressure Groups vs. Design

Dear Sirs: Eleanor Roosevelt has voiced concern lest the returning soldiers after the war constitute a dangerous pressure group if their domestic interests have not been sufficiently safeguarded. Why worry about possible pressure groups when those long in existence made this war inevitable by refusing to permit necessary adaptations to change in the field of their vested interests? Is anyone taking any steps to remove this primary cause of war?

American pressure groups are still, unchallenged, forcing our principal government agencies to resist changes that cried out to be made a generation ago. Great care is being taken to avoid more than superficial thinking about what we shall face the moment peace comes. We continue to count on a huge public-works program to take up post-war slack.

The great problem of our generation is: how shall we change the handicraft-aristocratic-scarcity tastes of medieval origin so that design may be encouraged now to create great new peacetime uses for the factories, the machines, the mechanical skills essential to national survival in a world more willing to commit suicide than to use its imagination? Sir Stafford Cripps rightly says, "The failures of England and the United States have been failures flowing from the lack of imagination." Which is merely another way of saying that politically powerful pressure groups have an abundance of hindsight but will throttle anyone with foresight.

If Henry Ford had paid heed to pressure groups, he would have attempted to solve the problem of cheap mass transportation by breeding faster horses and building cheaper buggies. Instead, he did a lot of thinking over a drafting board. He reduced pretty theories to three dimensions. Yet this is the one formula we doggedly refuse to follow. We prefer to pamper our own pressure groups and hide the consequent failure and folly under a smoke screen of noble rhetoric!

"I Like Poetry but . . ."

Dear Sirs: In his discussion of modern poetry in a recent Nation Randall Jarrell committed the fundamental error of accepting "modernist" gibberish as poetry. His hypothetical reader, if discriminating, would say, "I like poetry, but I do not like the infantile and meaningless cacophony that is the modern substitute for poetry."

If the function of the artist is to share with others his emotional response to his discovery of a pattern or a significance in the world, his fulfilment of that function is in direct proportion to the ease, directness, and clarity with which his work conveys the form and color of that response. The modernist seems to be preoccupied with his own emotional indigestion and therefore to have little to say that is worth saying. Furthermore, the means he employs are the reverse of direct and clear. He abhors the accepted meanings and orders of words, and sometimes assumes that one becomes a poet by abandoning punctuation.

The same attempt to substitute perverted "originality" and neurotic sensationalism for sanity and beauty is evident in the musical sphere and in that of the plastic and graphic arts. Modern "music," modern sculpture, and modern painting alike have sunk to the childish anarchism of the jungle that is the home of their primitive counterparts.

For Browder's Release

Dear Sirs: If we are to win this war and thus preserve our democratic way of life, every genuine anti-fascist, regardless of his politics, must be given a chance to contribute to the war effort. Earl Browder is the most powerful single anti-fascist fighter in this country, and his continued imprisonment is a mark of our lack of unity and understanding of the war issue.

The Shape of Things

THE NEWS OF ALLIED BOMBS FALLING ON Japan, following closely on the extremely efficient raids on the Philippines, has had a tonic effect on the United Nations. For once their power has been shown to be actual and present rather than merely potential. And the mystery, so far undispelled, of where the raiders came from and where they landed seems to have created confusion in Tokyo. The contradictory Japanese broadcasts that have been coming in ever since are no doubt partly designed to elicit information; but they also indicate a surprise and consternation which are hardly consistent with the continuing Japanese statements that the damage was extremely slight and was confined, Allied deviltry being what it is, to "grammar schools, hospitals, and cultural establishments." The first reports spoke of sixty planes, of which nine were shot down. The latest stories say that there were ten American planes, and for the first time speak of three airplane carriers having been seen off the coast of Japan just before the raids. It is quite possible that the planes took off from carriers, bombed the four Japanese cities, and landed in China. Eventually no doubt, we shall have the whole story from Allied sources. Meanwhile our favorite Japanese comment on the raids is the one which described them as "just another Yankee joke and propaganda stunt for home consumption in America." The laughter in Tokyo strikes us as a little hysterical, but the chuckling in Chungking is entirely authentic.

APPOINTMENT OF GENERAL MACARTHUR to the newly established post of Commander-in-Chief in the Southwest Pacific, with instructions from the United Nations to "prepare to take the offensive against Japan," is an important milepost in the Pacific war. The forces under MacArthur have already seized the offensive to a considerable extent. The spectacular raid against the Philippines made by American bombers under the command of Brigadier General Ralph Royce appears to have done a good deal of damage to Japanese shipping, docks, and defense installations, and to have had a heartening effect on the American and Filipino defenders of Corregidor. Perhaps the most encouraging feature of the raid was the precision with which it was planned and carried out. The Japanese were not only taken completely by surprise but apparently are still uncertain about the location of the secret bases used. Nearer to their main base, American and Australian bombers have maintained constant offensive operations against the Japanese at Rabaul and at Kupang on the Dutch portion of Timor. The success of these attacks has greatly reduced the immediate danger of a Japanese drive against Australia. The initiative has passed to MacArthur, and there is every reason to believe he knows how to use it.

TWO OF THE COUNTRY'S LARGEST STEEL companies, Carnegie-Illinois and Jones and Laughlin, have been accused by the War Production Board of "repeated, deliberate violations of priority regulations." The charges are concrete and specific. The Jones and Laughlin Company is charged with making large quantities of tubing and drill pipe for the oil industry in direct violation of a WPB order and with distributing its products to civilian users having no preference rating whatever. Carnegie-Illinois is accused of publishing a manual for its employees setting up delivery schedules which ignored the government priority ratings. The seriousness of these charges can hardly be exaggerated. As a direct result of its resistance to the government's expansion plans of a year and a half ago, the steel industry has become one of the chief bottlenecks of the entire war-production program. If it is established that two of the principal steel producers have deliberately held up war production in order to fill orders for their civilian customers, the government would be amply justified in taking over plants belonging to these companies. J. L. Perry, president of Carnegie-Illinois, and H. E. Lewis, president of Jones and Laughlin, deny the WPB's accusations, but Mr. Lewis, in his denial, gives indirect support to the charge by admitting that more than 5 per cent of his company's shipments in March bore no priority rating. Yet all the steel companies have huge backlogs of unfilled, high-priority orders.

MUCH AS WE DETEST FATHER COUGHLIN and Social Justice, we prefer to see them both put out of circulation by full court proceedings rather than by Administrative action. On the basis of the magazine's recent contents those responsible for it appear no less open than Pelley to the charge of "making and distributing false statements intended to interfere with the success of the military and naval forces of the United States and intended to promote the success of our enemies." We therefore welcome Attorney General Biddle's announcement that Social Justice, its direction, ownership, and finance, is to be studied by the special federal grand jury now investigating Nazi propaganda and seditious influences. This will give Coughlin a chance to tell all, since he has now emerged from behind the camouflage provided by his parents, the nominal owners of Social Justice, and accepted full responsibility for the editorial policy of the magazine. By so doing he disavows his own positive declaration to Archbishop Mooney of Detroit that after May 27, 1940, he would not be in any way responsible for the publication. No doubt the grand jury will be interested in his explanation of this somersault. We hope, too, that the orator of Royal Oak will be asked why that old contributor to Social Justice—Dr. Goebbels—should have rushed so promptly to his defense. Our own explanation of this embarrassingly public acknowledgment of the Axis's indebtedness to Coughlin is that it constitutes recognition of the end of his usefulness in the United States. But some value can still be squeezed out of him by his presentation as a martyr to Roosevelt's "gangster methods" in broadcasts designed for Ireland and other Catholic countries.

ARCHIBALD MACLEISH, IN A SPEECH LAST week to the American Society of Newspaper Editors, pointed out that there are "minority elements of the American press which are actively influencing American opinion in directions which lead not to victory . . . but to defeat." It was not, he said, the responsibility of the government to crack down on such publishers, who contrive just to keep within the law. But, he suggested, it was the responsibility and duty of "the loyal and honest press to hunt out and expose by every instrument of truth the skulkers in the journalistic ambush." This emphatically is a job which the leading daily journals of the country, even those whole-heartedly supporting the war effort, are not doing. There was a time when newspapers did not hesitate to attack each other on issues of principle. Even as recently as the last war the New York Tribune waged a bitter campaign against "Coiled in the Flag, HEAR-S-S-S-T." But nowadays there seems to be a gentlemen's agreement in the publishing field that "dog doesn't eat dog." The New York Herald Tribune has, it is true, published at least one strong editorial criticism of the divisive press, naming names, but this is an honorable exception. And even the Herald Tribune refused to print an impressive full-page advertisement issued by the Friends of Democracy which castigates the behavior of Hearst, McCormick, and Patterson, asking them, "And what do you call 'aiding the enemy,' Gentlemen?" The New York Times applied a similar censorship, but the advertisement has appeared in the San Francisco Chronicle, which deserves praise for its patriotism. We hope other great newspapers will now reconsider their attitude. Their readers have a right to know which forces are undermining our war effort and what reputable and representative organizations think about their policy.

THE REPORT ON THE NORMANDIE DISASTER is a shocking commentary on the lack of coordination and effective organization in the navy. At the time of the fire at least sixteen federal, state, and local government agencies were exercising some jurisdiction over the ship; but no individual or agency had real authority. The commandant had never been on board the Normandie and "did not consider himself in charge of the situation or to be the responsible naval officer present. He had considered the ship to be in charge of the district material officer and the fire to be in charge of the Fire Department." But the district material officer believed himself to be acting solely in an advisory capacity. The lieutenant in charge of the Coast Guard unit looked to orders from the captain of the port. The captain of the port "considered the commandant in command." The effect of this division in responsibility can also be seen in the inadequate precautions that were taken against fire or sabotage. The Coast Guard was supposedly responsible for the protection of the ship. But the Coast Guard fire watch had not been told that the city fire-alarm box had been removed. The hose lines first brought to the scene could not be connected because the Coast Guard had not been informed of the change from French to American fixtures. Essentially the faults were the same as those revealed in the Pearl Harbor investigation; only in this case the lack of coordination was even more flagrant. We have no easy solution to offer. The root of the difficulty may be found in the peace-time bureaucracy still controlling the armed forces. A rigorous overhauling is obviously called for.

BY ANOTHER VOTE OF EIGHT TO FOUR, WITH the representatives of the public and labor lined up against the employer representatives, the National War Labor Board has ordered the International Harvester Company to accept a maintenance-of-membership provision in its union contract if a majority of union members in each of eight plants favor such a provision in a secret referendum. At a press conference William H. Davis, chairman of the board, stated that if any union member desired to drop out of the union before the referendum was held he could do so subject to the union constitutions. Roger D. Lapham, who wrote the dissenting opinion for the employers, said that the majority decision meant that a minority of 1,400 in a plant of 3,000 workers would be bound to remain in the union, even if they opposed the provision, assuming that 1,600 favored it. If, as Mr. Davis asserts, those who do not wish to remain in the union may drop out before the elections, the employers' concern lest workers be imprisoned in unions seems over great. As for the flaming assertion of the National Association of Manufacturers that maintenance of membership is only a sweeter name for the closed shop and that it amounts to a dictatorship over the American worker, we may be forgiven for suspecting that the N. A. M. is motivated by something besides devotion to workers' rights. The N. A. M. knows the difference—and it is enormous—between the closed shop and maintenance of membership; but the N. A. M. is not interested in being fair to organized labor, only in smashing it.

THE MEXICAN GOVERNMENT'S POSITION IN the four-year controversy over the value of the oil wells expropriated by the Cárdenas regime has been substantially upheld in the award handed down last week. The value of the properties was set at $23,995,991. It is, to be sure, a good deal higher than the Mexican valuation of $9,000,000, but the companies had demanded $200,000,000. And it is clear that the United States has agreed to Mexico's contention that the subsoil rights did not belong to the American companies but to the people of Mexico. The agreement is a sound one and should contribute materially to the strengthening of military and political cooperation between the two countries.

TWENTY MEMBERS OF THE SPANISH Falange, notorious for its pro-Axis activities throughout Latin America, have recently been granted American citizenship in Puerto Rico. Nearly all of the twenty are wealthy Spaniards; many of them are owners of large estates in Spain. Most, if not all, of them belong to the reactionary Casa de España in San Juan, headquarters of the Falange on the island. Many of them contributed large sums of money to Franco during the Spanish Civil War and are still contributing to the Auxilio Social, the Falange aid organization. In granting citizenship to this group United States District Judge Robert A. Cooper declared that he was "sure that he could not find cause why the applicants should not be granted the privilege of American citizenship," adding that he had "no doubt they would become loyal American citizens." Ironically enough, it was Judge Cooper who several years ago sentenced Dr. Albizu Campos and a group of other Puerto Rican nationalists to prison. Since Campos has come to symbolize the democratic aspirations of a considerable portion of the Puerto Rican population and the wealthy Falangists symbolize the most reactionary, anti-democratic influences on the island, Judge Cooper's action has proved anything but popular in Puerto Rico. No investigation appears to have been made to discover why this influential group of Falangists should choose this moment to seek the protection of American citizenship. In the Philippines members of the Falange actively aided the Japanese, for which they were honored with a special decoration by the Spanish Falange in Madrid. Possibly the FBI can find out what they are up to in Puerto Rico.

G. O. P. Looks Abroad

BY DILIGENT prodding, Wendell Willkie has forced the old Republican elephant to unwrap its ears from in front of its eyes and take a look around the world. As a result, it has lumberingly climbed off the fence where it has been sitting so long and so inelegantly, and parked itself definitely on the anti-isolationist side. Reestablished in his position as mahout, Mr. Willkie now has to get his mount actually moving in a forward direction.

This outcome of the Republican National Committee meeting in Chicago is all the more interesting because many political observers had thought that Mr. Willkie's influence was waning in the higher councils of the party and had expected that the resolution he offered for consideration would be quietly smothered. The isolationists in the party were cock-a-hoop over the Illinois primaries, from which Senator C. Wayland Brooks and Representative Stephen Day had emerged with triumphant majorities. Among the party tacticians there seemed to be a feeling that it would be worth while not to alienate the isolationist and anti-war vote, which, added to that of the regulars, might be sufficient to swing the fall elections. In the committee itself Willkie's pledged supporters were supposed to constitute only a small minority, and when, against their protests, all resolutions were referred to a small subcommittee, a thinly diluted compromise motion seemed almost inevitable.

The two principal resolutions under consideration were those drafted by Mr. Willkie and by Senator Taft. Both included a declaration of full support to the President in the prosecution of the war, but the terms of Willkie's resolution were wider in scope and far more full-blooded than those that contented the Senator. The former Presidential candidate wished to put his party on record in favor of a war waged without reservations and against any peace with the enemy except "peace with victory." This part of his resolution emerged from the subcommittee virtually intact. It can be regarded as a definite blow to any appeasement forces which linger within the Republican ranks.

The most important and boldest part of Mr. Willkie's resolution was that which attempted to establish basic principles for American policy after the war. He sought to commit his party "to undertake now and in the future whatever just and reasonable international responsibilities may be demanded in a modern world." This advance rejection of watertight nationalism in relation to America's role in peace and reconstruction was of course a direct blow at the isolationists, who, if they have lost out on the war, hope still to win the peace with the brilliant success that the Republicans achieved in 1920. Moreover, it is a square hit on the principle of high protection which has been the outstanding article of Republican faith for over sixty years.

Under the circumstances it is more surprising that the essential meat of Mr. Willkie's resolution should have survived the culinary efforts of the subcommittee than that in the process it should have become somewhat less "rare." In the form in which it was unanimously adopted by the full National Committee the phrase "international responsibilities" disappeared, to be replaced by the statement: "We realize that after this war the responsibility of the nation will not be circumscribed within the territorial limits of the United States; that our nation has an obligation to assist in bringing about understanding, comity, and cooperation among the nations of the world."

Asked for comment, Senator Taft declared that "it was a great mistake for the National Committee to express any policy at all at this time on post-war action" but indicated also that he thought "the teeth of the Willkie proposal" had been drawn. Be that as it may, the passage of the resolution seems to us a clear indication that Mr. Willkie retains more influence than the Old Guard had supposed or hoped. His leadership has been given a new lease of life under conditions which suggest that his hold on the party will grow stronger in direct proportion to the extent to which he refuses to conform to the rigid and conventional pattern of Republicanism.

The Guthrie Case

THE Guthrie hearings before the Truman committee proved a disappointment. Enough evidence came out to indicate that Donald M. Nelson is still permitting entirely too much "business as usual" in the consumers'-durable-goods section of the War Production Board; it is on curtailment of these consumers' durables that we must chiefly rely for rapid expansion in war output. But this evidence often seemed to come out in spite of the Truman committee rather than through its efforts. The committee members spent too much time scraping and bowing before the dollar-a-year men and explaining that they were forced to ask embarrassing questions because Nelson had asked them to investigate the Guthrie case. The committee is understandably friendly to Nelson, but this friendship may get in the way of a forthright verdict in the case. For if the committee finds Guthrie's charges justified, it must criticize Nelson for having failed to give him a hearing and for permitting the conditions against which Guthrie protested. So far the committee's investigation of this case, in contrast to its usual public-spirited and courageous work, is noteworthy chiefly for its omissions. The record affords but a glimpse of the typewriter industry, which is making a half-million machines this year although it is one of the easiest to convert and is well adapted to make machine-guns. Little more has been done by the committee to probe into the scandalous delays in bringing full conversion of the construction industry to war purposes. The whole question of why dollar-a-year men are still permitted to make decisions affecting their own industries has been easily evaded by witnesses and inadequately pressed by the committee.

The fact is that from January 15, when Philip Reed of General Electric took over the Bureau of Industry Branches, until March 16, after Guthrie had resigned, curtailment orders had been issued in only six industries. The criticism which attended the Guthrie resignation seems to have stimulated the issuance of the forty orders that followed. In too many cases these orders were framed to suit the exigencies of industry rather than the needs of the emergency. A refrigerator manufacturer framed the order on refrigerators. A furniture manufacturer framed the order on furniture. Typewriter dollar-a-year men in the Army-Navy Munitions Board, as well as in the WPB, fought for, and succeeded in getting, continued production of typewriters. In this last case the supply services of War and Navy seem to have asked for more typewriters, while the ordnance and infantry sought immediate conversion of the industry to gun-making. The Truman committee could redeem itself and perform a public service by digging into the matter and giving us the details.

Laval Takes Over

BY FREDA KIRCHWEY

THOSE of us who have insisted, since the fall of France, that Pétain was a temporary Nazi expedient rather than an obstacle to Nazi aims must beware of taking too easy satisfaction in his downfall and in the imminent necessary end of American appeasement. It is true that much good may result from a clarification of Vichy's role. It is good that the United States government is being forced at last to abandon the pretense that it, not Hitler, was handling the strings attached to the puppet. It is good that our attempt to persuade the French people of our friendship while we snubbed their leaders and bribed and cozened their betrayers has at last collapsed; the end of equivocation is at least in sight.

But we should recognize that we have again been led to the point of action by our enemies, not by our own will. The accession of Laval to power was a minor Pearl Harbor; he burst in our faces like a bomb from a Japanese plane. Only a few weeks ago our Acting Secretary of State was publicly congratulating himself and the country on the latest eager assurances from Vichy that they were not going to yield an added inch to Hitler: the armistice terms were their final line of defense and there they would stand. But on the very day when the State Department's optimistic communiqué was issued, Pétain and Laval met at Randan near Vichy and undoubtedly laid the groundwork for the present deal. (Remember Kurusu?)

Now Mr. Welles is surprised and angry—as Chamberlain was after Prague, as Hull was after Pearl Harbor. The Vichy note rejecting our last note explaining our decision to send a consul to Brazzaville was a curt and nasty affair. It was drafted and released before Laval came to power. Just before. Then it was recalled and then again released, presumably by Laval's orders. If this note is an indication of the line of the new government, then a break is likely. On the other hand, several dispatches indicate that Laval is going to try for continued good relations with the United States. If he does, we may look for further moves aimed at stilling American apprehensions, such as Laval's unctuous deference to Pétain's painful indorsement of Laval. Then what will the State Department do? Is it not possible, in the light of the recent past, that our policy-makers may dream new dreams of dividing Laval from Pétain and of encouraging Darlan—the new Weygand—to pursue an independent course in regard to the fleet? After all, reputations have been staked on the success of appeasement; and it is hard to admit failure, even if you do it in the form of a statement claiming victory.

Hitler has again robbed us of the initiative. It is a simple fact, no paradox, that the strategic time to break with Vichy was before the Nazi trap was sprung. Then our act would have meant something. The noose around old Pétain's neck was visible for all to see, but still there remained confusion, doubt, a desperate craving on the part of the French people for a sense of solidarity with their democratic allies and a need almost as great on the part of the American people for a clean democratic line to follow and fight for. Before Laval, we could have taken the initiative.

We can still, to a limited extent, take matters in our hands, if for once we show ourselves capable of acting coldly and shrewdly and in accordance with our own interests—which are the contrary of the interests of Berlin. But to do that, we shall have to reverse our customary procedure, interpreting Laval's first smile as a deliberate provocation, a sufficient reason for ending relations. Whereas if Laval takes a truculent, defiant line, we shall be justified in assuming that Hitler is ready for a break but hopes to spare Laval the onus of actually making it. We will pursue our necessary objectives relentlessly, in full collaboration with the Free French and in open, undisguised opposition to Laval, but leave it to Laval to make the break that will put the final touch on his stupendous unpopularity. We still have a little space in which to maneuver, though we have lost the chance to act boldly in support of the cause to which we have pledged our collective life and fortune.

Within this space there are a good many things we can do. Hitler's decision to thrust Laval on the French people is a sign that he must at all hazards close his ranks in the West. The appointment of Field Marshal Karl von Rundstedt to supervise German defenses from the North Cape to Hendaye and the reported transfer of some additional 150,000 German troops to France show Hitler's concern over the growing threat of a second front. The "neutrality" of the old Vichy government is no longer sufficient protection; it must be sacrificed to the more urgent necessity of repression and full collaboration. Laval, the master wire-puller, will doubtless attempt to hand over his country with a minimum of disturbance; but if the victim struggles he will not hesitate to shoot. Pétain, it is already clear, will give his blessing to the proceedings. The least the United States can do is to refuse to cloak the dark business in its official good-will no matter how politely the Vichy gunmen may ask for it.

Our obvious battle task is to rob Hitler of the security he is gambling so much to win. We can do this only by acting promptly and in close collaboration with our allies. We can of course cut off finally all shipments to France and North Africa. We can back De Gaulle in every theater of action. It may already be too late to take Dakar without fighting the Germans; several dispatches report that Nazi submarines operating along the Atlantic merchant routes are based there. But many strategic points, especially including Martinique and Guadeloupe and the big island base of Madagascar lying across our route to the Middle East, should be promptly occupied by the Free French with Allied help. And the United Nations should take over and put into service the French warships still held in their ports.

We should push with all possible speed for an early Allied offensive in the West. Mr. del Vayo stresses, on another page of this issue, the desperate need of creating a second front while the first front still holds. He balances the enormous risks of an invasion of the Continent against the all-but-final disaster of a Russian collapse and urges the first as the lesser danger. Laval's coup and the mounting anger of the French people are a warning that we cannot afford to delay long. To accept the one and betray the other would assure Hitler his second conquest of the West.

Finally we should beat Hitler to at least one diplomatic punch by ending our relations now with Spain. Must the fiasco of Vichy be repeated in Madrid? Are we to go on fooling with Franco until the day arrives when Hitler decides to push his armies through without asking our permission or that of Britain? Let us for once act first, demanding that Franco order all Nazi technicians and army officers to leave Spain, that he force Nazi submarines and other craft to withdraw from Spanish ports, that he call back his Phalangists from the Americas, where they act openly as Hitler's agents, on pain, if he refuses—as indeed he must since he has no power either to order or to force—of immediate severing of diplomatic relations.

Our best answer to Hitler's latest move in France would be to wipe out the fiction of neutrality that still protects him in Spian.

More Dangerous than Nudism

BY I. F. STONE

Washington, April 19

COWARDLY is the only word I can find to apply to the conduct of Milo Perkins, director of the Board of Economic Warfare, in the cases of C. Hartley Grattan and Maurice Parmelee. A favorable press greeted the Vice-President's defense of these men against the usual reckless Dies committee charges. They have been cleared by the FBI. Yet Grattan was called in by Perkins and given the choice of resigning or being fired, and Parmelee was informed at 3:30 on Wednesday that he was being dismissed as of 5:30 that same afternoon. Grattan's past isolationist views in no way detracted from his usefulness to the board; he was employed as an expert on Australia, a field in which his competence is acknowledged. Parmelee's work with the United States War Trades Board in London during the last war, when he took part in the administration of the blockade, and his years of experience as an economist-consul in Berlin after the war made him unusually well qualified for service with the Board of Economic Warfare. His peremptory dismissal on two hours' notice was shameful. Dies can point to the removal of Grattan and Parmelee, as he already has to the resignation of Malcolm Cowley (under fierce attack and lukewarm support), as victories. Members of Congress who have gone to considerable risk to fight the Texan feel definitely let down by New Dealers who think the way to win a battle is to retreat under fire.

By contrast, neither the Standard Oil revelations before the Truman committee two weeks ago nor the General Electric and du Pont exposures before the Senate Patents Committee last week have led to any purge of their ubiquitous and powerful dollar-a-year men. The story of Remington Arms and tetracene was buried in the back pages of most newspapers. The testimony of Lawrence Dobey, special assistant to the Attorney General, shows that Remington Arms placed loyalty to its cartel partner, I. G. Farben, above loyalty to our country and our allies. Use of tetracene, a superior non-corrosive combustion initiator for machine-gun and rifle ammunition, was denied to countries of the British Empire last year because of Remington's obligations under a cartel agreement with I. G. Farben, though the patent is American-owned. The picture has its complexities. The anti-British clause of the agreement seems to have been originally inserted at the request of Britain's Imperial Chemicals, Ltd., which was as interested as Remington and I. G. in preventing competition. Du Pont, which controls Remington, also had, may still have, large stockholdings in I. G. Farben. Testimony revealed that not until November 20, 1940, did the executive committee of du Pont authorize the sale of its stock in I. G. Whether anyone came forward to buy German securities at the end of 1940 is not disclosed by the record. These entanglements illustrate the extent to which the basic war materials of the Western peoples, on which their destiny depends, are in the hands of concerns with a stake in both sides, concerns which regard the war as an unfortunate interruption in cartel relations they have every intention of resuming. Yet men drawn from these same companies continue to occupy strategic positions on the War Production Board and in the War and Navy departments. Behind them is intrenched wealth and a subservient press, and the New Deal is afraid to act against them. The tetracene revelations we owe to the public spirit and courage of Senators Bone, O'Mahoney, La Follette, and D. Worth Clark, for the power of the du Ponts has been great enough to keep the facts hidden in the files of the Department of Justice until now, and the War Department has been able to prevent the anti-trust division from prosecuting.

Postponing enforcement of the anti-trust laws until after the war is over is one way of lengthening, if not losing, the war. Take the case of tungsten carbide, also spread on the record of the Senate patents hearing last week. Tungsten carbide, next to the diamond and possibly boron carbide, is the hardest substance known and the best material yet discovered for the cutting edges of machine-cutting tools and wire-drawing dies. A Fortune article last January attributed the speed of German rearmament in large part to the widespread use of tungsten carbide in the Reich's industries. "In many machining operations," Fortune said, "substitution of tungsten carbide for high-speed steel multiplies the rate of production at least 500 per cent." Had it not been for an anti-trust investigation, the existence of a cartel agreement between General Electric and Krupp restricting the output of tungsten carbide in this country would never have come to light. Early in 1940 the Frankfort Arsenal invited bids on 3,000 pieces of tungsten carbide. L. Gerald Firth, of the Firth-Sterling Steel Company, a patent licensee of General Electric, bid $8,730, then wrote the government that he was forced to make this bid by the terms of his patent license, that he could have made a reasonable profit at $3,375. Investigation disturbed executives busy on war orders, but it also led to an indictment which was followed by a sharp reduction in the price of tungsten carbide.

In this case, as in so many others, restriction of production in this country was not forced upon American concerns but was sought by them. The agreement had its origin in the desire of General Electric to make Krupp stop selling tungsten carbide in this country. Through American outlets Krupp was selling tungsten carbide here at $50 a pound in 1927 and 1928. By its first agreement with Krupp in 1928 General Electric pushed the price up to $453 a pound, forced competitors out of business, and finally in 1936 bought Krupp out of the American market. A director of Krupp's, writing to G. E. in 1936, wondered why the output of tungsten carbide "was booming in Germany" but was so little used in this country, "although America was generally known for its ability to grasp and develop the most modern manufacturing methods." Engineers within General Electric's own organization protested in written reports against what they considered an uneconomic price policy and asked for the dissolution of the Carboloy Company, the G. E. subsidiary in charge of tungsten carbide. General Electric preferred the restrictive policy; so did its British cartel partner. Evidence given before the Senate committee showed that the British reached a restrictive agreement with the Germans a month after Britain and Germany were at war. G. E.'s agreement with Krupp has merely been suspended, not ended, by the war. In this as in most cartel agreements royalty reports gave the Germans useful military information.

I want to add a missing link in this story. John Henry Lewin, the Special Assistant Attorney General in charge of the tungsten-carbide case, testified that efforts were made to bring it to trial in the summer of 1941. The trial date was set for October, 1941. "Representations were made by counsel for the defendants," Lewin said, "that by reason of their engagements in connection with producing tungsten carbide, and in connection with the engagement of one of the individual defendants with the Office of Production Management, it was necessary to have postponement." The government objected, but the case was postponed to February, 1942, then to March, and is now set for trial on June 15. The dollar-a-year defendant whose time might be wasted by the trial is Dr. Zay Jeffries. Dr. Jeffries has been in Washington since February, 1941, as chairman of the metals' conservation and substitution group of the Advisory Committee on Metals and Minerals of the National Academy of Sciences, and is a War Production Board consultant on metals. Despite his supposed absence from work Dr. Jeffries was paid $15,500 in salary and $12,600 in bonuses by General Electric in 1941, in his dual capacity as technical director of G. E.'s lamp department (defendant in another anti-trust action) and chairman of the board of Carboloy.

As chairman of the board of Carboloy, Dr. Jeffries was in a position to know that its basic patents on tungsten carbide were declared invalid by the courts about two years ago and could be taken over by the government at any time. I doubt whether he ever so far forgot his private loyalties as to make this part of his advice as a government consultant. I do know of another case overlooked by both the Truman committee and the patents committee which gives some indication of the advice he offers. Last year the Truman committee heard of the run-around given to a man named Gaudy who held a patent for making aluminum from common clay, a method successfully used in Germany and Italy. Thurman Arnold testified last week that several years ago Alcoa bought up a patent of this kind for a million dollars and never used the process in production. Alcoa's monopoly is based on its possession of all the high-grade bauxite in the Western Hemisphere. Its monopoly would be undermined by a method for making aluminum from clay. The Truman committee last year heard that a Dr. Zay Jeffries at the National Academy of Sciences had made a report on this subject but never followed the lead any farther. Inquiry by this correspondent reveals (1) that though Dr. Jeffries has been working for General Electric since 1914, he also worked for the Aluminum Company of America from 1916 to 1936; and (2) that Dr. Jeffries submitted an unfavorable report on the Gaudy patent, although Bureau of Mines experts were for it and TVA had been using a similar patent successfully. This is the dollar-a-year man in the tungsten-carbide case whose time must not be taken up with embarrassing anti-trust questions.

1942 or Never

BY J. ALVAREZ DEL VAYO

MUCH has been said about the second front in recent months, and much more will be said in the months to come. The subject stirs all those who understand that this war is not a game, who look for some way out of the anguish of wanting the war to be won and not knowing how to win it. The people feel the force and logic of the growing demand for a second front while Russia's armies retain their fighting strength. Of course everyone has admired the spirit of the R. A. F. in bombing incessantly the German industrial centers at the moment when the Nazi armies seemed to be marching without halt toward the heart of Russia. In our desire to see the Allies undertake some action that would indicate the flowering of a more aggressive spirit, we all responded with enthusiasm every time a suicide patrol broke the siesta of the occupation forces in Norway or on the coast of France. And our feelings were justified. All that was heroic, useful, encouraging. But it was not enough. Even night bombing on a mass scale, from which the British, from Winston Churchill down, hoped so much and which they even looked upon as an alternative to a second front, has proved less effective than was expected. As to the exploits of the suicide patrols, they would be most valuable as a complement to an offensive or as part of a campaign of guerrilla warfare, but today it is clear that neither bombings nor raids will introduce irreparable disorder in Hitler's plans, finally snatching the initiative from him.

The clamor for a second front is not going to diminish; on the contrary, it will become overwhelming as soon as the stupendous struggle on the Russian front regains its former intensity. Until we see emerging from somewhere a force comparable with the Russian army in power to resist the totalitarian war machine, Russia will continue to polarize the hopes of all those who desire, above every other thing, to win the war. The psychology of the people has been transformed by the events of the last two years, and it will be useless for those who oppose support of Russia, or would prefer to see it reduced or conditioned, to try to stir the ashes of old apprehensions and antagonisms. In that field Hitler's speculation will fail even more completely than in the military field: if the plan to smash Russia in six months proved a ridiculous fantasy, the hope of politically isolating the Soviet Union reveals a still greater miscalculation. The time has passed when such slogans of defeat as "Better Hitler than Léon Blum" and "Better Hitler plus Franco than the Spanish reds" could deceive a people facing the Nazi threat. The person who today cries, "Better a stalemate or a negotiated peace than a Russian victory," only identifies himself as an irresponsible idiot or a traitor.

Those who doubt this should look at the British press of the last few months—not merely the Daily Herald or the News Chronicle or any other liberal or labor daily, but the great conservative press. The most recent attitude of that press can be expressed in some such phrase as this: "If only we win the war, we don't care who commands—Wavell or Timoshenko." Some of those who set down such brave words may not be as indifferent as they pretend. But for the majority of the British people, yes!

The demand for a second major front has been gaining not only in extent but in authority. At the beginning it was mainly a popular movement of sympathy for the stand of the Russian people, a movement from below, naturally encouraged by the Communists. The ordinary man, especially in England where the effects of the Russian resistance were more directly felt, asked feverishly at the beginning of the winter for a diversion which could save Leningrad and Moscow. The reserve with which that demand was met by the high command did not impress the man in the street. He had seen military experts go wrong in many crucial instances—to begin with, that of the Russian resistance itself—and he had seen the General Staff strike in places where an offensive extinguished itself as soon as it was started. Later, in the Riom trial, he followed the duel between Daladier and his generals, in which the former French Premier charged them with having pretended at various times that they lacked sufficient war material to undertake an action when in fact the stores were full of munitions and tanks which had not been sent to the front.

As time has passed, the demand for a second front has found more sophisticated support. Doubt of old strategic concepts has penetrated even the professional military ranks. Soldiers as well as common people begin to be irritated by the realization that each day brings its new defeat, and that one can hope for good news only in the Russian communiqué. The popular impression that if no change is made the Allies will lose the war is strengthened by the criticism of military men themselves, who can no longer refrain from speaking their minds even if the general staffs remain unconvinced. The excellent book by Lieutenant Colonel Kernan, "Defense Will Not Win the War," has rapidly become almost a classic of the new strategy; and there are many other officers of the army and the navy, in Great Britain as in the United States, who maintain the same position. And in the space of two weeks three so different authoritative voices as those of Mr. Litvinov, General Sikorsky, and Dr. V. K. Wellington Koo pronounced themselves in favor of the second front—while reports of the concentration of new German troops along the Russian frontier became more and more alarming. The demand has thus become the most vital issue in the clash of two strategic concepts, an issue on which depends the very outcome of the war.

The man in the street is the more convinced, now that he has authority to back his hopes and intuitions. He tells himself that when a statesman and commander like General Sikorsky, whom no European Dies committee has ever classified as red and who is a member of the Inter-Allied Council, asks for a second front, it must be for reasons good enough to outweigh the dangers. Neither can he imagine that the Soviet government, to which the other Allied governments may be assumed to have stressed the difficulties of a second front, would insist on it through its diplomatic representatives unless the Russian leaders believed in its practicability. And he assumes that those leaders must know as exactly about the problem of shipping, always put forward as the greatest obstacle to an invasion of Europe, as the officials who oppose them. For his part, the common man believes that if ships were found to carry more than 700,000 men safely to the Near East and to the Pacific, it should not be impossible to find the necessary tonnage for a much shorter expedition—for instance, to Portugal. And it is precisely through Portugal, and through that Spain which continues to be potentially at war with Hitler and with Franco, that the popular imagination, especially on the other side of the Atlantic, visualizes the irruption of the Allied forces into the occupied countries of Europe.

Naturally, considering the losses suffered by the British merchant marine and the far from completed American building program, we cannot hope to find enough ships to meet the demands of all the fronts. This must be admitted. But if the importance of striking in Europe in 1942 is recognized by the general staffs, they will accept the hard necessity of cutting off supplies from England and the Pacific for a few months. This would imply many sacrifices. Ships which now carry food to Great Britain, and ammunition and reinforcements to the Far East, would have to be devoted to preparing the great blow in Europe. The English would be obliged to eat less; but in Spain the people endured their hunger through almost three years of war, subsisting on a little bread and rice and even less fish. It would mean also that every one of the United Nations would stand ready to sacrifice its own immediate national interest to the common requirement of victory. It is only a matter of knowing how to choose.

If popular logic had prevailed over the sophisticated wisdom of statesmen, the world might have been spared this cataract of blood. The common man has always sensed the futility of expecting "preparations" to catch up with racing events. Today he asks himself whether, if such extreme difficulties in shipping exist in 1942, they may not still exist or be even more serious in 1943 and 1944. But a question he asks himself even more earnestly is what forces can take the place of the Russian army in the Battle of Europe that must finally bring about the defeat of the Axis if in the meantime Russia has been vanquished or eliminated as an effective factor in the war. It is not a question of idealizing the Russian army; not a question of suggesting that well-equipped and well-commanded British and Americans will not be capable of fighting as well as the Russians. But can anybody seriously think that a British-American expeditionary force, disembarking in 1943 or 1944 at the best imaginable point in Europe, could accomplish the job of an army trained in a life-and-death struggle with the Nazis, operating from its own soil with a whole nation behind it? Once the Russian army is destroyed, there will be no serious chance of opening a second front in Europe. On the other hand, with the Russian army at its full strength and with the United Nations throwing their entire weight into the battle, there is a chance not only of stopping the Axis drive but of breaking Hitler sooner than many people think possible. Under one condition: that they strike this year and wherever it is possible to strike. Because in my conception a second front does not mean a single second front. If it is practicable to strike at the same time through Portugal and Spain, along the French coast, and through Norway, so much the better. To open a second front means to utilize all the present resources of the United Nations at the moment when Hitler launches his next blow, to provoke a diversion and division of his forces, to give him hell from one corner of Europe to another.

Certainly the enterprise implies tremendous risks, but no risk could be greater than that involved in the collapse of the army that until now has proved the only one able to stop the Nazis. Should an expeditionary force, which need not be of millions, suffer a serious setback, it would not mean the end of the war any more than did the disaster of Dunkirk or the collapse of France or any of the major defeats in the Pacific. But the smashing of Russia, or even the conquest of the Baku oil fields, leaving the Red Army incapable of fighting a real war, would mean that Hitler had destroyed the Allies' chance to defeat him in Europe.

Of course in 1943 or in 1944 an Allied expeditionary force could be sent into action better equipped and better trained than would be possible today, and many more ships would then be available. Unhappily, while we build ships and equip and train our forces, the Axis will be doing the same thing. And even if the Allied preparations went ahead at greater speed, it is a serious question whether Britain and America together could within two or three years produce sufficient material to compensate for the loss of the Russian armies with all their equipment, and of Russia's great industrial plant.

In discussing the value of an Allied offensive, the growing unrest and hate against Nazism cannot be ignored. The opening of a second front—or of several new fronts—in Europe would demand the full unleashing of political warfare and a swift revision of the diplomacy of the democracies. However powerful it might be, an expeditionary force could be gravely weakened if it found itself hampered by the lack of a realistic policy toward the puppet regimes and the surviving neutrals. That applies equally in 1942 and 1944, and without regard to the place where an attack might be launched. An army of liberation should be able to move as necessity dictates unhampered by political compromises and diplomatic maneuvers. One cannot imagine such an army operating successfully in Western Europe if its leaders are forced to take care lest they injure the Nazi patriotism of General Franco or Chief of Government Laval. Effective action presupposes the ending of all the ambiguous situations which could otherwise be used by Hitler to tip the scales in his favor. On the other hand, a daring political offensive would assure formidable and delirious support for the expeditionary army from all the conquered peoples.

If a major Russian defeat would reduce to an incalculable degree the chances of Allied military victory, from a psychological point of view its effect would be no less catastrophic. The emotion with which the efforts of the Red Army have been followed during six months of general misfortune arises not only from admiration for Russian gallantry and competence. It has a deeper source: once more the peoples of the earth have seen an entire nation moving as a single man against terrible odds. The feeling that has crystallized around Russia is of the same sort that surrounded the Spanish epic and that would have gone out toward France if in June of 1940, instead of declaring Paris an open city, the government had given the people a chance to rise to their patriotic and revolutionary traditions. Many things have been said about the spirit of the Russians in this war, but nothing has better conveyed the difference between the temper of Russia and of other countries than the irritated tone in which Sir Stafford Cripps, addressing Parliament in his new capacity as Leader of the House, pronounced himself against "business as usual," "pleasure as usual." One felt that he had fresh before his eyes the vision of a country where the people were all in the front line, where nobody shrank from destroying the fruits of twenty years' effort, knowing that nothing was worth saving in case of a Hitler victory and that any price was worth paying to help bring his downfall.

It would mean tremendous disillusionment and despair for the peoples of the free and occupied nations if such a country and such an army were allowed to be destroyed without the greatest effort to keep them in the struggle. In this war, perhaps more than in any other, enthusiasm is war material as valuable as planes and tanks.

Often I have been told, "You talk about enthusiasm in war. How would you define it?" Very simply, by recalling one happening in the Spanish war. At a very difficult moment of the fight in Catalonia "El Campesino," the popular Loyalist commander and a real peasant himself, was sitting in the hall of a hotel in Barcelona waiting to be called to the War Office. People surrounded his table. "Is there any professor here?" asked El Campesino. There was a professor—of astronomy. "Astronomy?" said El Campesino. "Well, for this case it will do all right. Tell me, professor, is it the truth, as somebody in my brigade told me one day, that there was once in history a war of thirty years?" "Yes," replied the professor. "Are you sure?" and his eyes began to brighten. "Of course," replied the professor. And El Campesino, with a great burst of joy, cried, "Then we are saved!"

That is enthusiasm in war. That is what Russia has, what China has, what Spain had. But El Campesino was wrong, not in his spirit but in his calculations. Spain was not allowed thirty years in which to win, and neither are the United Nations. It will be 1942—or never.

Shall We Draft Women?

BURLINGAME PUBLIC LIBRARY Burlingame, Calif.

BY MAXWELL S. STEWART

IN THE United States, in sharp contrast to the situation in England, Russia, and China, the war has so far been predominantly a man's war. An enormous amount of feminine energy has gone into rolling bandages for the Red Cross, knitting sweaters, air-raid-precaution work, first-aid courses, and motor-corps-auxiliary activities; but all this, though of undoubted value, is on the periphery of the war effort. In coming months, if the war is to be won, American women will have to contribute a very large part of the additional effort demanded of us by total war. Unfortunately, few people, men or women—if we are to judge by press comments and ordinary conversation—have as yet any comprehension of the nature and extent of that effort. There is not even agreement on policy in high government circles.

Women will be needed in huge numbers in our war factories before the end of this year. Women will also have to take over such civilian jobs as running elevators, street cars, and buses and operating light machinery in order that men may be released for the army and for heavy work in the war industries. The situation confronting us, in a nutshell, is as follows: At the beginning of this year approximately 5,000,000 persons were employed in our war industries. By the end of the year, if we are to attain the production goals set by the President, at least 15,000,000 must be employed directly in war work. During the same period selective service is expected to take some 2,200,000 men out of industry and agriculture for our fighting forces. To meet the tremendous demands which the war has imposed upon us, it is estimated that 8,400,000 workers can be shifted from civilian to war jobs. Another 1,500,000 can be drawn from the ranks of the unemployed. The normal increase in population will provide half a million workers. A few tens of thousands of older men who had retired or were about to retire can be put back on the job. But most of the remaining 2,000,000 jobs will have to be filled by women—and by women who are not now working outside their homes.

So far women have not entered the factories or otherwise taken over war jobs to anything like the extent they did in 1918. Of the 5,000,000 persons employed in war industries at the beginning of this year, only about 500,000 were women. In World War I about 2,000,000 women were directly engaged in war work. In 1941 only 4 women in every 1,000 were working in war industries; in 1918 the ratio was 21 to 1,000. In view of the tremendous industrial requirements of total warfare today as compared with those of 1918, it is probable that before we are through we shall have to exceed the 1918 ratio by a considerable margin.

A glance at the 1940 census figures will show us how we can meet our crucial man-power problem by the employment of women. Of the 50,350,000 women fourteen years of age or over, slightly less than one-quarter, or 12,850,000, were listed as in labor force, and of these 10,700,000 were gainfully employed. About 28,500,000 women were engaged solely in their own housework, and another 4,500,000 were in school or college. A considerable number of the women who do their own housework are young women with employment experience. Many of them have no children; many others have children past the age when they require constant care. There are also many hundreds of thousands of young unmarried women who are perfectly able to work outside their homes but have never felt the necessity for doing so. A substantial proportion of these are highly trained college women who are capable of adjustment to many kinds of skilled work.

Perhaps half as many women as will be required this year are already registered in one or another of our public employment offices. The United States Employment Service is analyzing the work records of these women in an effort to find out how many of them are available for jobs in the war industries. But it is evident that at least a million, and probably many more, of this year's war jobs will have to be filled by women who are not now looking for work and have no intention of going into a war factory. Several additional millions will be needed next year.

How to get suitable women for the jobs that must be filled is one of the crucial questions before us today. Women have given unstintingly of their time for all kinds of volunteer activities. But there is a vast difference between contributing a few spare hours a week to voluntary defense activities and working in a factory day in and day out until the war has been won. And it is the grind of factory work, rather than the volunteer activities, that we must depend on for ultimate victory.

No one can say just what proportion of the needed women can be obtained by appeals for voluntary enlistment. Few authorities believe that enough qualified women workers can be obtained by this means. It is generally felt that in this war, as in the last, the chief motive force driving women into war work will be economic pressure. We might as well face facts. Practically all the women who are now working are doing so because of necessity. This is particularly true of the women in factories. Of the 2,000,000 women engaged in some form of war work in the last war, a few may have been motivated primarily by patriotism; the majority were forced into it to support themselves or their families. With nearly 5,000,000 men in the armed services, many women had no choice but to seek work. The rapid rise in living costs during the war also tended to drive women out of their homes and schoolrooms into factories or government offices.

The same forces are already operating in this war, but they have been counterbalanced to some extent by generally improved economic conditions. Despite increased taxes and higher living costs, most American families are better off today than they were during the 1930's. Although figures are lacking, there is evidence that a considerable number of women who took jobs during the depression have given them up during the last year or so because the pressures which drove them into the labor market have lifted. It is possible that the curtailment in the sale of automobiles and the restrictions on home building will also restrain some women from looking for work, for many married women, especially among the middle classes, appear to have held jobs in order "to keep up with the Joneses." Any effort to enrol married women for regular work in industry, moreover, is bound to strike a snag in the present draft-deferment procedure. It is natural, if not indicative of the highest patriotism, for a woman to hesitate to take a job if by working she increases the chances of her husband's being drafted. Some change in selective-service procedure is imperative if married women are to be drawn fully into the war effort.

Nevertheless, it can hardly be denied that the coming year will see considerably greater pressure on women to seek work. As the draft reaches out for married men, more and more women will be forced into employment. Up to now the cost of living has risen only about 15 per cent, but once inflation get under way, it proceeds at an increasing pace. Next year's taxes may be double or triple this year's, particularly for low-income families. If the proposed increases in social-security taxation, the suggested plan for deferring wages, or a sales tax is adopted, the pressure on low-income families will become very heavy. It is possible that it will produce the millions of women workers required.

Official Washington seems inclined to wait and see whether these voluntary workers suffice before considering a plan for conscripting women for war work. Many persons, however, believe that conscription is not only necessary but preferable to voluntary methods. No individual, they argue, can possibly say where he or she can serve best in the war; the decision should be left to an impartial board which, after reviewing the person's capacities and responsibilities, should have the perspective for a fair judgment.

The experience of England in mobilizing the labor of women is especially pertinent here. England's traditions and practices with regard to women working are perhaps closer to ours than those of any other country. Largely because of these traditions the British government procrastinated, even as ours has done, in instituting a system of labor conscription applicable to women. But when the country was finally organized for all-out production, it found that its acute shortage in man-power could only be relieved by the employment of women under governmental direction and compulsion.

Compulsion has been applied charily and with no great hardship. Compulsory registration of women began in April, 1941. Girls twenty and twenty-one years of age registered first, but by now all women and girls between sixteen and thirty have been enrolled. Most of the twenty- and twenty-one-year-olds have been called up for the Auxiliary Territorial Service, to do various types of war work. About 20,000 women between twenty-one and thirty-five years of age are being placed in war industries each week. Most of these are transferred, with or without a period of training, from civilian to essential war industries. In some munitions plants women already compose 80 to 90 per cent of the workers. Forty per cent of the employees of some of the aircraft factories are women, and the ratio is growing. While women are used chiefly for light operations requiring accuracy and manual dexterity, an increasing number are being used in heavy machine operations—with no dire results.

From the beginning the British exempted women with children under fourteen, together with the wives of men in active service, from duty outside their homes. But since the country now faces a serious shortage of workers, this policy may have to be revised. As a means of expanding the labor supply the government is now casting a rather envious eye at the large number of married women whose domestic responsibilities make it impossible for them to accept full-time jobs but who might be available for part-time work. Organizing part-time work presents a number of difficult problems, but the difficulties are not insurmountable. Where the experiment has been tried, satisfactory arrangements have been worked out.

Children, particularly children under school age, have offered the chief obstacle to enrolling an adequate number of full-time and part-time women workers in the British war industries. Like this country, Britain had few day nurseries available for working mothers. A number were opened to meet the emergency, but efforts in this direction were hampered by lack of trained personnel. Steps are just now being taken in Britain to train nurses and supervisors for nurseries that should have been ready many months ago. Young children of school age also present a problem because the schools usually open several hours after the women have to go to work and close before they get back.

Both British and American experience shows that women have special domestic responsibilities, not borne by men, which must be taken into account if we expect to enlist any large number of women workers. In addition to cooking, taking care of the house, and rearing the children, women usually do the shopping for the family. These duties must be considered in arranging working hours for women. A six-day week may be necessary for men in war industries, but it is not practical for women. In a recent study of the number of working hours advisable in war time made at Princeton University a forty-hour week was recommended as most satisfactory for full-time women workers. Efforts to lengthen this work week have been found greatly to increase absenteeism among working women. Special precautions must also be taken to provide proper safeguards for health and safety. In order to preserve morale, if for no other reason, wage rates, including the entrance rate, should be the same as for men.

It is impossible to set forth at this time a complete program for the use of woman-power in the war effort. Many of the essential decisions regarding the disposition of man-power have not yet been made. We still do not know whether we shall need an army of six or of ten million men. We have not yet reached a decision regarding the conscription and placement of non-military male labor. Until these questions of general policy are decided, the details of a program for women cannot very well be formulated. But since there is no doubt about the need for huge numbers of women workers, there can be no excuse for failing to take certain preliminary steps which will enable us to avoid some of the painful delays experienced in Britain.

First of all, it is necessary to set up training courses which will prepare women for specialized work in the war factories. A start has already been made in this direction. The defense-training programs conducted by vocational schools, the NYA, and the training-within-industry program of the Labor Division of the War Production Board are open to women as well as men. But comparatively little has been done to bring these programs to the attention of women, or to set up courses specially adapted to women.

Although formulation of a plan for conscripting women for the war industries may not be desirable until the need for such action is more apparent, an inventory of our resources in woman-power should undoubtedly be made. For technical reasons it may be advisable to do this gradually as it was done in Britain. But there is no logical argument against registering women just as we are now registering men.

Finally, provision of adequate nursery-school facilities for the children of the women who are being drawn into employment should be undertaken at once. No other single measure would do more to release trained young women for vital war jobs. Plans might also be worked out for a system of part-time employment which would enable thousands of women now barred from accepting jobs to render effective aid in the war effort. Only subservience to an outworn tradition and a disposition to play politics prevent us from taking these essential steps while there is yet time.

Laval and Roosevelt

BY LOUIS FISCHER

SUMNER WELLES declared at his press conference last week that he could not receive the French Ambassador's rejection of the State Department's note of April 13 because the Ambassador's communication had previously been submitted to the Nazi authorities for approval. How can we remain on friendly relations with Vichy when its relations with us are filtered through Berlin and dictated by Hitler?

Mr. Welles recently went to Rio de Janeiro and persuaded many Latin American governments to break off relations with the Axis powers because those relations helped the Axis and harmed us. But Vichy helps the Axis. It has turned over vital French territories to Japan. We blacklist foreign firms and foreign subsidiaries of American firms which trade with Axis countries. But Vichy has admittedly supplied Rommel's armies in Libya. Don't we need consistency in our foreign policy?

What practical advantage can further relations with Vichy give us? It has been contended that by maintaining the tie with the authorities in unoccupied France we prevented or restrained Hitler from seizing the French war fleet. Now the French navy is a tremendous asset; it could alter the balance of the war. How could we achieve the important end of keeping it out of Hitler's hands? Obviously the few boatloads of wheat and oil we have shipped to France and North Africa could not do this. If it is true that our friendship for Vichy keeps the French navy in disuse, then either that relationship must be worth so much to Hitler that he is ready to forgo the French fleet or our friendship so strengthens the Vichy authorities that they can stand up to Hitler and refuse to surrender the fleet.

As long as we are friends of Vichy we cannot take military action against Dakar or any other territory controlled by Vichy. That must be a relief to Hitler. But can this be the full reason for Hitler's remarkable restraint toward the French navy?

At the time of the armistice not a few French politicians wished to prolong resistance against Germany. They would have formed a government in Africa and used the French fleet to aid the British. Germany's seizure of the fleet would have fanned this opposition and might have provoked an open mutiny of the French commanders and sailors. Hitler, shrewdly recognizing that he must not try the impossible and hoping soon to knock out the British and end the war, therefore stipulated in the armistice agreement that the French navy was to gather in French ports, be demobilized under German and Italian control, and "lay up." He was afraid that it might somehow come into British hands or be used to establish nuclei of hostility to him in the French empire. Knowing that Marshal Pétain and General Weygand wished to keep the French colonies, Hitler provided in the armistice that units of the French navy might be "released to the French government for protection of French interests in its colonial empire."

These two motives still inspire Hitler: on the one hand, he fears that any attempt to grab the French fleet would enflame the French public and endanger the ships —they could be gutted or scuttled by their crews; on the other hand, he hopes that the Vichy French themselves may some day use the fleet against the United Nations. This is the clue to the reappointment of Pierre Laval.

Hitler will be busy during the coming season. He will fight hard in Russia. He may drive into the Near East and approach Syria. The Allies may invade France with commandos or larger concentrations. If the democracies win this war, that ends Laval's career. He therefore must help Hitler to win. Germany is pressed for time and man-power. It is in need of more active collaboration from France. Laval is the man of Hitler's tenth hour.

Hitler has a profound faith in Quislings. He does not regard any country as unalterably anti-German or anti-Nazi. Ever since June, 1940, he has been trying to forge a French government supine and disloyal enough to reenter the war, this time on the side of Germany. Then a French government, not the Axis, would use the French fleet against the enemies of Germany. To get France to fight for Germany after it had refused to fight for itself is a difficult and delicate task, and Hitler has handled it with much patience. Now he seems to think either that the time is ripe or that the task is hopeless. That is the meaning of the return of Laval.

What is America's duty in this Laval crisis? First, however, what was America's role in the French situation before this crisis? Pétain has assiduously cultivated United States friendship. Why? Because to Frenchmen America has become a symbol of opposition to Hitler. Whenever Pétain or Darlan was accused of being pro-German, he could reply: But we are on cordial terms with the United States. It is significant, in this connection, that Laval, the day the news came of his return to power, made a public statement courting America. The continuation of diplomatic relations with America would enable Laval to do his pro-Nazi work under a protective cloak marked: The United States Embassy in Vichy.

Pétain has used that cloak too. The question which President Roosevelt must now decide is whether he should let Laval continue to use it in the plain service of Hitler. The magic name of America apparently has a potent hold on French sentiment and French public opinion. Can it not be employed to embarrass Laval and Hitler instead of helping them? Pétain did enough for Germany. Laval, obviously, intends to do more. Otherwise he would not have replaced Pétain as chief of the French government. Should we lend him the name of America to do this? Or should President Roosevelt go on the radio and speak in French to the French people and tell them that Laval is Hitler and that America therefore is breaking off relations with Laval and the betrayers of France. If friendship with the United States is an asset to Vichy we can turn it against Vichy. Otherwise, some day, using the pretense of a British air or amphibian raid on French soil, Laval will officially put France into the war against us, and then it will be too late to throw our prestige and influence with the French public into the balance against Hitler. We can do it today, perhaps tomorrow. But we cannot do it when the French in both zones are more completely gagged than they are now.

Washington has believed that by buttressing Pétain it checked Hitler. But Pétain, after appointing Laval, has appealed to all Frenchmen to support Laval. And Laval has no known desire to check Hitler—on the contrary. If we continue to buttress Pétain we buttress Laval, and we aid Hitler while preparations go on apace to bring France into the war as a pro-Axis belligerent. When Pétain and Laval were at odds there might have been some little sense in dealing with Pétain. But collaboration between Pétain and Laval obviously means more French collaboration with the Nazis. How can the United States government be a partner to this? Since we presumably have some weight with the French public, we should turn to it as the only possible obstacle to Hitler-Laval-Pétain schemes. Just as Churchill once addressed the Italian people by radio, President Roosevelt should speak to the French nation over the heads of its Nazi-made rulers and urge them to refrain from going into the war on Germany's side and against America.

Before this year ends, American troops may invade France. Their success will depend on their weapons, training, and courage—but also on the reception they get from the French people. America must have a clean record toward France. It must not be recorded that we helped Laval sell out France to Hitler.

The Dismal Reich

BY ZACHARIAH SHUSTER

THE general impression one gets from reading the official Nazi press is that though the Germans have conquered Europe, they are depressed and sad, so sad that the Propaganda Ministry cannot cover it up. Even the reports of Germany's victories written by official war correspondents contain no note of triumph but are tinged rather with weariness and nostalgia. The following excerpt from a story printed in Das Reich, the official paper of the Propaganda Ministry, illustrates the prevalent tone of the reports from the eastern front.

> Where are the happy French towns, in whose cool cellars the dusty bottles awaited us? Where is the deserted house of the notary with the grandfather clock and the soft, wide beds and the clean linen in the closets? Where are even the chimneys of Poland, its breweries, its vodka distilleries? In the U. S. S. R. there are no gay districts, no bountiful cellars, no pianos, tablecloths, or bells. Brother, take your staff and drag through your day's wandering with your half-loaf of bread and your small tin of sausage.

A soldier serving as official correspondent wrote thus of the Russian campaign:

> Endless is this land and endless the sky, roads without end in an infinite waste. One village resembles the other, one city is like another, everywhere the same women and children standing silently at the roadside, > everywhere the same wells and courtyards. Who knows whether we are making progress? When the column gets off the road and marches over the fields, guided only by the compass, we feel like world wanderers tossed about in an ocean of land, seeking new shores. And even this aimless gazing on vast spaces is the privilege only of the men in the first vehicles. All those behind are covered with a cloud of dust. The whites of the eyes glare strangely from the dry, dust-covered faces, and the parched lips refrain from talk and laughter. The motors whir or sigh; the axles and wheels groan; the army marches ceaselessly to the battle thundering in the distance.

A sense of unconquerable Russian spaces, of a wide "ocean of land" with the shores far, far away, is expressed in almost all descriptions of Russia. One gets the impression that the Nazi soldiers behind the lines are infected with the apathy that is usually ascribed to the Russians. The writer just quoted mentions also the glorious victories that have been won despite the enemy's stubborn resistance, but in the background of his factual report lurks a sense of emotional helplessness which may in the long run be a strong factor in the disintegration of Nazi morale. The same report ends with, "Yes, endless is this country, endless is its sky, endless, however, is also the dark fate with which it is burdened."

An account of an evening spent by Nazi soldiers on the Russian battlefield, also printed in Dr. Goebbels's paper, is saturated with human but un-Nazi-like sentiment:

> The darkness hovers mercifully over the lonely huts and stables, and the eternal guard of stars spreads out over the heavens. We talk of wives, girls, and children: of the wives thoughtfully, of the girls boldly and hungrily, and of the children almost shyly. Pictures pass from hand to hand; letters are read aloud; and gradually we learn about each other, how it is at home and how one feels deep down in his heart. Nowhere else do men unloose their tongues as they do on the battlefield. Never afterward will one permit another to look so deeply into his innermost thoughts. . . . When a man has fallen, our thoughts wander back to his family, and for their sake we should like to call back the irrevocable. . . . After we have spoken of him sufficiently, silence descends, and with this silence he returns to our midst and shows his quiet face ennobled by death.

This emphasis on the dreariness and longing of the individual soldier submerged in a mighty and interminable conflict is characteristic of most of the recent war correspondence. Of course, there are stories of heroism, too. Much is written about conquered bridgeheads, occupied industrial centers, the soldiers' great endurance under the enemy's ceaseless and "bestial" fire. Yet even here one feels the same emotional undercurrent.

Back on the home front that wizard of propaganda, Dr. Goebbels, is often more revealing than he intends to be. He betrays how gaiety has vanished from German faces by appealing to his people to force artificial smiles for the sake of the heroes returning from battle. This appeal, published in Das Reich, was properly entitled, On Smiling in War Time. The author, Hans Joachim Kitzing, introduced his subject with the observation that when the soldier comes home on a short leave "there is a gleam in his eyes and a smile about his lips." And how is he received? What do the people at home tell him, and what is the expression on their faces? In Herr Kitzing's words:

> After the soldier has told his story, he is ready to listen. The people at home also have much to tell, even more, it appears, than the soldiers. It would be good if they also would smile while telling of air raids, of waiting in queues, of the shortage of one article or another that enriches life. In most cases, however, the narrators of these hardships are glum. Only the listening soldier smiles, because to him all this appears trivial compared to the events in which he has participated. . . . The soldier may be led to think that life at home consists only of a chain of deprivations. . . .

This admission by the mouthpiece of the Minister of Propaganda and Enlightenment is followed by a long exhortation on the value of smiling even against one's natural inclinations. "Life is serious and passing," Dr. Goebbels philosophizes, "but the smile remains forever."

The Propaganda Ministry naturally tries hard to counteract grumbling, criticism, and all kinds of hostile undercurrents, but in doing so it is compelled to unveil at least part of the real picture of present-day Germany. In a leading article in Das Reich Goebbels himself pleaded with the people to endure with greater equanimity the hardships imposed upon them. He said:

> This does not mean by any means that we cannot discuss among ourselves the vicissitudes of the time. Even occasional cursing and scolding are not considered a crime against the state. If a person complains about this or that or gives vent to his anger, his conduct is understandable in the light of the thousand unpleasant by-products of the war. But a little thought will bring even the most stupid ones around to the realization that the government is not always at fault. Although it can do many things it cannot make the weather. When the winter is terribly long, the potato sprouts come up later than usual. One may be impatient and do some scolding, but that will not cause the potatoes to grow faster. And the government does not smoke the cigarettes which we now constantly lack; the public smokes 25 per cent more than before the war, and our tobacco industry is simply incapable of keeping pace with the demand.

He then delivered a long tirade against the British, who, he said, were bent upon utilizing this situation to destroy German morale.

That there is grave anxiety among the mothers of Berlin about the fate of their evacuated children is clearly shown by an article in Das Reich written by a child specialist to convince the mothers of the capital that the high mortality of children in the evacuation camps is not due to conditions in the camps. From his article we learn that more than 130,000 children were evacuated from Berlin in the spring of 1941. The mortality rate among them, the learned doctor asserted, was lower than the statistical tables of previous years indicated for children at home. The mothers should therefore be grateful for the extra children kept alive in the camps and not grumble about the deaths.

Poetic reactions to the current world scene appear frequently in the Nazi press, many of them charged with melancholy. Here is a prose translation of a poem written on the eastern battle line and published in Das Reich. The poet is Gerhart Schumann.

> Also over this gray and dreary land sinks down a night. We have buried the dead, the dead of our battle. Among the dark crosses the cold guns stretch. Someone is silently looking for a comrade's hand. Strange, in the swamps and woods a horrible anguish crushes us. O blue hills of Swabia. O silvery Bodensee. The sky is empty as the earth. Has it not one star? . . . Two gleaming stars bend earnestly and fervently to me—your face, your sorrowful smile, your eyes, beloved.

The present mood of the conquering Germans is well summed up in an article that appeared in the Goebbels organ under the title Die Deutsche Stimmung (The German State of Mind):

> In this war the surface of the German soul does not reflect the great events taking place at the front. In this fact lies the great difference, as all older people say, between the present and the First World War. . . . Then there was really such a thing as a German Stimmung. A man of that time who returned to Germany now without knowledge of the fundamental changes which have taken place since would certainly be astonished. Hardly a sign would betray whether the High Command of the army had just published a scanty report or had announced a great victory. The burning feelings to which the times have accustomed us remain beneath the surface. Is there a lack of courage? Are we indifferent and fatalistic? The general reserve, the concealment of feelings, the absolutely matter-of-fact attitude to the war do not arise from any lack of inner sharing. They are a new form of steadfastness which has been developed by our generation.

This mystical "inner sharing" which the Nazi government accepts as a satisfactory explanation for the complete indifference to victories, the vanished smiles, and the endless apathy in which the master race finds itself after all its triumphs belongs to the vague terminology introduced by the Nazis into political life. But the language used cannot disguise the realities of life or the reaction of these realities upon the German people.

In the Wind

A RECENT INCIDENT at Fort Bragg in North Carolina throws an interesting sidelight on army race relations. Several hundred white troops were gathered to hear a lecture on venereal infection by a camp chaplain. The same lecture was scheduled to be delivered to a Negro contingent at a later hour. But shortly after the talk for whites had begun, an officer interrupted the meeting to announce that the Negroes had by some mistake arrived outside the hall. He said that the hall would hold both groups but that he personally objected to a mixed audience and that if one other soldier shared his sentiments, he would order the Negroes to await their turn. Not one soldier objected. The officer reluctantly admitted the Negroes but seated them at the rear with four empty rows to separate them from the whites.

SOME OBSERVERS of isolationist tactics believe that the Ford-Lindbergh collaboration at Willow Run may have more political significance than was at first apparent. An effort will be made, they say, to build Lindbergh up as the genius of assembly-line bomber production and to reinstate the ex-colonel as a patriot by having him ferry the first plane out of the new plant to one of the fighting fronts.

GOVERNOR TALMADGE of Georgia has announced that he is opposed to a bill now before Congress that would allow $300,000,000 of federal funds to be turned over to state educational institutions. "If federal funds were appropriated," he says, "you would have the problem of coeducation of the races immediately. And that's something Georgia don't stand for."

THE BOSTON GLOBE'S information department received and published a letter from a woman who sought advice on how she could get transportation to Germany. She explained that she was an American citizen who had married a German. Her husband and two sons had joined the Nazi army. She was convinced, she said, that she was on Hitler's side in "the war against communism and the Jews" and so she would appreciate any assistance that could be given to help her take part in it.

THE NEWSLETTER City Reporter has compiled statistics on the relative circulation of isolationist and pro-Administration newspapers in New York City. It estimates that the papers still publishing isolationist propaganda have a circulation more than three times as great as the others.

MERWIN K. HART, head of the New York State Economic Council, was reported in this column three weeks ago as one of the indorsers of the early Nazi propaganda pamphlet, "Communism in Germany." Mr. Hart did not sign that statement, but Archibald Stevenson, his attorney and the vice-president of the council, did.

War Poems

BY MARK VAN DOREN

The Single Hero

This man kept courage when the map of fear
Was continents, was paleness to the poles,
Was Jupiter milk white, was Venus burning.
The very stones lay liquid with despair,
And the firm earth was bottomless. This man

Could walk upon the water; nay, he stamped
Till the drops graveled, till a sound returned
Of pillars underheel, of granite growing.
This man, alone on seas, was not afraid.
So continents came back. So color widened:

Bands upon blankness. So the other men,
The millions, lifted feet and let them down;
And the soil held. So courage's cartographer,
Having his globe again, restored each mass,
Each meadow. And grasshoppers sang to him.

Total War

For the gray temples, for the slippered feet
That bounded such a life as, bent to grace,
Looks brittle now, looks breakable, the word
Nevertheless is shatter; the shocked face

Must fly on other errands, the pale shins
Must brown, must bruise themselves, and all that trunk
Be fragments; the cohesive thought be shrapnel
Peppering cold skies. The sands are sunk

That pedestaled our figure, that as one
Mock granite sounded echo to our soul;
Whose end is now this grit, these million grains
That star a blackened heaven, where no whole

Ever again may shape. Yet, gentlemen,
Be shivered. What was habit now is myth,
Is mumbling. Let it go. A huger form
Waits round the world: man still, and monolith.

Christmas, 1941

The millions at this solstice
Who cannot see the long,
The white days coming:
To them no song

Except the death of others,
By bullet or by ice,
In dark Malayan waters
Or where the North Sea mice
Eat hawsers, and a howling
Wind from pole to pole
Brings minute word of bleeding,
Of the surrendered soul;

Of agony that nothing
Is song enough to soothe
Except of million others
The strong death news.

The Doomsters

The difference they prophesy,
If utter, disappoints the fear;
Apprehension only starves,
Staring at too far a year:
Feeding upon too changed a woe
From any that time's children know.

If relative, a law decides:
From this to that, so many causes.
Whereupon the fear grows fat;
Then midway of its feasting pauses:
Recognition stales the fare
Sooner than panic can prepare.

Too strange, a blank; too known, a foe
Familiarity refuses.
Experience lies down with doom,
That sleeps again, as history uses.
The difference they weep and sing
Is nothing, or is everything.

Hollywood Paris

THE LAST TIME I SAW PARIS. By Elliot Paul. Random House. $2.75.

FOR eighteen years, on and off, Elliot Paul lived in a small hotel in the rue de la Huchette, went to his newspaper jobs in the Chicago Tribune and New York Herald offices, wrote his books (which number fourteen), got drunk (and according to his own accounts very happily and stupendously drunk), aroused sentiments of loyalty and affection in the hearts of the people among whom he lived, and learned to play the concertina—as brilliantly, incidentally, as I have ever heard it played. This book records the personal histories of the French people of that little street during the years the author knew them, supplemented by a sound—if rather sketchy—contemporaneous political history of France. It opens in the year 1923, and except for those relatively brief periods which the author spent in the United States and Spain, it takes the reader consecutively through to the spring of 1940, when the first Nazi tank units crossed the Pont St. Michel and entered the rue de la Huchette.

It is evident that Elliot Paul lived simply and with tenderness among the inhabitants of that little street, just as he lived—as his "Life and Death of a Spanish Town" bears ample witness—among the Spanish people in Spain. It is evident, too, that he was through choice a part of a Frenchman's, not an American's, Paris; by instinct he preferred the bistrot du coin to the Cafe de la Paix or even to the Dôme. Nor has he any particular interest in celebrities, as such. Only on page 392 does a short, hasty list appear in which the names of celebrities and nonentities are genially intermixed, and nowhere in the book—let it be set down to his everlasting credit—is there an anecdote about Joyce, Gertrude Stein, Picasso, or Ernest Hemingway. He refers to the surrealists as "a group of talented literary clowns," and calls André Breton "a windbag who could write like hell when he wanted to." For Elliot Paul's concern was not with art, or even with literature, but with the French people, their daily living and their daily argument.

In view of all this, it would seem that Paul's present book might very well contribute one chapter to a history which we badly need: that is, a personal record—over an almost twenty-year period—of a people who will never cease to be of profound and passionate interest to Americans. There is, indeed, no reason why this book should not have gone far toward divesting the French of their foreignness for those Americans to whom the quality of the French spirit is still unknown. There is no reason why such an essentially human document might not have served to reestablish not only Frenchmen's prejudices and peculiarities but the obvious fact of their inseparability from the rest of mankind.

This would be the veracious artist's first concern; it has, regrettably, not been Elliot Paul's. For all his indulgence of and his affection for the long cast of characters of whom he writes, he has viewed them with the canny eye of the metteur en scène. He has managed to serve them only as clever make-up man, and their true substance has nowhere been set down. He has accentuated the length of their mustaches, the shortness of their waists, played up their mannerisms, presented their purely human characteristics in such a way as to make them appear national eccentricities. We become acquainted with sixty or more French women and men in the pages of this book, and they are all very droll and recognizably "froggy" figures, rigged out, it might be, for the Hollywood conception of a typical little-street-in-Paris scene. They are so picturesque and so quaint that they end by being grotesque; and it follows without question that the suicides, the tragedies, the loves and deaths of freaks are without dignity, and their politics must seem as futile to us as their defeat. In short, Paul's knowledge of the French people is as superficial as his knowledge of their tongue.

Among the minor but persistent annoyances in the book are (1) the translation, possibly humorous in intent but none the less tiresome, of every French word or phrase—examples: "numero (number)," "alors, toi? (well, you?)," "canaille (rabble)," "Vive la France! (Long live France!)"; (2) the constant misstatements made for the sake of humor or to fit in with the uninitiated American's idea of what living conditions in France must be—examples: Frenchmen's complete ignorance of modern plumbing, Quaker Oats, and grapefruit, cocktails are so strange to them that they choke on the olive in the martini, Paris water is unfit for drinking (had Mr. Paul said that Paris water was not generally used for drinking, I think no one would have objected, but Paris is known to have the best drinking water of all the European capitals—with the possible exception of Vienna—and excellent drinking water it is); (3) the appalling errors in French grammar; (4) the continual references to pre-war France's state of decay. These last, proffered by Mr. Paul without amplification, seem to be scarcely a conclusion he arrived at during those pre-war years of observation of French behavior but repetition of a facile phrase which has become familiar to us all during the last year or two.

That Elliot Paul has failed to write either an interesting or an authentic book is not due to lack of affection on his part for the French of the rue de la Huchette or to lack of feeling for the French people's cause. It is due rather to his own tragic inability to write about people—and by this I mean any people—with the same unequivocal artlessness with which he apparently lives in their midst. The word tragic is not out of place here, for Paul's obviously great capacity for responding with warmth to the needs of mankind, his ability to arouse love and loyalty in others, and his instinct for the unfortunate, the exploited, and the suppressed are worthy of a less careless and touristic rendering.

"The Republic" in Basic

THE REPUBLIC OF PLATO: A NEW VERSION FOUNDED ON BASIC ENGLISH. By I. A. Richards. W. W. Norton and Company. $2.50.

HOW TO READ A PAGE. By I. A. Richards. W. W. Norton and Company. $2.50.

BASIC English is like the Mona Lisa: any serious consideration of its merits is disturbed by the wish to forget both the weight of convention and the lure of rebellious dissent. It does not help one to make up one's mind about Basic English that this limited language is addressed to foreigners in the hope of making world communication easier. The question always remains whether any important understanding depends on the extent and difficulty of a vocabulary or on something else not so readily controlled.

In his new version of Plato's "Republic" Mr. Richards adopts the former hypothesis, without, however, adhering strictly to Basic English. He uses more verbs than the list allows and thus avoids the "noun plague" that characterizes Basic. As he told readers of The Nation in the issue of March 28, he wants to make Plato's debate on government accessible to the widest possible circle of readers—readers who he thinks are always alienated by the leisurely pace and full flourishes of the original and its translations. He has therefore cut, condensed, and retranslated with an eye to simplicity.

The result does not strike me as fulfilling his intention. Setting aside objections of detail, I am more than ever convinced by this new version that the ease with which a presumed lowbrow will take to a classic does not depend wholly or even mainly on forms of speech. It depends rather on the familiarity or unfamiliarity of the ideas and their sequence. A great popular writer—say, Dickens or Conan Doyle—can use big words and involved constructions and still be widely understood, because what these point to is relatively commonplace. A difficult writer—say, Henry James in "The Ambassadors"—can use short words and short sentences and still give the impression of complexity and obscurity, because his substance is new and strange. So with Plato, the way of arguing—I might even say the need of arguing—can hardly be made attractive to those who do not already feel some liking for the enterprise and are not willing to put some effort into following its course.

I agree, to be sure, with Mr. Richards's rule that we should translate the classics into our own contemporary speech and not into some artificial and would-be archaic idiom. In the preface of Samuel Butler's version of Homer the translator gave the definitive reasons for this choice. They are less pretentious reasons than those Mr. Richards gives in his introduction to "The Republic," for Mr. Richards's mind is aglow with pedagogical earnestness. He believes that we should all read Plato for the sake of democracy. It is not clear to me how Plato's Spartan regime with class barriers and intellectual censorship is going to help keep up our spirits; and on general principles I suspect the elevation of any single book to the rank of scripture. In any case, Plato does not contain all that matters in political theory. The Greeks have not said the last word on any subject, however much we may admire what they did say. The notion of the last word is nonsense, at least until after the Last Trump.

The same strained eagerness vitiates Mr. Richards's other publication, "How to Read a Page," which is meant to accompany the "Republic." By discussing the ambiguities of some hundred important words this manual intends to correct Professor Adler's "How to Read a Book" and to take precedence over Professor Buchanan's discipline of the Hundred Great Books. It does not in fact accomplish either of these tasks, being a hodge-podge of semantics, propaganda for Basic, literary criticism, political theory, and theology. Though written down in spots and offensively cute in others, the work bears little relation to the description given on the jacket, "A Course in Efficient Reading." It is itself extremely difficult to read, and at best it only establishes the fact that prose needs as much interpreting as poetry.

Mr. Richards's own prose is certainly in want of it. One would guess that the text had been dictated if this supposition did not entail the further one that Mr. Richards had no ear. How else account for a sentence like "This illustrates well a point in these notes of very great importance"? This is unfortunately a fair sample. On one page Mr. Richards preaches precision in the use of words; on another he argues that it is pedantry to insist on correct usage because context gives meaning to most uses and even misuses. In this theoretical contradiction Mr. Richards follows the practice of the imprecise. He is addicted to the usually meaningless connective "in terms of"; he will not distinguish between "specific" and "particular" any more than between "shall" and "will"; and his mismanagement of pronouns is such as frequently to obscure all meaning. Indeed, his book directs attention not so much to the value of semantics and Basic for good reading as to the still more elementary axiom that "easy writing makes damned hard reading." Correct emphasis, placement, rhythm, and inner relations—in short, the old problems of prose that pedants still worry about—do not occupy Mr. Richards sufficiently. He evades these difficulties in part by proposing a new set of seven distinct quotation marks composed of small letters, which he himself uses with a freedom that seems to say again: "Let the reader do the work." There would be much to add about the philosophic and social implications of Mr. Richards's present failure viewed in the light of worthy services previously rendered. But speaking of pedantry, who is this Francis of Verulam who supplies a number of mottoes to Mr. Richards's chapters? Isn't "Bacon" Basic? JACQUES BARZUN

Preparing for Peace

THE ROAD WE ARE TRAVELING, 1914-1942. By Stuart Chase. The Twentieth Century Fund. $1.

THE sedate Twentieth Century Fund has engaged Stuart Chase, the happy warrior of economics, to write a series of six very short books under the general title, "When the War Ends." Although the first of these, "The Road We Are Traveling," is offered as a complete book, it is difficult to view it as more than a prologue to the series. It is merely a quick, facile summation of past investigations and fairly common knowledge. The sources are largely secondary. Mr. Chase's great gifts as a phrase-maker and publicist are abundantly in evidence, but not, as yet, the part played by the Fund's excellent research facilities. Even if we give future volumes the benefit of doubt, it is clear that a publication plan requiring this volume to stand by itself was badly devised.

But the broad intentions of the program are excellent. As A. A. Berle's foreword says, defeatism about the peace is almost as dangerous as defeatism about the war. "When peace comes, it will be an opportunity to use our vastly increased plants and human resources to raise the standard of living of all of us, and a challenge to make a greater civilization." Too few people understand that war, except in isolated areas of devastation, may well be a period of capital accumulation.

But Mr. Chase's immediate attention is directed to the past. He spends 82 of his 106 pages examining the pattern of change and the basic trends that developed between 1914 and 1942. He shows us in a brilliant flash how the economic assumptions of 1914 grew out of a century of seemingly insatiable markets and limitless expansion; how "the first scientific war on the planet" forced men to devise the techniques and the machines for mass production; how scarcity was outstripped, and how men after the war had to find new assumptions on which to base their lives.

The huge new plant capacity had two immediate results: intensive high-pressure selling, and a gradual falling off of new investment. "Savings, instead of being invested, gathered in stagnant pools." This of course was the primary cause of the Great Depression. The New Deal was a stopgap, "with no considered philosophy behind it. . . ." Then came Hitler, the threat of war, and the starkest kind of military and economic realism. Gold did not matter any more, nor budgets. Citizens who in 1940 voted against Roosevelt in the belief that "you can't spend your way out of a depression" approved of $60 billion for war and saw the economy galvanized. Men came first and money second. "No nation in this dangerous world of 1942 is meekly going bankrupt because some textbooks say it ought to. . . . Well, who is going to pay for [the war]? It is being paid for right now with the physical and mental work of those who are producing and moving the goods." Suddenly people made the vital discovery: the more production, the more money. Chase reminds us that in the midst of the German arms drive two million new homes for workers were built, great highways constructed. "The essential point is that profits are no longer the spark plug of the economic system."

Mr. Chase sums up the trends of the period under eleven heads: the advance of technology; the halting curve of population; the closing of the frontier; the growing interdependence of specialized producers; unemployment; the decline in private investment opportunities; the decline of the free market; the growth of propaganda both in business and politics; mechanized warfare; increasing centralization in government; and the advance of autarchy. In the final section of the book he sketches very briefly some problems and some goals for America, but since the next volume in the series is entitled "Goals for America," we ought to suspend comment pending details.

Most of Mr. Chase's broad and vividly pictured panorama will be accepted by progressive analysts. The dubious points are the emphasis on population curves, which can be and may already have been reversed; a passing emphasis on "priorities unemployment," which has turned out to be pretty much of a spook; and a coy dallying with James Burnham's managerial thesis. Mr. Chase pretends to be greatly mystified about the kind of revolution that is now abroad in the world, and calls it "X." But elsewhere, in a succinct passage, he explains it quite clearly: the more complex the institutions of modern civilization become, and the more specialized the tasks of the individual, the greater the need for planning and coordination. This means only one thing: centralized authority, which is the price we pay for a rich and variegated society. The great question is only whether centralized authority can be firmly chained to democratic controls.

The Fateful Decade

TEN YEARS: THE WORLD ON THE WAY TO WAR, 1930-1940. By Dwight E. Lee. Houghton Mifflin Company. $3.75.

PROFESSOR LEE has written the first comprehensive one-volume account of the political and diplomatic events of the decade which began with the cessation of reparations in 1931 and ended with the German war upon the Soviet Union and the United States in 1941. The story is told here with great skill in presentation and integration, with careful attention to details, and with an interpretation that draws the right lessons. The book suffers somewhat from its too exclusively political character. It does not do justice to the underlying "ideological" conflict which alone can explain the tremendous character of the crisis. Thus Professor Lee compares Napoleon with Hitler, overlooking the funda-

BERTRAND RUSSELL:

"A very valuable discussion of the problem of the completion of democracy and the avoidance of the totalitarian system. . . . It is to be hoped that the book will arouse particular interest among those practical people—the technical and managerial class—on whose good will the future of democracy so greatly depends."

MAX LERNER:

"A brilliant achievement. It breaks new ground in our social thinking . . . a challenge to every type of social thinker to look to the dryness of his intellectual powder. This is a book which will do much to shape our thinking for the next decade."

GEORGE S. COUNTS:

"A magnificent book, fresh and incisive. Written in the great liberal, humanist, and democratic tradition. . . . It is the best book in the field that I have read in years. In my opinion Mr. Corey has given us in broad outline the course that our democracy must follow if it is to survive."

THE UNFINISHED TASK

Economic Reconstruction for Democracy

"Upon the men of our generation falls the duty to unlearn, relearn, and learn anew." Lewis Corey shows how government, management, and labor can ensure a democratic victory for the mutual good of all—how they must strip away outmoded mechanisms, while preserving the freedom, tolerance, equality, and enterprise that are the essentials of democracy. $3.00

mental difference between the French Revolution, from which Napoleon sprang, and the fascist revolution which produced Hitler. Therefore it is not correct to say that "both men might have utilized the forces they had evoked to construct a better world for everybody." Napoleon could have done it; he would have done it if he had remained faithful to the revolution. Hitler could not have done it—because he remained faithful to the vision which animated and produced him. "Had Hitler had a broader vision than the outlook of a half-starved debater inspired by the false traditions of a narrowly nationalistic pan-Germanism, he might have used his power to make Germany a partner in a better world order," says Professor Lee. But then Hitler would not have been Hitler, and the background of the Nazi revolution would not have existed. It is the very essence of Hitler and Hitlerism that he did not and could not attempt any order based upon liberty and equality, the principles of the French Revolution. The German people accepted Hitlerism not so much because of external conditions as because of certain social and intellectual traditions existing in Germany; this, however, does not mean that there is anything in the German "race" which would not respond to modifications and changes in the social and intellectual atmosphere of Germany. Professor Lee seems to underestimate the fateful importance of the fascist Weltanschauung as represented today in Germany and Japan, where it reaches far beyond the political and economic fields.

Despite these flaws the book has great value as a reliable, intelligent, and well-written guide to the political and diplomatic events of the past ten years. It is centered upon Europe and especially upon Germany; it is more concerned with the acts of the great powers than with the lesser actors on the European stage; and it concentrates on foreign policy and international relations rather than on the social and psychological trends in what may be called domestic policy which are of importance in determining the foreign policy of countries and groups. The events of the period, however, are analyzed with detachment and great fairness, and facts are presented graphically in a vigorous style. The ultimate conclusions of the author are inescapable for any serious student of recent history:

> In the future there must be, in addition to a more careful consideration of everyone's rights, a far greater emphasis upon responsibilities in a world of disappearing frontiers and ever-speedier means of communication. If the United States seeks to hide behind the Atlantic and Pacific, it may well lose the Washington-Jefferson-Lincoln tradition. Instead of emphasis upon nationalistic division there must be education for unity which stresses the common heritage of man as a result of his age-long humanistic aspirations and ideas.

This is the very thing which the German National Socialists and the Japanese nationalists reject most emphatically. Here lies the very reason for the decisive and total character of the world crisis which grew through the fateful decade, the non-recognition of which made the present catastrophe inevitable.

Naval Primer

SEA POWER IN CONFLICT. By Paul Schubert. Coward-McCann. $2.50.

IN "Sea Power in Conflict" Paul Schubert attempts two tasks. The first half of the book is devoted to an exposition of navies in general and the diverse elements which make up what the author terms the "new sea power." The remainder contains an account of the naval history of the present war.

In interpreting sea power to the lay reader Mr. Schubert has done a very fair piece of work. He gives a fine account of the development of naval science during the past quarter-century, pointing out the changes being brought into modern warfare by the airplane and submarine. His chapter on the German navy is notable for a penetrating analysis of German strategic thought. Descriptive chapters dealing with various types of warships are not so satisfactory, mainly because of an unaccountable failure to deal with naval planes, though plane carriers are adequately described.

The second half of the book is less valuable. In fact, Mr. Schubert's accounts of the sea war do not go much beyond official communiqués, and in at least one instance, his statement in connection with the Norwegian campaign that "the German navy lost from one-third to one-half of its fighting strength," he merely repeats an early erroneous impression instead of taking the slight trouble needed to get the correct facts. However, despite such shortcomings "Sea Power in Conflict" is a satisfactory primer of naval information.

Power and Politics

PEACE BY POWER. By Lionel Gelber. Oxford University Press. $1.50.

THIS "plain man's guide to the key issues of the war and the post-war world" is so lucid that the plain man would undoubtedly profit from reading it, but it is also profound enough to engage the attention of the experts. It belongs to the realistic school of political thought. Its author declares:

> The issue to be determined is where power will reside. For too much has been written about the so-called "game of power politics" as though it were a sport, however solemn or diabolical, outside the legitimate business of society; one in which miscreants of the old school indulged and which artificers of the new school will abolish. In point of fact the contest of power is the essence of politics, and it is singular that the very ones who are confident that it can be uprooted from international relations are themselves eager to seize its fruits in domestic affairs.

Mr. Gelber presents his analysis of world politics persuasively and urbanely. Those who hope that the post-war world will achieve forms of unity and integration totally different from anything previously known in world history would do well to read this book. Yet the author is remarkably complacent about the economic and international difficulties of the democratic world and rather simple in his conception of the German malady and its cure.

The weaknesses of this book suggest that there might well be a greater exchange of thought between the realists, who understand the perennial problems of politics on any level of human history, and the radicals, who appreciate the unique and revolutionary aspects of particular periods of history.

Romains in America

SALSETTE DISCOVERS AMERICA. By Jules Romains. Translated by Lewis Galantière. Alfred A. Knopf. $2.50.

YOU might think that his experience with "The Seven Mysteries of Europe" would have taught Jules Romains the danger of writing about himself. Yet in this new extra-curricular divertissement, written in the intervals of leisure which even "Men of Good Will" leaves to its indefatigable author, we have but two important characters, one of whom is named Jules Romains while the other is no more than a manifest alter ego. As the naive Salsette goes about discovering America, the well-nigh omniscient Romains is always at his elbow to draw him out, to prod him into stronger affirmations of opinion, and to develop, if need be, his thoughts. Those familiar with "Men of Good Will" cannot fail to recognize Jerphanion and Jallez projected into middle age. And anyone who has ever studied a modern foreign language will recognize the familiar device of the two friends who travel about France or Germany or Mexico, as the case may be, in the pages of the second-year reader and composition book.

With the exception of the three or four pages on the American middle ages, the banality of Salsette's and Romains's remarks about our women, our cooking, our architecture, our landscape, our subways and parkways is disheartening. Where is the satiric talent of the earlier Romains, the man who wrote the comedies "Knock" and "Musse" and the novel translated here as "The Boys in the Back Room"? Aiming to be ingratiating, Jules Romains has written for his American hosts a bread-and-butter book.

Keep Them Out!

NO event in 1942 is likely to have more effect on the future conduct of the war than this fall's Congressional elections. Although the majority of Congress supports the Administration's war program, a dangerous opposition is working overtime to capture Congress in November—or at least to elect enough defeatists and obstructionists to hamstring the majority.

The Nation herewith announces the early publication of a series of articles about several of these candidates—documented reports that will reveal a great many new facts as well as their voting records, affiliations, and public utterances:

C. Wayland Brooks (R., Ill.)
Stephen A. Day (R., Ill.)
Hamilton Fish (R., N. Y.)
Robert F. Rich (R., Penna.)
Gerald L. K. Smith (Mich.)
Jacob Thorkelson (R., Mont.)
Gerald B. Winrod (Kansas)
Martin L. Sweeney (D., Ohio)
George Holden Tinkham (R., Mass.)
William B. Barry (D., N. Y.)

These are men about whom all good defenders of democracy must say—

Keep Them Out!

IN BRIEF

BEND IN THE RIVER. By Jan Valtin. Alliance Book Corporation. $2.

A collection of minor stories and sketches many of which were first printed in the San Quentin Bulletin when the well-known author of "Out of the Night" was a prisoner. These stories, dealing mostly with sailors, convicts, abandoned women, hard-living men, reveal an acute sense of man's loneliness, man's cruelty, man's search for something greater than himself, but they are obviously early works, sometimes fumblingly brutal, sometimes over-pretentious, though indicative of a dormant talent. Many are prefaced by autobiographical sketches which tell of the author's fears, pride, and ambitions, and thus give some cohesiveness to the scattered tales.

BINDWEED. By Betty de Sherbinin. William Morrow and Company. $2.50.

The author is a young woman of twenty-five who has lived a good part of her life in Argentina. This, her second novel with an Argentine setting, is a pleasant, though uninspired, book about the life of almost-high society in Buenos Aires, wholly preoccupied with marital and financial affairs. The people are never very interesting, but Miss de Sherbinin has succeeded admirably in capturing the strong Catholicism, traditionalism, and isolation of the Argentine ruling class that are responsible, at least in part, for the behavior of our not-so-good neighbors.

DON PEDRO AND THE DEVIL. By Edgar Maas. The Bobbs-Merrill Company. $3.

A big historical novel about a young Spanish don who captures Peru with the Pizarro brothers and is in on everything, from the strangling of the Inca to the Spanish king's councils of state. The "devil" of the title seems to be totalitarianism and autocracy, but it comes out pretty cloudy. Worth reading for the historical detail.

DIE HELLEN NAECHTE: GEDICHTE AUS FRANKREICH. By Hans Sahl. Barthold Fles Verlag. $1.50.

Well turned verse this is, in that genre of simplicity perfected by German poets of the nineteenth century. But by now it is almost impossible to write straightforwardly in this convention, with its folk wistfulness and obvious, inevitable rhythms, without sinking into the conventional. In Mr. Sahl's poetic journal of exile the disasters of the last eight years take on the inexplicable, wanton character that historical events might have in the mind of a peasant—and his poetry suffers for it, because he is not a peasant. And yet he is not a modern poet, even though he may have been influenced by Brecht and other contemporaries. Where Mr. Sahl's poetry is strong it has the strength of an ultimate confession, as in the poem Spanien (1939), but elsewhere, for all its grace, it is hardly more than a melancholy, superior kind of occasional verse.

PATTERN OF MEXICO. By Clifford Gessler. Illustrated by E. H. Suydam. D. Appleton-Century Company. $5.

The chapter headings and the thirty-two full-page pencil sketches, well reproduced and expressive of an old-fashioned charm, by the late E. H. Suydam give this handsome volume its principal distinction. The chief value of the text is that it is a conscientiously complete treatment of a perennially fascinating subject. The approach is that of a conventional travel book, superficial and at times banal.

MUSIC

The Spring "Season of Ballet" opened with a week of performances by the Ballet Theater. In addition to the repertory of the winter season there were two new ballets—Antony Tudor's long promised "Pillar of Fire," to the music of Schönberg's "Verlärte Nacht," with settings and costumes by Jo Mielziner; and Fokine's "Russian Soldier," to the music of Prokofiev's "Lieutenant Kije" Suite, with scenery and costumes by Doboujinsky.

Tudor's vocabulary is distinctive, effective, moving; it is also limited, both qualitatively and quantitatively, and hence repetitious and not equally suitable to all ideas, situations, emotions, or to all styles of music. The suppressed intensities and agonies of "Lilac Garden," the nostalgic music of Chausson's "Poème" provided the occasion of its one successful use; and equally successful now in the first part of "Pillar of Fire" are the same movements, intensified in accordance with the greater intensity of the scenario, which is concerned not with the recollection of an early love affair but with the actual—and violent—sexual experience; and in accordance also with the greater intensity and weight of Schönberg's music, which turns out to serve extremely well the purpose it was not intended for. And the effectiveness of this part is heightened by Mielziner's setting, with the violent distortion of its House Opposite. But in the second scene the music persists with endless aimlessness, the Tudor patterns of movement continue with feeble pointlessness, and Mielziner's setting constitutes in itself a devastating comment on both. The piece, it remains to add, was excellently performed by Hugh Laing, Nora Kaye, and the others.

As for "Russian Soldier," concerned with the "memories of his native land [that] crowd his mind as he lies on the vast battlefield" mortally wounded, not only does it use satirical music which is inappropriate to its serious idea, but it carries out this idea with invention which is even poorer than the music—the only good part being the peasant dances near the end and the few movements with which the soldier echoes them.

By the evidence of the Scythian Suite, which Koussevitzky performed in New York on March 12, Prokofiev wrote better music under the czarist regime that he satirizes in "Kije." In "Kije" technical expertness is grinding it out by formula; in the Scythian Suite a youthful fulness of imagination and of musical powers produces some pages that fall short of the mark and others that hit it with magnificent success. In this music about pagan Scythia I heard things which suggested the possibility that Prokofiev in 1914 had heard or knew the music about pagan Russia that Stravinsky had completed the year before. These things, however, if they did represent an external influence, were made part of a personal and individual way of writing; whereas what struck me more forcibly as I listened was the fact that a lot of Shostakovitch is a pretentiously expansive and diffuse reworking of the compact and sharply defined writing of Prokofiev.

Koussevitzky's stunning performance of this Prokofiev piece represented his complete understanding of it; but while the fabulously beautiful sound and finish of the Boston Symphony's playing in Mozart's Symphony K. 551 (the so-called "Jupiter") provided evidence of Koussevitzky's virtuosity as a conductor, his insufficient understanding of the music was made clear in the excessively fast tempo that robbed the first movement of its majesty and force, the distention of the Andante cantabile second movement into a Largo, the phrasing that avoided the plastic distortion which Koussevitzky is often guilty of but that was a mere playing of the notes with fabulous beauty of sound and finish, as against the sharply contoured inflection with which Beecham gives Mozart's phrases character and meaning. It was interesting to hear this performance, with its striking contrast to Beecham's spaciously elaborating and deeply probing treatment of Mozart, after reading statements about Koussevitzky's copying of Beecham performances—almost as interesting as it had been to hear the striking contrast between the alleged Koussevitzky copies and the alleged Beecham originals. Try to imagine a conductor listening to another conductor's performance and wanting to do anything but show what a different and superior performance he can give; better still, try listening to the Koussevitzky and Beecham performances of K. 338 on records.

Letters to the Editors

What's Wrong with Bates

Dear Sirs: While the writer of this letter makes no pretense of being a military strategist, he cannot refrain from taking issue with the military analysis of Ralph Bates in his What's Right with Britain, published in The Nation of April 4.

Assuming Mr. Bates's statistics to be correct, Germany has a maximum of 50 divisions available to meet an attack in Western Europe. England has at home 100 well-equipped divisions, plus 30 less well equipped, plus a "well-trained Home Guard of two million men." The major part of these forces must remain idle, according to Mr. Bates, partly because England does not possess enough shipping to transport them across the Channel.

Mr. Bates figures that because 7½ tons of shipping per man were necessary to maintain the A. E. F. in France (3,000 miles), 2½ tons per man will be necessary for the Channel (20 to 100 miles), and that England cannot spare this amount. This tonnage ratio is obviously incorrect, and, moreover, small boats, of which England has enormous numbers, could be used for the Channel crossing, as they were at Dunkirk.

Mr. Bates believes that the 130 divisions in England, in addition to the Home Guard, must remain there for home protection. Just where Germany is to obtain the 2½ tons of shipping per man to enable it to engage these home forces with its 50 free divisions he does not reveal.

Instead of using the British army for the purpose of attack on the Continent—with American reinforcements—Mr. Bates recommends that additional forces be sent to Libya and Suez, 12,000 miles distant by sea from Great Britain, to engage German troops who can be supplied by a route one-tenth as long. Certainly Britain must have strong air superiority over the Channel in order to protect a crossing, but when will it ever have it if not while most of Germany's strength is engaged on the Russian and Libyan fronts?

To the layman, the direct defense of Egypt, Suez, and the Near East looks much more difficult than a strong offensive in the West, which would also constitute an effective protection for the Near East. While an attack in the West may not, indeed, be feasible at this time, Mr. Bates's figures tend to indicate the contrary.

There is a growing feeling that if America and Britain spread their forces in an attempt to protect the greater part of the globe, they are likely to be defeated by enemies who do not hesitate to concentrate on our vital sectors, unhampered by attacks on their home ground. C. FAYETTE TAYLOR

Cambridge, Mass., April 15

Or Is He Right?

Dear Sirs: May I put in a word of warm praise for Ralph Bates's What's Right with Britain in your issue of April 4? It is, to my knowledge, the first article to insist that invading troops must be carried across water by ships rather than by inspiration, and that morale, for all its importance, is not the essence of a bridgehead. Through the whole article runs a nice combination of cold fact and progressive suggestion—the only combination that can have both a steadying and a stimulating effect on today's harassed reader. NIGEL DENNIS

New York, April 13

On Freedom of Expression

Dear Sirs: Your comment on my letter in the issue of April 11 raises questions which obviously require reply. You ask whether I do not know an "out-and-out fascist paper" when I see one. I know of no test of opinion to fit such a large word. What is loosely called the fascist press ranges from sympathizers with the Axis to the anti-British Irish, professional anti-Semites, the anti-New Dealers, and the anti-Communists.

You yourself reveal confusion when you classify Pelley, Deatherage, and Coughlin as the fascist press and yet speak of McCormick, Hearst, and Patterson as "more dangerous"—advocating that when they "skid across the thin line that divides their doctrine from open treason" they too should be prosecuted. I challenge The Nation to show any substantial difference in the editorial attitudes of all these papers. You cannot define the thin line. Your policy would result in suppressing them all.

All judgments in this field are subjective. That is always the danger in prosecutions for opinion. Benjamin Franklin answered your argument during the Revolution. Said he: "Of course the abuses of free speech should be suppressed, but to whom dare you entrust the power of doing it?" He was surrounded by Tory propaganda, which was not suppressed. Nor did the United States in the World War, shameful as the record of suppression was, dream of going to the lengths you advocate. The anti-British and somewhat pro-German Irish press was not touched; nor were most of the German-language papers, whose pro-Germanism was ill-concealed.

You ask whether the Civil Liberties Union is planning to "defend Pelley, Coughlin, and company." They have not yet been indicted. If they are indicted solely for opinions which present no "clear and present danger" of illegal acts, we shall of course offer to assist in defending them, as we have in the past defended equally unpopular spokesmen of causes which every liberal must detest. It is not particular individuals we defend so much as the Bill of Rights for all of us. In the War cases the Supreme Court laid down the rule of "clear and present danger," the best working yardstick yet devised. We propose to stand by it. We can only hope that The Nation too will adopt it instead of the dangerous doctrine of tendency. ROGER N. BALDWIN

Dear Sirs: As one who turns with enthusiasm to Freda Kirchwey's articles, I must admit a first reaction of disappointment in reading her Curb the Fascist Press! in the March 28 issue. I feared that the weapon she threw at the fascist press might in time rebound to curb The Nation. I can hardly think of a worse calamity for American liberalism.

Liberalism could never have been in a worse quandary than it is today on this question of freedom of expression. Voltaire's famous saying is being severely tested. Can we still hold to that motto? Yes, if we admit just one exception: we must not permit anyone to use freedom of expression to further or to establish a regime the chief tenet of which is to suppress freedom of expression everywhere. LORNA C. GLOVER

Hyannis, Mass., April 10

Sprung Rhythm

Dear Sirs: I admire George Barker for pulling no punches in his review of my book on Robert Bridges in your April 4 issue. And I should scarcely want Bridges's poetry or my criticism to fare differently at the hands of one who considers Shakespeare "unsound, turgid, and incomplete." From his remarks I judge Mr. Barker to be a forthright admirer of the English university wits, for whom "A Hope for Poetry" and "New Bearings in English Poetry" are crucial critical documents. Between this energetic and currently fashionable school and my own unfashionable traditionalism lies a gulf which a brief letter can hardly hope to cross. However, Mr. Barker makes two assertions which I feel bound to answer.

1. Mr. Barker accuses me of adducing "against" what he calls a "minor masterpiece" of Housman, Bridges's lyric "The hill pines were sighing." I do nothing of the kind. After noting that Bridges is sometimes facile and obvious in the Housman manner, I criticize "The hill pines were sighing" for its unmotivated intensity. I do not compare it with Housman's poem.

2. Mr. Barker concludes that I have "omitted to read any poetry published since 1930." I see no reason to furnish Mr. Barker with a reading list or a bibliography of my reviews, but if he wishes to pay the established Harvard tuition fees I shall be glad to read some contemporary poetry with him.

The basis for Mr. Barker's conclusion—my statement that no subsequent poet has been able to make a "similar use" of Hopkins's "wrenched form" of sprung rhythm—is worth discussing. Mr. Barker points to "the number of poets who have employed sprung rhythm" since 1930 as a proof of my omissions. My main point was that a very cautious use of sprung rhythm as a means of metrical variation—such a cautious use as one finds in Wyatt, Jonson, and Bridges—is more valuable as a permanent influence than the extreme violence of Hopkins's meters, in which sprung rhythm is used as a metrical norm. I should be the first to agree that not only the poets of the thirties but many earlier poets use occasional sprung rhythm. But the question is whether Hopkins's own meters have been successfully imitated.

The common mistake is to narrow Hopkins's general and wide influence on the language of recent poets to a metrical influence. Thus crammed imagery, startling ellipsis, and a general tightness and nervousness of line are often described as "Hopkins's sprung rhythm." The illusion is strengthened where diction is actually borrowed:

Me, March, you do with your movements master and rock
With wing-whirl, whale-wallow, silent budding of cells . . .

These lines of W. H. Auden's, which illustrate what C. Day Lewis calls "mal-digested influence," certainly have the Hopkins flavor. But they are neither Hopkins's sprung rhythm nor anyone else's. If variation in degree of accent is recognized, both lines are iambic hexameter, with the third, fourth, and fifth feet inverted. If the lines are sprung rhythm, half of Meredith and nine-tenths of Browning are sprung rhythm.

What in fact one finds in Auden and many of his contemporaries is a sporadic use of sprung feet or sprung lines as variations on an accentual-syllabic norm. This is also Bridges's practice. But what one almost never finds is sprung rhythm used as a constant prosodial basis, as in Hopkins. Recent poets, who never attain Hopkins's breathless rush of sound, normally compensate for accentual gain or syllabic loss somewhere else in the line or in an adjoining line. Thus their experiments appear to me healthily tame. The sprung feet in the following examples are italicized:

Rest from loving and be living.
Fallen is fallen past retrieving
The unique flier dawn's dove
Arrowing down feathered with fire.
(C. Day Lewis)

One unnoted, mild and young; his eyes live in a dream (Spender)

A turning page of shine and sound, the day's maze (MacNeice)

Where we went in the black hull no light moved
But a gull white-winged along the feckless wave. . . . (Tate)

The ambiguity of the last example is typical; there is no syllabic loss and the accentual gain might be questioned. Though the ruggedness of Dylan Thomas's diction sometimes gives an impression of sprung rhythm, Hart Crane alone among modern poets attained some of Hopkins's peculiar effects. But his verse was not technically sprung rhythm, and some of his most Hopkinsesque lines were written before Mr. Winters introduced Crane to Hopkins's poetry.

Mr. Barker will no doubt accuse me of further pedantry in thus insisting on a strict definition of Hopkins's sprung rhythm. But those who speak so blandly of sprung rhythm and of Hopkins's influence would do well to recognize the precise meaning of the term and to examine in what that very wide influence consists. The Shape of Things

IN BURMA THE WAR IS STILL GOING BADLY for the United Nations. Although the Chinese have been fighting stubbornly, they have been handicapped by inadequate numbers and lack of air support. By a courage born of desperation they succeeded at the end of last week in recapturing the important city of Taunggyi on the central Burma front, but this gain was imperiled by the withdrawal of other Chinese units a little farther west and by a rapid thrust of Japanese mechanized forces which threatens to cut the railroad between Mandalay and Lashio. Thus General Stilwell's army is dangerously exposed on both flanks. The strategy of the United Nations on the Burma front remains essentially a defensive one. Hope is held out that the monsoon, which is expected in two or three weeks, will temporarily check the Japanese advance. In Australia, on the other hand, there is evidence of a mounting offensive spirit. The bombings of Japanese bases on Timor, New Britain, and New Guinea have been stepped up, and the Japanese attacks on Port Moresby and Darwin have encountered increasing opposition. While the forces of the United Nations are still not strong enough to undertake large-scale offensive action in this area, attacks on some of Japan's outlying bases may not be far off.

THE LANDING OF AMERICAN TROOPS IN New Caledonia is a second notice to Laval's government that the United States is ready to act in support of its war interests if not of its principles. M. Henry-Haye is expected to protest, but the State Department will certainly reiterate the position it took in regard to the setting up of a consulate at Brazzaville in Equatorial Africa. It said then that the United States would deal with the established authorities, whether Vichy or Free French, in all African or Pacific French territories. This rule of thumb serves our immediate strategic purposes without interfering with our immoral and ineffective discrimination against Free French control of St. Pierre and Miquelon. General de Gaulle is not quibbling over matters of consistency. He has welcomed the American forces to the island, assuring them of the cooperation of the local authorities and the population. New Caledonia, lying in the straight line between Honolulu and Sydney, has immense strategic importance, both for resisting further Japanese pressure to the south and as a base for future offensive moves against Japanese positions to the north. More important, but still uncertain, is the fate of Madagascar. This great island base is in Vichy control, and since Laval's advent to power the authorities have been repressing all De Gaullist, anti-Axis elements. Quick seizure of the island is essential if Japan is not to get there first. Apparently the job is to be left to South Africa, which has already broken off relations with Vichy and so freed its hands for action. What forces undertake the task is a question of efficiency; the essential thing is that they move fast. But once Madagascar is in Allied hands, its administration should be turned over without argument or delay to the Free French.

TWO MONTHS AGO THE NATION SUGGESTED in its In the Wind column a plan for bombing Tokyo by which the American bombers would proceed to bases in the Soviet Maritime Provinces instead of trying the long and hazardous return trip to the Aleutian Islands. We have no way of knowing whether the pilot of the bomber which landed near Khabarovsk read our suggestion or not. But we cannot help being a little pleased that someone in our armed forces had the imagination to make this contribution to the war of nerves. The Japanese do not know whether one or a score of American planes landed in the Maritime Provinces, but they are quite aware of the fact that planes that can fly from Tokyo to Khabarovsk are perfectly capable of flying back to Tokyo again should Russia be forced into the Pacific war. And if one American plane can be delivered to Russia via Tokyo, presumably hundreds of others could be similarly dispatched in the event of war. We can be sure that the Japanese would like nothing better than to find some way of preventing a repetition of this incident. But Russia's conduct in the affair has been beyond criticism. It has faithfully conformed with the provisions of international law covering such cases. It reports that the plane and its crew have been interned. But how long will they be out of action? The Japanese wish they knew.

IN ORDERING THE FEDERAL SHIPBUILDING and Dry Dock Company at Kearny, New Jersey, to grant maintenance of membership to the Industrial Union of Marine and Shipbuilding Workers, the War Labor Board, like the National Defense Mediation Board before it, has come to grips with the United States Steel Corporation, of which the company at Kearny is a wholly-owned subsidiary. When, last summer, the Defense Mediation Board recommended the acceptance of such a clause, the company rejected it, and the shipyard was taken over by the navy. Four months later it was turned back to its owners. The company has not yet committed itself on the new decision. If it refuses once more to accept the clause, the government will have to decide whether or not the yard shall be seized for the second time; and the majority decision of the War Labor Board indicates that its members recognize that the fate of the board itself is involved. The four employer members issued a dissenting opinion, and it is rumored that they may resign. The majority opinion appealed to general principles as well as specific claims. "The government of the United States," it said, "is under a moral and equitable compulsion not to take advantage of the national agreement [barring strikes] which has disarmed this union of its only weapon. It is under the same compulsion not to allow the most powerful corporation in the world to take advantage of this convenant of honor." It also pointed out the advantages to management of dealing with a responsible union assured of the minimal security which maintenance of membership provides.

BACK IN 1937 THE UNITED STATES STEEL Corporation surprised the world, and reaped large returns in good-will, by suddenly consenting to deal with the C. I. O. Stettinius and Taylor, who directed that decision, are no longer in control. According to persistent reports, their successors never approved of it, and the first defiance in the Kearny case was said to be designed to put labor once more in its place. But a lot of water has gone over the dam since then, and it may be that in 1942 even the "most powerful corporation in the world" will have the sense to realize that maintenance of membership is a small price to pay for continued private operation and a guaranty of labor peace. If Big Steel should have the vision to accept the clause, its action would, of course, break the libertarian heart of Mark Sullivan, who sees in the decision the umptyumpth "beginning of totalitarianism." It would also distress the gentlemen in and out of the N. A. M. who, to judge by their public statements, lie awake nights worrying about the sacred right of individual workers to make their own bargain with big corporations. But the casualties among the Blimps would be more than offset by disproval of the War Labor Board's charge that United States Steel is defying the government in the midst of war.

THE NEW MAN-POWER COMMISSION HEADED by Paul V. McNutt is potentially the key agency for determining the government's basic war policies. Its decisions on how America's available man-power shall be used will inevitably affect our military strategy as well as our program for mobilizing industry and agriculture for total war. But with the commission still in its organizing stage, we have conflicting advice as to its probable policies. Mr. McNutt, on assuming his post as chairman of the commission, stated that he was opposed to compulsory drafting of man-power for defense work, but indicated that if voluntary methods failed he would probably ask for authority to assign industrial workers to "specific tasks." A few days later word was given out that even the proposed voluntary registration of women might be put off for some time. Still more recently, John J. Corson, director of the Bureau of Employment Security in McNutt's Federal Security Agency, predicted the establishment of a clear-cut national program for the orderly recruitment, training, and placement of the country's total labor force. The discrepancy between these various statements is probably more apparent than real. There is a strong disposition in Washington to avoid an outright draft of labor. Yet at the same time it is becoming generally recognized that some degree of compulsion will have to be introduced if our available man-power is to be used in the most efficient way. It is probable that a program can be worked out that will avoid the appearance of a "labor draft" but will nevertheless involve selective placement of workers in industry in accordance with a system of "labor priorities" worked out by the Man-Power Commission. Our only fear is that the program will be piecemeal, and that the commission will not have the courage to see to it that every man and woman is making his or her maximum contribution to the war effort.

THE EFFECT OF STATE TRADE BARRIERS IN hampering war production has prompted the President to summon representatives of the forty-eight states to a conference on May 5 to discuss means of eliminating these obstacles. Most of the domestic trade walls are an outgrowth of the depression. To an increasing extent during the later years of the crisis states sought to "protect" their citizens by imposing restrictions on goods and services originating outside the state. Perhaps the most serious were the diverse regulations governing the size and weight of motor vehicles. In recent months these have operated to delay the interstate transportation of vital war materials. The Commerce Department also points out that twenty-seven states have anti-migratory laws and twenty-five have "settlement" laws which tend to impede the movement of workers to defense centers. Lack of uniformity in licensing provisions for professional workers has also hampered the movement of doctors, dentists, and engineers to areas where they are badly needed. Economists have long been calling attention to the need for eliminating these and other discrepancies in our state laws, but in normal times little could be achieved because of the power of intrenched local interests. At this moment, however, the President can count on almost unanimous support for any measure that will increase war production.

THE ASSOCIATED PRESS LIBERALIZED ITS by-laws last week with a view to easing the entry of new members and then proceeded to defend monopoly, apparently in the name of freedom of the press, by voting down the application of the Chicago Sun. Colonel Robert R. McCormick, publisher of the Chicago Tribune, hailed this action by saying he hoped it meant "that the Gestapo is out of American newspaper offices forever." His reference, with its nice mixture of venom and ignorance, was to the fact that the Department of Justice had informed the Associated Press that its old by-laws constituted a restraint of trade since they operated to prevent the admission of direct competitors of existing members. It is to be noted, however, that a special committee of the A. P. which investigated the question found that amendment would also be desirable on other grounds. "We are persuaded," its report stated, "that among the membership there is growing recognition that limitations on the availability of our news service has only served to build the effectiveness of competitive services and is therefore undesirable." Under the old rules, which the Department of Justice questioned, a four-fifths vote of the membership was required for the election of a new applicant against whom original members in the same field had exercised their "right of protest." Hereafter a new member can be elected by a simple majority, provided competitors are compensated for the dilution of their rights. It was under this new rule that the Chicago Sun was turned down after a representative of the Chicago Tribune had scared the assembled publishers by arguing that "any rich man would be willing to start a paper in competition with yours in any city if he knew in advance it would cost him very little."

TWO MEMBERS OF THE DIES COMMITTEE appeared before the House Accounts Committee to criticize the loose and irresponsible way the Texan runs his snoop-and-smear agency, but $110,000 has nevertheless been granted the committee for another year. These two Representatives, Voorhis and Casey, may offer a resolution at the next meeting of the Dies committee to prevent the chairman and J. B. Matthews from acting without consulting other members, but there is not much chance of its passage. Representatives Eliot and Marcantonio will no doubt continue to criticize Dies from the floor, but if the Texan is to be stopped, laborites and liberals will have to organize now, not wait until a few weeks before his request for a new appropriation comes up next year. Attorney General Biddle, in the announcement of a new interdepartmental committee to pass on cases of alleged subversive activity by federal employees, threw some light on the quality of Dies committee charges. Of Dies's famous list of 1,122 subversive characters in the government service, 301 turned out to be members of organizations the FBI does not regard as subversive, 46 were employed by non-federal government agencies, 57 were not employed by the government, and in 7 cases the charges were based on evidence too meager even to provide the starting-point for an investigation. The FBI declared that of 2,990 other officials reported to it as subversive, 782 were not government officials at all.

THE WAR DEPARTMENT OWES THE COUNTRY an explanation of the mysterious inquiry into the Industrial Section of its Public Relations Bureau. This section, headed by Colonel L. Robert Ginsburgh, seems to be one of the few in either the War or Navy Department which appreciate the importance of good relations with labor in the war effort. Colonel Ginsburgh is a West Pointer with two decades of service in the army, and has made many friends in both labor and industry. Recent tours on which he took labor leaders resulted in a great deal of favorable publicity for the army in the labor press. The man assigned to investigate Colonel Ginsburgh's division is H. E. Harrell, former personnel expert for the New England Telephone and Telegraph Company, which is notoriously insistent on the open shop. The background of this inquiry is, we suspect, the usual indifference to labor on the part of brass hats and hostility to unionism on the part of officers recently recruited from big business. Under Secretary of War Patterson has on several occasions shown that he has more understanding of the labor problem than the average War Department bureaucrat. We hope he will block the attempt to abolish Ginsburgh's section.

The President's Message

THE seven-point anti-inflation program outlined by the President to Congress carries the war into the home of every American citizen. If the President's program is adopted, the well-to-do face a ceiling of $25,000 in personal income, together with drastic increases in personal and corporate taxes. Workers will forgo wage increases even where a raise may be overdue owing to the rising cost of living. Merchants face an over-all ceiling on the prices of their goods. Farmers are asked to drop their efforts to push the prices of agricultural commodities above parity levels. Everyone must expect more rationing, additional restrictions on instalment buying, and the necessity for increasing their purchases of war bonds.

In contrast to the piecemeal efforts that have so far been made to control inflation, the strength of the President's program lies in its broad scope. It recognizes that the checking of inflation calls for much more than mere price control. In fact, the President had very little to say about price control as such. He was interested primarily in measures which have as their purpose the mopping up of excess purchasing power. This, of course, is sound strategy, even though its implications are not generally understood.

Congress may try to whittle down part of the program. This must not be allowed. As they stand, the seven points represent an irreducible minimum if the upward spiral of prices is to be checked. It cannot be denied that the program is a harsh one. There will be howls and sustained opposition from many interested groups. But only harsh measures can possibly succeed at this time. Inflation has already begun. As the President pointed out, living costs have advanced 15 per cent since the beginning of the war in 1939. Our experience in the last war shows that inflation always gets under way gradually. But once it is started, it moves in geometric progression as the gap widens between rising consumer incomes resulting from ever-increasing war expenditures and the declining supply of civilian goods on the market.

Under the influence of a business-as-usual psychology, the United States has been slow to take steps to check the spiral. But it is not too late. There is nothing inevitable about war-time inflation. It has been checked in Canada; it has been held within bounds in England. But even a drastic system of price-fixing, wage regulation, and credit restriction such as the President has outlined cannot guarantee us immunity from further price rises. The most rigorous system of price ceilings will break down if the amount of purchasing power in the people's pockets greatly exceeds the volume of goods available in our shops and stores. Rationing is essential, as the President pointed out, for distributing necessities fairly among the population, but it cannot be applied to all commodities and if utilized too widely or too drastically tends to stimulate the development of a black market.

The heart of the President's program, then, is the proposal to take up excess purchasing power by increased taxation. And this is the point at which we may expect the greatest opposition in Congress. The House Ways and Means Committee has had the Treasury's tax plan before it for weeks. While no official explanation for the delay has been given, hints from Washington suggest that the committee is unwilling to adopt either the Treasury's request for increased excess-profits taxes or the proposed boost in the income levy. Yet an application of the President's program will necessitate much higher income and corporation taxes than were originally proposed by the Treasury. Will Congress respond to the emergency, or will it continue to evade the main issue by talking about the forty-hour week and a general sales tax? Much depends on public pressure. So far the public has been fairly apathetic about the matter of inflation. This has been due largely to lack of understanding, which in turn has been due to lack of leadership. The President can do much to remedy these lacks through such addresses as his latest fireside talk. But the task is more than one man can carry alone. Despite the sacrifices that must be borne, it is to the interest of every American to see that the program is carried out, and carried out vigorously and completely. Congress must be made to feel that the country is united behind the President.

Tension in the West

LORD BEAVERBROOK'S speech before the American Newspaper Publishers' Association provided a fresh stimulus to the discussion of a new western front. For while most of the previous participants in this debate have been handicapped by lack of knowledge of the chief material factors which must decide the issue, Lord Beaverbrook, who until recently was a member of the British War Cabinet, supposedly is in possession of a good part of the necessary information. His advocacy of a second front in Western Europe was without reservation. He argued, as did Mr. del Vayo in The Nation of April 25, that there is "a chance to bring the war to an end here and now. But if the Russians are defeated and driven out of the war, never will such a chance come to us again." And he went on to declare that Britain was now admirably "equipped in weapons of war for directing such an attack on Germany."

Lord Beaverbrook was unquestionably voicing the opinions of the British people in urging an early offensive, but it seems doubtful whether he was speaking for the British government, despite his semi-official position. The London Sunday Times, which is usually considered to be a mouthpiece of Whitehall, commented coldly that his speech was "hardly in the category of a service" and added: "We will not be hustled by inopportune pressure from any quarter. Responsible people in this country and the United States are well aware that we shall both resume the offensive in the earliest and best conditions possible."

Bewildering as the debate on the new western front is at times to citizens of the United Nations, we take some comfort in the thought that it must be even more bewildering to Hitler. Clearly, whether by luck or good management, this free-for-all wrangle on matters of grand strategy is playing an increasingly important part in the war of nerves. To the German generals it must seem like a manifestation of democratic insanity, but backed as it is by the threat of the commandos and by the ever heavier blows of the R. A. F., they cannot safely ignore it. So one of the highest officers of the Wehrmacht, Field Marshal Karl von Rundstedt, has been placed in charge of the defenses of Western Europe from the North Cape to the Spanish border. Garrisons are being reinforced all along the coast, fortifications strengthened, and new efforts made to suppress the peoples of the occupied countries, who offer a constant threat to the German rear. Men and materials are being diverted from the eastern front, where spring advances but the long-threatened offensive still halts.

Hitler's latest speech before the Reichstag betrayed uneasiness and uncertainty about the next move. Once again his audience was treated to a long and inaccurate historical analysis and to stale diatribes against the Jews. But after this introduction came a kind of apologia for the Russian winter campaign, coupled with the ominous assurance that next winter the German army would be better prepared. The most significant part of Hitler's speech, however, was his request "for an explicit indorsement of my legal right to demand of everyone the discharge of his duties or to cashier anyone from his post or office if I consider that he has failed in his duty regardless of who he may be or what acquired rights he may have." The necessity of this demand for additional power for one who has long acted as an absolute dictator is not obvious, but it suggests that there are important unseen forces in Germany opposing the Führer's will and that a new purge is in the making. The phrasing of both the speech and the Reichstag resolution points toward the army as a center of disaffection, for what other German group can be said to have "acquired rights"?

One other point in Hitler's speech is worth noting—his denunciation of the British air raids and his promise of retaliation. The R. A. F., we believe, will take this threat as a signal to heighten its efforts. The present British air offensive has two major aims. It seeks first to smash at German communications and factories in order to hinder the campaign against Russia and, second, so to plague the Reich with bombs and fighter forays that the Luftwaffe will be forced to divert more and more of its strength to the west. The successive batterings of the Baltic port of Rostock serve both objectives. It is a shipment point for the Russian front and the site of the huge Heinkel airplane factory. Both plant and docks seem to have been put out of action for some time, and the inhabitants of the city are reported to be fleeing for refuge.

These attacks have already infuriated the Germans into making two of the biggest raids from which Britain has suffered for months, and it is perhaps significant that these were directed not against factory towns but against two historic cities of a mainly residential character—Exeter and Bath. It is blows like this that Britain is deliberately inviting—while the memory of London, Coventry, and scores of bombed cities is still undimmed—in order to compel Hitler to divide his air strength. Easy critics of Britain's war effort, who have yet to come within 3,000 miles of an air raid, might well ponder this fact.

Our Slacker Patents

BY I. F. STONE

THE Greeks and Romans had a motto, "Nothing too much." Our Communist friends follow the opposite rule. "Everything too much" seems to mark each of their shifts in policy. In pursuit of national unity the Daily Worker on April 24 published an editorial, American Monopolies and the War, which must have made pleasant reading for Standard Oil of New Jersey. The Daily Worker accused The Nation and the New Republic of naivete in their attitude toward recent cartel and patent revelations. "It is true," the editorial said, "that certain American monopolies did pursue an earlier policy of pro-Fascist appeasement. . . . But it is also true ["on the other hand," as we liberals are accused of saying] that the wreckage of this Munichism and the peril it created for the very existence of the whole country, including these monopoly corporations, did result in a transformation into an opposite policy." The editors of the Worker might be left to enjoy this pipe-dream undisturbed if it did not represent a view held far too widely in Washington, a view that is the basis of the current campaign to put Thurman Arnold in the doghouse for the duration. A few observations are in order.

1. Pearl Harbor came in December. Standard Oil did not make its butyl-rubber formula available until March. It did so then under threat of anti-trust prosecution by Thurman Arnold. This is the same formula which was made available to I. G. Farben in 1938 on the ground of "business honor." The same officials of Standard Oil remain in office and are doing their best to keep butyl production in the hands of their own company.

2. There has been no "transformation into an opposite policy." The du Ponts have yet to pool their neoprene-rubber patent with the Buna and butyl patents. This policy, this reluctance to give up precious formulas and trade secrets even in defense of our country, does not derive from "Munichism." It derives from the nature of monopolistic business. These businesses did not aid the enemy because they liked Nazism. They aided the enemy, and still aid him, because their interests demand restricted production.

3. Whatever may be the long-range merits of capitalism as opposed to socialism, or the value of trust-busting, the fact remains that without a vigorous agency like Arnold's anti-trust division these secret agreements cannot be exposed or the formulas made available for use in the war. The fact that Standard Oil did not voluntarily pool its butyl patents after Pearl Harbor, that du Pont has yet to place neoprene and other patents at the disposal of the war program is proof of that. There must be a policeman on the beat, and the only policeman available is Arnold's anti-trust division. Almost everywhere else in Washington big business writes its own ticket.

4. The evil is constant and exists in little business as well as big. Only a few weeks ago production of eighty planes in one plant and of twenty flying fortresses in another was delayed and the entire assembly line in a third shut down for lack of a single type of screw, on which the Dzus Fastener Company holds a patent. Complaint was made to the anti-trust division by a manufacturer of metal parts for aircraft who wanted to produce these screws but was afraid of a patent-infringement suit.

5. Fear of anti-trust prosecution and of the unpleasant publicity attendant on exposure has brought down the price of tungsten carbide and forced companies to accept consent decrees in synthetic rubber and magnesium. These decrees are weak enough. One wonders how we get any consent decrees at all when the companies feel that they can escape prosecution, as General Electric has done in the Carboloy case, by pleading that their officials are too busy with war work.

6. The President has seized foreign patents, but his action does not solve the problem of domestic patents. The War Patents bill, written by the Department of Justice, requires special administrative action for each domestic patent the government would take for its own use or subject to compulsory licensing. This is cumbersome. If big-business executives are too busy to stand trial on anti-trust charges, have the President and his aides the leisure to go through special procedure every time a patent is needed for the war effort?

7. The Administration can seize any patent it wants; the actual text of the War Powers acts may not fully support it, but public opinion will. The Administration can break the back of any monopoly at any time through the RFC or the Treasury by financing a competing business. Can an Administration which lacks the vitality to use the powers it has, which leaves monopolists and friends of monopoly in key positions, be trusted to correct patent evils by special administrative action? I, for one, do not think so.

8. Why not provide for compulsory licensing of all patents and allow any business man to manufacture any product for which there is increased demand, like the Dzus fastener? Pending the growth of a more vigorous spirit on the part of the Administration in dealing with property rights which hamper the war effort, compulsory licensing would at least have the virtue of throwing open patents in every field to business enterprise. Let those who talk of the benefits of free enterprise prove their sincerity by allowing the normal forces of the free market to act as a solvent on our patent monopolies.

9. Finally, is there anyone naive enough to believe that the business men who formed combinations despite the Sherman Act and continued them with enemy countries despite the war will be less likely to continue these practices if fear of prosecution is removed?

Our Consuls at Work

BY VARIAN FRY

LISBON, August, 1940. The consul general at Lisbon resented interference by private citizens like me, and made no bones about admitting it.

"Each applicant must stand on his own feet, Mr. Fry," he said. "I advise you to concern yourself strictly with relief and leave the visa question entirely to us."

Schiaparelli got her visa at the American embassy in Paris. Later the State Department cabled the consulates canceling all visas issued before June 7. When Schiaparelli reached Lisbon, the vice-consul renewed her visa immediately, and she sailed to the United States.

The sister of a prominent French Popular Front leader came to Lisbon on the same day as Schiaparelli, with exactly the same visa. She had to wait six weeks before she could get her visa renewed. The vice-consul asked her to produce one document after another: first, an affidavit proving that she had a permanent residence in the unoccupied zone; then a certificat de bonne vie et moeurs—little more than a guaranty that she was not a prostitute and usually based on the opinion of a concierge; then a transcript of her police record, if any.

After more than a month spent in the waiting-room of the American consulate, without even a chair to sit on, she decided that her visa would never be renewed. She went to the Cuban consulate. The Cuban consul, an old pockmarked Indian, received her so courteously that she burst into tears.

It was another two weeks before the American vice-consul finally renewed her visa. When she asked him why he had renewed Schiaparelli's so promptly and held hers up so long, he said: "Oh, Schiaparelli will make millions in the United States."

The vice-consul in charge of visas had his own ideas about who should be admitted to the United States and who should not. I showed him my list. One of the first names on it was Lion Feuchtwanger.

"If that man should come to me and ask for a visa," the vice-consul said, "I'd refuse it. He put on a regular song and dance about the Soviet Union a few years ago. We don't want his kind in the United States."

* * *

A German rabbi had obtained an immigration visa in Berlin on May 8. An immigration visa is valid for three months, and you are all right if you get on a boat bound for the United States before it expires. It took this man many weeks to get out of Germany. He arrived in Lisbon late in July and got a reservation on the S.S. Excambion, leaving Lisbon for New York on August 8—exactly three months from the day his visa was issued. But the vice-consul wouldn't let him get on the boat. He insisted that the visa had expired at midnight of the seventh, and nothing would move him to give the man the benefit of the doubt, or renew his visa as he had Schiaparelli's. The poor rabbi had to watch the Excambion sail without him, while the consulate at Lisbon called for his dossier from the consulate at Berlin. It was another three months before his visa was renewed.

* * *

One of the vice-consuls at Lisbon received applicants with his feet on his desk, pipe in mouth. He never got up from his chair, even for women. Applicants stood for hours in the waiting-room, stood again while the vice-consuls were questioning them. One woman swore she had paid an American consular employee $12 to get a seat after five hours of standing.

* * *

Marseilles, August, 1940. After lunch I went to the American consulate. The woman behind the desk on the second floor had bleached hair, deep blue eyelids, and an unnatural sparkle in her eyes. I said I had come to see the consul about visas. She gave me a slip of paper with an address typed on it and told me to go downstairs and take a trolley marked "Montredon."

The car was already full when I got in. I could see that more than half the passengers were refugees.

The trolley took us along the broad Avenue du Prado to the sea, then turned left and followed the Mediterranean coast for fifteen or twenty minutes. It was a hot August afternoon. Landscape and climate reminded me of Greece. Arid gray limestone hills, closely packed beach houses, umbrella pines, date palms, dry heat, dust.

At Montredon the car stopped and everybody got off. The way to the visa division led up a long drive lined by plane trees. Under the trees there were narrow irrigation ditches. The refugees hurried ahead, stirring up a cloud of chokey dust as they walked. I lagged behind, glad of the shade and the comforting, cool sound of the water running down the ditches toward the sea.

When I reached the big brick house at the end of the drive a large crowd of refugees were already there. They filled the benches in the waiting-room and spilled out on the porch. I went inside and stood at the open door of the big center room. A dog-faced young man came up and frowned at me.

"What do you mean, trying to get ahead of the others?" he said in French. "Go back to your place and wait your turn."

I explained that I was an American citizen come to inquire about the visas of some refugees my committee was interested in.

His manner changed abruptly.

"Oh, excuse me, sir." He was speaking English now, and sweetly. "I didn't know you were an American. If you'll come inside," he said, leading me into the big office and offering me a chair in front of a large office desk, "I'll take your card to Mr. ——."

I had waited ten minutes when a vice-consul came up to the desk. "What are you doing here?" he barked. "Get back to the waiting-room where you belong."

I decided to see how refugees were treated, and got up without saying a word. In the waiting-room I waited two hours. Then I went back to Marseilles and called the consul on the telephone. He gave me an appointment for the following day.

It was my first experience with the American Foreign Service in Vichy France.

* * *

Vichy, November, 1940. One of the Quaker workers has turned up a particularly virulent case of anti-Semitism at the embassy. She was having a conversation with one of the secretaries.

"I hope you're not helping Jews get into the United States," he said.

"What would you do with them?" she asked.

He hunched his shoulders in the position of a man holding a submachine-gun.

"Ptt-ptt-ptt-ptt-ptt," he said.

Nice, December, 1940. The young vice-consul in charge of visas here is fond of trick questions. A few weeks ago he put this one to a German Jew from the camp of Gurs: "What would you do if you were admitted to the United States and someone asked you to do something against the interests of the Italian or German government?"

The man from Gurs thought a moment. "I would do what was in the interests of the United States," he said.

"Visa refused," the vice-consul snapped. "We don't want anyone in the United States who is going to mix up in politics."

Bewildered and heartbroken, the man went back to Gurs. He is still there, still wondering why his answer was wrong.

* * *

Marseilles, April, 1941. The vice-consul had received a telegram from the State Department authorizing him to give a visa to Léon Jouhaux.

"What do you know about this guy Jouhaux?" he asked.

I said that Jouhaux had been secretary general of the Confédération Générale du Travail, the A. F. of L. of France.

"What is he," the vice-consul asked, "a William Green or a John L. Lewis? If he's a Lewis, we don't want him."

Marseilles, May, 1941. I had come to see the vice-consul about Largo Caballero's visa.

"Who's Caballero?" he asked.

I explained that he had been Prime Minister of Spain.

"Oh," the vice-consul said, "one of those reds."

I told him that Caballero had been an uncompromising enemy of the Communists.

"Well," the vice-consul said, "it doesn't make any difference to me what his politics are. If he had any political views at all, we don't want him. We don't want any agitators in the United States. We've got too many of them already."

* * *

Marseilles, Spring, 1941. R—— has been transferred to Lisbon, and the new man in charge of visas is young and inexperienced. This is his first post. Afraid of making mistakes, he tries to solve his problems by refusing visas whenever he can. I decided to test him out. Today I talked to him about just two cases, both women. One was a German Social Democratic underground worker. She had a good affidavit. The other was the Countess X. She had no affidavit at all.

R—— refused to give a visa to the German political refugee.

"How do I know she won't do underground work in the United States if I let her in?" he asked.

But when I mentioned the Countess X, he became sweet as honey.

"Oh, I'm sure there'll be no difficulty about her visa," he said. "Just tell her to come in any time she wants to and ask to see me personally. I'll fix her up right away."

He didn't even ask what the Countess's politics were. She got her visa a few days later.

Madrid, September, 1941. At Madrid the consulate and the embassy are in the same building. I went to the consulate to get my passport renewed. The man and the woman in the small office off the hall were discussing a movie, in Spanish. They seemed to have nothing whatever to do. I waited for them to finish their conversation. Then I told them what I wanted.

"You'll have to see the consul about that," the man said. "Won't you sit down? I think he'll be along in a minute."

I sat down and began to thumb idly through a copy of the American Foreign Service magazine. The roly-poly face of Herbert Hoover looked down at me from the wall. There was no portrait of President Roosevelt.

Suddenly the consul came in. A heavy-set man of about fifty, he was like a nervous hostess a few minutes before her guests arrive. "Let me see," he said to himself. "What was it I came in here for? Oh, yes, of course." He went to a shelf, took down a large volume, and turned the pages over in bunches, at random.

"This man wants to have his passport renewed," the clerk said.

The consul put the book down. "What did you say your name was?" he asked.

I hadn't said anything yet, but I told him.

"Oh dear," he said. "You're the man who was put out of France. I know. What are you doing here?"

I explained that my passport had expired, and that I didn't want to risk traveling with it until it had been renewed.

"Good gracious," he said. "I don't know what I can do about that. I really don't. I'll have to cable the department for authority."

At that moment the door on the porte-cochère opened, and a man in clerical clothes came into the hall.

"Oh, good morning, good morning," the consul said, rushing out to the hall to greet him. "I'm so glad to see you, so glad to see you. Do come into my office."

Both men disappeared through another door, and the stenographer, the clerk, and I settled down to enjoy the silence. The clerk made careful impressions of all his rubber stamps, one after the other, on a large piece of white paper. The stenographer brushed the dust off the keys of her typewriter. I returned to the American Foreign Service magazine. It was half-past eleven in the morning.

Fifteen minutes later the consul returned. "Now, let's see, where were we?" he asked. Then, answering himself, "Oh, yes, oh, yes, your passport. Let me have it, won't you?"

I took it out of my pocket and gave it to him. It was an old red passport.

"You don't mean to tell me you've been traveling on this?" he asked. "These passports were taken up months ago."

I said that for some reason which I didn't understand the consulate at Marseilles had renewed my old red passport instead of giving me a new green one, as it had everyone else.

"Well, now, really," the consul said, looking over the passport page by page, "really I don't know quite what to do. If I cable the department you'll have to wait several days in Madrid. Meanwhile you're very likely to be arrested. But unless I get special authority from the department I can't renew your passport. Oh dear, this is a tangle, isn't it?"

He put down the passport and picked up the book. Then he put down the book and picked up the passport.

"Besides," he said, "there isn't any room in this passport for an extension. You haven't a single blank page left. Have you got your Portuguese visa?"

As I couldn't have entered Spain unless I had had a Portuguese visa, I thought it unnecessary to answer this.

"Oh, yes, here it is," the consul said. He was looking at the old visa I had got at Marseilles a year before. "Well, now, let me see, what shall we do about this?"

He turned to the stenographer. "I think you had better make out an application for extension," he said.

The stenographer got up from her desk and went to a file. She took out three copies of a long printed form. Then she returned to her desk, inserted pieces of carbon paper between the forms, and put them in her machine.

The consul left the room. He came back when we had finished the forms. "Finished?" he asked. "Let me see them." The stenographer gave him the forms.

"No, I really don't think," he murmured to himself. "I really haven't the authority to do this in your case." He paused for a long moment. Then he said: "Why don't I just write in your passport that it's valid another two weeks? That will give you time to get back to the States, surely?"

I said that that would depend on how soon I could get a place on the Clipper.

"Well," he said, "at least it will give you time to get to Lisbon. They can worry about it there. I'm sure I don't know why I should be bothered with this problem."

He was writing on the bottom of a page of the passport as he talked. "Madrid, September 10, 1941. This passport is valid for fifteen (15) days from this date. Signed: —— ——, American Consul."

"There," he said, handing the passport back to me. "That ought to do to get you to Lisbon. These Spanish border officials can't read English anyway."

New York, December, 1941. The consul was explaining the shortcomings of the consulate over a glass of beer.

"I did the best I could, but I had a pretty poor staff," he said. "There was old C——. He was good-natured but lazy as they make them. He hated nothing as much as work. Then there was W——. He was a little old maid, fussy and petty. I could never get him to take responsibility for anything. T—— drank too much and ran up debts. He used to come into the office drunk almost every afternoon. P—— was a faithful work horse, slow but steady. He'll never advance in the service, and he knows it. R—— is a flighty youngster, undependable. Altogether, I didn't have much support, did I?"

He took a sip of beer.

"But as H—— G—— said to me," he continued; "H—— G—— was our chargé d'affaires, you know. He came up to the consulate once and looked over the staff. " 'Well, Frank,' he said, 'you've certainly got a cross-section of the American Foreign Service here.' "

Attrition Works Both Ways

BY DONALD W. MITCHELL

IN THE present world conflict we are reminded of Aesop's fable of the four donkeys which, threatened by a neighborhood lion, managed to preserve themselves by staying together and presenting a united front. The lion, being a clever fellow, induced them to disagree and separate, and each was then easily killed.

Today, after a score of countries have been struck down by fascist aggression, the four chief United Nations that remain are clearly in the position of the four donkeys. Yet the recent visit of General Marshall and Harry Hopkins to London indicates strongly that after months of war the two nations most closely united are still not agreed on fundamental strategy.

Reporters have guessed that the London talks dealt with the chances of an immediate Allied offensive in Europe. The Churchill government on many occasions has expressed opposition to such a plan because of the unpreparedness of British troops and the risks involved. British troops have, in fact, been trained mainly for the purpose of defending Britain, and there is not the slightest sign that the Churchill government has considered the forces and strategy that will be necessary actually to win the war. American army officers, on the contrary, have never contemplated an unending and indecisive defensive and are under few illusions regarding the necessity of beating Hitler in Europe.

Whether even a minor offensive in Europe could be supplied by American merchant shipping which can fulfil less than 50 per cent of other present requirements is a matter of the gravest doubt. Yet the strong Russian stand is furnishing us with an unrivaled opportunity to intervene on the Continent. Further, if the coming German offensive against the Soviet Union reaches the Caucasus, thereby enabling the Reich to replenish its rapidly dwindling oil reserves and possibly crippling the Red Army, the chance of defeating Germany within many years, if at all, will probably have vanished.

In the absence of a single policy for achieving victory, the common denominator of Allied war plans is the war of attrition—wearing away the enemy's strength in men, planes, and ships in order to take the punch out of his blows. That this course can alone never achieve decisive results goes without saying; today as always only the offensive can win a war. The enemy also uses attrition, and in addition has been able to conduct powerful and successful offensives.

The greatest recent losses on both sides have occurred in the western Pacific. In the naval fighting in the Bay of Bengal Japan followed the policy of countering Allied sea power with its own less costly airplanes. The loss of valuable British and American dreadnaughts, heavy cruisers, and a plane carrier stamps this Japanese effort as an unqualified success.

Japan's purpose also obliged it to risk its warships within close bombing range of Allied shore bases. The risks proved worth taking, though had the Japanese ships been opposed by either more sea power or more air power the results might have been different. After the sinking of the Haruna and the destruction of British battleships in the Far East, the enemy adopted the plan of using cruiser escorts for convoys. These ships are almost unprotected against aerial bombings, and if American submarine and plane commanders have been even approximately right in their reports, the Japanese have lost at least a fourth of their pre-war cruiser fleet and suffered minor losses in other classes of ships.

However, after more than four months of attrition warfare the picture shows a clear Japanese advantage. The Japanese battle fleet has been preserved largely intact, while the Americans and British have each lost two irreplaceable dreadnaughts, and the margin of their naval dominance has been thereby gravely reduced. The American Asiatic fleet has ceased to exist, and save for submarines, Allied naval units in the southwest Pacific have been practically eliminated. Further, though Japan's losses have been heavy, they have not greatly affected its strength for an ultimate naval showdown. And in return the Japanese have gained all their strategic objectives, whereas the Allies have had only defeats.

On land the campaign of attrition has been even more in Japan's favor. No figures are available, but Japanese casualties in transport sinkings and in the Philippine fighting have probably been around 100,000 men. This is not too large a price for an unchecked string of victories, enormous gains of territory, at least 200,000 enemy prisoners, and an unknown number of the enemy killed. With the achievement of each success Japanese pressure on other fronts has been increased.

It is only in the air that the figures of losses run in our favor. Qualitatively, both our personnel and our planes have proved enormously superior to those of Japan, and we have inflicted losses of at least four or five to one. Japanese naval bombing has been excellent, but the army's plane work has been very poor.

On the opposite side of the world the situation is less clear. In the past three months the Germans have kept up a successful U-boat offensive in the Atlantic which has prevented our gaining much ground in the building of the new tonnage that is absolutely essential to ultimate victory. We are today accumulating war materials and training men far more rapidly than we can transport troops to the field of battle and keep them supplied with the tools of war. Thus we are deprived of the opportunity to use our full war potential.

Germany has had economic difficulties, though perhaps not in the degree that American wishful thinkers believe. The Nazis have deliberately chosen to starve subject populations in order to hold famine at arm's length at home. Reports of an approaching German oil shortage have been so persistent and have come from such apparently reliable sources as to deserve some credence.

In the Battle of Russia both sides have lost enormous numbers of men and vast quantities of material, with the Russians standing somewhat ahead of the Germans in both their losses and their ability to make replacements. For neither, have the losses of man-power reached a high enough level to cripple military efficiency, though Germany is already short of workers in its war industries. The hour of decision on this most vital front of the war, the only one where the odds even remotely favor the United Nations, is not far ahead.

Two aerial campaigns are of special interest. The British attacks upon northern France and eastern Germany are being made so regularly and with such large forces of planes that their objective may be to feel out German resistance in preparation for an attack by land. If it is, then the relatively small losses so far suffered and the weakness of enemy resistance should be encouraging.

The beginning of direct air attacks upon Japanese cities was probably hastened by Japan's wide dispersal of force to the south. Tempting as these cities are as bombing targets, we should not overestimate the military significance of the raids. Their chief value, indeed, was in raising American and Allied morale. We must have either many more plane carriers or closer land bases before we can hit Japan with sufficient regularity and force to bring vital results. But the raids were the type of action that must be greatly extended and intensified if we are to win the war.

Words Are Triggers

AN OPEN LETTER TO ARTHUR GARFIELD HAYS

DEAR ARTHUR: You write me protesting against a "new policy of the Department of Justice in bringing prosecutions for opinion alone." You ask me to join the protest which you, as counsel for the American Civil Liberties Union, have made. But I support the actions of the Department of Justice. Hence I cannot accede to your request.

This may surprise you, for you remember, as I do, that from the same platform we have together championed the constitutional right of freedom of speech, opposed censorship and suppression of opinion—even of that we hate. Remembering this collaboration, admiring your many valiant fights for civil liberties, recalling A. Mitchell Palmer's witch hunting, but mindful also of Mr. Biddle's liberalism, I felt it my duty, before taking sides, to examine what you called "opinion alone." That survey persuades me you have fallen into error.

Three men to whom you refer in your letter of protest as being prosecuted for "opinion alone" are George W. Christians, Robert Noble, Ellis O. Jones. From their utterances—as reported in Life and the New York Herald Tribune—I select a few bits which, I confess, cause me astonishment at your definition of "opinion."

George W. Christians, founder and commander of the fascist "Crusader White Shirts," is accused of having distributed handbills to our soldiers at Fort Oglethorpe and Camp Forrest. I quote a few words. "Now we are to give up our lives for the Delusion of Grandeur of a Merciless Monster Franklin Delano Roosevelt. Some neck—for a Rope." "What are we fighting for? Do we die for dollar domination?"

Noble and Jones operated in Southern California—a military zone which has been shelled by the Japanese. "The Japanese have a right to Hawaii . . . I would rather be in the war on the side of Germany than on the side of the British," says Jones, chief of the "National Copperheads." "Our country has not been attacked . . . Japan has done a good job in the Pacific . . . we are for Germany and for Hitler," says Noble. A Hitlerian rabble rouser, he incites a meeting to "impeach" a wax-faced dummy of President Roosevelt. "Friends of Progress"—a Jones-Noble outfit—held weekly meetings in an auditorium through March of this year. Their handbills offered advice on "how you can individually (legally) keep out of the war effort." Noble repeatedly praised "the Axis powers because they are the liberators of the world"; proclaimed that "MacArthur and his men are not heroes but fools"; that "Germany and Mr. Quisling are doing a fine job of liberating the Norwegians from the aggressions of England"; that the Japanese bombing of Pearl Harbor was "the proper thing." The Noble-Jones bulletin, Copperhead Notes, refers to "General MacArthur's desertion of his troops in the field."

Enough. The point need not be labored. Are these quotations correct? If so, I ask whether you seriously hold that they are mere expressions of "opinion alone." Such words are more aptly described in Judge Learned Hand's notable epigram, "Words are triggers of action." To Oliver Wendell Holmes they were sedition; to Lincoln they sounded more like treason. Such words bring to mind a famous letter to Erastus Corning in 1863. In reply to weasel-worded resolutions "to sustain the cause of the Union" but chiefly to censure Lincoln for unconstitutional arrests, Lincoln pointed to those citizens who "hoped to keep on foot amongst us a most efficient corps of spies, informers, etc," and declared that "he who dissuades one man from volunteering, or induces one soldier to desert, weakens the Union cause as much as he who kills a Union soldier in battle." Lincoln knew the perils of his time.

Biddle knows the present peril. The spies, informers, saboteurs, and their abettors, the Fifth Columns, Shirters, Fascists, Bunds and Nazis, and their dupes, have for years deluged this country so that Hitler might divide and conquer. Quo usque tandem? How long shall we endure? I refer you to the Milligan case.

That celebrated decision, rendered by the Supreme Court immediately after the close of the Civil War, is chiefly remembered because it freed Milligan from a death sentence imposed in 1864 by a Military Commission sitting in Indiana. The court, eloquently sustaining civil liberties, held that because there was not actual warfare in Indiana, Milligan was constitutionally entitled to trial in the civil court. Let us recall also, however, that the court pointedly set forth the proper methods of dealing with those who in war time attempt to obstruct war efforts. "If it was dangerous," says the court, "in the distracted condition of affairs, to leave Milligan unrestrained . . . the law said arrest him, confine him closely, render him powerless to do further mischief; and then present his case to the grand jury of the district with proofs of his guilt, and if indicted, try him. . . ." The course thus charted is, I submit, precisely that which Biddle follows.

In your protest to the Attorney General you stand on Justice Holmes's famous 1918 opinion in Schenck v. United States. So do I. Let us look at that case. Writing the Supreme Court's unanimous opinion, that Civil War veteran (he knew war), that great defender of civil liberties, laid down the principle: freedom of speech can be suppressed when it creates "a clear and present danger." Read those words with your eyes open to the world of today. Read them in conjunction with other statements contained in that great opinion. They demonstrate that what Biddle is doing is precisely what Holmes thought lawful and necessary in time of war. Read Holmes's description of the defendant Schenck's circular. Schenck is mild when set beside Noble, Christians, and Jones.

Discussing the inevitable effect of Schenck's circular, Holmes says: "We do not see what effect it could be expected to have upon persons subject to the draft except to obstruct the carrying of it out." Apply that test to the utterances of Christians et al. Proof of actual effects such as the "impeaching" of the President by the Noble-Jones mass-meeting was not required by Holmes. Today plenty of such proof must be in Mr. Biddle's hands. The rabble rousers have long been spreading their poison. Holmes points out that "in ordinary times the defendants . . . would have been within their constitutional rights." (Are these ordinary times, Arthur?) He reminds us that it is the "tendency and the intent" that count. (Is there any doubt as to the tendency and intent of the utterances I have quoted?) Holmes cautions us that "the most stringent protection of free speech would not protect a man in falsely shouting 'fire' in a theater." (Is not that just what Christians, Coughlin, et al. are doing in this theater of world war?) Facing grim realities, Holmes summed up the matter: "When a nation is at war, many things that might be said in time of peace are such a hindrance to its effort that their utterance will not be endured so long as men fight . . . no court could regard them as protected by any constitutional right."

Until months after Pearl Harbor Biddle held to the position to which prior to war you and I adhered. But you shut your eyes to the grimmer realities of today; to the fact that this is war; that as never before the danger is present, the danger is clear. Do you forget the tons of Nazi propaganda dumped for a decade into this country? Do you forget Goebbels's boast that conquest of the United States is an "inside job"? Too late Norway, Denmark, Holland, Belgium, France learned that words are bullets as well as triggers. Let us not be the victims of too little and too late.

Biddle himself has laid down a sound rule which shows that we may give him our full trust and faith. "Free speech," he said, "ought not to be restricted . . . unless it clearly appears that such speech would cause direct and dangerous interference with the conduct of the war." That is good, sound, patriotic, American horse sense. It is not the credo of the witch hunter; neither is it that of a sleepwalker. As Holmes well put the matter, it is "a question of proximity and degree." Biddle has the facts. He knows, as neither you nor I can fully know, the extent of the danger, its degree, its proximity. Let us stand by him. JAMES N. ROSENBERG

The Politics of Attack

BY NORMAN ANGELL

FROM every quarter now comes the proclamation of the key principle of victory—offense. We must take the offensive or be defeated. Particularly from Russia do we get the warning that if we remain on the defensive, leaving offense and its initiative to the enemy, we invite the utter destruction of the whole Allied cause.

So be it. But if we are to equal and beat the enemy in the effectiveness of his military offensive, the rapidity and sweep of his strategic initiative, we must equal and beat him in his political offensives too; one is impossible without the other. If we stand upon the political principles we have proclaimed heretofore, we cannot act with the promptitude of an enemy that does not admit neutrality. Recognition of this fact raises the question whether our attitudes, which happen to be militarily disastrous, are in truth the outcome of moral rectitude or moral confusion. In the interest of effective strategy now and effective post-war organization we should face the ethical questions even if we do not entirely answer them.

Recall the facts which have enabled the enemy at almost no military cost whatever to establish himself in vitally important strategic positions from which he can now be dislodged only at immense sacrifice of life. Quite early in the war Britain knew, everyone knew, that Germany would sooner or later, by an advance through the Low Countries and Scandinavia, attempt to outflank the Maginot Line and secure air and submarine bases upon the Atlantic for an attack upon Allied sea communications. The threatened countries were urged, implored, to cooperate with Britain and France in a well-prepared scheme of mutual defense. But the lesser states would have nothing to do with such plans. The very discussion of them, they urged, would imperil their neutrality; any partnership with a foreign state would compromise their national independence. The argument seemed to run that while refusal of Allied proposals would not provoke invasion by Britain or France, participation in them would provoke invasion by Germany. Allied scruples were already working enormously to Germany's advantage in that the very knowledge of German aggressiveness was operating to prevent the building up of any effective resistance to it.

It is true that the Allies were told, as Britain is told by Eire today, that their help would be welcome after the German invasion had begun—but not one moment before. Yet it was quite clear to the least instructed that once invasion had begun, it would be far too late to send effective help. We know the outcome: Norway overrun in a few weeks, Holland in ten days; Denmark conquered by telephone; Belgium crushed in confusion and terror. Allied scrupulousness on the point of neutrality did not save these countries; it helped to destroy them. There is something tragically comic in the fact that the British forces which now, as commandos, raid the Norwegian coast and are hailed in every Norwegian heart as an earnest of deliverance from satanic tyranny would have been fought as enemies if they had preceded the Germans by twenty-four hours, or long enough to take over the harbors the Germans now occupy and to mine and fortify them. Had the forces which now, after disaster, are welcomed with such joy come in time to prevent disaster, they would have been fought by the Norwegians themselves in the name of national right, self-determination, independence, neutrality, freedom. As a result Norway has for the time being lost all rights whatsoever, personal and national alike. It has lost them because like others, including Britain and America, it stood by a certain concept of political right which, if maintained by the nations generally, would make the defense of any right a physical impossibility, a concept which has indeed already put the nations of continental Europe at Hitler's mercy.

The end of the story is not yet. For things may so develop that the whole issue of the war may turn upon the promptitude with which a Dakar, a Tunisia, a Madagascar, a Martinique, a Portuguese or a Spanish island is occupied—or a De Gaulle recognized—and the enemy forestalled. (It was reported recently that at one moment a British force could quite easily have forestalled the Japanese in Thailand, but that the British commander did not dare to move for fear of sharp reproof from the home government, which had been emphatic in its insistence that Britain's record must be kept free of any charges of "aggression.")

The nature of the confusion which is still playing its part in hamstringing Allied offensive strategy is illustrated by a recent editorial comment of the Saturday Evening Post's (prior to Pearl Harbor) on a letter of Bernard Shaw's anent the problem of the Irish bases. Shaw felt impelled as an Irishman to testify that England had stuck to its bargain about Irish independence "as no other country in the world would have done." He pointed out that "Mr. de Valera is asking Mr. Churchill to imperil his forty million people for the sake of the mere paper neutrality of four million hostile Irishmen." (Had Shaw been writing after Pearl Harbor he might have added to the forty million imperiled British a couple of hundred million in the Americas, twice that number in China and the Antipodes, a similar number in India.) Ireland, insisted Shaw, could not be made another Switzerland, adding: "Mr. de Valera says those ports belong to Eire, but the day is gone when any race of people can call its land its own. Those ports belong to Europe, to civilization."

To which the Post replied:

> If four million Irishmen have no rights that forty million Englishmen are bound to respect, what rights have forty million Englishmen that eighty million Germans are bound to respect? If the day is gone when people may call their land their own, what is England defending, and what is the war about? Thirdly, if this is liberal ethic and liberal thinking, then liberalism of this cult, as we have suspected before, is morally and intellectually bankrupt.

If the Allies, including America, had in fact and in all cases stood by the principle that the Post invokes in behalf of Ireland, the Allied cause would already have been lost. It has been expedient to be scrupulous in respecting the neutrality of Eire, despite the cost in ships and food and lives. But we can hardly pretend that there has been quite the same scruple in the case of Iceland, Greenland, Egypt, Syria, Iraq, Iran, or in the pre-war years Panama, or, still earlier, in the case of a long list of British bases stretching from Gibraltar to the Far East.

A few weeks ago an isolationist publication gave to the arguments of the Saturday Evening Post their logical extension. It insisted that this war could never be regarded as a war for freedom until Britain was prepared to give back Gibraltar to Spain and "Ireland to the Irish," to evacuate all other territories which it occupies, and completely to dissolve its empire and liberate "all the people living under its yoke," including the people of the dominions. This has been in some quarters a familiar theme. Assume that Britain had some years since become completely converted to that particular type of political morality—as, indeed, a goodly proportion of the British people had become—and had completely dissolved the empire, evacuating Gibraltar and all the other bases. What would have been the result today? There can be no doubt whatever that if the British people had been as moral as all that, or had been moral in that particular fashion, a Nazi Gauleiter or a "Vichy" government would now be ruling in Britain, and every British port, every factory, and most of the British fleet would be in Nazi hands; Africa and India would have fallen long since, and their teeming millions would have been made into tools of Nazi world domination.

Have we, then, been saved from that fate, at least for the time being, by sheer political immorality and wickedness? And do the present battle cries of independence and self-determination and national freedom mean that the organization of the general defense of the nations against a new violence, like that which Hitler has launched, must always be subject to the self-determination of a Gibraltar or an Aden—or an Eire? That the defense of civilization as a whole must always give way to the objection a state may raise to the presence of a foreign naval or air base upon its territory? That the one political impulse which must never be overridden and must always be regarded as sacred is the impulse to isolationism? In that case the future is with Hitler—the present Hitler or another—however this war may end.

The obviousness of this truth—that the Hitlers will always be able to pick off their enemies one by one, and the war fail of its prime object, if we accept our present battle cries at their face value—can hardly be regarded as favorable to a dauntless morale. True, we talk of a new League of Nations, the blueprint of which is presumably going to be so dazzling that nations will discard those emotions of nationalist separatism which we still foster, and which at present no one seems to have the courage to challenge even to the extent of suggesting with any bluntness that we cannot possibly hope to render national rights secure until we have recognized and accepted the obligations by which alone the rights can be defended.

The difficulties of cooperation between independent states is not a new story; it is as old as the failures of Greek city states to achieve it. It is obviously one of the most difficult of all the tasks undertaken by men. If human experience anywhere gives any hint of forces which help toward success in that task, we ought to be ready to use those forces. The League of Nations failed to solve the fundamental problem of mutual aid in resistance to aggression; the members feared, and evaded, the responsibilities of collective defense. They preferred neutrality. But the nations of the much-criticized British Commonwealth—into which so large a part of the empire had been resolved—did not fail in this particular, and the fact is only mentioned here because actual events illustrate a political principle that it is vital just now to understand.

Although Canada, Australia, New Zealand, and South Africa had an independence which entitled them to be neutral, none of them chose that course. They were active belligerents more than two years before the United States became one. And it is worth while putting bluntly to ourselves the question: What would have happened if the Parliament of Canada, like that of Eire, had voted for neutrality? Would the fact that a "British" nation on this hemisphere decided to remain out of the war have had no effect on the development of American opinion, on President Roosevelt's task and course, on his two years' fight against isolationism? And could Britain have faced the enemy in Europe alone during more than a year if the dominions had repudiated any obligation to come into the fight?

Why did they come in? Why did collective security, which in the case of the members of the League failed so egregiously, succeed in the case of half a dozen nations by no means entirely British, which included important French and Dutch elements? The answer would be too long for a Nation article, but a partial explanation is to be found in two facts: Although Britain has laid no statutory obligation on the dominions, it has freely offered them the protection of British power—of the navy, the naval bases, and the coaling stations scattered throughout the world. To accept or benefit by that help obviously involved a corresponding obligation—to give help in return. The obligation has been recognized in the retention by the dominions of a mere symbol, the crown. It was a reminder that the new nations had better hang together if they did not want to be hanged separately by some Hitler or other. Cooperation for security was made a reality by the existence of power at a center, coupled with the recognition that cooperation depended upon the acceptance of reciprocal obligations.

If the United Nations are to fulfil their task, centrally directed power must in this case also be freely offered as the means of security for all those cooperating, in return for their acceptance of the relevant obligations. With the accent on obligation. And of course coercion of those who repudiate the obligation cannot be excluded. No workable human society, no building up of law, has been possible without coercion, a coercion which need not endanger the purposes of the war if we know what we are doing and are not trapped by fallacies similar to those embodied in the Saturday Evening Post editorial referred to above.

That passage, with its cocksureness, is worth quoting if only to show how liberalism when applied to the field which now concerns mankind more than any other, the international field, has failed to explain itself to certain very important sections of the public. What has liberalism been doing all these years if the editor of the most widely disseminated magazine in America can consider such an appeal as Shaw's for the fulfilment of obligations indispensable to the defense of any right for anybody, equivalent to the denial of right? Or if it is necessary to explain that anyone who wishes to be sure of calling his land or his property or his soul his own must make his contribution to the apparatus of defense—pay his taxes for police and courts and what not in the domestic field, and fulfil obligations even more onerous still in the too long neglected field of international relations?

Surely it ought not to be necessary at this date to explain that there is a difference between the criminal violence of an individual entering a man's house, killing its owner, and seizing it for the criminal's own evil purposes, between that and the seizure of property under the rule of eminent domain, by virtue of which alone at times the human community can defend itself, can uphold the law which prevents robbery and which alone makes either freedom or order possible.

Laval's Cabinet of Traitors

BY HENRY TORRES AND HAL LEHRMAN

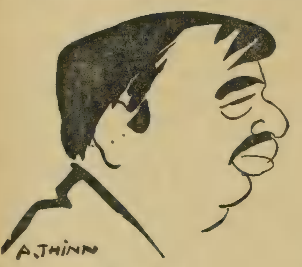
THE political nonentities Pierre Laval has dug out from behind the molding are important not for what they are but for the interests they represent. Individually so obscure that correspondents had to scratch around for a scrap of identifying comment on most of them, the twenty-four assorted ministers, state secretaries, delegates, and commissioners of the new regime form in their constellation the most sinister governmental group in the history of modern France.

That the Cabinet is a sell-out to the Nazis needs no underlining. But the list of the stooges makes two more subtle disclosures. The first is that Laval is not only insuring his own skin by contributing to a Nazi victory but getting the payments on his own insurance. The second is that Pétain and Darlan are as completely under Laval's thumb as Laval is under Hitler's. All the hocus-pocus of the Marshal's supposed contempt for the Auvergnat and the Admiral's hatred of him has been exposed by the magicians themselves.

Laval is an old hand at making money by dealing with the Germans. In 1931, during his first Premiership, he made a famous trip to Berlin with Briand. He spent half his time double-crossing his Foreign Minister and the other half arranging for French investments in the German chemical industry. As Premier, he stuck by his law clients, and one of the best was the great chemical trust of Rhône-Poulenc. But in 1942 Laval has more than chemicals to mix. There is the whole of France's remaining wealth to pillage—and the Banque Worms to help him do it. Pétain allowed this institution to take control of virtually the entire national economy and serve as intermediary for the absorption of France's industries by the Germans. Laval has done even better. He has installed the bank in the Cabinet.

The House of Worms got its start three-quarters of a century ago. It carried coal to the great world ports, grew fat on coastal trade, fatter on shipbuilding. A boon to the republic's commercial prestige, it was the only French firm in its field to give the British serious competition. Yet Hippolyte Worms, the present dean of the house, used to be a passionate Anglophile. He married an English wife—now in London. His daughter's husband is the son of a high official at the British Foreign Office.

In 1937 the House of Worms opened a banking department. The brains behind this enterprise belonged to one Jacques Barnaud, formerly of the Treasury. His lieutenant was a certain Gabriel Leroy-Ladurie. These two developed a considerable attachment for the political dervish Jacques Doriot, who in a single year—1934-35—had gone all the way from Communist to Fascist. Doriot's Parti Populaire Français was stocked mainly with renegades tossed out of respectable trade unions for graft and other peculations. It was properly mystical about labor's rights, in the approved National Socialist manner, and offered a natural investment for nervous money in the days of the People's Front. Barnaud and Leroy-Ladurie did more than just support the P. P. F.; they moved in and took old Worms along with them.



Pierre Laval

After the armistice Doriot set up his collaborationist shop in Paris. So did Barnaud. Already, at Bordeaux, while Reynaud was still in power, Barnaud, in the name of high finance, had been able to put terrific pressure behind Pétain's campaign for surrender. At the same time Leroy-Ladurie had worked on his friend the Countess de Portes, mistress of the Premier. A grateful Pétain made Barnaud Delegate General for French-German Economic Relations. This meant that he was in charge of turning over French properties to the Nazis, on a commission basis. It remained for Laval to raise Barnaud and his job to Cabinet rank.

Leroy-Ladurie has been rewarded by the gift to his brother Jacques of an even juicier plum—the Ministry of Agriculture and Food Supply, where profit possibilities these days are well-nigh astronomical. Jacques was picked for this post by Laval because he was a big landholder and an old-time henchman of Dorgères, the demagogue of the pro-Nazi Peasant Front.

That makes two for the Banque Worms in the new government, and there are two more. Jacques Guérard, also an ex-Treasury man, after being fired from the directorate of the Banque d'Extrême-Orient, entered the Worms establishment as its agent for insurance companies. After an assignment from Darlan arranging bases for the Nazis in Syria, Guérard turned up in Paris as French insurance Führer. He is now a secretary of state "attached to M. Laval." The last of the Worms quartet is Paul Marion, another Doriotist ex-Communist, ex-editor of l'Humanité, pre-war errand boy for the bank abroad—especially in Germany—and currently Vichy's Information chief.

With such a crew at his elbow, it is obvious what course Laval will steer in domestic policy. An anarcho-syndicalist lawyer who made millions by backstairs pleading for big-time swindlers, an ex-Socialist whose last Premiership in 1935 cut the standard of living 10 per cent, Laval outdid even himself in his maiden broadcast as Premier under Hitler: "The workers' world has nothing to fear . . . it is socialism that will be installed. Labor will be protected, honored, magnified." To guarantee this, the new State Secretary for Labor is Hubert Lagardelle, publicly acknowledged by Mussolini as his teacher in social philosophy. Lagardelle is another of those former Socialists, disciples of Sorel's "Reflexions sur la violence," who went in one easy glide from preaching the general strike to a swivel chair in the front office of monopoly capital. To please il Duce, France sent this friend of his revolutionary salad days to the Rome embassy, where Attaché Lagardelle had more power than his ambassador. He was Mussolini's undercover man in the Hoare-Laval deal on Ethiopia, and later kept France from forcing a showdown with Italy until the blackshirts were ready with the dagger and France lay dying. This intimate of Matteotti's assassin is now being paraded as the guardian of wages and hours for French workers.

Hangers-on crowd each other in the new government. Typical of these is Raymond Grasset, State Secretary for Health, an old crony from Laval's Puy-de-Dôme bailiwick. Pierre Cathala, the Finance Minister, has held some kind of job in every Laval cabinet. He paid off in a big way once by getting on the Chamber's commission investigating the Stavisky affair and whitewashing his boss. Max Bonnafous, State Secretary for Agriculture, is Adrien Marquet's representative. The neo-socialist fascist mayor of Bordeaux recruited Bonnafous from the local lycée. Thanks to such high patronage, the schoolteacher became a prefect in North Africa and in Marseilles, second largest city in the country, without the slightest administrative training. Similarly Georges Hilaire and Robert Bousquet, state secretaries in the Interior Ministry, are two little prefects, aged thirty-four and thirty-three, from the occupied Aube and Marne, where they excelled as bootlickers of the conqueror

Burlingame, Calif.

Of the six Ministers, three are all-out Pétain men. Lucien Romier is a doddering ex-journalist who enjoyed a reputation as a debilitated augur in the fashionable columns of Le Figaro. Documents found during the war in the private files of the France-Germany Committee prove that Romier was intrusted with suppressing the articles of his colleague Wladimir d'Ormesson, a Catholic patriot who later resigned his Vatican embassy post rather than serve under Vichy. Romier is now "Minister of State Without Portfolio Attached to Marshal Pétain." Joseph Barthélémy, professor at the Paris Law School, told the world in a sensational and highly effective front-page piece for Le Temps before Munich that France had no legal obligation to defend Czecho-Slovakia. Barthélémy remains as Minister of Justice. Charles Maurras, arch-Royalist, is not in the Cabinet, probably because he is stone-deaf. But he is adequately represented by Abel Bonnard, leader in the Académie Française of the "Parti des Ducs," for whom a merely moderate reactionary was no better than a Bolshevik. A pre-war writer of essays in super-elegant French lamenting the departed pomp of kings, Bonnard blossomed after the armistice into a furious polemic, shoveling yard after yard of copy into every collaborationist sheet in France. He is now Minister of Education.

The presence of this fossilized triumvirate shows how complete are Pétain's ties to the Laval regime. But the case of Darlan is even more conclusive. The Admiral, no longer in the government, is head of the armed forces and responsible only to the Marshal. Our perennial appeasers are already suggesting that he is therefore the white hope of France. But they ignore the fact that the Secretaries for Navy, Air, and War are all under Laval—and are all Darlan men.

Vice-Admiral Paul Auphan was previously Darlan's naval chief of staff and only last winter was running errands for him in North Africa. (Admiral Charles Platon, another of the Darlan proteges, is now Laval's own secretary.) General Jean Jannekeyn was promoted from colonel and made commander of the air force in Syria by the infamous Henri Dentz, Darlan's Governor General, in time to resist the British–Free French occupation. General Eugene Bridoux was until a fortnight ago Darlan's valet to Laval's jackal Fernand de Brinon, ambassador in Paris, where the General had himself incessantly photographed in full uniform at Reichswehr galas.

The last knot of the rope which binds the Marshal, the Admiral, and the new "Chief of Government" is tied by Jacques Benoist-Mechin. He and De Brinon are now secretaries in Laval's personal Cabinet. But Benoist-Mechin, author of a scandalous panegyric to Nazi treatment of French war prisoners, was Pétain's own delegate to the German military. His present post is final proof, if any is still needed, that Laval and the Marshal are two faces of the same counterfeit coin.

Everybody's Business

BY KEITH HUTCHISON

South Africa's Golden Goose

IN MY last article, discussing the war-time utility of the precious metals, I pointed out that gold was still playing an important part in British war finance. Lend-lease has relieved but not ended the strain on Britain's attenuated foreign-exchange resources. Arms contracts predating lend-lease are still being liquidated, and there is an adverse balance of payments with countries outside the sterling area which must be met.

Last year almost one-fifth of a total British war expenditure exceeding $15 billion represented payments abroad which were financed by the realization of foreign resources—gold, dollar balances, and overseas investments. Britain's gold reserves are now largely exhausted; its most salable foreign investments have been sold or mortgaged. Hence for its future needs it must depend to a considerable extent on the newly mined gold of the empire countries within the sterling area, especially of South Africa.

From the point of view of the United States it makes little difference whether goods shipped to Britain are paid for in gold or by a lease-lend debit note. In both cases what we are really receiving is a claim on future British production. Lend-lease agreements provide for the eventual return of equivalent amounts of goods. Gold may seem to some people a more tangible form of payment than a paper obligation, but in actual fact this gold does nothing to increase our wealth—our command over consumable goods—unless at some future date we are prepared to exchange it for foreign commodities and services.

If this were better understood, it might be easier to arrange for pooling the finances of the United Nations, just as their armed services, their production, and their shipping are now being pooled. In that event, the last remaining war-time function of gold—its use as a balancing factor in international payments—would lapse, and, theoretically, the labor and equipment now being devoted to gold-mining could be diverted to more useful forms of production. I say theoretically, because while in most countries gold-mining is a marginal industry which could be closed down without causing more than a limited amount of dislocation and hardship, there are countries where any such step would mean economic catastrophe. The outstanding example is South Africa, which is as compleetly dependent on gold production as Detroit on the manufacture of automobiles. But whereas Detroit with ingenuity and effort can turn to the production of planes, tanks, and guns, the scope for a similar transformation in South Africa is extremely limited.

The South African gold mines afford direct employment to some 50,000 white workers and 300,000 natives and indirect employment to tens of thousands more. In fact, it would hardly be an exaggeration to say that most other industries in the country are subsidiary to the mines, while agriculture to a very considerable degree is subsidized by them. This is due to the fact that while the government provides large subventions for the farmers it draws from the gold mines the major part of its revenue. In 1940, it is estimated, direct taxes on gold-mining yielded £28 million, while taxes on income derived from the same source produced £22 million—or together £50 million out of a total revenue of £63 million.

The part played by gold in South Africa's trade balance is equally impressive. In 1941 imports were valued at £100 million; exports, excluding gold, at £41 million. Sales of gold to the Bank of England amounted to £119 million, thus leaving a balance of £60 million which, after allowing for certain "invisible" items, was available for the repatriation of South African foreign indebtedness. In view of this degree of dependency on gold, South Africans insist that drastic curtailment of the industry would be disastrous. It would not be possible, representatives of the mining interests declare, to transfer unskilled native labor to other occupations even if equipment for new war industries could be secured. A big proportion of the white labor force has been released for service in the army. The well-equipped machine-shops maintained by the mines have been partially turned over to war production.

A gradual slowing up in the mines is recognized as inevitable. All work on new properties has been suspended, and development work in producing mines is being curtailed. Only one-third of the £36 million spent on "stores" in 1941 was for imported goods, Certain essential spares and materials must be procured from the United States, but South African mines are not being given any higher priority ratings than American mines, and the shipping shortage provides another handicap.

South African troops have played a notable part in the Ethiopian and Libyan campaigns. Now the Union has assumed major strategic importance since its great naval base at Simonstown is a crucial factor in protecting the remaining sea route to India and the Middle East. The economic strategists of the United Nations must therefore give due weight to the plea that South Africa's foundation industry must be enabled to continue operations if its war effort is not to be short-circuited. It is to be hoped, however, that South Africa will not neglect the present opportunity for greater industrial diversification, particularly the development of base metals. For surely the present crisis spotlights the danger of allowing one's market basket to be filled exclusively with golden goose eggs.

Democracy's Allies in Europe

THE 6TH COLUMN: INSIDE THE NAZI-OCCUPIED COUNTRIES. By Jan Masaryk, Mme Antonina Paderewska-Wilkonska, Stanislaw Stronski, Karin Michaelis, Tor Myklebost, Theodore Broch, Dr. N. A. C. Slotemaker de Bruine, Henri Fast, Prince Jean of Luxembourg and Pierre Dupong, Geneviève Tabouis, Svetislav-Sveta Petrovitch, Sofocles Venizelos. Alliance Book Corporation. $2.50.

UNDERGROUND EUROPE. By Curt Riess. The Dial Press. $3.

PRISONERS OF HOPE: REPORT ON A MISSION. By Howard L. Brooks. L. B. Fischer. $2.75.

EUROPE is not a continent of cowering slaves but a seething battleground where fighting peoples plot to regain the independence they have temporarily lost. Day after day, night after night, unsleeping conspirators carry on their warfare against Hitler, Himmler, the Gestapo, and their traitorous tools. They have learned to expect no mercy, and they have hardened themselves to give none. When one of their number is captured, they know he is tortured and killed. These heroes of the underground movements of the captive countries are the volunteer armies of the United Nations, the allies we cannot afford to forget or neglect.

The three books listed above lift a corner of the curtain that conceals the dark continent of Europe and give us a glimpse of the extraordinary tragedy that is being played out there. On one side we see the arrogance, ruthlessness, and sadism of the self-called master-race, and on the other, the pride, ingenuity, and sacrifice of those who refuse to accept the role of slaves. Here is a drama of the struggle for liberty that literally pierces us with pity and terror. It is the story of a war that is so much more than a mere conflict over national boundary lines that its incidents affect the reader like the chiaroscuro of Dante or the exaltation of Milton.

In a Czech armament plant a German soldier saw a workman pouring soup into a cast. The worker knew it would create a fault in the metal that would make it explode when it became a gun. The soldier rushed to prevent the sabotage. The two men grappled, and both went down into the liquid fire. True, the Czech died—but the steel was spoiled, and there was one less soldier, one less gun for the enemies of his people. Greater love hath no man than this. That struggle silhouetted against, and then consumed by, the blazing inferno is one flash from our contemporary inferno, a vivid moment illuminating the meaning of our struggle.

"The 6th Column" is unfortunately named. It is a report of democracy's fifth column at work in ten countries. The reporters are for the most part men and women familiar with the plans of the unconquered captives in their native lands and continually in touch with them, for communication with their friends in the outside world is maintained with amazing regularity by the leaders of the underground movements. Not all the accounts are written with equal skill, and some are devoted rather to a history of the defeat than to the present struggle against the victors, thus giving the impression that in those countries the underground movements are not active or else that the writer is not informed about them. The most satisfactory accounts are those of Masaryk on Czecho-Slovakia, Myklebost and Broch on Norway, and De Bruine on Holland. While Stronski has given a fair outline of Poland's struggle he has by no means adequately described the amazing organization with which this people is combating the cruelest persecutions being visited upon the captured lands. In spite of its defects, however, the book gives the most complete account of the underground movements that I have yet examined.

Nazi rule follows a well-defined pattern in all these countries. It completely suspends all legal rights, making the population dependent upon the opportunities and whims of the local rulers. It suppresses all freedom of the press. It attacks religious leaders of all faiths. It visits continual oppression upon all universities and students. In these four fields every conceivable kind of personal and social outrage is carried on—theft of personal property, torture of all who display any signs of independence, heavy fines upon communities accused of acts of protest, and vindictive firing upon crowds or buildings selected for punishment. Against these the people maintain a subterranean press, a system of chain letters, secret military organizations, machinery for aiding the concealment and flight of their leaders, continual sabotage, communication with leaders abroad, training for the children and young people in the language and customs of their own people, and vigorous religious protest.

Curt Riess in "Underground Europe" tells stories of individual exploits that illustrate dramatically how the people wage their war. His book should win a wide audience by its human appeal even among those who will understand little of its political import. It makes plain that life in the captive countries moves at two levels, the one that the conquerors see and the hidden one where people talk and act intensely for the things they cherish and have not surrendered. In this underground community all unite to fight the common enemy, but in it also the struggle for future power goes on between the reactionaries who still think of their privileges of yesterday and the liberals who anticipate genuine democracy in the days to come. Riess makes clear at whom our present propaganda should be aimed and how our political warfare should establish contact with those who will help us make the kind of world we want.

"Prisoners of Hope" by the Reverend Howard L. Brooks tells effectively of his experiences in 1941 as a worker with the Unitarian Service Committee furnishing medical care to the concentration camps in France. The Unitarians have performed this service skilfully in conditions of extraordinary delicacy and peril. Mr. Brooks's volume helps to explain their success. It is a book about life under the Vichy regime. It shows how Americans have helped the enemies of Nazism to escape from Europe, paying particular tribute to the courage of Varian Fry, how the Gestapo has penetrated unoccupied France, and how the people express their protest. Above all it shows how Vichy has enslaved every Frenchman and truckled to every Nazi. I recommend it as required reading for the State Department. FRANK KINGDON

How to Attack Japan

VICTORY IN THE PACIFIC: HOW WE MUST DEFEAT JAPAN. By Alexander Kiralfy. The John Day Company. $2.75.

WITHIN the last few weeks American public opinion has turned completely away from the misconception that a defensive war can be other than a losing war, and we now are confronted with the danger that the difficulties of the inevitable alternative will be overlooked. In that connection Alexander Kiralfy's study of the means by which we can hope to achieve victory in the Pacific could not be more timely. The author approaches the problem from a coldly practical point of view, in sharp contrast with the wishful thinking evident in Lieutenant Colonel Kernan's "Defense Will Not Win the War" and in so many articles and speeches advocating an immediate offensive. The will to victory, he points out, is essential but it is not enough. We shall never beat Douhet with Coué.

"Victory in the Pacific" is an excellent combination of encyclopedic erudition and forceful, realistic thinking. Mr. Kiralfy's analysis of the underlying reasons for Japan's yet unbroken chain of conquests is the most exhaustive and convincing that has appeared so far, and is no less convincing or closely reasoned for having been written in the few weeks since Pearl Harbor. A working knowledge of Japanese has aided the author in defining the means by which Tokyo's militarists sought out the chinks in the United Nations' moral and material armor and plunged the sword unerringly at these spots. The only objection to this part of Mr. Kiralfy's work is that he maintains, somewhat laboriously, an analogy between the professional militarist and the surgeon (isha). Similarly, in the discussion of military measures there is a rather forced analogy with shogi, the Japanese chess.

Before presenting his case for the offensive Mr. Kiralfy seeks to dispel some of the fatal illusions about the global war into which we have been precipitated. The Pacific theater is not—as President Roosevelt and Prime Minister Churchill prematurely decided—a secondary front, but a second primary front. We shall not beat the Japanese by painstakingly breaking off their invasion spearheads at the tip and even more painstakingly driving them back, mile by bloody mile, to Java, to Singapore, to Luzon, to Hainan, to Formosa, and eventually to Japan. We shall gain little, and may even lose, by sporadic raids such as that on the Marshall Islands. We cannot fight under Marquis of Queensberry rules—"Militarists, guided solely by strictly scientific considerations, are fighting against men staggering under a load of inhibitions which include pacifism, defense-mindedness, and war morality . . . they form the trilogy of defeat."

What then shall we do? Mr. Kiralfy describes the Japanese mandated islands in detail, but one could wish for a fuller discussion of the possibility of an offensive westward through the Marshalls. After a nod to the submarine flotillas which have operated with indecisive success on Japan's convoy routes, he turns to the most dazzling of all possibilities, an attack on the enemy homeland. This could come only from the north, and Mr. Kiralfy presupposes the cooperation of the Soviets in providing bases and in making simultaneous attacks from their Maritime Provinces. This supposition may be justified, and indeed the offensive potentialities of these Russian positions may compel Tokyo to strike at them forthwith. If so, it is to be hoped that the United States is prepared to give the necessary aid, not for the defensive, but in the form of counter-attacks even more telling than the raids on Tokyo, Yokohama, Kobe, and Nagoya. And if this should not be so, it is to be hoped that plans for the invasion of Karafuto, Hokkaido, and Honshu are being laid, with due allowance for the fact that Russian bases may be unavailable. In either case, "Victory in the Pacific" is a storehouse of information essential to an understanding of the future campaigns across the international date line. And it is the soundest and most provocative discussion of the alternatives open to the United Nations in that vast theater of war.

GILBERT CANT

Quennell's Byron

BYRON IN ITALY. By Peter Quennell. The Viking Press. $3.50.

"BYRON IN ITALY" is the sequel to Mr. Quennell's admirable "Byron: The Years of Fame"; it spans the time between 1816 and 1823, from the end of Byron's disastrous marriage to his departure for Greece. This is the period of Byron's full poetic maturity, the period of the last canto of "Childe Harold," of "Beppo," of "Cain" and "Manfred," of "The Vision of Judgment," and, most important of all, of "Don Juan." It is also the time of that crisis in Byron's spirit that led him through the liaisons with Clare Claremont, Marianna Segati, and Margarita Cogni, through the sordid and probably perverse Venetian nights, through the torpor of his attendance upon Theresa Guiccioli. For a while he was quiet with Theresa in the placidity and affection of the Palazzo Lanfranchi; but the furies were soon at him again and he fled to the fatal Greek adventure.

It is a hard story to tell. The events are frequently sensational, sometimes brutal, and they can tempt the biographer to forget that this is not a sexual melodrama but a spiritual tragedy. But Mr. Quennell is not to be tempted. He does not assume that Byron's sexual career was unique either in his own day or in ours. He understands the nature of Byron's sensuality, knowing that, in the ordinary meaning of the word, Byron was not a sensual man at all. Byron's sexual urge was as reluctant as it was compelling, and he expected little peace or pleasure from its satisfaction; deep conflicts of impulse made his affairs the symbols or the instruments of other than sexual needs, just as the Greek enterprise served other than political aims.

Mr. Quennell does not labor this insight, and he does not usurp the role of the psychopathologist. He makes his point as the biographer should make it, by the right proportions of his narrative and by the tact of his tone. After the rush and gush of Ethel Colburn Mayne's useful but infatuated biography, and after the grave knowingness of André Maurois's, the quiet worldliness of Mr. Quennell's book comes as a cool relief. In life Byron gave the best of himself to men and women of the world who accepted him without worship, contempt, or astonishment, and in biography he responds in the same way.

But good as Mr. Quennell's book is on all personal matters, it has a serious deficiency. Byron was more than a man of personal life; he was a man of mind, of society, and of history, and unless he is seen so he is not truly seen. And Mr. Quennell is both inadequate and naive in his dealing with history and ideas. His book, through most of its length, does not lead us to remember that Byron was a great and conscious European who suffered as much from his epoch as from himself. Then, having sinned by omission, Mr. Quennell undertakes to make up for it by launching into a sin of commission; as the story draws to a close with Byron preparing to sail for Greece, Mr. Quennell interrupts his narrative to make an elaborate estimate of the romantic movement. He tells us, among other things, that the romantic poets were "continually advancing the charms of extinction against the claims of life," that they were anarchic and distrusted the use of reason, that to them we may trace all the evils of nationalism—"essentially a romantic movement"—and even the theory of Aryan racial superiority. This is, of course, both inaccurate and illogical; and Mr. Quennell is so concerned to blame our present disorders on the romantic poets that he quite forgets the manful struggle they made against the disorder of their own time.

Mr. Quennell's unhappy excursion into political judgment occupies but a relatively small part of his book, and it should not obscure the book's excellent qualities. Nevertheless, it indicates an inadequacy in Mr. Quennell's understanding of Byron which all his personal insight does not redeem.

Taxes and Politics

AMERICAN TAXATION: ITS HISTORY AS A SOCIAL FORCE IN DEMOCRACY. By Sidney Ratner. W. W. Norton and Company. $4.50.

IT IS difficult to damn Sidney Ratner's book on American taxation except with faint praise. The author's point of view is firmly grounded in the progressive tradition of writers like Charles A. Beard, Allan Nevins, and Gustavus Myers, to whom he gives full credit in his preface and in voluminous footnotes.

As a text or reference book, the volume should prove widely useful. Perhaps it is unfair to criticize such an extensive and scholarly work from the point of view of the general reader. Yet it is decidedly unsatisfying in a number of important ways.

The title is misleading, because the study deals exclusively with the history of federal taxation. To consider the national tax program without reporting at each stage the complementary effects of state and local taxation is to give a distorted picture of the over-all burden at various income

And a number of new and exciting talents

A special feature of this beautifully printed book is a section devoted to the most recent photographs of the poets. Also many of the poems by such poets as Wallace Stevens, Stephen Spender, etc., are here printed for the first time, making the book a splendid first edition item. The previous anthology edited by Oscar Williams last year was selected by The Nation as among the "100 Notable Books of 1941," and we prophesy that the present volume will be a literary event in 1942. Distinctly a book that the lover of modern poetry cannot afford to be without.

levels. State and local taxes are mentioned briefly in a few places, but there is, for example, no mention of the very serious failure of New Deal leaders to undertake the necessary and difficult job of coordinating the present chaotic tax structure.

The distinction between progressive and regressive taxes which is accepted by most liberals is assumed throughout the book, and perhaps no extensive new discussion of the subject is needed. At the same time the desirability of taxing the rich and the undesirability of taxing the poor are not so generally taken for granted that they can be presented without argument. More particularly, it is not entirely fair to examine tax programs of Revolutionary and Civil War days solely from the point of view which prevails in progressive circles today. Taxation must be considered in the light of economic conditions and theories which were general at the time the taxes were levied: the imposition of an income tax during the Civil War was far more radical than it was fifty years later, and the Senators who proposed and supported it deserve relatively greater credit than they are given, even though the measure was modest in its effect on the rich.

During the nineteenth century, at least, the people of the United States as a whole were convinced that the accumulation of capital in the hands of rich men was beneficial, since the country needed capital for the development of its resources. It can reasonably be argued that the great disparities between rich and poor which were allowed to develop as a result of this conviction were deplorable. But in all fairness it is important to distinguish between an era when private fortunes were largely invested in productive enterprises and the present situation, when over-saving has become a real economic menace. Mr. Ratner fails to make that distinction, or to give any full discussion of the economic effects of taxation. His preoccupation with social justice is commendable, but it does not shed very much new light on his subject.

Nevertheless, a history of national politics in America in terms of tax legislation is a worth-while job, and one which the author has accomplished with skill, a readable style, and a great deal of scholarly research. While much of the background is familiar to anyone who has read Beard and Parrington, it is enlivened with many anecdotes and character sketches which are decidedly to the point. It is scarcely the author's fault that arguments about taxes have gone over and over the same ground, and it is amusing to read the comment of the New York Sun on the Supreme Court's invalidation of the income tax in 1895: "The wave of socialistic revolution has gone far," said the Sun, "but it breaks at the foot of the ultimate bulwark set up for the protection of our liberties. Five to four the court stands like a rock."

In presenting such illuminating details, together with a more serious record of Congressional action on tax bills since the days of the Revolution, Mr. Ratner has performed a real service. Unfortunately, his efforts to present a full historical background for the story of taxes have led him occasionally to make hasty and rather dubious generalizations. He writes, for example: "The Roosevelt Administration, however, had dealt a heavy blow to international economic cooperation in July, 1933, when Roosevelt repudiated the program of the London International Economic Conference for currency stabilization because he desired to promote a speedy recovery within the United States through a devaluation of the currency and a rise in domestic prices."

Many economists, especially those with orthodox views about currency, will agree with this statement. But it can be argued with considerable justification that the London Economic Conference was wrecked because the British and French representatives refused to begin serious discussions without an agreement for restoration of the gold standard. Whether the President was right or wrong, his policy at that time does not deserve to be dismissed with a casual sentence.

The book was evidently completed before the attack on Pearl Harbor, and the final chapter, America Faces the Second World War, inevitably fails to cover the tax problems which will arise from the war expenditures now in prospect. By the time the war is over, the value of the whole study will probably be quite purely historical. CHARLES E. NOYES

"How Begot, How Nourished?" I

[This is the first of a series of three commentaries on the writing and publishing of poetry. The second will appear in an early issue.]

DURING a lull in the general uproar a stir and murmur from that corner of the party where the literary editors have their heads together waft a phrase halfway across the room. Did I hear something about "a renaissance of poetry"? In the midst of the loud resuming noise, before we apply too much common sense to analysis of the phrase and deflation of its metaphorical value, even while we remind ourselves that poetry is written with the human hand and that poets are produced by a so far undiscovered dialectical law, in other words, according to God's holy will, it might be interesting to pay a little attention to the publication of poetry, to examine the various means by which it is presented to the reader, the various levels on which, in book form, it engages his attention.

To begin with, we have the reputable established commercial houses. These—some more, some less—bring out books of poetry every season, for one reason or another: for prestige, to balance their list, to have the satisfaction of cashing in on a long shot when a Pulitzer prize winner comes over, or from more creditable motives. All of them complain that they lose money on it; still, one might like to have a look at the accounts, and see whether they drop more on their poets, in any given season, than they throw around on cocktail parties for their novelists or the successful inside-story lasses and lads. Is it only a low and skulking nature that can suspect even houses with lofty names of receiving an occasional discreet subsidy from a poet? And what about that "You-write-us-a-novel, we'll-publish-your-poems" angle? But whatever their peccadillos, these houses are the best bet for the poet who can afford to wait, and not let waiting get him down.

On another level we have recently seen something like a revival of the system of individual patronage, and it is this phenomenon, and its product, that I wish to discuss principally in this first article. Young Walter Chrysler, if I remember correctly, made one or two desultory attempts, some years ago, along these lines; and now we have the much more energetic and systematic efforts of the New Directions Press in Norfolk, Connecticut. The editor, James Laughlin, is—I hope it is not libelous to say—a rich young man whose other assets include a generous heart, a willing ear, and occasional manifestations of rather pretty taste. His munificence has permitted considerable increase both in the quantity and quality of poetry published in the last few years; and his range is not restricted by narrow concepts. His firm will shortly publish, for example, a good-sized anthology of modern poetry from Latin America, the translations taken care of by American poets. He has not only established a series called "The Poet of the Month," but is now bringing out his second annual anthology of the work of five young American poets.

The "Poet of the Month" series may be had at an annual subscription price of $4; I take it this refers to editions bound in paper; board copies are offered singly at a dollar apiece. At hand are five volumes, from the latter part of 1941 and the early part of 1942. Their scope is considerable, as may be seen from what follows: a collection of new translations made from the Palatine anthology by the modern American poet Dudley Fitts; some of the poems from an early book by Rainer Maria Rilke, "The Book of Hours," with the original German facing translations made by another modern American poet, Babette Deutsch; a book of poems by a young Englishman, F. T. Prince; another by a middle-aged American, Malcolm Cowley; and an anthology of some three dozen from the original thirteen hundred lyrics left by Robert Herrick.

In presenting translations of forty-nine poems from the Palatine anthology, Mr. Fitts continues the good work begun in a previous edition of a hundred poems from the same source. His method is to suggest the Greek quality of the originals by a simple Doric line, like that of H. D.'s poems. Now and then Mr. Fitts can be caught in an arch act, or a sly one, putting in a word for no good reason, or even an idea, as in the Poem 24, from Philodemus the Epicurean. Sometimes, too, an epigram seems to lose its point, or to have been taken from a rather labored original. One might wish that Mr. Fitts had tried his hand now and then at reproducing the original elegiac meter—his method makes the poems seem, perhaps, a little too austere—or that he had attempted the use of rhymed couplets, in the eighteenth-century manner, to sharpen the point, especially in the satirical epigrams. But the general effect of the collection is that of fine, clean, simple work; and the pages are a delight to look at as well as to read.

The page design of the Rilke book, on the other hand, could hardly have been calculated to produce a more exasperating impression. Each poem, whether in German or English, starts with a heavy bold-face Gothic line with letters somewhat larger than those below; the rest of the German side of the page is printed in italics, in the English alphabet; the English side of the page is in Roman. On both sides of the page one finds, occasionally, single words or phrases set in small Roman capitals. If this does not look quite as phony and messy as it sounds, it still looks phony and messy enough; and this is bad, not only on its own account, but because it contributes to a substantial distortion of our view of Rilke. Rilke did have in him just a little of the phony-precious-pretentious: to present him under a glass which magnifies this aspect alone does much to put off the sensible reader, who comes to learn, later than he should, how much greater Rilke really was, how much more there was to him, how steadfastly he came to grips with, how magnificently transcended, his early limitations. "The Book of Hours" is early work and, good as it is, by no means Rilke's best, for there is considerable mawkishness in the emotion and a tentative quality in the technique. But these poems are interesting, both for themselves and because they show out of what beginning his later art matured. Miss Deutsch's translations are pretty good, though not quite so good as they might have been if she had studied harder to reproduce the sound effects of Rilke, or to understand how much he could drive home with the simple noun, the simple verb, the simple definite article. In a translation appearing on page 19, for instance, she uses five rhymes on the ee sound where only two appear in the original sonnet. She is not often guilty of leaving out, but she sometimes does some putting in; or she does not resist hard enough the temptation that comes to translators to add the adjective that the original noun suggested to them; this has the effect of stopping the suggestive power of the original version.

F. T. Prince's poems were published in London in 1938 by Faber and Faber; which means for one thing that T. S. Eliot thinks well of him. He has sent over to this side fourteen poems, nine of them very short, from that collection, and has also added one new poem. For once a new young poet, but good, who does not sound too much like Auden; he does sound a little like Eliot sometimes. He has a fine ear and a nice wit; the tone is elegiac at times, or questioning in an almost feminine manner; but underneath the treble of the interrogation there is affirmation in the bass.

Malcolm Cowley is also indebted to Eliot, both for the title of his collection—"The Dry Season"—and for the manner of some of the poems. His mood, also, is often elegiac, or nostalgic with a sentimental hankering after the good old days described in "Exile's Return." This little book gives the impression that he has turned, for spiritual regeneration, to the writing of poetry.

In the poem Seven, at the end of the central section, and in the two poems of prophetic affirmation that follow, there are signs of serious self-examination, as distinguished from narcissism; and in some poems both in the first and final sections there is an attempt to secure a more basic simplicity. The most interesting poems in the book, I feel, are these, where the writer achieves his effects, as he says, "by making the poems a simple statement of things felt and seen."

The little sheaf of poems by Robert Herrick is neat to look at and will beguile you for a pleasant half-hour. I am curious to know what is meant by one remark in the preface: "It is suspected that he was something of a Propertius during these London years."

Next time I plan to discuss Mr. Laughlin's collection of five young American poets, as well as a somewhat similar group of seven published by the press of James A. Decker.

IN BRIEF

I REMEMBER CHRISTINE. By Oscar Lewis. Alfred A. Knopf. $2.50.

This slick little novel might be called a by-product of Lewis's work on "The Big Four" and "Bonanza Inn." By piecing together his memories of a powerful San Francisco capitalist, now dead, and tying them up with an old scandal and some odds and ends of gossip, an elderly novelist shows up the hypocritically pious picture of the big money man presented in an authorized biography. There is not enough bite to make the book important, but the smooth blend of irony and superficial shrewdness about people sends it near the head of the season's lightweight class.

OUR HAWAII. By Erna Fergusson. Alfred A. Knopf. $3.50.

Through the medium of a personal travelogue Miss Fergusson manages to convey a picture of the Hawaiian Islands as a portent of racial tolerance and cultural amalgamation. She has a knack also of weaving history into her narrative in a lively and natural manner. Illustrated with photographs and maps which highlight the text.

A gay and charming footnote to English history and literature, with appropriate illustrations from old prints.

ART

Abstract Art

THE sixth annual exhibition of the American Abstract Artists seems to have released a spate of group shows of abstract art. The high-water mark is the Red Cross benefit exhibition "Masters of Abstract Art" inaugurating Helena Rubinstein's New Art Center on Fifth Avenue, which will run until May 15. At the same time A. E. Gallatin is showing a selection of recent acquisitions and loans that will remain on view over the summer at the Gallery of Living Art at New York University, Washington Square; and the Museum of Modern Art is presenting for an indefinite period recent accessions and extended loans to illustrate the origins and development of abstract painting and films. All four exhibitions overlap, but their emphases vary.

The A. A. A. exhibition, which closed on March 23, was the most provocative show of all, not so much because of the merits of the individual contributors as because many of them were comparatively young and so could tell us most about the probable future of abstract art in this country. Upon this future a lot depends. The abstract is the one contemporary order in which it is least possible to get away with the chic, the imitative, and the merely facile. While the American abstract movement has been no less chained to its origins abroad than the rest of our art, and has produced its own share of pallid, imitative work, abstract artists are as a group more conscious of their shortcomings in this respect and less comfortable about them. They are unwilling to settle for anything less than a first-hand art.

Aside from the collective impression made by the A. A. A. show—which as a feat of hanging alone induced the exhilaration peculiar to well-housed shows of abstract art—certain individual performances made one feel that here was art in movement; new possibilities were being plumbed that burst the confines of the set easel-picture and sculptured piece. Nor did it matter too much whether the results so far were very successful or not. And there are no great successes as yet: a certain authority is lacking, there is a hesitancy even in the work of the older artists—a hesitancy not present, for instance, in the big painting on view by Jean Hélion, a Frenchman, which manages to retrieve its weak, Vermeerish color and inflated design by what I can only call authority or assurance. But there is a beginning, and beginnings can be found almost nowhere else in contemporary American art. Among the most promising evidences were the metal constructions of Ibram Lassaw, clean, intense, and full of animation. However, Lassaw sets himself problems that seem at times too easy; which is also the case with Gertrude Greene, whose polychrome bas-reliefs would be more interesting if color were used to define the planes in depth as well as in extension. As for the paintings themselves, the best seemed to me to be those by Hananiah Harari, Giorgio Cavallon, and Esphyr Slobodkina. They had in common a fluidity of shape and color that seemed least to violate the character of their medium, in contrast to the "geometricians," who treat canvas as though it were concrete or plastic. But there is one painter among these latter, Albert Swinden, who shows as much promise perhaps in his single unsuccessful painting as the others in their successful ones.

Many of the artists whose work appeared at the A. A. A. show are also represented at Mr. Gallatin's exhibition. I admire Mr. Gallatin's taste, but sometimes find it too narrow. This may be the reason that his show makes a duller impression, even though there was nothing at the A. A. A. so completely finished as two of the pictures here by Hélion, or one by Mondrian, or the gauzy composition in citrus colors by John Ferren (whose show of more recent work at the Willard Gallery marks a great retrogression from this).

The exhibition at the Museum of Modern Art identifies the origins of the absolutely non-objective in the "suprematism" of the Russian painter, Kasimir Malevitch, "who in 1913 began to base his art upon the square and the circle." The works by Malevitch and his disciple Rodchenko, by Larionov, the Russian "rayonist" (he analyzed the visible into streaks of colored light), and by Umberto Boccioni, the Italian futurist, all have documentary value but are meager in aesthetic results. Going on to the section of the exhibition devoted to the school of Paris, we see that the great abstract and semi-abstract idiom is post-cubist and French, and that in its heyday, 1910-30, it could work through such comparatively minor talents as Le Corbusier-Jeanneret, Villon, and the sturdier Antoine Peusner to produce little masterpieces. Even Mondrian, to judge from the work he did during this period, of which there is an example here done in solid squares of color, was perhaps at his best while still strongly under the influence of post-cubism proper. And if the large and a bit over-aggressive painting by Gorky, an American, is good, it is because he continues the same thing in his own way. And of course there is the splendid still life by Braque and the one by Picasso, which consists of three very good paintings not very successfully put together on a single canvas. Of the rest of the show one can only say, "how interesting." It was certainly worth while to have obtained the examples of sundry other pioneer abstractionists, Wilfred's Lumia compositions and the water-color designs for an abstract film made in 1913 by Leopold Survage, but the practical result—the pleasure to be got from them—is nil.

The "Masters of Abstract Art" is the latest and richest of the four exhibitions, containing as it does works by Picasso, Braque, Arp, Miró, Klee, Van Doesburg and others, which have already taken safe and calm places in the pantheon of art. The finest item is a portable mural painted in 1933 by Miró, who, like the other Spaniards Picasso and Gris, belongs mainly to French painting and is one of the few artists of our day able to cover a large area of space so well that the beholder wishes it even larger. At the sight of the cubist paintings by Gris, Picasso, and Braque, one wonders how it was ever possible to say that cubism is a dry, "intellectualized" art without emotion, for these pictures with their brown tones and vibrating planes communicate the pathos of their moment and place with an eloquence more than equal to that of Apollinaire's poetry. However, the special excellence of this show does not lie in its confirmed masterpiece but in the generally high level of accomplishment shown by the work of the lesser men, both American and foreign. There are plenty of bad things here, but I was more than once surprised to discover how well artists whose work I do not particularly care for could paint in given instances.

It is to be wished that this show had the advantage of more spacious quarters so that one could get more than four feet away from some of the pictures.

CLEMENT GREENBERG

MUSIC

DR. ALFRED EINSTEIN is the musicologist to whose disciplined scholarship we owe the new edition of Köchel's Catalogue and the editions of the resurrected Haydn symphonies that Stiedry performed with the New Friends of Music Orchestra. In "Greatness in Music" (Oxford University Press, $3) he is a scholar writing not for other scholars but for the lay reader; which means, as he puts it, writing with "no long preliminary research, no copious scientific equipment, and no learned annotations," or, as I would put it, giving only the essential train of thought and its necessary factual basis, without all the cluttering, obscuring detail of supporting reasoning and fact that is required in a rigorous presentation for other scholars.

Actually one finds Dr. Einstein on page 126, for example, reaching "the difference between genius and talent, which in music as in other things is not a quantitative but a qualitative difference"; on page 129 describing the difference as "condensation, which is related to brevity but is not identical with it," and which is "a stronger vitalization through musical energy and expression"; and then giving examples. First Telemann and Bach, between whom the difference turns out to be that when Telemann wrote in the French or the Italian style "there was always a residue of imitation," whereas "when Bach wrote a concerto im italienischen Gusto it was Bachian or, as has been incorrectly said, German. For it was not his so-called Germanism that determined Bach's style; rather it was Bach's music that determined the German style. A national style is the sum of the individualities of speech that can be drawn from the work of musicians—but sometimes cannot be drawn from it; for if Bach is German, then the Wagner of 'Tristan' or 'Parsifal' is definitely not very German. Bach just is Bachian, and Wagner Wagnerian"—all of which may be true, if not very clear, but Dr. Einstein is supposedly discussing condensation.

But on page 130 "the process of condensation becomes very clear when we compare Mozart with his Italian contemporaries. 'Mozart and Cimarosa'—that doesn't go, even if Stendhal believed it did. Berlioz was absolutely right when in an annotation to his memoirs of this corpulent consul at Civitavecchia he said that he 'wrote the most irritating lucubrations on music, for which he fancied he had some feeling.' Mozart had the good fortune—and merit—to have captured . . . some of the best librettos which Italian opera of those days afforded. But not the very best. The very best opera buffo librettos . . . were not written by Da Ponte but by Giovanni Battista Casti, his rival, who unfortunately plays about the same role in the history of Italian literature of the eighteenth century as Pietro Aretino did in the sixteenth. He wrote a number of novelle galanti which are as salacious as they are witty—but, after all, perhaps more witty than salacious. Byron must have known them and admired them; otherwise we should hardly have his 'Don Juan.' Goethe"—and so on until on page 133 we reach the fact that Casti's "Rè Teodoro," the best libretto of its time, was set to music not by Mozart but by Paesiello, whose opera would be a failure today because "it lacks what we have called 'condensation.' Paesiello said everything in a broader and a more shallow way than Mozart."

Note that the essential line of thought is: "Condensation is the difference between Mozart and his contemporaries. Cimarosa is one example. Paesiello is a second: though he started with a libretto by Casti that was even better than Da Ponte's librettos for Mozart, he produced an opera that was inferior to Mozart's because it lacked condensation." Note that just as Dr. Einstein could not cite the example of Telemann and Bach without bringing in what he thinks about a national German style, so he cannot cite the example of Cimarosa and Mozart without mentioning what he read in Stendhal about Cimarosa, and in Berlioz about "this corpulent consul at Civitavecchia." Note further that from this he goes to Mozart's librettos without a word to indicate that he has moved on from Cimarosa to Paesiello; and that we are left in the dark about the purpose of the comparison of Da Ponte's and Casti's librettos—that is, its relation to the real point, which is the comparison of Mozart's and Paesiello's operas—for two pages in which Dr. Einstein again, having mentioned Casti's librettos, must drag in what he has dug up about Casti, about Pietro Aretino, about the novelle galanti which Byron must have known and admired, and so on.

The book, then—for it is all like that—is filled with the details that are properly in a book for scholars, but not properly in a book for lay readers. And the reason is that if the book is written informally it is also written pretentiously, and that actually the informality is part of the pretentiousness: Dr. Einstein never lets his lay reader forget that it is a scholar who is writing for him—or rather who is condescending to write for him—out of the riches of his enormous scholarship, his long experience, his vast reading, his profound philosophical meditations. Moreover, writing informally, for our scholar, means writing with his scholar's discipline relaxed below the requirements of even an informal intellectual exercise. Even such an exercise, that is, must have organization, order, form; but Dr. Einstein has taken the informality of the occasion as an excuse for shirking this burdensome obligation to integrate the material of each chapter into a coherent, clearly outlined progression, the four chapters into a unified treatment of the book's subject; he has taken it as an excuse for producing instead the four causeries such as are given on the lecture circuit—each with its impressive rather than descriptive title, each playing with the material, and each a confused clutter through which in some instances one can penetrate to outline and direction, and in other instances one cannot.

A number of passages in the book I cannot make head or tail of; some that I understand I don't think much of; others I find richly informative and perceptive; but even with these the book is for me—who approached it with respect for its author and eager anticipation of what I would learn from him about an important and interesting subject—a shocking performance. And the performance being what it is, one can understand and forgive the satisfaction I got from seeing the author, right in the middle of all this pretentiousness, slip on a banana peel—refer, that is, on page 120 to Mozart's "two 'little' symphonies in A major and G minor (Köchel Nos. 200 and 201)," when actually K. 200 is in C major, K. 201 is in A major, and the "little" G minor is K. 183.

Post-War Germany

Dear Sirs: Your issue of April 11 carried an article by Reinhold Niebuhr in which the following statement appeared: "A federated Europe would probably be dominated by Germany." This idea seems to be shared by many people; in fact, they think it so self-evident that it requires no proof. But careful consideration of the problem leads to an entirely different conclusion.

In a divided Europe Germany was the most powerful country. All the curbs imposed upon it in the period between the two wars proved ineffective. If it were not for the participation in this war of the United States, Russia, and England—powers not properly a part of Europe—German domination over the continent would be assured for an entire historical period.

In a European federation, on the other hand, there will be no domination of one nation over others. Differences in the size and strength of the member states need not result in the subordination of the weaker or the smaller. The United States of America affords a living example. The disparity between the Eastern states and the other states of the Union is far greater than that between Germany and other European nations; yet all the states have equal freedom and equal rights. That, of course, does not mean that it will be easy to establish a United States of Europe patterned upon the United States of America. What I wish to emphasize is merely that German domination of a federated Europe is not inevitable.

The natural tendency in Central Europe is toward the decline of German influence rather than its growth. During the past two decades there has been a steady decrease of German elements in the eastern portions of the former German Empire and a corresponding increase of Slavic elements. The anti-Polish policy established in Pomerania by Bismarck some sixty years ago attempted to use force to stop this process, which was already then in evidence, but the results were insignificant. At the same time, within the German Reich, we observe an awakening of national consciousness among the Polish elements in Silesia, which has been separated from other Polish territories for almost 800 years. Similar processes have gone on in other Slavic nations, particularly in the former Hapsburg empire.

Today Hitler attempts to stem this process by a policy of extermination of non-Germans which makes Bismarck's measures pale by comparison. Yet his efforts yield only negligible results (western Poland may be cited as an example). The Germans began political and military action against the other European nations precisely because they were unable to dominate them by peaceful and purely economic means. When the German minority, one-fifth of Europe's population, is deprived of its artificial props, when Prussian power is destroyed and the Junkers and great capitalists are liquidated, the diminution of German influence in Europe will be further accelerated.

In a genuinely democratic federated Europe there will thus be no reason to fear German domination.

America's Danger

Dear Sirs: I would like to thank you for your paragraph on the Victory Program of the Automobile Workers in your issue of April 18. It showed a realization that America is in graver danger than most of us want to admit.

It seems to me that a magazine such as The Nation can be very influential in waking up the country to two of its greatest dangers—the smug belief, on the one hand, that somehow everything will turn out all right; and the hysterical desire, on the other hand, to find a scapegoat for our problems. We have got to stop inflation, and the only just way to stop it—the only way, in fact—is to clamp down on war profits of every kind. Labor will have to give up excessive overtime, management will have to forgo excessive profits, landlords will have to keep their rents within reason, and the farmers must realize that this war is not being fought to raise the price of food.

Since human nature has its limits, mere good-will among the people is not enough. There must be national legislation. The danger is that each interest will be so afraid of losing a few fat years that it will put pressure on Congress to do nothing. However, once the American people understand the deadly danger of inflation and defeat rolled into one, I think even the most callous Congressman will decide that his chances of reelection are better if he votes for a firm control.

It is in the creation of a sane and vigorous public opinion that you can do a great deal of good. CHAD WALSH

The Shape of Things

WE REJOICE THAT THE UNITED NATIONS have acted in time to forestall a Japanese occupation of Madagascar, the great French island which stands so commandingly astride the sea routes to India and the Middle East. As we go to press, few details are available, but a strong force appears to have landed near Diego Suarez, the well-equipped naval base at the northern tip of the island, and to be advancing against only slight opposition. Reports so far received suggest that the expedition is wholly British. It seems to us unfortunate that arrangements were not made for at least a token American contingent. However, we welcome the strong State Department announcement that the occupation has "the full approval and support of the United States government" and its warning to Vichy to refrain from any form of retaliation. More serious than the lack of direct American participation is the fact that the Free French forces appear to have been left completely out of the operation. Moreover, early reports suggest that the British are planning to carry out a purely military occupation, leaving civil administration in the hands of the Vichy-appointed governor, who is responsible for the recent reign of terror against local supporters of De Gaulle. Such an appeasing gesture to the government of Pierre Laval would be political folly of the first water. It would be a direct invitation to sabotage and espionage in Madagascar and a smack in the face for the Free French movement which would inevitably confuse and dismay millions of Frenchmen just when they need increased moral backing to carry on their bitter fight against collaboration.

STANDARD OIL OF NEW JERSEY ISSUED AN angry denial of the charges that a deal with I. G. Farben had stifled the production of synthetic acetic acid in this country, but the denial has only intensified suspicion that the company knew what it was doing in entering into a series of agreements with the Nazi chemical trust. The charges made by Irving Lipkowitz of the Justice Department's anti-trust division were specific and were based on more than a hundred documents submitted to the Senate Patents Committee. These show that Standard Oil dismantled its acetylene plant in 1939, after the outbreak of war, under an agreement negotiated after the war started but predated to the day before the war. Although the Standard Oil Company, after Lipkowitz's testimony before the committee, issued a statement declaring that Lipkowitz had "drawn conclusions not based on the facts," it avoided sending a representative before the committee to deny the charges under oath. Nor did it deny the essential fact—that the company had dismantled its plant under an agreement with the German company.

STANDARD OIL HAS BEEN ON THE CARPET for dealing with Axis firms before. It will be recalled that the company put up a feeble defense when Thurman Arnold charged fully a month ago that its agreements with I. G. Farben had hindered synthetic-rubber production in this country, and that it had no reply when Assistant Secretary of State Berle declared that it did not halt sales of gasoline to Nazi airlines in South America until forced to by the State Department's blacklist. So far, however, there has been no prosecution or direct investigation of the Standard Oil Company to find out why it adopted these Axis-favoring policies. It is quite possible that the company officials have been merely innocent victims of a clever Axis design to weaken this country in the event of war. But if their share in the affair has been entirely innocent, they should welcome an investigation and should not shy away from making statements under oath.

THERE ARE SIGNS THAT THE POLITICAL truce in Britain is being strained to the breaking-point, not by conflicts between the party machines, but by the growing reluctance of the electors to accept rubber-stamp candidates. The formation of a coalition government at the beginning of the war was accompanied by a standstill agreement between the three major parties—Conservative, Labor, and Liberal. Since then, whenever a Parliamentary vacancy has occurred, the party machines have united in supporting the nominee of whichever party previously held the seat. The practical necessity of such an arrangement is obvious, but it has had also the grave disadvantage of perpetuating a political set-up dating back to 1935 and one increasingly unrepresentative of current opinion. Moreover, it has resulted in most vacancies being filled by elderly party hacks whose chances of election would have been slim if they had had to fight for it. Nevertheless, until recently the independent candidates who offered themselves at many by-elections failed to attract votes. Now in the course of a single day two traditionally Conservative constituencies have been captured by independents of a leftist but not Communist character. These overturns at Rugby and Wallasey follow one at Grantham about a month ago, when the Conservative candidate was defeated by a popular local manufacturer with past Labor affiliations standing as an independent. In all three cases the successful candidates emphasized that they were not against Prime Minister Churchill. On the contrary, they wanted to strengthen his hands for a really all-out effort to win the war and prepare for the peace. Their victories are indicative of political ferments at work in Britain which the party machines, sunk in bureaucratic inertia, can no longer safely ignore.

AS A RESULT OF LAST WEEK'S PLEBISCITE IN Canada Prime Minister Mackenzie King is free to ask for legislation imposing conscription for overseas service. Technically, he has of course always had that right. But since he had made a solemn pledge before the last election not to draft men for foreign service, Mr. King had maintained that only the voters could release him from his promise. The pledge was made in the interest of national unity at a time when the loyalty of Quebec was in serious question. The imposition of conscription in World War I had provoked widespread disaffection among the French Canadians of Quebec, and in view of the known fascist sympathies of a section of the population it was feared that the situation would be even worse in this war. While conditions in Quebec have materially improved in the past two years as a result of the passing of the Duplessis government, the plebiscite results indicate that the problem is by no means solved. Although some sections of the province voted yes, Quebec as a whole voted nearly three to one against releasing Mr. King from his pledge. In some districts the negative vote was as high as thirty or forty to one. It is still not clear whether the government will proceed with legislation extending the draft in the face of the Quebec opposition, but the chances are that it will do so after some delay. The overwhelming majority of Canadians have shown that they are determined to win the war at any cost, and although some trouble may be expected, the minority will doubtless go along.

THE RESOLUTION PASSED BY THE WORKING committee of the All India Congress Party decreeing that invasion of the country is to be met with non-violent non-cooperation makes it clear that Gandhi, whose influence seemed to be waning, still has extraordinary power over Indian opinion. The motives actuating the Mahatma, in whom the saint and the politician are so bafflingly mixed, are less clear. His insistence on non-violence—of which Nehru and many other Congress leaders have long since become skeptical, to say the least—might be put down to a single-minded dedication to a technique which has been his life work if it were not for his recent anti-British and anti-American utterances. It is true, of course, that non-violence does not mean non-resistance, though it seems a poor method of opposing airplanes and tanks. It is also true that the resolution states that "not to put obstacles in the way of the British forces will often be the only way of demonstrating non-cooperation with the invader," and it reiterates Indian antipathy to Nazism and fascism. In this last fact, and it is a fact, lies the best hope that the Indians, whatever the Congress has decreed, will defend themselves by any means they have at their disposal. We imagine that many good Congress members are taking comfort from the fact that there are both British and American forces in India, and they will undoubtedly continue the preparations for guerrilla warfare and Home Guard defense that are already under way in many sections. Indian bitterness against British rule is deep and understandable. It is hard to believe that this bitterness will be allowed to facilitate the conquest of India by a far more brutal imperialism.

DESPITE THE ATTACKS MADE BY SENATORS Byrd and Taft on government publicity agencies, these agencies have on the whole been operated with great efficiency and objectivity. Every newspaperman in Washington knows what a useful role they play in providing necessary information. Most of the publicity men are themselves ex-newspapermen of experience and ability. It is not always possible for an official to deal directly with the press, and much time is saved by routing requests for information through an information officer. Byrd's attack on Lowell Mellett's new United States Information Center reflects a bitter and unfair campaign against Mellett by the Washington Post. The purpose of the new center is to make it easier for business men and others to find out where to go in the bureaucratic labyrinths of the capital when they have specific contractual or other matters to discuss. Taft is equally unfair in his attack on Archibald MacLeish, an attack that insists on identifying vigorous criticism of defeatists with their suppression. MacLeish's record and public statements make Taft's talk of "suppression" and "lynch law" ridiculous. If any fault is to be found with government publicity agencies it is that they are often so afraid of the horrid word "propaganda" that they lean too far in the other direction.

THAT THE DISLIKE OF THE SPANIARDS FOR their present regime has spread far beyond the Loyalist ranks is a fact on which all serious observers of the Spanish situation agree. Many former Franco supporters have been thrown into the opposition by a growing disappointment in which hunger, Phalangist terrorism, and a too abject submission to Berlin all play a part. The bulk of this new opposition has emerged from a section of the Officers' Corps, for whom the arrogant military pretensions of the Phalanx have become unbearable, and from the ranks of the Monarchists, who have been ruthlessly excluded from any participation in the "reconstruction" of Spain. We are therefore not surprised to hear Monarchist voices suddenly raised against a regime with which they appeared to be entirely identified during the most desperate moments of the Spanish struggle. We do not doubt, either, the enthusiasm with which Don Manuel de Augustín, Marques de Aguiar, has set himself, according to the New York Times of May 3, to the task of raising on this continent an army of 150,000 men of Spanish blood to fight against the Nazis and their Spanish puppets—provided only "that certain diplomatic arrangements could be made." We doubt still less that there will be officials in Washington who, should they feel themselves obliged some day to take a position against the Franco regime, would find their bitter duty somehow softened if they could do it by allying themselves with a marquis of genuine reactionary extraction. What we do doubt is that the Spanish people in America are likely to rush to arms under the leadership of a grandee who at best could play the role of a kind of Spanish Eckhardt—admired in certain appeasement circles but without any popular national following of his own.

The Fall of Burma

ANOTHER chapter has been virtually completed in the five-months-old Pacific war. And like all that have gone before, it has ended in tragedy. The fall of Mandalay marks the end of effective resistance in Burma. By seizing Lashio Japan has accomplished the primary object of its campaign. The Burma road has been severed. China has been very nearly isolated from the other United Nations. It is true that an alternative route, a few miles to the north of the old road, has recently been opened, but this too is endangered by the Japanese advance into northern Burma. At best, the new routes planned can carry but a fraction of the supplies that were beginning to move through the Lashio gateway.

In many respects the setback is more serious than any of the United Nations' preceding defeats. The loss of Singapore deprived us of a vital base for a counter-offensive against Japan, but it left us the possibility of continued defense. Java was important both because of its natural riches and as a base for future operations. Burma also is rich in raw materials and has great strategic importance. But the catastrophe of its loss lies in the fact that we are deprived of the ability to arm and supply, except at great cost, one of our principal allies. Unless we somehow restore effective communications, China cannot carry on indefinitely. Ironically enough, it may go down to defeat, after five years of courageous resistance, as a result of the realization of its greatest hope—the entry of the United States and Britain into the war. For it is the failure of the United States and Great Britain to prepare an adequate strategy that has permitted Japan to succeed in its carefully worked-out plan for closing the back door to China.

The immediate cause of the defeat in Burma, as in all other sectors, was the lack of air power. Just why the defenders of Burma should lack planes five months after the start of the Pacific war, when American production has attained really substantial levels, has not been officially explained. It is probable that the answer lies largely in the lack of shipping for the transportation of fighter planes. It also looks as if the United States had been once more outguessed by the Japanese General Staff. At the beginning of the war we were fooled by the attack on Pearl Harbor and rushed to Hawaii reinforcements and supplies that were badly needed in the Philippines, Wake, and Singapore. In the past six weeks we have strained our energies to reinforce Australia, while the main Japanese attack has been directed against Burma. The British have done no better. If we are to judge by press reports, the original British garrison in Burma received no reinforcements of consequence. A few British planes were sent in, but too few to be of value against the impressive Japanese concentration.

The failure of the United Nations to reinforce the defenders of Burma adequately makes it clear that we have not yet achieved anything approaching effective coordination in the Pacific area. The defense of Burma was left almost entirely to the Chinese on the theory that China was chiefly concerned in the outcome. The Chinese fought gallantly enough. But they were never given sufficient air support or the equipment they needed to conquer the Japanese motorized units. This was our responsibility.

Burma is lost. The mistakes that have been made cannot be undone. But it is not too late to save China and India if we make it one of our paramount tasks to furnish enough weapons to the peoples of these countries, regardless of cost or fancied risk to our own bases. If the past five months have taught us anything, it is that the United Nations must act as one if they are to escape complete disaster.

Wages and Inflation

IN HIS message to Congress outlining his anti-inflationary program the President asked for legislation to implement his proposals for additional taxation and for limiting farm prices to 100 per cent of parity. Very pointedly he omitted to ask for any legal curbs on wages, hoping to achieve by administrative action that stabilization of "the remuneration received by individuals for their work" which he included among his seven necessary steps "to keep the cost of living from spiraling upward." More than that, he used his influence to help kill the various bills which sought to shackle trade-union organization and to abolish the forty-hour week.

Because of his unwillingness to crack down on labor and his refusal to institute forthwith a rigid wage ceiling Mr. Roosevelt has been subjected to a tremendous barrage of criticism.

> The real weakness of the program [the New York Times declares in a representative editorial] is that it continues to avoid coming directly to grips with the harsh necessities of inflation control. It ignores lamentably the central necessity—a tax program which drains off from the masses of the consumers the excess purchasing power being created by war-time government spending. Instead, it offers the almost wholly irrelevant suggestion of a $25,000 limit on all individual earnings. It continues to lean hopefully upon purely voluntary restraint of wage increases despite the demonstrated weakness of such a course and the inconsistency of putting a ceiling upon the vital cost element—wages—which have so much to do in determining prices.

In the course of his message to Congress, and again in his broadcast, the President pointed out that our peace-time standard of living must come down and that we must give up not only luxuries but many creature comforts. Obviously he was not suggesting that only the rich should make sacrifices. In making his taxation proposals, however, he was keeping in mind the sound political principle that when you are asking the mass of the people to forgo butter to provide guns you cannot leave the well-to-do to eat their caviar undisturbed. No matter what laws may be passed and how many teeth they are equipped with, the control of inflation will depend on the consent and cooperation of the majority of our citizens. Lacking this consent, it will be as futile as prohibition, and for this reason, if no other, it is essential that the psychological aspects of the problem should not be neglected.

The Office of Price Administration has estimated that spendable income in the current year will exceed goods and services available for consumption by from $17 billion to $21 billion. This is the famous inflationary gap which must be closed if the pressure of purchasing power is not to force prices through their new ceilings. Undoubtedly the bulk of the increased spendable income will be in the pockets of the workers, but this does not mean that the average family income will be unduly swollen. Millions of unemployed have once again stepped into the ranks of wage-earners in the past year; millions more who were working part time are now bringing home a full week's wage plus overtime payments. A few highly skilled workers are making enough to place them in the middle-income brackets, but average wages certainly do not provide for more than a modest standard of comfort. Douglas aircraft workers, for instance, at the end of 1941 were averaging $44.65 per week, which means of course that the less skilled employees were drawing considerably less than this amount. The pay envelope at General Electric, where a large proportion of the workers are highly skilled, averaged no more than $45.11 last year. In view of the rise in prices which has already taken place—and as the accompanying chart shows, the rise has been particularly steep in the case of articles of working-class consumption such as work shirts and percale dresses—these wages cannot be regarded as extravagant.

Nevertheless, it is true that wages cannot safely be increased and must expect to bear a much heavier burden of taxation if the inflationary gap is to be closed. So far as wages are concerned, the President hopes to achieve a voluntary freezing. His directive to William H. Davis of the War Labor Board calls for stabilization of workers' remuneration "under a flexible policy of balancing the wage structure." This recognizes that an absolutely rigid ceiling on wages cannot be adopted in view of the many anomalies which now exist. For instance, automobile workers, many of whom are now engaged in aircraft construction, are better paid than the regular airplane mechanics. It may be necessary to correct this situation, not only for the sake of abstract justice, but to prevent a drift of workers from the West Coast to Detroit.

Any general increase in wage levels would bring no real benefit to the workers, for it would do nothing to increase the total goods available. We have no doubt that most trade-union leaders recognize this harsh fact, even though they have gone on record as "unalterably opposed to any system of wage-freezing"—to quote Philip Murray. Their situation is complicated by the fact that, with wages fixed, some members may tend to lose interest in the union. But this danger may be avoided if the War Labor Board continues to support maintenance-of-membership agreements in plants where a majority of the workers are now organized. The unions, also, could do much to consolidate their position by putting more effort into the task of education and by developing new ways to safeguard their members' economic interests. The mutual housing scheme supported by the shipyard workers at Camden, New Jersey, is a case in point.

The trade unions have given many proofs of the earnestness of their support for the war effort, and we cannot believe that they will refuse to do their part in fighting inflation. The Administration has stood firmly against coercive measures and taken considerable risks by insisting that labor policy during the war must be developed on a voluntary basis. So far this stand has been triumphantly vindicated; and it would be tragic if any breach between the President and labor were now to open on the question of wages.

Axis Spring Maneuvers

BY FREDA KIRCHWEY

THE warring world is experiencing a "lull." Though men are fighting and dying on twenty fronts, no major movements are going on. But a lull is only a phase of the fight; like an interval of sparring in a boxing match, it is used to stall for time or maneuver for position. The maneuvering in progress today is as elaborate and difficult to follow as the most intricate military operation, and equally important.

There is every reason why such moves as Hitler's speech, the Salzburg meeting between Hitler and Mussolini, and rumors of political disturbance in Italy and Spain should be minutely examined by commentators and statesmen. In them lie the clues to actions in the coming months which may determine the final outcome of the war. Unfortunately, clues are not easy to extract from an inspired rumor or the speech of a dictator; the language of politics is enigmatical. As a consequence, a good deal of nonsense has been spoken and written about the goings-on in Axis-controlled Europe—nonsense which reveals a passionate desire for the enemy's collapse rather than a shrewd estimate of his strength.

Hitler's speech was, of course, defensive. It acknowledged the defeat of Nazi plans in the very act of explaining it. It threatened Britain with a blow-for-blow retaliation for the R. A. F. raids but coupled its threat with the suggestion that the empire could only be saved "with Europe"—Hitler's Europe. It promised to destroy "the Bolshevist colossus" but reminded Britain that after the war she would find "her allies stronger than she is herself," a strange prediction that revealed Hitler's fear of defeat through an inverted plea for British support against Russia. In the course of explaining the reasons for the winter retreat in Russia it exposed the necessity of making "hard decisions" in cases "where nerves snapped, discipline broke down, or a sense of duty was lacking." To mention such a necessity at all was to acknowledge the serious nature of the break in morale. But Hitler went much farther. By demanding the Reichstag's ratification of his "right to intervene and take necessary action wherever the existence of our nation demands it," Hitler in effect admitted that demoralization was bound to continue and that he could not count upon even the ruthless organs of Nazi "justice" to act with sufficient brutality and contempt for legal rights.

Hitler led from weakness, not from strength. But only a reckless optimist could take any short-term comfort from this fact. The evidences of growing strain in Germany insure a period in which Hitler will resort to desperate measures rather than accept defeat or delay. If he launches a "peace offensive," as many serious observers expect, it will be aimed not at making peace—he knows well enough that peace now is impossible—but at creating enough division of opinion here and in London, based on fear of increased Russian power after the war, to slow down the war effort. Ironically, in this maneuver his arguments and his hopes are in direct conflict. Only if Russia continues to hold his armies can he threaten the world with the consequences of Bolshevik success; but only in case of Russian collapse can he hope for any faltering in Allied morale.

A peace drive would, at most, serve as a sort of artillery barrage to soften the enemy before the next real attack. It would logically follow the present strategic lull. But only if the anti-Axis world allows itself to be led astray by reports of unrest and imminent collapse in the fascist countries will the tactic be successful.

This doesn't mean that discontent among the war-weary population of Europe is a fiction. It is real and inevitable. The quotations published in The Nation two weeks ago from the Nazi official press revealed the unhappiness and anxiety of an army and a people that have endured the horrors of the winter campaign in Russia. The report this week on German man-power shows the lengths to which Hitler must go to keep his war machine supplied. But the only real hope to be found in Hitler's difficulties is a future hope. In the next few months, the months that count most critically, no benefit can be expected from German suffering or German gloom. On the contrary, the nearer Hitler's back comes to the ultimate wall of defeat, the more dangerous and aggressive will be his struggles.

As for the happy evidences of disaffection in Italy and Spain, those, too, should be simultaneously acknowledged and discounted. Count Sforza, the wisest and most liberal of Italian statesmen-in-exile, writing in this issue of The Nation, effectively disposes of many hopeful interpretations put on the recent activities of the Italian royal house. Such interpretations are based on old fallacies; it is time the anti-Axis world abandoned its childish preoccupation with the divisions among fascists. No love is lost, certainly, between Mussolini and the royal family—just as no love is lost between Mussolini and Hitler—but these assorted partners in crime will certainly wait to cut each others' throats until they have expended every effort to cut ours.

The Italian people are hungry and miserable, and this condition grows worse. How it will be dealt with is already indicated: more Gestapo agents are moving into Italy "to study the organization of the Italian police"; 350,000 Italian workers will be sent to Germany in the next three months; more Italian troops will be sent to the eastern front; Fascist party leaders who criticize the regime are being liquidated; new loud demands for French territory are published in the press; and Italian prefects are given full powers to stamp out any attempts at resistance. Unrest cannot be ended, but it can be temporarily held in check by a mixture of terror and small measures of distraction and amelioration—a circus or two, a little bit of bread. That the bitter feeling of the mass of Italians will in the end prove a powerful asset to the Allied nations is not to be doubted; but to exaggerate its present effect is to jeopardize its ultimate value. Our future allies are the Italian people and their democratic leaders, not dissident Fascists and members of a royal house that has served as the tyrant's useful tool for twenty long years.

As for Spain, one can only repeat the same warning in louder and more impatient tones. Dope stories straight from the city rooms of American newspapers tell of imminent government upheavals, of the probable exile of Suñer, of fights between army officers and Phalangists. The old friction between the army and the Phalanx has undoubtedly increased. But to hope that this friction will produce a new government commanding popular support or that Franco will himself head a reorganized anti-Axis regime, is to repeat the error committed toward Rome and Vichy. Franco and Suñer may have differences which would insure a break under normal condition. Today the two men and their followers are bound together by the strongest tie that exists: both know that their lives and their power are forfeit if either betrays the other or if their regime betrays Hitler. Once in a position to choose between them, the Spanish people will choose neither. The sufferings of the last five years are sufficient guaranty of that.

Both Feet in the Trough

BY I. F. STONE

Washington, May 4

CREDIT the House Naval Affairs Committee under Vinson of Georgia with a major share of the price reductions beginning to be offered the government by war contractors. The War Department says it has saved almost $75,000,000 by renegotiating contracts with North American Aviation. Secretary Knox announces that the Sperry Corporation has "readjusted" prices in a way that will save the army and navy $100,000,000. Ernest R. Breech, president of Bendix Aviation, declares his company has made voluntary reductions in the price of aircraft parts and accessories that will save the government an estimated $73,354,000.

Representative Vinson claims that his committee's inquiry into war profits has already saved the government some $400,000,000. This amounts to considerably less than 1 per cent of the total value of war contracts to which the army, navy, and Maritime Commission are committed. If Congress were less niggardly and if Vinson spent less time looking for far-fetched arguments to prove that labor is "profiteering," the committee could push total savings into the billions. But a Congress which could find $110,000 for Dies dishes out a meager $25,000 at a time to the Vinson committee. So far it has spent little more than $40,000, or .01 per cent of the savings effected. Though the Naval Affairs Committee shines by comparison with the House Military Affairs Committee, which has devoted itself wholly to whitewashing big business and smearing the New Deal, Vinson and most of his colleagues have little heart for a thorough inquiry into profits. Their preliminary report, on January 21, was obscure, jumbled, and confusing in its discussion of profits, enthusiastic in its attack on labor. The $10,000,000 increase in the assets of American trade unions since the beginning of the war, about a dollar a member, may seem microscopic beside the billions raked in by capital, but the committee saw it as "tremendous financial gains . . . an astounding picture of concentration of wealth . . . hitherto associated only with industry and finance."

Misplaced eloquence of this kind is not suprising from a committee whose chief counsel is Edmund M. Toland, famous for his work several years ago with the Smith committee's investigation of the Labor Board. The profit questionnaires sent out by the Vinson committee are hardly searching, and the figures disclosed in its report are the figures war contractors themselves gave for their costs and profits. Where the contractor failed to state whether the profit was before or after taxes, the committee generously assumed that it was before taxes. Yet the profits uncovered were often so enormous and the cost accounting so fantastic as to stir Toland's professional zeal as counsel to the point where he seems to annoy some members of the committee. The chairman himself, as coauthor of the Vinson-Trammell Act limiting war profits, is torn between his interest in placing some ceiling on armament costs and his unwillingness to antagonize big business. The latter feeling is usually dominant.

That so timorous an inquiry should begin to frighten arms concerns into "voluntary" price cuts is some indication of the money they must be making on the war program. The figures in the preliminary report, obscure and unintelligible as they were, were shocking enough to lead the President on April 8 to establish a Price Adjustment Board to renegotiate army, navy, and Maritime Commission contracts where the profits seemed exorbitant. This board has been working as quietly and tactfully as a floorwalker who has just caught a duchess in the act of stealing a bottle of perfume. Every effort is made to have the "lift" appear accidental, the restitution voluntary.

More effective than the embarrassed inquiries of the board is the fear of exposure before a Congressional committee. The Vinson questionnaires have begun to worry arms contractors. The arrival of committee investigators stimulates the latent sense of patriotism. North American Aviation was due for a visit from committee accountants. Sperry Corporation made its offer of readjustment exactly three weeks after agents for the Vinson committee began to examine its books; Vinson promises a report within the near future on "the reasonableness of the $100,000,000 saving thus far offered." Bendix began to think of price cuts after its records were subpoenaed by the committee, and its president, Breech, announced the company's reduction offer from the Vinson committee's witness stand on Thursday. Breech testified that the subpoena arrived on April 6. His first letter offering the government a price reduction went out on April 20. Breech denied that he was moved to act by the arrival of the subpoena. "My movement was generated," he explained, "by the general publicity on the subject."

How Bendix Aviation happened to find itself on the griddle before the Vinson committee last Thursday is a mystery whose solution may be found in the friendly relations between Toland and Thurman Arnold and in the peculiar kind of guerrilla warfare the anti-trust "truce" forces Arnold to wage. Bendix Aviation is an important company, an affiliate of General Motors, and the committee has been very hesitant about going after big business. Although it has been investigating war profits for more than a year, it has held only two hearings at which war contractors have been publicly examined. The first was on March 23, the second on last Thursday, April 30. In an appendix to the transcript of the first hearing I came across some documents which indicate how reluctant the committee is to go after the really big profiteers; among them were a number of memoranda from committee investigators to Toland. One gives a list of contractors engaged in making aircraft who hold contracts on which they themselves admit profits in excess of 50 per cent of cost. "It occurred to me," the investigator wrote, "that this list of companies may serve the purpose of indicating contractors who should be investigated." There follow lists of all contracts on which profits of more than 10 per cent were reported.

These lists are as poorly organized as most of the profit releases of the committee, but when put together they show what important witnesses Vinson and his colleagues might have chosen for their first hearing. There were 718 naval-aircraft contracts on which a profit of more than 10 per cent was reported. These contracts were held by 58 companies. Bendix Aviation held the largest number of high-profit contracts, 92 in all. The Aluminum Company of America was next with 25, on which the stated rate of profit ran as high as 95.3 per cent. The highest rate of profit which Bendix admitted was 122 per cent. Glenn L. Martin held 12 high-profit contracts, the highest being 83.6 per cent; Sperry held 13 contracts, the highest 46.1 per cent. Bell Aircraft had a profit of 105.6 per cent; Douglas Aircraft, one of 35.2 per cent. RCA and du Pont and General Electric and Goodyear and Curtiss-Wright also held high-profit contracts. These are all important aircraft contractors, supplying large amounts of materials or finished parts. But the committee, in planning its first hearing, went to the very bottom of its list and picked a company no one had ever heard of before, a company holding one contract, on which it reported a profit of 11.7 per cent. This was Jack and Heintz of Cleveland, which makes a starter for aviation engines.

Jack and Heintz made a great story for the newspapers. No big-business toes were stepped on, and the case was made to appear one of labor profiteering, since a girl secretary was paid $39,365 for a year's work. There were more important aspects of this case that the papers overlooked. The first is that the profit which Jack and Heintz reported as 11.7 per cent turned out to be 100 per cent. If a profit reported as 11.7 per cent turned out to be 100 per cent, what were the real rates of profit of companies which reported 50 and 60 per cent and even, in one case, 141 per cent?

Persons close to the committee explain that Jack and Heintz were chosen for the first hearing because the Navy Department, the FBI, and the Internal Revenue Bureau were at work on the case, and the committee didn't want to be left behind. No one can read the transcript of the Jack and Heintz hearing without feeling that the navy, the FBI, and the Revenue Bureau were completely justified in having a look at the affairs of this company. But why was so much attention paid to this small fry and so little to the much larger contracts and the much higher profits of bigger companies? It is an interesting coincidence that when Jack and Heintz went into the manufacture of starters they were muscling in on one of the most lucrative patent-monopoly pools in America, that presided over by General Motors' Bendix Aviation.

The Jack and Heintz hearing was on March 23. A subpoena was served on Bendix on April 6. The hearing was held on April 30. But the hearing had very little to do with costs, though several inter-office memos disclosed the interesting methods used by Bendix to arrive at its prices. The formula given was "direct labor, plus 300 per cent, plus materials equals commercial cost.

To the commercial-cost figure add 50 per cent for profit, which will give a minimum net selling price. This minimum . . . multiplied by two should equal the list price." Apparently minimum prices were not for the government because another inter-office memo, referring to the Hayes Manufacturing Company, says, "The Air Corps prices, unless under special circumstances, are more than their civilian prices, which is sound."

But the main emphasis of the hearing was on the relationship between Bendix and General Motors, and between Bendix and Siemens of Germany. The material bore all the earmarks of a suppressed anti-trust case. At least one memorandum submitted at Thursday's hearing seems to have been prepared by the Department of Justice. "The aircraft-accessory industry today," this memorandum said, "suffers from a singular lack of sources of supply and is hampered by the pyramiding of production in critical items." This is attributed to a patent pool entered by General Motors and Bendix in 1929, the restrictive effects of which were intensified by an international agreement between Bendix and Siemens in 1937. Breech of Bendix admitted on the stand that, despite the war, this cartel agreement is still in effect. Its results have been to bar the export of certain vital accessories to Canada and Australia, to bring about collaboration between Bendix and the Germans in occupied France, and to limit supply in this country. Inter-office memos introduced in evidence referred to the Germans as "our northern friends," and in the last few minutes of Thursday's hearing a lawyer from Hughes, Hubbard, and Ewing, counsel for Bendix, gave the story away. He rose righteously to explain that Bendix had been under investigation by the Department of Justice for several months but had refused to enter into a consent decree because the department had insisted that certain patents be made available to all aircraft manufacturers.

Inquiry reveals that the case against Bendix has been mysteriously shut off within the department, probably by War and Navy Department pressure. This article is an appeal to Senator Bone and his colleagues of the Patents Committee to take up where the timid Vinson committee left off.

What About Italy?

BY CARLO SFORZA

FASCIST propaganda has been winning silent victories in America, one after another. The first was the miraculous transformation into high priests of "loyal Americanism" of a gang of writers and pseudo-writers who for years have poisoned the minds of 5,000,000 Italians and Italian-Americans; this was followed by the complacent acceptance by American officialdom of these dangerous fellows as allies in the greatest crisis of American history.

Another victory of Fascist propaganda is to be found in the strange success-of-curiosity of a book just published, "Agent in Italy." Serious books about present-day Italy have recently appeared here and in England; yet the only one about which hundreds of "important" people have spoken in glowing terms is a lurid description of an artificial Italy where, among blunderbusses and mandolins, hundreds of thousands of conspirators are said to be ready, etc. Perhaps its naive compiler did not set out to deceive; but this book is designed to spread an optimistic complacency about what "must" happen in Italy, thereby disposing of the necessity to decide, to work, to take risks. Moreover, the book conveys the idea —which the Fascists are very anxious to spread—that it is not necessary to pay any attention to the views of those Italians in exile who have proved through long sacrifice that their love of Italy is only equaled by their devotion to freedom because, according to "Agent in Italy," there is no contact between Italians abroad and Italians in Italy—when the happy truth is that our principal consolation for the life we have accepted as a sacred duty is the constantly growing communication and identity of feelings and ideas between ourselves and the most heroic Italians in the mother-country.

Fascist agents—of whom so many are still at work here and are not only free but respected—probably had less to do with another outstanding success which Mussolini's propaganda has had within the past week. I refer to the dispatch which stirred America with the news that the King, acting independently of the Duce, had at last summoned a Crown Council in Rome to discuss the situation. It gave rise at once to the most absurd conclusions, published at the risk of giving the world the false and humiliating impression that the most powerful of all the democracies was relying, for opposition to the Axis, on Italian institutions which did nothing to hinder Mussolini's criminal plunge into war in June, 1940, though the immense majority of the Italian people were opposed to fighting against France and Britain at the side of the hated German Reich.

On the day the dispatch appeared I was at Hamilton College, but dozens of joyful telephone calls reached me even there. A few (they were not from Italians) expressed the hope that I might fly at once to Rome to help the King in his "daring struggle against fascism!" Three days later disillusion came with Mussolini's visit to Hitler in Salzburg—no halfway meeting this time. From Salzburg Mussolini returned with a solid corps of Gestapo agents. The Duce sends tens of thousands of Italians to be killed in Russia, against the desires and the interests of Italy; Hitler reciprocates by providing him with Gestapo agents to defend his life against Italians—of whom not one, apparently, was interviewed by the author of "Agent in Italy." In Mussolini's eyes the bargain is highly satisfactory.

No hope, then, from Italy?

On the contrary there is hope, more perhaps than from any other invaded country; but it can be turned to account only if a moral atmosphere is created not only in Italy but in the world as a whole. Thanks to the heroism of the Russians, time is, for the present, working for us. But we have not a moment to lose. If it is essential that we open a new military front to aid the Russian resistance, it is just as important to create a moral front. Nothing can be done in Europe without this moral preparation; and that is why nothing could be less constructive than the recent book by a certain lieutenant colonel in which suggestions for an offensive in Italy were mingled with cheap disparaging remarks about the Italian nation.

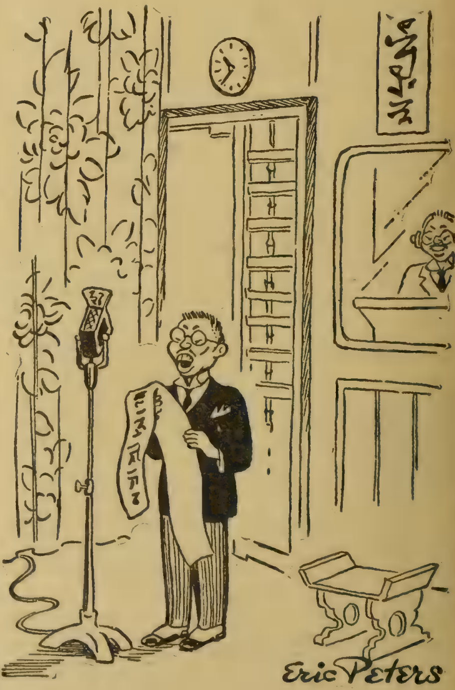
What I have in mind when I speak of a moral offensive is something infinitely more important than radio broadcasts and leaflets citing Garibaldi's love for England and the United States. What is needed is not only appeals but commitments from those democratic leaders on whom Europe's millions rely for deliverance. New proof of this was given to me a few weeks ago, when I received responses solicited from Italians in Italy in broadcasts of mine discussing the Atlantic Charter. "Yes, you may be right," the answers ran. "You are certainly right in believing in Roosevelt's generous and humane intentions. But why are we not told by the chiefs of the democracies what they think about the future of Italy? To raise volunteers, to risk our lives, to risk much more, our honor, we must be sure that we are serving the cause of a free Italy and a free world."

Moreover, what I saw in 1917 in Italy and on the Macedonian front convinces me that what happened once may happen again. Even after so long a lapse of time nothing is more alive in my memory than my arrival on the right bank of the Piave a few days after the breaking of our front at Caporetto by the Austrians and the Germans and my emotion as I watched thousands of soldiers, practically without officers, digging trenches there because—so they told me with a certain "understatement" well known to those familiar with Italy before the days of pompous fascism—"we have to wait for them somewhere; why not here?" Such is the Italian soul which so many centuries have molded. We may seem depressed, dejected, but always a new spring of life, sometimes of heroic action, breaks forth again. But only in response to a moral incentive.

On the Macedonian front I saw an even more symbolic spectacle: the joyous emotion of our people and the perplexity and confusion of the Germans, Hungarians, and Bulgarians when we proclaimed Wilson's Fourteen Points with megaphones and leaflets dropped by airplanes. German and Magyar officers brought to us as prisoners no longer bluffed. Instead they asked humbly, "Is it really true what Wilson says? If it is, there is no longer any reason to fight." And the more daring added, "After all, why should we care about the Kaiser?"

It is a moral offensive along these lines that all Italians, all Europeans, and perhaps some Italians are anxiously waiting for. It is only as the result of such an offensive, more Wilsonian than Wilson, that the unfortunates whom Mussolini and Horthy and the Slovak traitors have sent to the slaughter in Russia will revolt, even though German machine-guns are trained on them.

Such a moral offensive would bring joy to 45,000,000



"The Americans' bombs fell directly on an old ladies' home. In observance of a period of mourning, railroad traffic will be suspended for several weeks."

Italians; and the arms would drop from the hands of the Fascist bandits, as the lances and daggers fell at the feet of the guards at the Holy Sepulcher. Italy, Central Europe, the Balkans are today the Sepulcher. There can be a resurrection but not until the past is put behind us. For miracles we must look to the future.

Everyone knows that Roosevelt considers this a people's war that must end in a people's victory. What will happen in Italy—where nobody believes any longer in fascism—in France, in Spain; what will happen in the hearts of all the martyred masses of Europe, from Norway to Poland to Serbia and Greece, on the day Franklin Roosevelt rises and in the name of the greatest democracy in the world not only affirms the principles of freedom but puts forward a concrete program for achieving it?

Hitler's Slave Legions

BURLINGAME PUBLIC LIBRARY Burlingame, Calif.

BY HEINZ SOFFNER

THE Nazi chiefs are struggling desperately to overcome the labor shortage which threatens to slow up their war machine. And at the same time they are trying to complete the enslavement of the working classes throughout Europe in accordance with their long-range plans for the "New Order." A few weeks ago, at a meeting of employment experts in Berlin, Dr. Beisiegel, a department head in the Labor Ministry, presented an ambitious program for a continent-wide labor supply. Full use of Europe's natural resources, he explained, depends upon planned employment of the total European labor force, estimated by him at 255,000,000. He asked that steps be taken at once to utilize "surplus labor" all over Europe and to coordinate all labor-market regulations.

At present Germany is using many different—and partly conflicting—methods to satisfy its growing need of foreign labor. More than a million prisoners of war have been put to work. Contracts with foreign governments—Italy and Spain—provide about a half-million commandeered laborers. German governmental labor exchanges in the occupied countries recruit individuals on the spot. Foreign firms, complete with management and labor force, have been moved to Germany; last February the Labor Ministry transplanted French, Belgian, Dutch, and Danish building companies and French metal-industry factories. Some large private German concerns have recruiting offices of their own in the conquered territories; in neutral countries they rely on advertisements, circular letters, and such. In Sweden the Northern Liaison Organization tries to provide workers for Germany, especially for the building and airplane industries. Forced labor has been introduced in Poland and Czecho-Slovakia; it is cheap and it is a way to deprive those unruly nations of their intelligentsia. In order to make unskilled aliens more useful in Germany the Nazis provide training in numerous centers: in Poland twenty-nine special camps turn out builders and carpenters; in Rotterdam and Amsterdam training schools for metal workers have been established; through a recent agreement with the Bulgarian government the Nazis train young Bulgars for German airplane factories.

Contracts with "voluntary" foreign workers were originally for six months but are now for twelve at least. As soon as a worker from outside is assigned to a job in Germany, the occupation authorities in his home town cancel his ration card and issue him a new card only at his destination. Foreign workers are compelled to send a large part of their wages to their families at home; this also helps to keep down consumption in Germany. Once in a job, the alien worker must stay there. Leaving without permission brings a penalty of imprisonment for as much as ten years. Factory police, close supervision of all aliens in the Reich, and restrictions on travel combine to enforce these regulations. Moreover, every worker, German or alien, has an employment book which is deposited with the employer while the contract lasts. Both employer and labor exchange have to certify orderly discharge in this book, and no employer in Germany or outside may hire a worker without it.

If alien women workers are found to be pregnant, they are sent home immediately, in accordance with an order of the German Labor Ministry dated August 13, 1941. "Exceptions are allowed only if the employer attaches special importance to retaining the woman and is willing to provide accommodations for mother and child."

The Nazis not only use prisoners of war, contrary to international law, directly in war production, but also place them, as well as other non-German workers, in danger areas—especially areas which are regular targets of the R. A. F. At the Nazi-occupied port of Lorient 350 French workers hired by the occupation authorities were killed by bombs in one night last fall. About 3,000 Belgian workers in Germany have already died in R. A. F. attacks. Today a recruiting campaign is under way to procure French workers for the hard-hit German ports of Kiel and Hamburg.

Jews, although in Nazi doctrine they are "unfit for productive work," are being made use of. In Lodz in Poland 80,000 Jewish workers are compelled to manufacture uniforms, boots, shirts, and other supplies for the Nazi army. Jews have been drafted as miners for the Kladno coal mines in Czecho-Slovakia. Throughout the Reich Jewish labor battalions toil on roads, make repairs after air raids, and do similar jobs.

The Nazis boast of granting alien workers the same rights and working conditions that German workers enjoy. Even if this were true, it would still mean a deterioration in the condition of many, since wages and living standards in the Reich, even before the war, were considerably lower than in most countries of Western or Northern Europe. Treatment of the alien workers is somewhat inconsistent owing to the conflict between the Nazi's desire for maximum output and their policy of degrading non-Germans below the master race. Social insurance, in which pre-Hitler Germany was markedly in advance of most European countries, has been extended to all foreign workers and to their families in the occupied countries, and a special department of the Nazi Labor Front, the Office of Labor Mobilization, has been created to take care of them. Recently 15,000 laborers from fourteen European countries were collected in Berlin's Sportpalast to be told by Dr. Ley, head of the Labor Front, that they were "the messengers of the new Europe." At the same time aliens are in many cases segregated in camps or in empty factory buildings and otherwise restricted in their movements. Italian laborers are often rigidly separated from the local German population. Fear of sabotage causes the Nazis to employ Russians only in groups of twenty. Polish workers have to wear a yellow square with a purple P on their breasts. By an order of October 1, 1941, the Labor Ministry disregards the provisions of the Juvenile Labor Protection Act for Poles of fourteen to eighteen years. Polish workers have a special tax of 15 per cent deducted from their wages. In their spare time they are confined to limited areas. They are forbidden to enter bars or restaurants. Their religious services must be conducted by German priests. The only "entertainment" they are allowed consists of Nazi propaganda films and war communiqués.

About 4,000,000 non-Germans work for the Nazis today within the pre-war boundaries of the Reich and many more outside these boundaries. In the conquered countries Nazi labor policy has been more circumspect than at home, but its ends have been the same. In Austria, though the country has been part of Greater Germany for four years, the labor situation receives a great deal of attention. Last February, during a campaign to increase industrial output, Gauleiter Baldur von Schirach made a tour of many Vienna factories, conversing affably with the workers and distributing free tickets for the state theater. He tried to sell the Nazi regime to the workers as "socialism" and promised them representation on the production committees to be set up in every war plant.

Wages in the conquered countries are usually "assimilated" to the much lower Reich level by the prevention of wage increases while prices and living costs go rapidly upward. In Luxembourg living costs increased 80 per cent before the end of 1941; wages were permitted to rise nominally 45 per cent, but on the average two-fifths of the pay is deducted for taxes and for levies by the municipality, the Nazi Party, and the Labor Front. In Denmark living costs increased 50 per cent between August, 1939, and August, 1941, while wages rose only 10 to 15 per cent. Wage increases have been forbidden by the Nazis in Norway in spite of 30 per cent higher living costs. Hitler's puppet Bulgarian government decreed this January that annual earnings may exceed the earnings of the preceding year by only 3 per cent. In Poland prices have soared to 500 per cent above the pre-war level, but no wage increase has been authorized; on the contrary, Polish workers receive for a sixty-hour week only 80 per cent of what German workers get for a forty-eight-hour week.

Working hours have been lengthened everywhere. Practically no time limit is set for forced labor in the various "services." Young Norwegians, for instance, conscripted for military construction work in northern Norway, have to toil eighty-seven and one-half hours a week in seven shifts of twelve and one-half hours. Protesting workers are threatened with being sent to penal labor across the Finnish border. For privately employed Norwegians, too, Reich Commissioner Terboven has ordered a ten-hour working day. The skilled French workers in the automobile and airplane factories around Paris refused overtime work during many months but finally yielded when the Nazis began to pay for overtime with canned food, otherwise unobtainable in starving France.

Thus far the Nazis have dealt with the labor organizations in each occupied country separately and discriminatingly, several times changing their tactics. In Denmark they have not interfered officially with the once strong unions, which have nevertheless lost most of their bargaining power and independence. In Norway the unions were tolerated for a time, while unsuccessful attempts were made by the Quislings to gain control. A year after the invasion, however, many union officials were arrested, and last September, when workers' discontent led to a strike in Oslo, two union leaders were shot by a firing squad and many others sentenced to long prison terms. Odd Fossum, one of Quisling's henchmen, was finally set up as head of the Norwegian Federation of Labor.

In Holland many labor leaders were thrown into German concentration camps immediately after the invasion, and Reich Commissioner Seyss-Inquart appointed

H. J. Wonderberg, chief of the labor division in the Dutch Nazi Party, commissioner of the Dutch Federation of Trade Unions. A year later the Christian Trade Unions were also compelled to join the Nazified federation. The result was a mass exodus of union members—only one-third remained in good standing. In reprisal the Nazi administration decreed that after January 1, 1942, unemployment benefits should be paid only through the Nazified unions.

In France the central bodies of the union movement have been dissolved, but local groups and regional federations still exist. On last January 1 the Vichy government promulgated a "labor charter" along the lines of the Italian corporative system, to which both Free and Christian trade unions objected vigorously in a joint manifesto. In the occupied zone a group of labor renegades have promoted a "French Labor Front" on the well-known Nazi pattern.

Evidence that the Nazi industrial war machine is beginning to suffer from a lack of man-power is seen in the successive steps the Nazis have been forced to take to stiffen their labor policy in the occupied countries. Where they expected voluntary cooperation, as in Belgium and Holland, they have been forced to introduce conscription of labor; where they intended to act indirectly, through "natives," as in Czecho-Slovakia, Latvia, and Norway, they have been forced to take over the labor unions completely. Originally preferring to exert merely economic pressure, they are now using more and more terror against restive labor—no fewer than 335 members of the destroyed unions have been murdered in the Bohemian Protectorate since Hitler's hangman, Heydrich, took over there.

The Nazis themselves admit lowered per capita output, but they ascribe it to food deficiency, British air raids, and similar "objective" causes. The French Mining Association reports that the average output of coal has declined 12 per cent since the armistice—but it declined one-third more in the occupied zone, which is still comparatively better fed, than in the unoccupied area. Passive resistance, go-slow methods, applied both in the Reich and in the conquered countries, probably damage the Nazi war effort more than spectacular acts of sabotage. Underground papers, such as La Libération in France, Le Monde du Travail and L'Espoir in Belgium, Fri Fagbevegelse in Norway, Glos in Poland, support this labor resistance.

The important question is, to what extent will the undeniable discontent and resistance of Europe's vast labor force actively contribute to Hitler's downfall? Wishful thinking about spontaneous uprisings must be discounted; the United Nations must take the initiative in loosening the grip of Hitler's terror upon his unwilling toilers. They must convince the workers of Europe that victory for the United Nations will bring social and economic security, and they must coordinate the underground opposition with military and political action from the outside.

Unconquered Malta

BY EDWIN BONICI

AN EDITOR to whom I talked a few weeks ago about an article on Malta hinted that it might be better to wait until the island fortress was conquered and then write a kind of obituary. I think he is going to wait a long time, and I say this as one who was born and brought up in Malta and knows that the strength of its fortifications is matched only by the toughness of its people. After suffering more than 2,000 raids, after taking the punishment of a greater weight of bombs than has been dropped on any comparable area in the world, the island is still carrying on and still hitting back, not only defensively but offensively.

Long ago Napoleon called Malta "the strongest island in all Europe." In terms of modern warfare it has been described by an Italian admiral as "an unsinkable aircraft carrier permanently anchored on Italy's doorstep." How right he is! And how often has Italy in the past two years felt the sting of the British planes which have hopped over from Malta to harass the airfields and harbors of Sicily and Calabria, and to prey on the convoys carrying reinforcements and supplies to the Axis armies in Libya! But it is not only from the air that the island has hit the enemy hard. Its deep bays provide bases for submarines which carry on constant warfare against Axis warships and merchantmen.

The first Italian attack on Malta came within twenty-four hours of Mussolini's declaration of war in May, 1940. Since then there have been few quiet intervals, and sometimes there have been as many as fifteen alerts in a single day. The Axis fliers have had to pay an enormous price. If they fly low enough to aim their bombs accurately they get caught in murderous ack-ack fire from batteries skilfully concealed all over the island and its small neighbor, Gozo. The concentration of anti-aircraft guns on Malta is perhaps the greatest in the world, and the gunners, many of whom are Maltese volunteers, have through constant practice developed a high degree of skill. Nor are ground defenses the island's only retort against raiders. Spitfires shooting out of underground hangars to give battle thousands of feet above the ground have sent hundreds of enemy machines crashing into the sea. Time and again the Rome and Berlin radios have joyfully announced that Malta was knocked out. The Axis airmen who have to fly over Malta know better; they say the experience is a foretaste of hell.

Just what damage the Axis bombs have caused on Malta is of course a military secret. We know that numerous churches and many of the famous palaces of the old Knights of Malta have been hit, and that thousands of homes and business buildings have been destroyed. Our houses in Malta are built of massive squared stones cut from the local quarries, with floors of cement or sometimes of marble. They are designed to stand for hundreds of years, but solid as they are, they cannot resist high explosives. They do, however, give protection against shell splinters, and since they have no wood in their construction they do not invite incendiary bombs.

No complete figures of casualties among the civilian population, which numbers a little over 250,000, have been published, but the losses are known to be heavy. The worst month of those for which any details are available was September of last year, when 350 persons were killed and 348 injured. In March of this year, when raids rose to a new peak, 230 deaths were reported.

The toll would have been far greater but for the splendid underground shelters. Malta consists of solid rock of a unique character. It is a kind of limestone which is easy to work but turns to granite hardness after exposure to the air. Below ground there is a labyrinth of caves and passages some of which date back to early Christian times. Others were constructed during the Middle Ages, when Malta withstood more than one famous siege by the Turks. These caverns have been enlarged to provide a place of safety for the whole population. Numerous openings make it possible to take cover rapidly and insure good ventilation, and subterranean arms of the sea help to solve the problem of sanitation. Underground, too, are natural bombproof storehouses where reserves of food and munitions can be kept safe from the enemy's destructive fury.

Malta has been a British stronghold since 1800, when the islanders, with the aid of the British fleet, rose against the garrison left there by Napoleon on his way to Egypt two years earlier. It was formally annexed with the consent of the Maltese by the Treaty of Paris in 1814, and since then it has been one of the great bases on which British naval power depends. The advent of the airplane led some people to believe the island had become useless as a fortified base. It is little more than twenty minutes by air from the nearest Italian airfields, and during the Ethiopian crisis Mussolini's propagandists boasted loudly it would be quickly knocked out in the event of war. Some British experts at that time advocated the abandonment of Malta if war broke out. But bolder counsels prevailed, and the modernization of the island's defenses was taken seriously in hand. The plans adopted presupposed of course active French cooperation and a close link with the French stronghold at Bizerte in Tunis. Since France fell, Malta has had to depend on its own resources supplemented by the convoys which fight their way through from Alexandria.

Malta's defenses against air attack have again and again demonstrated their effectiveness. Its defenses against an attack by sea have yet to meet a real test, for the Italian fleet has never ventured within the twenty-mile range of its huge guns. Once, and once only, on July 27, 1941, the Italians attempted to force their way into the harbor of Valetta with a fleet of E-boats escorting eight smaller torpedo-carrying craft. It was an opportunity for which the native gunners of the Royal Malta Artillery had been waiting. A simultaneous intensive bombing attack did not disturb the accuracy of their fire, and in short order every one of the torpedo-carriers was blown out of the water and at least nine E-boats were destroyed.

There have been reports from time to time that the Germans were assembling a huge fleet of troop-carrying planes in Sicily, hoping to capture Malta as they captured Crete. Perhaps they will still attempt this feat, but if they do I fully expect they will experience a costly failure. Malta together with Gozo is only 122 square miles in area and is almost entirely lacking in trees or other natural cover; so there would be little chance for parachutists to descend and organize undisturbed. Probably few of them would land at all, for the troop-carriers would make fine targets for the anti-aircraft gunners, and the men that did reach earth would find themselves tangled in a maze of stoutly held defenses and soon be on their way either to heaven or a prison camp.

To the traveler approaching from the sea Malta looks like a bare rock, but actually a considerable part of the island, and of Gozo as well, is cultivated, mostly in small holdings. Many kinds of fruits and vegetables grow abundantly, and local vineyards supply a fair vin ordinaire. The many bays provide good fishing, but the war has interfered with the tuna catch and deprived the islanders of a favorite dish. Most grain has to be imported, as well as meat and butter. So far Malta has not gone hungry, for periodically the convoys have come through, though not without losses, bringing to the besieged fortress not only food but the huge quantities of munitions and gasoline needed for its continued defense. There is little danger of a water shortage such as afflicted Hongkong and Singapore. Possibly the main water system of the island has been damaged, but there are good springs to fall back on, and most houses have big cisterns cut in the rock to collect water from the roofs during the prolonged rainy season.

We Maltese can hardly claim to be a pure race though we like to think we still show a strong strain of the original Phoenician inhabitants. As the family names indicate, people from many Mediterranean countries have at one time or another settled in the island, some seeking sanctuary, some saved from shipwrecks, some just drifting to our shores as men drift to any port of call. During the last century many Italians immigrated and were made welcome. They fitted into the community without difficulty and were contented enough until the Fascist government began systematic agitation among Italians living abroad.

Mussolini has always thought that Malta, so near to Italy and so essential to the control of mare nostrum, ought to be part of the Fascist empire even though historically it has never been Italian. During the long regime of the Knights of Malta there was a close connection between the island and the Papal court, and Italian was the legal language. Under the British, Italian long enjoyed equality with English in the courts and schools, but a few years ago Maltese, always the main language of the people, was given legal and educational status. This decision provoked a fierce political contest, one of the island's two leading parties battling for the restoration of Italian. The Fascists naturally made the most of this opportunity to promote their propaganda, and a tense situation continued until the British government decided to suspend the constitution and return the island—first granted self-government in 1919—to the position of a Crown Colony. This step aroused little antagonism among the people, especially since it was accompanied by real efforts to promote economic prosperity and social reform.

On the whole, our relations with the British have been amiable. They have brought us comparative prosperity and given us religious tolerance and legal security. Even the pro-Italian minority was never really anxious to exchange British control for Fascist rule, and after suffering from Italian bombs and witnessing the degraded state of Italy under the heel of the Gestapo, it has joined loyally in defense of the island.

Malta stands and will continue to stand because its people are determined never to surrender. They are responsible for a large part of the island's defenses, and in addition many of them are in the British navy. Thousands of others work in the dockyards and the arsenal, which has trained some of the finest mechanics in the world. They showed their mettle when the aircraft carrier Illustrious limped into Valetta harbor after a tremendous hammering from Axis dive-bombers. Within three days she was patched up and able to sail safely to Alexandria under her own steam.

The heroic resistance of Malta was uniquely recognized a few weeks ago when King George conferred on the whole population of the island the George medal, the highest British award for civilian gallantry. That has been a source of pride and satisfaction to the many Maltese who now live in the United States. And I am certain that my people at home, who have remained so steadfast under fire, will be assured by this sign that they have not been forgotten and that, indeed, the whole world is watching them with admiration.

Indictments Pull the Triggers

AN OPEN ANSWER TO JAMES N. ROSENBERG

DEAR JIM: Your letter to me in last week's Nation entitled Words Are Triggers correctly quotes the statements for which Christians, Noble, and Jones have been indicted, and with your usual restraint you even omitted what to me seem to be some of the most vicious of their utterances. The gist of your letter is in your rhetorical question, "I ask you whether you seriously hold that they [these statements] are mere expressions of 'opinion alone.' " Just that. I take instances: "Germany and Mr. Quisling are doing a fine job of liberating the Norwegians from the aggressions of England"; "The Japanese bombing of Pearl Harbor was the 'proper thing.' " Let me ask you, Is it or should it be a crime to say that the British are fighting not for freedom but to maintain their empire; that the débâcle in the Far East has been due to the fact that the British have not freed the natives; that the Russian armies—which have put up such a magnificent fight—are interested not in freedom but in communism and the rule of Stalin; that the Russians will come to terms with the Germans whenever they deem it wise?

Yet the tendency and perhaps the purpose of any of the foregoing statements would be to weaken this country's morale, to discourage recruiting, to help the enemy. In the event of indictment because of such statements, a defendant in time of war is certain to be found guilty. In the last war men were convicted for saying that we should have a capital tax, that the war was imperialistic, that the House of Morgan was saved by our entry into the war. In such times all that the government needs is a charge and a defendant. Our patriotic juries with sons in the service are sure to do the rest.

Fortunately, in our law the question of legality of utterances does not depend upon the general tendency or effect of language but upon the question of whether or not there is direct incitement to unlawful act. The line must be drawn here, or you have an end of free speech, which, as Judge Cardozo once remarked, is the "indispensable condition of nearly every other form of freedom."

You refer to the Schenck decision, which merely held that language must be considered in the background of conditions and is punishable if it creates a "clear and present danger" of unlawful conduct. As analyzed in a recent case (Bridges v. United States), decided the day after the outbreak of this war, "the substantive evil must be extremely serious and the degree of imminence extremely high before utterances can be punished."

I like the little schoolgirl who, when a schoolmate said the Germans would win the war, answered, "Pfui!" The so-called seditious statements for which these men were indicted have now been publicized all over the country. Thus their propaganda, which originally reached a few people, has now, with whatever effect it might have, reached millions. Is it not fair to assume that we are influenced not so much by fear of this propaganda as by a desire to "get" the propagandists? Do I object seriously to these men going to jail? Far from it—but of course that is not the point.

What is the effect of these prosecutions? The Nation, with a liberal tradition which has earned it the condemnation of Martin Dies, proposed, and effectively, that the government put Social Justice out of business. The New Masses is after the Chicago Tribune and Colonel McCormick. Numerous complaints have been made against the Daily News. Even the Saturday Evening Post is under fire. The New Republic published a letter in which the writer stated that the theory underlying Catholicism conditions its members toward fascism. Others say that the Jews are likely to turn toward communism. The Irish papers say we are supporting British imperialism. Personally, I particularly dislike the propaganda of Martin Dies, even when it is approved by Hitler and Goebbels. Where would all of this bring us? Different groups have different prejudices. We would all be caviling at one another. The result would be to stir up resentment, hatred, fear, and make issues of matters that are relatively dormant, issues that would divert us from the one effort on which the country as a whole is united—the winning of the war.

At the end of a talk at a forum the other night, one of the audience said that my views were dangerous and that I should be curbed in time of war. I stated that no doubt he and many others in the audience would like to put me in jail. I suggested that if this were done, the people in the audience probably would be about equally divided between my prosecutors and my supporters, that they would become disunited, that their attention would be diverted from the one thing on which they all agree, the necessity of victory.

I believe in the right of free speech, not only as an ideal, but as a practical matter. I believe that democracy works. I believe—and here we may differ—that the rationale of freedom applies particularly in time of stress. Both of us today have one aim—victory over the menace that threatens all freedom. For my part, I think our war effort will be hampered by suppression.

We should not forget that criticism and a free public opinion are essential to promote the best efforts of our leaders. Not only this, but expression relieves emotion. Those who feel strongly in dissent are far less likely to act if they are permitted to talk. It is rare that those who express themselves are dangerous. The greatest harm that results from suppressing a small number of extremists is that you keep millions of reasonable men from expressing themselves. Further, it is better to have open than underground propaganda. Finally, when you let people alone, you do not have the fear, suspicion, and hate that lead to amateur espionage of dinner-table conversations and cause neighbor to watch neighbor. The unity aroused in us by the dastardly Japanese attack on Pearl Harbor and the German declaration of war may be considerably disrupted if we begin to snipe at one another because of differing views. Of course, under a free system we do not seem to have the unity of a dictatorship nation, but that is only because we have free speech, press, and assemblage.

But you say, let's leave this to Francis Biddle, a man who has the friendship, respect, and admiration of both of us. I am thankful he is the Attorney General. He started out with the statement that the war brought an attack upon the principles of the Bill of Rights. "Every American must remember that the war we wage today is in defense of these principles. It therefore behooves us to guard most zealously these principles at home." You yourself say, "Until months after Pearl Harbor Biddle held to the position to which prior to the war you and I adhered."

But do you have in mind that Biddle is a public official, that our officials are subject to constant pressure, that their natural desire is to promote national unity, and that they may well feel that where there is a tremendous public demand for suppression of vicious opinion—a demand joined in even by reasonable men like yourself—the country is likely to be more unified if they respond, at least to some extent, to that demand? They are likely to start with cases where public opinion seems to be behind them almost unanimously, and gradually, as in the last war, to go farther as the hysteria increases.

Why the fear? The country is united as never before.

BOOKS and the ARTS

The Use of Ideals

THE GATES OF AULIS. By Gladys Schmitt. The Dial Press. $2.75.

THE title of this novel is perhaps not accurately descriptive, for the story deals with the legend of Tauris rather than with that of Aulis, with sacrifices escaped rather than with sacrifices consummated; its Orestes and Iphigenia learn to overcome the self-sacrificial impulses which seem to give them strength but which actually serve their weaknesses. Carl Hasselmann, a radical sociologist, is in a perpetual censorious worry about political integrity and therefore cannot act politically. His sister Ellie worships absolute notions of tragedy and morality and therefore cannot paint truly. They are able to follow their proper destinies only when they acknowledge the multitudinous conditions of human nature and admit their right to their own selves and their own happiness.

Miss Schmitt's first novel is serious and ambitious. Its manner heavily obscures its merit, but if you stand well back from it and manage to see through its verbiage and its lumpy lyricism, you cannot help finding it in some ways admirable. For one thing, it is a relief that the author portrays and judges unhappy intellectuals with what the jacket blurb rightly calls "respect and tenderness." But more important is the courageous perception on which the novel is based. "Selflessness" and self-sacrifice are perhaps the two most admired modern virtues, and contemporary novelists have seldom dared to bring them into question. In a world in which virtue seems both uncertain in its nature and rare in its occurrence, it still appears to be indubitably virtuous to consecrate oneself to a cause from which little gain and possibly much hardship are to be expected. The conscience of the literate middle class is obsessed with the ideal of selflessness; to this group morality always presents itself as a reproach for crassness and as a desire to give up everything for art, science, and humanity. It likes to have a quota of dedicated spirits in its life and in its literature, and though it long ago learned to suspect that there are "real reasons" behind, say, religious fervor, it prefers to hold unquestionable the motives of secular dedication.

Yet it is certainly true, as Miss Schmitt sees, that behind much selfless action there lies self-seeking or self-justification or self-destruction. This ambiguity of motive, this use of idealism, is perhaps the special modern confusion. The love of humanity generates its own problems and its own vices; the love of truth has its own insensibilities. Often, by hating vice too much, as Burke said, we come to love men too little; and a convenient excuse for loving men too little is to hate the vice of certain men a great deal. To understand this does not, of course, deny the value of dedication; it simply implies that there is an ethics of dedication, that choice of the moral course does not settle the quality of one's morality: there is, as it were, a morality of morality. The nineteenth century understood better than we do how selflessness can be the most effective form of pride, that it can be marked by a cold censoriousness, by a negation and an arrogance which must sooner or later qualify the art or the political action it produces. Hawthorne often dealt with this insight; so did Nietzsche; and Ibsen, having himself announced the claims of the ideal, told us, in "The Wild Duck," how the ideal may be distorted to serve personal wilfulness.

Unfortunately, Miss Schmitt's novel is not up to the importance of her theme. It is impossibly wordy, by which I do not mean merely that it has too many words (though it has) but that the words have an improper part in the creation. We are told that Miss Schmitt has consciously modeled herself on Proust and Mann, but she reminds us of neither of these writers, who are discursive but not wordy; rather, she seems to be in the line of the three most tiresome of modern verbalists, Dorothy Richardson, Waldo Frank, and Thomas Wolfe. These writers hold in common a belief in the power of words to render, by sheer weight of numbers, every possible shade of sensibility. The result of this belief is that their ever-accumulating sentences dissolve the solid world; we have the uncomfortable feeling that they never credit us with knowing what anything is like and that in their insistence on overwhelming us with complete information they are trying in a very aggressive way to substitute their sensibility for the world. Miss Schmitt does not go quite so far, but she goes far enough. She can write sentences as simple and precise as this: "Only in the attic rooms, where maids undressed and stood before imperfect mirrors, were there any patches of light." But most of her narrative moves like this:

> I am going, he thinks, from the place of my unfruitfulness to my rightful station upon the face of the earth. These hills are nothing to me, my haste dismisses them, I go with the purpose and the speed of a planet. Virile, conscious of the miracle of my consciousness, I make a white cleft in the night with my flying face; I take direction with speed and go triumphantly home.

The corrective for such prose is not an ideal of spare, cold economy: the novel is a discursive form, it needs expansiveness and it needs full language. For the bad lyricism of sensibility which Miss Schmitt uses, the corrective is story. Only through plot and action can the novel truly realize an idea. The novelist may be infinitely discursive and expository if, like Henry James, he is always reminding himself to "dramatize, dramatize"; if he subordinates everything to the demands of the dramatic element, he can usually count on the elements of language and sensibility to take care of themselves and to have the right proportion. But a novelist like Miss Schmitt depends upon sensibility to do the work of drama. And from a sensibility as insistent and aggressive as Miss Schmitt's we inevitably try to escape; after a few score pages our eyes learn to skip the passages of high, conscious language—we want to get on with the story. The saving grace of Miss Schmitt's novel is that it has, after all, at least the outline of a good story beneath all its verbiage.

The Problem of Japan

GOODBYE JAPAN. By Joseph Newman. L. B. Fischer Publishing Corporation. $2.50.

OUR ENEMY JAPAN. By Wilfrid Fleisher. Doubleday, Doran and Company. $2.

HOW JAPAN PLANS TO WIN. By Kinoaki Matsuo. Little, Brown and Company. $2.50.

JAPAN: A WORLD PROBLEM. By H. J. Timperley. The John Day Company. $1.75.

A CONSIDERABLE amount of thought has been given to the problem of how to deal with Germany after the war. But thus far we have had little discussion of the equally difficult problem of what to do about Japan. All observers are agreed that Japan is a nation apart. Its history, customs, traditions, and present psychology ill fit it for citizenship in an organized, peaceful world. None of the recent books on Japan have brought out that country's abnormalities more vividly than "Goodbye Japan" by Joseph Newman, who until just before the outbreak of the war served as the correspondent of the New York Herald Tribune in Tokyo. Newman shows how Japan's unique political structure has contributed to control by the militarists, how the principles of aggression have been rooted in Japanese thought for more than 2,600 years, and how the Japanese cleverly concealed their aggressive intentions toward the Western democracies by elaborate entertainment of foreign, particularly American, public figures and by building a façade of brazen deceit with talk about a "new order for securing the lasting peace of the world." He also shows the other side of the picture: how Japan's aggressive policies have already led to a lowering of the people's standard of living and to a sharp increase of tuberculosis, rickets, trachoma, and myopia.

Wilfred Fleisher's brief picture of Japan closely parallels that of his fellow Herald Tribune correspondent, but as he was stationed in this country in the months immediately preceding the war he deals at some length with the duplicity of Japan's final "negotiations" with the United States. Both writers make it quite clear that Japan's action in entering the war on the side of the Axis was prompted by indigenous Japanese dreams of imperialism and was not the result of orders from Berlin.

A key to the type of mind which has developed in Japan as a result of its centuries of militarist tradition is provided in Kinoaki Matsuo's remarkable forecast of the American-Japanese war. Matsuo's book was published in Tokyo in 1940, and the text was stolen by Korean agents and translated for publication by Kilsoo K. Haan, a Korean stationed in Washington. It presents a fairly accurate time-table of the Japanese moves in the war, but its military value is secondary to its unwitting disclosures regarding the limited, though shrewd, operation of the Japanese military mind.

Mr. Timperley probes the origins of Japanese militarism much more deeply than any other contemporary writer. He finds that the urge for expansion at the expense of Japan's neighbors antedates by some centuries the Meiji Restoration of 1868. He points out that Japanese pirates have been terrorizing the China Sea since 1260 A.D. and that systematic raids on the coasts of Korea, China, Siam, and the Philippines began in the sixteenth century. There was a period of respite during the two and a half centuries of seclusion under the Tokugawa rule, but the expansionist spirit was revived again in the middle of the nineteenth century under the inspiration of the great nationalist philosopher Shoin Yoshida. In recent years Japanese thinking has fallen more and more under the spell of the sixteenth- and nineteenth-century nationalists. Like the Nazis, the present-day Japanese have acquired a mystical sense of their mission to bring order and truth to the rest of the world by means of the sword.

It is evident that the psychological basis of Japanese aggression will not be destroyed by a military defeat. On the contrary, it is likely to be aggravated. Great care and wisdom, therefore, must be exercised in working out the peace terms for the Pacific. As in the case of an individual, regeneration must come from within; it cannot be imposed from without. But since the democratic forces within Japan are extraordinarily feeble, Mr. Timperley points out that the world will have to insist on certain safeguards to prevent Japan from once more seizing military supremacy in East Asia. China will have to be strengthened by the return of Manchuria, Formosa, and all other territories taken from it by Japan. Korea should be restored to freedom, and the Japanese should be forced to cede the Marshall, Bonin, and other island bases used in the attack on the West.

This, Timperley readily admits, will be a bitter pill for Japan to swallow. But he would "sugarcoat" it by offering Japan free access to raw materials and even some special privileges in China provided Japan introduced a measure of social reform and sought to readjust its distorted, ill-balanced economic system. It is doubtful whether the sugarcoating will be effective, but it should be tried. A basic cure for Japan's international delinquency—and Germany's—probably depends on our ability to create and enforce a genuine system of world law after the war. This cannot be imposed from without but must be built by the cooperative efforts of the people of all countries, including the Japanese. So far no one has even sketched an outline of such a program applicable to the Far East. MAXWELL S. STEWART

American Writing by Negroes

THE NEGRO CARAVAN: WRITINGS BY AMERICAN NEGROES. Selected and Edited by Sterling A. Brown, Arthur P. Davis, and Ulysses Lee. The Dryden Press. $4.25.

BACK in the twenties books about Negroes and by Negroes were welcomed with an uncritical enthusiasm that was as harmful to the writers as it was essentially false because it was based on the assumption, which many of the books exploited, that Negro life was different from white life. The old stereotyped notions of Negro life and character persisted. What the present collection should establish once and for all is the identity of writing by Negroes, in all fields of expression, with American writing in general. Negro writing is from beginning to end part and parcel of American literature in derivation and tendency, in form, content, and intention. Such characteristics as the mingling of deep emotion and humor, the feeling for legend, and the note of defeat and protest are not exclusively Negro, as they are commonly considered to be, but are basic elements of the folk and literary tradition of the country, of already assimilated minorities. Although it would be foolish to deny that the spirituals belong to the Negro, they have their counterparts in the folk culture of white Americans, even as the popularity of swing music, which translates folk feeling into new rhythms, would not be possible if that music were not related to the traditional elements of a larger American culture. The Negro, as a minority, naturally takes on the culture he lives in, while at the same time he influences it.

It is because the editors see the problems of the Negro and the Negro writer as an integral part of American life that this anthology is important in the history of the American Negro. They reject the term "Negro literature" and demand a single standard of criticism. More than 100 of almost 1,100 pages consist of an excellent history and evaluation of all phases of Negro writing. There are poems, short stories, selections from novels, drama, and folk literature, well-chosen examples of biographical writing, and historical, cultural, and personal essays, but I liked best the speeches, pamphlets, and letters, and the social essays. Of these the best pieces were written by past or present members of the faculty of Howard University, with one notable exception—Charles S. Johnson of Fisk.

The caravan makes its way from David Walker's "Appeal" of 1829, Frederick Douglass's "Letter to His Master" of 1848, Booker T. Washington's compromising optimism, and Marcus Garvey's Universal Negro Improvement Association to E. Simms Campbell's "Early Jam" and Richard Wright's "The Ethics of Living Jim Crow." Some of the stages on the way are the plantation, the underground railroad, the Civil War, Reconstruction, the share-cropper, the courts, the ballot box, the school, the union, the "new Negro." This caravan moves; and it succeeds not only in presenting a history of the Negro in his own words but in clarifying the complex pattern of American life. Its value lies in the tremendous vitality it compresses and in the understanding it communicates of a common heritage.

Although Negroes have published more books of poetry than of any other literary form, the poetry section is by far the dreariest stretch of the route. The poets escape from themselves into protest, rhetoric, or decorum; they know what they want to say before they write, and consequently any poetic meaning they might transmit remains caged within them. A good deal of the more recent poetry is merely watered Whitman, the prose catalogue that runs on and on. It does not stand comparison, for instance, with this line from a prose folk tale, "My heart beneath my knees and my knees in some lonesome valley," or this from a folk sermon printed as verse, "Two thousand years have went by on their rusty ankles." I don't mean to suggest that poets should go back to spirituals and folk stuff. Rather, it seems to me that in continuing to draw from already crystallized modes of expression they sometimes try to eke out an emotion they no longer really feel. That is perhaps why some of the lyrics have the ineffectiveness of the words of a song without the music; the naturally lyrical poets still hear a music that does not grow out of the words they write but determines them, thus depriving the words of a direct relationship to the experience. This is equally true of the use of jazz rhythms and of dialect. There is another factor—the Negro writer is liable to be trapped by the very stereotypes he fights against simply because they are still attributed to him by the reading public. Despite the excellence of some of the prose selections, there too the experience of the Negro is not deeply explored. It remains to be written, but first it must be understood. The same lack of self-knowledge and understanding is endemic in American writing as a whole and is especially reflected in the incomplete portrayal of character.

H. P. LAZARUS

The Kernan Thesis

DEFENSE WILL NOT WIN THE WAR. By Lieutenant Colonel W. F. Kernan. Little, Brown and Company. $1.50.

A NOTED columnist was saying the other day that two parties seem to be forming in the United States, the parties of defense and attack. On the defense side the isolationists and appeasers, with the goal of a negotiated peace in their minds, are working for a Sitzkrieg. Taking advantage of distrust, prejudice, and fear, as well as the natural shrinking from the human cost of war felt by courageous men, the appeasers have made propaganda to which, so far, the advocates of an offensive have not offered an effective reply.

In this state of affairs almost any kind of demand for aggressive action would have value, even though some of its arguments might appear faulty. Lieutenant Colonel Kernan's book is a case in point. Lucidly and persuasively written, it serves as a bracing tonic against the malady of defensism. It marks clearly every blind alley and side path of evasion that might lead to defeat.

The book was written, of course, neither for the soldier nor for the professed student of politics. Since its allusions to military and political history are not more numerous or detailed than is required to persuade the general reader, it might be thought that the book should be discussed at its own avowed level. Yet one feels that it might have been improved as popular instruction. There are even a few dangers in the book, and some of its summaries are misleadingly brief. As the author says, Hitler took full advantage of the weakness of the democracies, of their lack of decision in the matter of offensive action. That indecision sprang from the fact that "in every democracy on earth the paramount object of policy was avoidance of war." The peacefully inclined governments would neither federate nor arm, much less do both. Long ago Machiavelli put the matter succinctly when he wrote that the Roman Empire owed its endurance to its policy of never waiting until war became inevitable, of never waiting until it was attacked. Rome, the adviser of princes pointed out, always went out to meet rebellion against its peace while that rebellion was still feeble and disunited. In 1933-34 the Roman solution, and Lieutenant Colonel Kernan's, one imagines, would have been to invade Germany and overthrow Hitler. The balance-of-power policy prevented such a solution. It is in the brevity, one might say in the crudity, of the truth that a certain danger resides.

That the argument may cause post-war trust to be reposed in mere force is apparent. What is valuable, however, is the author's tracing of the defensive outlook to the circumstances inherent in an unfederated world.

But such an analysis is insufficient, especially when it is followed by the mistaken argument contained in the chapter Mahan Was Wrong. The naval tradition of Britain and the United States is not necessarily connected with the rejection of offensive warfare. It is altogether sound to insist that navies cannot preserve peace or of themselves achieve victory. To the extent that people expect them to do so, trust in sea power is dangerous. It is none the less an extravagance to say that until 1940 it was believed in England that "sea power was sufficient to uphold Western civilization until the end of time." Nor does one feel much force in the chapter entitled The Staff Complex. At one point the author seems to be arguing that the capacity for initiative was lost because true generalship had been crushed by the over-development of staff work. Following Foch, the author opposes élan to planning. But surely the staff work of the German army is not meager. It is probably voluminous. The important thing is that its methods are adapted to the technique imposed by modern arms.

The criticism brings me to the principal defect of the book. That it was not merely the desire for peace that gave rise to "defensism" Lieutenant Colonel Kernan repeatedly explains. He says, all too cursorily, that it was the vast human expense of the 1915-18 campaigns that gave rise to defensive theories. The machine-gun had paralyzed movement and made of warfare a ruinous attrition. And when 1918 at last produced a successful offensive, the German surrender was due to exhaustion, the previous collapse of the Balkans, and the arrival of great American armies. With the technique of 1915-18 the offense needed to be three times as strong as the defense. That was the realization that vitiated British and French military thinking. The democratic general staffs stayed in schools and learned nothing. The German staff discovered new methods. The gasoline engine, correctly used, puts offense upon a level with defense. Lieutenant Colonel Kernan dwells much too briefly upon this question of technique. There is no need to add that the author is well aware of this, but it is still true that had he shown, as a page of simple technicalities would have done, that the only real answer to a blitz is another blitz, his case for the offensive would have been even stronger.

The reviewer confesses that he has little patience with the chapter called The Restoration of Strategy. Without a far more extensive survey of the problem, the suggestion that Italy offers the best theater for mounting an invasion cannot convince. Finally, while the author is a democrat, his last chapter, On the Dangers of Warfare by Committee, is likely to be useful to men who are pro-fascist. His references to political plots during the first World War, plots which he seems to think were designed merely to keep offense-minded generals out of command, are altogether too crude. In any case, no one can be more political than your ambitious general. Nor is ability an invariable companion to aggressiveness. What is needed is intelligent political leadership, served by generals who have mastered modern technique.

RALPH BATES

A Disciple of Aristippus

HOUSMAN, 1897-1936. By Grant Richards. With an Introduction by Mrs. E. W. Symons and Appendices by G. B. A. Fletcher and Others. Oxford University Press. $4.

HERE is Alfred Edward Housman as seen, from 1897 to 1936, through the devoted if not unduly penetrating eyes of his publisher, Grant Richards. In addition to his own text Mr. Richards includes an introduction by the poet's younger sister Katharine (Mrs. E. W. Symons), various illustrations, and no fewer than ten appendices.

"I may be able," writes Mrs. Symons, "to set my brother's memory free from erroneous conjectures by a definite statement of the troubles that did nearly wreck his career at its beginning, and did permanently affect his future for both good and ill." These troubles, she thinks, had nothing to do with any heart-breaking love affairs; they were the death of his mother on the poet's twelfth birthday, his disillusion with his early religious teachings, and, principally, his failure, in 1881, in the Final Schools at Oxford. Mrs. Symons has more to say of the effect of this failure than of its cause; she imputes blame to her brother for letting the family down at a time of severe domestic crisis. She does not go so far as to call this failure in itself a perverse act, though she says that her brother "chose to be perverse in many opinions that he expressed," but she does find him guilty of intellectual arrogance, negligence, and slackness. Once mortified, he became obsessed with the determination to retrieve his academic disgrace; and thereafter, whether in penance or inoculation, gave himself to mortification as the pattern of his life. This somewhat oversimplifies Mrs. Symons's thesis, of course: nobody could be quite as grim as this makes him sound, and Mrs. Symons does allude to the feasting, joking, and witty speech of which Alfred was the center. Some of her chance remarks are more provocative than her main address: for instance, her quotation of Aldous Huxley's "excessive repression of the sexual impulses tends . . . to produce an excessive development of pride and ambition," and her own comment that this observation "exactly fits the example in my brother."

The material in the appendices may best be described as various, both as to quality and interest. The "Manilius" dedication is given in the original Latin, followed by, not facing, Edmund Wilson's fine English translation; there are notes on Housman into Greek and Latin, and on Housman as treated by English composers; there are a treatise on Housman as a scholar and several articles of personal recollections (one could wish in these last that the poet's scathing witticisms had been made the subject of definite quotation rather than merely blissful allusion). The dates of Housman's poems are given again; this makes the third time, for they are given in the complete poems published by Holt in 1940 and in Laurence Housman's recollections published in 1938 by Scribner's. Of the approximately seventy pages of appendix material, more than half consists of notes by Professor G. B. A. Fletcher. Some of these, notably those dealing with undoubted and probable reminiscences in Housman's poetry, are interesting; some of them, for example the listing of Housman's words and usages not given in the New English Dictionary, the catalogues of compound epithets and favorite turns and repetitions, and the comparison of the length of Housman's poems with the Odes of Horace and the poems of Catullus, are merely littish scholarship going off the deep end.

Mr. Richards's own text contains a wealth of details and a single argument. The details begin with the publication of "A Shropshire Lad," at the author's expense, in 1896, and go on from there, through the story of the early reviews, through various scholastic, literary, and gastronomic adventures, up to the bequest of the poet's wine cellar to the Family Dining Club in the University of Cambridge and of his literary remains to his brother Laurence, with an account of the mourning, eulogy, and detraction that followed upon his demise. Some of this detail is perhaps more interesting to publishers and/or epicures than to the general reader. (I expect a furious visit from Housman's ghost for that double conjunction; how he would thresh in his grave could he know of such usage!) There is a good deal of repetitiousness in the various notes from Housman dealing with corrections on the proof sheets of "Manilius," in his responses to requests for permissions from anthologists and composers, in the lists of the fancy foods and wines ingested during this or that excursion on the Continent. But the documentation, as such, is impressive; it throws a good deal of light on the visible aspects of Housman's existence.

Mr. Richards's argument, on the other hand, is concerned with the invisible aspects of that existence. He contends that, like the snakes in Ireland, there were no such; he would have done with indecent speculation as to his friend's sexual constitution and indecent examination of his moral character. Mr. Richards apparently believes that the two things are identical. But is this really true? Might one not be a homosexual, overt or repressed, and still conduct one's life with the most upright probity; or be perfectly normal, as the saying goes, and still commit the great refusal, the sin against the Holy Ghost? (And then, of course, one might be normal and good, or perverse and wicked.) Especially when we are dealing with the character of an artist, a character Housman seems never to have admitted to himself save in the most intimate seclusion, in the deepest night when he struck his fist upon the stone, we need to remember that the Muse is not concerned with bourgeois Victorian notions.

The question of the origin of Housman's art aside—though it cannot be left aside entirely—was Housman, as an artist, a failure or a success? This will no doubt sound to Mr. Richards like a shocking question to raise, but it deserves a better answer than any of those vouchsafed by the eulogists Mr. Richards gushes over or the detractors whom he flays. If we judge Housman only by what he did, we must accord him a substantial measure of success. Put in so few words, this may sound like a patronizing, impudent, or presumptuous verdict; I have not space to amplify it here, to discuss the false quality of much of the praise, the grievous omissions in the description of his excellence. I might say, in passing, that I have never been able to share the impression that Housman's tone is pessimistic, despairing, despondent; its clarity lifts his work into brightness and gaiety, in the sense that Yeats spoke of Hamlet as gay.

We come to another question, however: whether Hous-

man left undone the things he ought to have done, whether he could accept his Nunc Dimittis with "the sense of having done the best—the sense which is the real life of the artist, and the absence of which is his death, of having drawn from his intellectual instrument the finest music that nature had hidden in it, of having played it as it should be played." (Curious to find these words of Henry James put in the mouth of a character supposed to bear some resemblance to Stevenson, whom Housman admired, perhaps, beyond necessity!) If we examine Housman in the light of these awful rays of truth, we shall find, I think, that he mortified not only the sinner but also the poet; that he averted disintegration by substituting induration; that, like Niobe, he turned, for his vanity, into the statue of stone he once admired. "One must beware," writes W. H. Auden, apropos of other matters, "lest humility turn into arrogance, as Housman's did." I take it this refers to something more than the superficial arrogance of being standoffish or of whacking the pates of one's fellow-inmates of the asylum at Cambridge.

Nor must Housman's attitude be considered a Stoic one, though many have seen in him an almost perfect exemplar of Stoic principles. He himself knew better; he favored the Epicureans, not because he was a man addicted to pleasures of the palate but because he was a man to whom pleasure was the highest good, pleasure, that is, in the sense of freedom from pain. (But above the Epicureans he favored the Cyrenaics, whose leader, Aristippus, held that true pleasure belongs only to him who is self-controlled and master of himself.) Housman realized how burdensome a gift was inspiration; contrast, in the preface to "Last Poems," "I can no longer expect to be revisited by the continuous excitement under which in the early months of 1895 I wrote the greater part of my other book, nor indeed could I well sustain it if it came," with Rilke's sentence, "The moment of inspiration must not be waited for but must be summoned and seized." Housman, in disavowing Stoicism, knew that Stoic principles require much more than a vulgar acceptance of pain; he knew that Stoicism insists on growth, on living in accordance with nature, knowing oneself, having an obligation to develop one's powers to their uttermost limit. This growth he denied himself; his life was painful, but he froze to the pain, and with it froze his art. If, toward the end, he heeded the voice of his daemon more clearly in life, he was by that time all but insensitive to its other demands:

Must I tell again
In the words I know
For the ears of men
The flesh, the blow?

Must I show outright
The bruise in the side,
The halt in the night,
And how death cried?

Must I speak to the lot
Who little bore?
It said, Why not?
It said Once more.

This, I think, is what Housman resolutely refused to face—not only the repetition of creative agony, but the extension of creative vision; and died impenitent.

Implements of War

THE TOOLS OF WAR. By James R. Newman. Doubleday, Doran and Company. $5.

THE present war has produced a large number of writers on military and naval matters who had no particular knowledge of their subject as recently as a year ago. These amateur militarists have contributed a good deal of misinformation, though the best of them have also had an open-mindedness and absence of bias, a faculty for apt and readable writing, and a freshness of viewpoint not often found in the professional military man.

James Newman demonstrates both the good and the bad qualities of the civilian turned military writer. Before he put together the materials for this book he apparently had no connection with military affairs. This lack of background is revealed in numerous misstatements of fact. Most plane carriers, he says, have a capacity of from 75 to 100 planes—actually only American carriers carry so large a complement. The surface tonnage of the largest submarine in the world, Surcouf, is given as 4,300. As a matter of fact, this is the submerged tonnage; the surface weight is less than 3,000 tons. Such errors are of minor importance, but they are comparatively numerous. And occasionally the writer gives glib but historically incorrect explanations of more important matters.

Despite these shortcomings "The Tools of War" is a fine piece of work. The author has traced the evolution of the principal implements used in modern war on land, sea, and in the air. His search for information has led in many directions, and he has compiled an adequate though not exhaustive bibliography. Naturally, he has left out a good deal in the long story of the development of man's weapons, but he has included the most valuable and interesting facts. He has done his best job in showing the growth of air power, his poorest on the evolution of warships. His account of present-day operations is excellent.

Like many civilians he enjoys taking pot shots at military conservatism and the frequent stupidity of military leaders. Here he is on extremely firm ground. The early distrust of such tools as the machine-gun, tank, and airplane shown by professional militarists is notorious. A military improvement usually exists for a generation or even for a century before it is adopted. Still, progress in military matters does occur, and the side having the most imagination and intelligence in its military leadership is generally the victor. An exception might be the last world war, which was decided by exhaustion rather than brains. At that, had the war lasted six months longer, all the fundamentals of the modern blitzkrieg would have been employed. Because military thinking is so extremely slow, Mr. Newman is justly skeptical of scare stories of mysterious and powerful weapons developed exclusively by one side.

Few recent military books have been more readable than "The Tools of War." The style is sure to give the greatest enjoyment to the average reader. Technical terms are either avoided or carefully explained, and numerous illustrations, many of them borrowed from recent issues of Fortune, others prepared personally, are of great interest.

FILMS

NOW that we have become accustomed to the realism of the talkies, we are apt to find the old silent films absurdly artificial; in most cases it is hard for us to understand how we were ever able to regard them as an imitation of life, or even to effect the necessary suspension of disbelief. Nevertheless, at their best the silent films had an artistic excellence of their own which they owed partly to their limitations. For in order to overcome the handicap of silence their creators developed a technique of miming and of visual suggestion which was lost in the early talking films and has never been wholly recaptured. No one achieved this technique better than Charlie Chaplin, and he probably used it nowhere more effectively than in "The Gold Rush." There is a series of famous scenes in this film, including the fantastically plausible shoe-eating episode and the exquisite dance of the rolls, in which the art of miming is brought to perfection. The most brilliant dialogue could add nothing to their effectiveness. After seventeen years this film has now been reedited by Chaplin and fitted with a running commentary and musical score. The elimination of the captions makes it flow more smoothly, but it is essentially unchanged. It still belongs to the type and has the characteristic merits of the best silent films. The commentary, which is spoken by Chaplin himself, is appropriately unobtrusive. The only thing about it that is at all infelicitous is his habit of referring to himself as "the little fellow." The pathos of the character he has created is striking enough, particularly in this story, not to need to be thus artificially underlined. But this is a minor flaw in what is otherwise a very skilful adaptation of a seventeen-year-old film to contemporary requirements. If there is anybody who needs to be convinced of the genius of Charlie Chaplin, I can only advise him to go to see "The Gold Rush."

Another creator of very good silent films, Robert Flaherty, has recently completed his documentary of "The Land" for the Agricultural Adjustment Administration. Like many documentary films it suffers from a certain discursiveness. There are many beautiful shots of scenery and people and machines, but the selection of them seems slightly arbitrary. Nevertheless, the film has its social aim, which is to create awareness of the plight of farm labor in the face of soil wastage and erosion and the competition of the machine. The film indicates that the task of soil conservation is being successfully accomplished, but it has no solution to offer for the problem of the machine. Mr. Flaherty's commentary is adequate to its purpose.

You would have to be very fond of animals to get much enjoyment out of Alexander Korda's version of Kipling's "Jungle Book." There are a few impressive shots in technicolor of a lion and a panther; and Sabu, who impersonates Mowgli, has an effective moment as the wolf boy confronted for the first time with fire. But this is not enough to compensate for an excessively silly story of a hunt for buried treasure, a great deal of painful clowning by a group of Hollywood actors who make the least convincing Indians that I ever hope to see, and a general assimilation of Mowgli to Tarzan. For the rest, there are a large forest fire, a parade of elephants, a talking snake, and much scurrying of crowds. All in all, Mr. Korda has spared no expense in dressing up his candidate for the most vulgar film of the year.

The much-heralded "Moontide" presents Jean Gabin in a waterfront setting but is very far from being another "Quai des Brumes." It has four main characters: Gabin himself as a happy-go-lucky dock worker; Ida Lupino as a waif who domesticates him; Thomas Mitchell, giving the best performance in the film, as a vicious weakling who preys upon him; and Claude Rains as a philosophical night watchman thrown in for good measure. Except for the relationship between Gabin and Mitchell, which carries inverted echoes of "Mice and Men," there is nothing interesting about the story. Every move in it is easily predictable, all the way to the happy ending. There is one very impressive scene, where the villain meets his death, but the direction is for the most part derivative and rather pretentious. The main object of the film being apparently to turn M. Gabin into an American box-office attraction, he is made to display an excessive amount of sulky Gallic charm. I think it might have been better to have given him a reasonable opportunity to show how exceedingly well he can act.

Except for the make-up artists who succeed at one point in turning Barbara Stanwyck into quite a plausible centenarian, no one comes out well from "The Great Man's Lady." Miss Stanwyck elopes with pioneer Joel McCrea, becomes estranged from him through a misunderstanding over Brian Donlevy, loses their two children in a flood, and finally gives him up to a second wife in the interest of his career. They meet again only at his deathbed, by which time he has become a Senator and grown a long white beard. The film is supposed to imply something about American womanhood, but whatever the message is, it is not a sufficient excuse for all that everybody, including the audience, has to go through.

RECORDS

SCHNABEL'S March 1939 recital at the Y. M. H. A. led me to speak of the process that had "created so completely and impressively right a shape for Schubert's B flat Sonata," but that, carried further, had "distended the phrases of . . . the slow movement of Schubert's Op. 53 to the point of distortion and overstatement." I mention this because Victor has issued a recording of the Sonata Op. 53 which Schnabel made in Europe a few years ago—a recording, then, which offers not the marvelous performance of the work that was heard in the New Friends of Music series this season, but a performance like the one that was heard at the Y. M. H. A. in 1939. In the opening section of the slow movement Schnabel extends each dotted quarter by an additional quarter, so that the measures are changed from three-quarter to four-quarter; and in lesser degree this pretentious distension is heard not only in other parts of the movement but in the scherzo that follows. The first movement and finale, however, are excellently played; and so take the set (888, $5.78) for what it offers—a partial realization of the superb work; an interesting demonstration of the fact that great artists are not necessarily perfect ones, and sometimes their imperfections are the faults of their great virtues. Take it—and ask Victor to issue the recording of Schnabel's performance of the wonderful B flat Sonata, which was released in England a year or so ago.

Victor's featured orchestral set for April offers a new recording of Sibelius's Symphony No. 1 made by Ormandy and the Philadelphia Orchestra (Set 881, $4.73). Early Sibelius is not Tchaikovsky; it is early Sibelius—which is to say Sibelius without the later refinements of method, idiom, style, orchestration, the later skill in concealing the discontinuities in thought and structure. It is, I hasten to add, quite enjoyable Sibelius—enjoyable in the way that Respighi's "Fountains" and "Pines" are enjoyable. The performance is effective and excellently recorded.

Enjoyable in a different way is Vivaldi's lovely Concerto Grosso Op. 3 No. 11 for strings. It has been available on records in the form of Stokowski's performance of his arrangement for the entire modern orchestra; now it can be had in the more continent orchestral arrangement of Siloti, of which the fine-sounding performance of Koussevitzky with the Boston Symphony is excellently recorded (Set 886, $2.63). And some day a conductor may record a performance by the string orchestra for which it was written.

Moderately enjoyable also is Haydn's unfamiliar Symphony No. 96 (Set 885, $3.68)—a minor specimen of the Haydn symphonic form, with an engaging first movement and minuet. Bruno Walter's performance is fair; as recorded the violins are a little shrill, the bass booms a little, and the over-all sound is reverberant, but not confusedly so.

On a single disc (18535, $1.05) is another unfamiliar piece, the section "On the Shores of Sorrento" from Strauss's "Aus Italien"—early and second-rate Strauss, prettily melodious and lush, well played by the Chicago Symphony under Stock, and with the sound of this orchestra recorded in a way that Columbia did not equal in even its best recording, the one of Enesco's Rumanian Rhapsody—to say nothing of its bad recordings, like the one of Schubert's C major Symphony. And on another single disc (18511, $1.05) Victor offers—and you are privileged to reject—William Schuman's Festival Overture, a characteristic piece of tripe, well played by the National Symphony under Kindler, and well recorded.

The beautiful Agnus Dei from Mozart's Mass in C minor is well sung and performed by Les Disciples de Massenet, Marcelle Denya, and the Montreal Festivals Orchestra under the direction of Pelletier, and is excellently recorded (18512, $1.05). On another single disc (18496, $1.05) Bidu Sayao does well with "Deh vieni non tardar" from Mozart's "Marriage of Figaro" and "Caro Nome" from Verdi's "Rigoletto." And another (15602, $1.05) offers "Un di felice" and "Parigi o cara" from Verdi's "Traviata," with Gigli as the bawling, sobbing Italian tenor and Caniglia as the tremolo-ridden Italian soprano.

Letters to the Editors

Mr. Rosenberg's Rebuttal

Dear Sirs: Mr. Hays thinks it "rare that those who express themselves are dangerous." So in 1931 thought German friends of mine—believers in democracy—when I asked them about Hitler's propaganda. Two of those friends lately died in a concentration camp. They did not comprehend that words are weapons. Neither, I fear, does the Civil Liberties Union, which thinks that the Biddle prosecutions will only "make issues of matters relatively dormant." Dormant? Is that the word for the tent-caterpillar shirters, fascists, and columns in our midst? Are the Pelleys, McWilliamses, Smiths, Winrods, Moselys, Coughlins, dormant?

To the accepted formula of Justice Holmes that speech may be punished when it creates a "clear and present danger" Mr. Hays would tack on Supreme Court Justice Black's addendum in last December's five-to-four Bridges decision. The danger, Justice Black tells us, must also be "extremely serious," the degree of "imminence extremely high." With this we need not quarrel but need merely remark that this opinion was handed down prior to Bataan, Corregidor, the Atlantic sinkings. Today the danger is not "imminent." It is here.

The Bridges case is not the Supreme Court's last word. That tribunal has again spoken. Only last March the Chaplinsky v. New Hampshire unanimous opinion (by a bench not noted for unanimity) reminded us that "it is well understood that the right of free speech is not an absolute"; that words which "by their very utterance . . . tend to incite" do not wear a constitutional shield; that "resort to epithets or personal abuse is not . . . opinion." Does the Civil Liberties Union stick to common sense when it regards the shouts of G. W. Christians that the President has a "good neck for a rope," of Noble and Jones that General MacArthur "deserted" his troops, as mere "opinion"? Are not they perfect types of the personal abuse and incitement through reiteration of which Hitler came to power, and by which Quislings betray their countrymen?

I turn again to Lincoln. Bitter as was the Civil War, none will gainsay our present infinitely greater peril. Assailed as violating his oath of office, as destroyer of the Constitution because of his suspension of the Writ of Habeas Corpus, Lincoln boldly chose Independence Day, July 4, 1861, for his immortal message to Congress. He knew the dangers. Boldly he justified his drastic act—the summary arrests "without resort to the ordinary processes and forms of law" when men were "dangerous to the public safety." What would the Civil Liberties Union have said in 1861? Biddle by contrast to Lincoln is a Mr. Milquetoast. Does Biddle put out dragnets for wholesale arrests by every United States attorney from Maine to California? Does he suspend the normal steps of the law? No. He takes the "ordinary course" of presentments to grand juries in those cases where his oath of office requires him to act.

"Must a government . . . be too strong for the liberties of its own people or too weak to maintain its own existence?" cried out Lincoln's anguished heart on that Fourth of July, 1861. The tyrant of that dark year, the martyr of 1865, the beloved man who had wiped out the blot of slavery, who had saved the Union and preserved our liberties, lay dead. The war had ended. Lincoln's strong measures were no longer needed. Almost at once with the return of peace the Supreme Court—a majority of whose bench had been appointed by Lincoln himself—nullified the conviction of Milligan by a Lincoln Military Commission, and restored the Writ of Habeas Corpus.

Let the Civil Liberties Union take heart. The Bill of Rights is a tree well rooted. Guarding it from tent caterpillars will not cause it to wither.

A Challenge to Franco

Dear Sirs: In one of your recent issues you expressed some doubts about the wisdom of the President in naming Professor Carlton J. H. Hayes as ambassador to Spain. Those of us who have known Professor Hayes and followed his thinking over the years had no such doubts. In any event your doubts should have been completely resolved by Professor Hayes's forthright declaration of principles on April 25 at the Hotel Plaza in New York City.

Even The Nation must be moved to applaud a prospective diplomat who anticipates that he may "be back here in the not far distant future" because his tenure will be dependent, "not on the Spanish government nor to a certain extent on this government but on Hitler." Combined with his ringing challenge to any and all totalitarian governments and his avowed declaration of intention "to expound my faith in the ultimate overwhelming victory of the United Nations," this address casts a scarcely concealed gauntlet at Franco's feet.

More power to the professors of history who assume diplomatic missions. They see clearly, vide the late Ambassador Dodd.

The Laval Disaster

Dear Sirs: The policy of appeasing Vichy, of working with well-known traitors, has led to the third great disaster of our present time. The German aggression was the first; the Japanese the second; and now the Laval disaster.

A country cannot control the seas merely with a large navy and a large air force. It can only control the seas by having bases. Our bases in the Pacific are lost. With the acquisition of the French fleet Hitler will obtain possession of Casablanca, Dakar, Toulon, Bizerte, and Madagascar, and he will control the Atlantic, the Mediterranean, and the Indian Ocean. To imagine that Darlan is not going to play Hitler's game 100 per cent is the height of folly.

Tomorrow our country will be an island surrounded by seas practically in the hands of the enemy. There may be some hope if we stop talking, get rid of our appeasers, and act. These things should be done at once: (1) Take Martinique, which today means a naval battle and the loss of precious ships. Martinique could have been taken without the loss of a man a year ago. (2) Take, or try to take, Madagascar, which would at least delay the action of the Germans and the French there. (3) Try to take Dakar. It will be impossible for De Gaulle to defend the African territories if Dakar remains in the hands of the Germans.

Naturally, there is hope in the Russian situation. But Hitler has covered his back well with the Laval action, and we were caught napping again. Every help must be given to Russia, and a second front must be opened if possible. The chances of landing in France now are very slight. Norway may be better, but here I am guessing.

Evacuating American Citizens

Dear Sirs: I was in San Francisco about the second of April and saw large notices that all Japanese aliens and citizens would have to leave on the following Monday. My mind went back to similar notices that I saw posted in Germany some years ago, proclaiming restrictions against the Jews.

Monday came, and my wife and I were asked to help some of the Japanese from their homes to the assembling place on Van Ness Avenue. Our particular concern was a family of nine, grandparents, parents, and children, the youngest a baby a few weeks old. These people had had a little cleaning business, which was being taken over by some friends. The government had provided storage for their car and the personal effects that they could not take with them. When we arrived at the evacuation center we took their bundles out of our car, and the soldiers helped us pile them in a great heap on the sidewalk. The place, a former automobile sales room, was filled with men, women, and children, those who were leaving and their friends who had come to see them off. It was an extremely orderly crowd, the soldiers were very kind, and the social workers saw that all went smoothly. Everyone had a tag with his name and number, and the baggage had tags with corresponding numbers.

My wife busied herself with the children of our little family, and I walked round with a strange feeling that this could not be the America that I had fought for in 1918. And then I saw among the crowd an American Legion cap. Its wearer was pretty discouraged and a little bitter as he told me he had thought his service would entitle him to remain in his home, or at least to have an investigation of his loyalty. One other Legion member the night before had rented a room in a hotel and blown his brains out rather than be evacuated.

This group was sent to a camp that had been hurriedly set up on the grounds of the Santa Anita race track near Los Angeles; they will be evacuated from there as soon as more permanent camps or positions can be found for them. Temporary crowded barracks are not the pleasantest place to live, though the exigencies of war might make this necessary for any of us; and it is a pretty grim job to evacuate our own citizens—students, teachers, nurses, doctors, Y. M. C. A. secretaries, Salvation Army workers, lawyers, ministers, and mostly just the simple people who want only a chance to make a modest honest living and, if need be, to serve under our common flag.

Disloyalty doubtless exists among the Japanese Americans as well as among other citizens, but let us not consider the color of a man's skin a test of his loyalty.

Wellesley Summer Institute

Dear Sirs: In spite of everything the Summer Institute for Social Progress at Wellesley has decided to go ahead and hold a one week's session, July 4 to 10, on "What We Can Do to Win the War and Prepare for Peace."

In open-forum sessions and small round tables war and post-war political and economic problems will be discussed under the leadership of such experts as Mordecai Ezekiel, economic adviser to the Secretary of Agriculture, Margaret Bondfield of the British Labor Party, and Henry Simon Bloch, of the staff of the Institute of Military Studies of the University of Chicago.

All interested in the preservation of long-term democratic values are invited to apply for membership regardless of age or previous schooling. For a final program write to me at 22 Oakland Place, Buffalo, New York.

The Shape of Things

WINSTON CHURCHILL'S MASTERLY SPEECH was not only a tonic for the peoples of the United Nations but a major stroke in the war of nerves which Britain has been waging against Hitler with increasing success in the past few months. Answering, in effect, Hitler's recent Reichstag address, the British Prime Minister reminded the Germans that their rulers had deliberately used terror methods in smashing Warsaw, Rotterdam, and Belgrade from the air, and had done their worst to "rub out" Britain. Now that the boot was on the other foot and the R. A. F. in a position to give the Germans an object lesson in aerial warfare, it was a little late, Mr. Churchill said, for Hitler to start whining. He promised that British fliers, soon to be reinforced by American men and machines, would attack systematically the many German cities where vital war industries were established, and he warned civilians in these places that the only way to escape was to abandon the factories and flee into the fields. Mr. Churchill also dealt trenchantly with Hitler's tentative offer to make peace with the West for the sake of a joint crusade against Asia. Again and again he referred with admiration and gratitude to the valiant stand of the Russians, and he emphasized the solidarity between Britain and the U. S. S. R. by warning Hitler that should he in desperation resort to the use of gas on the eastern front, the growing superiority of the R. A. F. would be used to carry gas warfare "on the largest possible scale, far and wide, against military objectives in Germany." It is to be hoped that this threat of retaliation, which it is understood was provoked by accumulating evidence of German preparations for launching gas attacks in Russia, will restrain even the Nazis from attempting this ultimate horror in warfare.

THE TONE OF MR. CHURCHILL'S SPEECH WAS buoyant, and there was a welcome absence of the irritable reaction to criticism which has marred some of his recent utterances. While carefully refraining from indorsing demands for a second front, he applauded the aggressive spirit reflected by the popular agitation for bolder action. Two members of his Cabinet, Sir Archibald Sinclair and Anthony Eden, went somewhat farther last week by hinting that the present British air offensive is merely a prelude to an invasion. The former promised that the tempo of R. A. F. onslaughts on Germany would be constantly increased throughout the summer with a view to breaking down German production and morale and hammering the Luftwaffe out of shape. Whether this strategy, together with commando raids on an ever larger scale and the constant threat of a full-fledged expedition against the Continent, will suffice to curtail the effectiveness of the German armies in the east remains to be seen. But at least the much-advertised spring offensive seems to be having difficulty in getting off the mark. A four-day German drive against the key position of Kerch in the eastern Crimea, which seemed to herald the opening of a new campaign, has been beaten back with heavy losses. The chief German offensive operations at present are directed toward securing the rear by wiping out opposition in the occupied lands. But no threats of "implacable violence" backed by mass executions serve to daunt the "V" front. From the North Cape to Mt. Olympus, from St. Nazaire to the Carpathians, the partisans of freedom are waging ruthless war against the Nazis. The tales of sabotage, train wrecking, assassinations, and bombings pour in, and for every victim of the firing squads a dozen volunteers spring forward. Hitler is being given no breathing spell to digest his conquests.

THE BATTLE OF THE CORAL SEA APPEARS TO have ended in a decisive victory for the United Nations. The communiqués issued by both sides make it difficult to know exactly what the outcome was, and as long as the enemy does not know, we can restrain our curiosity; but as there have been no reports of further large-scale landings by Japanese forces, it seems reasonable to suppose that the Japanese foray was indeed set back. This is most encouraging news. For in previous naval encounters the Japanese pressed on to their objectives regardless of losses. From a psychological point of view, the triumph could not have come at a better moment. The fall of Corregidor, coming immediately after the Japanese triumph in Burma, marked the low point for the United Nations' cause in the Pacific war. Symbolically, Corregidor meant even more than Bataan. It had come to be referred to, mistakenly perhaps, as the Gibraltar of the East. As long as it stood, it robbed Japan of the "face" that otherwise was to be derived from the conquest of the Philippines. But for most Americans its symbolic value has in no way been dimmed by its fall after five months of heroic defense. Pearl Harbor and Wake Island may stand for incompetence and unpreparedness, but Bataan and Corregidor will go down in history [illegible] symbols of the courage and determination of American and Filipino troops in the face of overwhelming odds.

BY UNDERTAKING DIRECT NEGOTIATIONS with Admiral Robert, French High Commissioner at Martinique, regarding the effective neutralization of French Caribbean possessions the State Department has neatly sidetracked Pierre Laval. The Vichy Gauleiter is reported to be very much upset by this treatment, and he has instructed his ambassador in Washington to express displeasure. If, as seems probable, Mr. Hull rejects this protest, there is not much Laval can do except break off relations with the United States—a step which he is clearly afraid to take. No official information is yet available regarding the kind of guaranties for which the State Department is asking, but according to Washington reports they may include the leasing to the United States of strategic points in Martinique, which presumably will be occupied by American garrisons, the immobilization of French naval units in the Caribbean, and the requisition of French planes and tankers now at Fort de France. As the New York Herald Tribune has pointed out, the concessions made by the Vichy government to Japan in Indo-China provide ample precedents for such steps as these. Remembering that there is a good deal of evidence of Admiral Robert's fascist sympathies, we hope that the State Department will not be too easily satisfied. With Axis submarines roaming the Caribbean we cannot afford to take chances in Martinique and Guadeloupe. There is every indication that the State Department is no longer in the mood to accept mere promises, but it is rather disquieting that its representative in the negotiations should be Samuel Reber, putative father of the phrase "the so-called Free French."

THE ECLIPSE OF SOCIAL JUSTICE IS A TRIUMPH for the orderly processes employed by the Attorney General in proceeding against this fascist mouthpiece. Father Coughlin cannot possibly cry persecution, since every safeguard of the democratic process was put at his disposal. That he decided to go out of business rather than face the government's charges is an interesting indication that he had nothing to say that could not be used against him. We are glad the hearings on the case are continuing, even though the chief defendant has scuttled and run. But why has Coughlin himself not been subpoenaed along with his editor and office boy and personal secretary? We hope his abject surrender has not provided him with any ex post facto immunity. He is still the person responsible for whatever seditious words appeared in Social Justice.

REDUCTION IN INCOME-TAX EXEMPTIONS AS proposed by Secretary Morgenthau must be regarded as an integral part of the Administration's anti-inflation program. As we have repeatedly pointed out, inflation can be avoided only if the excess purchasing power generated by the war can be mopped up by increased taxation. The Treasury's original program was not drastic enough for this purpose, and—from the standpoint of practical politics—it is clear that if we are to have additional taxation we must choose between broadening the tax base and levying a general sales tax. Many persons still regard a cut in exemptions as "taxing the little fellow," and it is true that a $300 cut in the exemption for a married couple and a $100 cut in that for each child will place an increased burden on millions of families with moderate incomes. But unlike the sales tax it will not strike at the lowest-income groups, the lowest third in our population, and it will be applied progressively, in accordance with ability to pay. This may be seen in the fact that only $100,000,000 of the $1,100,000,000 which is expected to be obtained through lowering the exemptions will come from new taxpayers, while $1,000,000,000 will come from present taxpayers. Congress will be reluctant to adopt Mr. Morgenthau's suggestion in an election year, but the alternative—a sales tax or inflation—is so obviously worse that we cannot see how any Congressman can face his constituency if he votes against the Treasury's proposals, which have received impressive support from Leon Henderson.

A SHOWDOWN ON THE AUTHORITY OF THE War Labor Board was avoided by a close margin last week when President Charles E. Wilson of the General Motors Corporation receded from his original position and accepted the board's ruling on the continuation of previous contract arrangements. A break was imminent when General Motors announced that it was discontinuing double pay for Sunday pending the negotiation of the new contract. While the union had already agreed to waive the double-pay clause in the new agreement, this concession was contingent on a pay increase which would compensate the workers, at least in part, for their loss. The WPB had in effect supported the workers in ruling that the contract should be considered by the board as a whole and that double pay should be continued until the board had a chance to hear the case. In defying the board's order, the General Motors Corporation issued a public statement declaring that the ruling "was based on an ex parte consideration." When members of the WLB pointed out to Mr. Wilson that he was in effect challenging the whole principle of settling war labor issues by mediation, he finally capitulated and admitted that he did not know what an "ex parte hearing" was, but he was satisfied that "nobody was taking an unfair advantage" of anyone else. His capitulation brought to a rather ignominious close a nation-wide press and radio campaign against the WLB which had been started in anticipation of a showdown. But though this campaign, like the earlier drive against the forty-hour week, has been frustrated, the undercover war against organized labor continues unabated.

THE EDUCATION OF UNITED STATES STEEL, spoiled child of American capitalism, proceeds. Its subsidiary, the Federal Shipbuilding and Dry Dock Company, has accepted the War Labor Board's order to grant the "maintenance-of-membership" clause in the contract it is about to sign with its employees. It has done so, according to its president, L. H. Korndorff, only because of the war emergency. Whatever the motive, Federal's acceptance not only of the much-debated clause but of the authority of the War Labor Board is good news. It increases the prestige of the board, and it is bound to have its effect on other corporations, among them Inland Steel, which expects to be faced with a similar order. The action of Federal must have been particularly disappointing to Clarence B. Randall, vice-president of Inland, who was suggesting, just the other day, a new wrinkle in anti-union technique. His company, he said, might poll its 8,500 stockholders before deciding whether or not to accept maintenance of membership. (We couldn't help wondering whether stockholders had ever been consulted when the salaries of vice-presidents were raised; but that, of course, is an astronomical question about which stockholders could not possibly have an opinion.) Mr. Randall went on to say, among other things, that he was "awfully fed up" with labor's claim to credit for surrendering the right to strike. "They ought to be jailed if they do strike." The prospect of being taken into federal custody for the second time certainly seems to have chastened Mr. Korndorff.

THE ELECTION OF DR. ALFONSO LOPEZ TO the Presidency of Colombia is good news, contrasting pleasantly with the disquieting reports that continue to emanate from Argentina and Peru. Some people in Washington have found Dr. Lopez a difficult associate to work with, and the proverbial harshness of his criticisms of pan-American policy has even given him a reputation of hostility to the United States. The truth is that he has exercised a justifiable reserve toward those official elements who would like to establish inter-American solidarity on a one-way basis, asking full cooperation from the Latin American countries while avoiding consideration of their economic and political difficulties. As President of Colombia from 1934 to 1938, Dr. Lopez made a good record of progressive statesmanship; it is encouraging that at this critical moment the Colombian people have elected him for a second time. One can rely on his anti-fascist position to produce a more healthy situation in Colombia than exists in Argentina and Peru, where the pro-Axis elements are moving full speed ahead despite official-dinner declarations. At this moment the Argentine government has taken special pains to announce the "warm reception" that is awaiting the Phalangist delegation now on its way to Buenos Aires to negotiate a new trade agreement between the fascist mother Spain and her favorite fascist daughter on the River Plate.

A FREE PRESS IS NEVER MORE NECESSARY than in time of war, and newspapermen on this side of the Atlantic rise to cheer the fight of their British colleagues against gags on the press in the United Kingdom. It is to Britain's credit that these are so few, as it is to the honor of its journalists that they are fighting so courageously against first infringements on their liberty. All sections of the press were represented at a recent Fleet Street meeting which protested against continued suppression of the Daily Worker, the threat to halt publication of the critical Daily Mirror, and petty restrictions of censorship. The ban on the Worker at a time when Russia is Britain's ally was properly described as an anomaly, and a resolution was passed calling for cancelation of Section 2-d of the British Defense Regulations, which empowers the government to silence critical editors. The need to step hard on the genuinely subversive and to act against those publications linked with the enemy is recognized in war time. It depends on an aroused and vigilant public in Britain, as here, to see that this is not made an excuse for gagging publications which are critical of the government.

China Must Be Helped

THE rather surprising success scored by the Chinese forces under General Stilwell in repelling the Japanese unit which had invaded China by way of the Burma road has, for the moment at least, relieved the situation in that area. But in view of the length of the lines of communication, it is doubtful whether Japan ever intended a major invasion of China through its back door. Regardless of the setback at Chefang, the Japanese have achieved the main purpose of their campaign—the closing of China's one practical supply route from the outside world. Barring a major victory which will reopen the route through Lashio and Mandalay, China's plight is desperate. Deprived of all supplies, it might continue its resistance for six months or a year but it could not hope to hold out indefinitely. For while remarkable progress has been made in developing an arms industry in the interior of China, the country is entirely dependent on its allies for artillery, planes, trucks, machinery, and many kinds of medical supplies. Its stocks of these are limited and inadequate and must be replenished.

From statements issued in Washington the American public has obtained the impression that we shall merely have to use other, perhaps less satisfactory, routes in supplying China, and that in any event Chinese genius will surmount the problem. This is a false and dangerous supposition. The Chinese have shown great courage and endurance in opening up their supply routes to the outside world, but there literally is no route to replace the Burma road. Several roads are under construction, but they are long, roundabout, and still far from completion. At best, they will carry only a small fraction of the goods that were beginning to move on the Burma road. And China cannot wait until 1943 or 1944; it must have supplies in 1942.

There is, of course, one remaining overland supply route to a United Nations base. That is the long desert road from Lanchow across Sinkiang to Soviet Turkestan. Although far from being a modern artery of transportation, this is a perfectly feasible route. Before Hitler's attack on Russia, a very considerable amount of Soviet war materials was regularly brought in along this road. Some aid is apparently still reaching China from Russia, but Russia's own needs and transport problems along the Turk-Sib Railway have reduced it to a trickle. Although the distances are tremendous, American supplies could be shipped via Archangel or the Persian Gulf into China along this route. But before such a supply line could be set up, vast technical problems would have to be overcome. Large quantities of transport equipment would have to be shipped to Russia, and technicians sent out to organize traffic on the new route as it was organized on the Burma road.

More feasible for the immediate future is the development of a system of air transportation. By the use of large, modern transport planes almost everything that China needs could be taken in. Heavy equipment could be transported in parts and assembled in China. Already some planes are operating by way of India. A more feasible route would be from Alaska to Siberia and thence over the desert to northwestern China. The organization of such an aerial ferry service would be a tremendous undertaking. As Admiral Yarnell, formerly commander-in-chief of the Pacific fleet, has pointed out, it would require thousands of our largest planes. In view of the tremendous demand for planes on other fronts, there is grave danger that we shall fail to provide the necessary equipment. Our past record in supplying China is far from reassuring. But in this instance we dare not fail. Keeping China in the war is important not only to the Chinese, who have fought so stubbornly for five years, but to our own war strategy. As long as Russia remains neutral in the Pacific war, China provides the only nearby base from which Japan can be attacked directly. Failure to take advantage of China's tremendous resources and favorable geographic position might prolong the war for years. No cost and no temporary sacrifice at home, such as might arise from the diversion of planes from our domestic transport, should be allowed to stand in the way of all-out aid to the country which has shown us how to fight Japan.

Rubber from the Farm

THANKS to the Gillette committee and its able young counsel, Paul E. Hadlick, the nation has been afforded a glimpse of hitherto unrealized possibilities in the making of synthetic rubber. The Gillette committee is a subcommittee of the Senate Committee on Agriculture and Forestry, and its assignment is to find uses for farm surpluses in the war-production program. Other investigating committees, notably Senator Truman's, have given us a broader knowledge of the way in which the synthetic-rubber program has lagged behind the needs of the emergency. Gillette's is the first to show us new ways of making the synthetic product. The most important of these is its manufacture from ethyl alcohol, made in turn from surplus corn or wheat.

Secretary of Agriculture Wickard, in his testimony before the Gillette committee, reported that on July 1 our carry-over of wheat alone would be 630,000,000 bushels. This year's crop is expected to bring the total supply to a billion and a half bushels. This is enough for two years' normal supply. "About 80,000,000 bushels of wheat or corn," Secretary Wickard said, "would be required to produce 200,000,000 gallons of alcohol, which in turn could produce 220,000 tons of butadiene. This would make approximately 240,000 tons of synthetic rubber," which would be roughly a third of our military needs during the coming year.

The making of synthetic rubber from grain alcohol would have a second advantage. The lack of shipping to bring molasses from Cuba has left most of the great commercial-alcohol plants of the East idle. These plants normally make alcohol from molasses, as the whiskey distillers normally make it from grain. The commercial-alcohol plants could easily be converted to the use of grain. "Relatively small amounts of copper and steel" would be required. Over and above all war requirements for alcohol, now being met largely from the whiskey distilleries, facilities now idle could handle 200,000,000 gallons of alcohol. Testimony by Simon Neuman, president of Publicker Commercial Alcohol, the one big independent in the business, is authority for the statement that synthetic rubber could be produced in nine months by this method, as compared with the eighteen months or more which will be required to build and begin to operate the new plants called for in the RFC's 800,000-ton program. Rubber made from grain alcohol would require much less in the way of critical materials.

So far the 800,000-ton program worked out by Jesse Jones and the dollar-a-year men in charge for the WPB provides for only one plant to make rubber from alcohol. The company which will operate the plant, Union Carbide and Carbon, makes ethyl alcohol synthetically from petroleum and natural gas, but may make some alcohol from grain as a sop to farm sentiment. The other companies, all linked to Standard Oil, the du Ponts, the Big Four rubber companies, the Mellon interests, and their allies, will make rubber from petroleum. While butadiene can be made directly from ethyl alcohol with little special equipment, the rubber program as now developing will require new petroleum-cracking facilities and new plants to turn butane, a petroleum by-product, into butadiene. This will bring the program into competition with aviation gas and synthetic toluol production, both of which are also dependent on the same sources in petroleum.

Just as Standard Oil and I. G. Farben long divided the world of synthetic oil and chemicals between themselves to restrict competition, so Standard and du Pont and the Mellon interests are determined today to keep the synthetic-rubber program in their own hands. Standard controls United States Industrial Alcohol, one of whose former executives, Fraser Moffet, is "dollar-a-year man" in charge of alcohol at the War Production Board. The commercial-alcohol combine fears the competition of synthetic rubber from grain alcohol. Germany, Poland, and the Soviet Union have all successfully made synthetic rubber from grain or potato alcohol. The Soviets' large synthetic-rubber industry is based on a process of this sort. But unless pressure is applied by the farm bloc and by an informed public opinion we shall go on planning to make our synthetic rubber by the slowest and costliest route—but the one preferred by the allied oil-rubber-alcohol-and-chemical companies. In their thinking monopoly still comes first.

The People's Revolution

BY FREDA KIRCHWEY

TWO meetings held in New York over the past week-end crystallized, through discussion and plans for action, a good many of the ideas that have been demanding concrete expression in the minds of progressive Americans. One was the second conference of the International Free World Association; the other was the Eastern Regional Conference of the Union for Democratic Action. In these gatherings were to be found a selection of the men and women whose opinions must dominate the waging of the war and the making of the peace if both are to be successful.

The delegates to the Free World meeting included many leaders of the democratic forces of the old and new worlds—Free Frenchmen, free Spaniards, free Hungarians and Austrians and Germans, free Czechs, representatives of China and India, Scandinavians, North and South Americans. Exiles from fighting enemy nations consulted with one another and with representatives of conquered nations and neutrals. They discussed the war and the peace to follow; and in the discussions one heard no discordant theories, no conflicting nationalistic claims. "Free World" is a name that lifts men above the maneuvers of foreign offices and the ambitions of politicians to a level on which the common human demand for mutual protection and individual freedom sounds normal, not fantastic or sentimental. But the delegates knew what they were facing in the struggle to achieve that sort of world; many of them had felt the impact of terror and tyranny on their own bodies, in their own emotions. All of them had experienced the cautious cynicism which so frequently informs the official acts of governments—even those committed to the fight for freedom. All of them knew the immense power of the elements of disruption working, consciously and unconsciously, in the interests of the dictators.

The Union for Democratic Action brought together the same sorts of people, men and women who combine a passionate determination that the war must be won with a belief that it can be won only if it is geared to democratic techniques and aims. The U. D. A. is primarily interested in the American aspects of the struggle, and its members are mostly Americans. With an eye to immediate practical needs, it has organized for action on a nation-wide scale in the coming Congressional elections. The Washington office, headed by Tom Amlie, former Progressive Congressman from Wisconsin, has compiled a handbook on the elections—both issues and men—which is this week published as a supplement to the New Republic. The New York office, with Dr. Frank Kingdon in charge, will serve as a campaign headquarters from which information and other sorts of ammunition will be issued to all groups and individuals fighting to put out or keep out of Congress men who oppose the war or try to pervert it into a campaign against democratic victory.

I thought, as I listened to the plans laid at both meetings, how close is the unity that exists among the varied elements fighting this many-sided battle for a free world. Their backgrounds may be as different as Chungking and Des Moines, but their common understanding of the meaning of the fascist drive for world dominion insures general agreement on what must be done to defeat it. They may differ on details, but you don't find them disagreeing on fundamentals—the failure, past and present, of policies of appeasement; the necessity of a powerful responsible labor movement closely integrated into the war effort; the desperate need for continuous, politically informed propaganda emerging from clear-cut war aims to which the common people of all countries can rally. You find them united in demanding "total" methods of warfare—methods which utilize every resource of power, human and mechanical, without regard for peace-time concepts of property rights or privilege. You find them recognizing the wary attitude of the majority of bureaucrats of every rank and country toward militant democrats and a democratic program. Patiently, almost cynically, the anti-fascist elements accept this attitude as inevitable, discussing only the means that can be employed to counter it, to multiply the number of democrats in office, and to strengthen the hands of those already in positions of power.

At the dinner held by the Free World Association on Friday evening a thousand guests heard the Vice-President of the United States deliver a speech which deserved full reproduction in the newspapers next day. Only PM, among the New York papers, printed it. It was covered very briefly by the Times and the Herald Tribune in stories emphasizing Mr. Wallace's suggestion that Japan might strike at Alaska and our northwest coast "at a time when German transport planes will be shuttled across from Dakar to furnish leadership and stiffening to a German uprising in Latin America," and his warning that "we must be prepared for the worst kind of fifth-column work in Latin America, much of it operating through the agency of governments [a clear reference to Vichy and particularly Madrid] with which the United States is at present at peace." This was a striking passage, but it was incidental to the point of Mr. Wallace's speech. The Vice-President, in the boldest analysis of the meaning of the war to come from any high official of this country, declared that "the people's revolution is on the march." He made it plain what forces seek to stop that revolution—the fascists and reactionaries, here and abroad, who fear the drive of the common people toward wider education, better control of the tools of production, greater power through their own organizations. The "people's revolution" offers the only real opposition to Hitler's fascist revolution, which from the day of the burning of the books, just nine years ago this week, revealed its inner purpose—to establish universal tyranny on the ashes of free thought and free inquiry.

The people's revolution is on the march, and it is the function of such organizations as the Free World Association and the Union for Democratic Action to provide it with leadership and a coherent program—in war and in peace, in America and for the world. These organizations must grow, because they fill a pressing need. The Union for Democratic Action is launching locals in many cities; the Free World Association, already well established as an international body with sections in China and England and Latin America, has announced the formation of an American section which will seek members throughout the United States. I warmly commend both organizations to every reader of The Nation. Join them; help spread their ideas and carry forward their programs. They are the natural instruments through which democratic opinion in this country can make itself heard and felt.

Rockefeller's Girl Friday

BY I. F. STONE

Washington, May 11

MRS. ANNA M. ROSENBERG'S dual employment by the New Deal and the Rockefeller family has long been a subject of gossip and criticism in the capital. The House Appropriations Committee and Louis Stark of the New York Times performed a public service when they brought out the facts. Mrs. Rosenberg's entrée to the White House and her well-publicized position as a Presidential adviser are assets she can hardly keep from capitalizing in her private business as public-relations and labor-relations counselor. Her work for the Macy-Bamberger stores and for I. Miller, the shoe dealer, seems politically innocuous, but it is disturbing to have her shuttle between Pocantico Hills and the White House. Standard Oil has entirely too much influence in the New Deal, and Mrs. Rosenberg ought to choose between F. D. R. and Mammon.

The law already prohibits a federal official from practicing as a lawyer before a federal agency. We hope the House Appropriations Committee will keep its promise to write a provision forbidding federal administrative officials to hold jobs outside the government. Mrs. Rosenberg's excuse for the $28,500 she draws from private employment while receiving $7,500 a year as New York regional director of the Social Security Board is a naive one. Mrs. Rosenberg says she took the government job on condition that she be allowed to continue her work as private consultant. A judge might similarly accept a position on the bench on condition that he be allowed to continue to serve several clients as private counsel.

Mrs. Rosenberg's private employment and public influence can hardly be separated. She admits that she has been receiving $6,000 a year from Nelson Rockefeller as his public-relations representative "since long before he became Coordinator of Inter-American Affairs." Mrs. Rosenberg played a major part in making Nelson Rockefeller Coordinator, and after Colonel William J. Donovan became Coordinator of Information, one of his first visitors was Mrs. Rosenberg. Mrs. Rosenberg wanted to be sure that Colonel Donovan did not muscle in on the territory of her boy Nelson. Nelson Rockefeller's high standing in Washington is the best kind of "public relations" for the Standard Oil crowd and the Chase National Bank.

These are not the only complications in Mrs. Rosenberg's dual position. She is a private labor-relations consultant. She is also a powerful New Deal politician. Can she separate the two in specific labor cases? She was powerful enough to help keep Sidney Hillman from becoming head of the new Man Power Commission and to get the job instead for her government boss, Paul McNutt. Mrs. Rosenberg is admittedly an able woman, but is she hired by business and by government only for her ability or for her influence as well? This is the question to which her ambiguous position exposes her.

If the House Appropriations Committee does a thorough job, it will also recognize the quasi-public character of a party's National Committee when that party is in power. Oscar Ewing is still counsel for the Aluminum Company of America and vice-chairman of the Democratic National Committee. Obviously the mere fact that he holds that powerful political position must have some influence on the officials with whom he must deal on behalf of Alcoa. The principle involved was recognized when Lawrence ("Chip") Robert had to choose between his private contracting business with government agencies and his position as Democratic national committeeman from Georgia. It is time that this principle was written into law.

Say Thank You to the Power Trust, Adolf. The purpose of the Tydings "economy" campaign has little to do with economy. The anti-New Dealers, unable to abolish the social-reform agencies, seek to destroy them by cutting their appropriations. The outstanding example of this technique is the McKellar amendment to the Independent Offices Appropriation bill passed last week by the Senate. This amendment abolishes the revolving fund the TVA has had since 1935 and forces TVA to turn in its revenue monthly to the Treasury and to go to Congress for any proposed expenditure, no matter how small. Administration Leader Barkley, in his very able speech against the amendment, put the issue nicely. A revolving fund is necessary, Senator Barkley said, "because if utilities set up by the public with their own money are to compete with private utilities, which they have got to do, they must be able to operate and function all the time without interruption." The enemies of TVA do not want it to be able to compete with the private utilities.

Had three Senators changed their vote, the amendment would have been defeated. Credit is due to Minority Leader McNary for declining to play politics with our power supply in time of war. McNary parted company with most of his Republican colleagues to vote against the amendment. It is a pity that Brewster of Maine, who showed so much understanding of the power and aluminum problems in the Truman committee hearings, joined the anti-TVA forces. O'Mahoney and Gillette, who have fought monopoly in other fields, did likewise. Those three votes could have saved the TVA.

The full significance of the McKellar amendment can only be appreciated against the background (1) of our power resources as compared with those of the Axis, (2) of our enlarged need for power, and (3) of the many occasions when the TVA has been forced to act quickly to provide power for war production. The revolving fund made quick action possible.

As Senator Lee pointed out, between 1935 and 1942 Hitler quadrupled the output of electric power in the countries he controls. The production of electricity in Axis Europe today is about 40 per cent above that of our own country. In aluminum and magnesium, the two light metals closely dependent on electric power, German production at the end of 1941 was greater than that of the United States, Britain, and Canada together.

Aluminum and magnesium are not the only war materials whose production requires large amounts of electricity. Shell cases are usually of brass, which is made of electrolytic copper and zinc. Electrolytic refined steels and ferro-alloys are necessary in the making of small arms, artillery, and tanks. Shipbuilding requires ferro-alloys for steel plates and structural shapes, high-grade electric steel for propulsion machinery. Magnesium is needed not only for planes but for incendiary bombs. Power is needed to make phosphorus. TVA must provide part of the power for the synthetic-rubber program.

Senator Norris showed that without a revolving fund for emergencies TVA would not have been able to come to the rescue of the Aluminum Company of America in the fall of 1939 and provide new facilities for the delivery during that fiscal year of an additional 288,000,000 kilowatt-hours of energy. The TVA spent $1,300,000 out of its revolving fund for that purpose. Alcoa paid $1,600,000 for the power. The power made possible the manufacture of 29,000,000 additional pounds of aluminum during the fiscal year 1939-40, the equivalent of 1,500 ten-ton bombers. "I presume those bombers, manned for the most part by American fliers," Senator Norris said, "have been destroying ships, airplanes, and other property of the enemy all over Russia, Europe, and Africa, and all through Asiatic waters. Such a thing would be absolutely impossible if these amendments should be agreed to by the Senate." So the Senate agreed to the amendments. Heil the Power Trust!

Freezing Out the Free French

BY HAL LEHRMAN

THE smoke of battle still hangs thick over Madagascar. Of British initiative, courage, and self-sacrifice there can be no doubt. Seizure of the island, frustrating Japan's designs on a base from which it could have crippled United Nations shipping in the Indian Ocean, deserves a prayer of thanksgiving throughout the democracies. But as the struggle continued, as more and more French and British fell in fratricidal combat before major resistance collapsed, the painful question arose: Need there have been any battle at all?

Being a reporter and not a military strategist, the writer can only set down here, without taking sides, what he has obtained from sources hitherto unimpeachable. It may now for the first time be disclosed, on high Free French authority, that the De Gaullist command in Equatorial Africa had perfected a plan for a bloodless internal uprising in Madagascar, timed to coincide with a three-pronged landing on the defenseless southern and western coasts. A corps of secret agents—former officers and colonists who escaped from the island after the fall of France—was preparing the insurrection. A portable Free French short-wave radio was broadcasting anti-Vichy propaganda under the Governor General's nose. Three battalions of crack African tirailleurs were concentrated on the mainland at Durban to back up the revolt with the prestige of an army and a flag.

The uprising and the Free French expedition were prevented from materializing by a lack of transport shipping, according to the De Gaullists. They outlined their needs to Premier Jan Smuts in Capetown and to the British. Smuts was eager for action. He feared that the Japanese, in addition to using Madagascar as a submarine base, would make it a jumping-off place for invasion of the continent. But all he could offer the Free French was a certain number of transport planes. These, with an average capacity of twenty men, were insufficient to fly 3,000 heavily equipped soldiers from their camp on the east coast of South Africa. Only the British, it is said, were in a position to furnish the necessary troop ships, and no favorable reply was received from London.

Confronted with the fact of the direct British assault on Madagascar, the Free French last week were publicly noncommittal and privately shrouded in gloom. While the fighting was going on, General de Gaulle himself had nothing to say. His delegates and aides in Washington and New York emulated his silence. Official disapproval of an ally's course was unthinkable, of course. But in quiet conversations tinged with despair two basic criticisms were advanced. First, the attack had been directed against Diego Suarez, the strongest fortified zone on the entire island. Greater resistance was thereby encouraged, with consequent increased losses for attackers and defenders. Second, Britain's open warfare against a French possession gave Axis propaganda another wedge to thrust between the people of conquered France and their former comrades in arms. The Laval-Pétain regime was able to strike a miserable pose as defender of the French empire against a foreign invader.

The De Gaullists contend, on the other hand, that their own plan would have reduced casualties to an absolute minimum and ruled out any possibility of a bogus Vichy appeal to patriotism. Their "plot" was an adaptation of the technique used in the seizure of Free French Africa, where in an area six times as large as the mother-country and with a population of six million, France was restored to the war and the democracies by a series of brilliant coups d'état. One after another, Chad, the Cameroon, French Congo, and Ubangi-Chari fell away from Vichy through internal maneuvering. Only in Gabun was there serious opposition. Free French dominion in Central Africa gave Britain a strong ally on the flank of its Libyan front and a defense in depth along the most vulnerable stretch of the Capetown-to-Cairo route in the Anglo-Egyptian Sudan. For the United Nations, Free French Africa cut the time and risk of shipping around the far tip of the continent. Bombers touch De Gaullist territory regularly on their way to the Middle East.

In Madagascar the Free French counted on the overwhelmingly anti-Vichy sentiment of the native Malgache population. They had at their disposal a broadcasting service, Radio Madagascar-Libre, which consisted of a powerful sender mounted on a truck, operating in the style of the outlaw German stations. Among the leaders of the proposed uprising were men who knew the terrain from a lifetime of residence, who had even commanded units of the troops which later fought the British. Four of them were officers who had been found loaded with chains in the brig of a French ship taking them to Marseilles.

The objective of the coup was to have been not the strong naval fortress of Diego Suarez but the capital at Tananarive, a much weaker place than the harbor citadel. As soon as the revolt signal was flashed throughout the island by Radio Madagascar-Libre, De Gaulle's fifth columnists were to make straight for the official broadcasting station, the Governor General's palace, and other key buildings in Tananarive. By concentrated raids they aimed to take over in one night all the main communications and all the administrative centers, in addition to locking up the Vichy officials. Simultaneously, landings were to be made at Majunga at the mouth of the Betsiboka River on the west coast, at Tulear in the southwest, and at Fort Dauphin in the southeast. These debarkation points are virtually without fortifications. The weak Malgache garrisons there would probably be already split by the revolt. Any remaining coastal resistance, it was expected, would be easily brushed aside by the Free French battalion commanders and their black infantry—Sara tribesmen, the toughest fighting breed in Equatorial Africa. Then a swift march northward and eastward by the three columns was to converge on Tananarive. The capital once neutralized, the remnants of the garrison still loyal to Vichy—mostly Senegalese—could be tightly bottled in the Diego Suarez area.

At this moment, the plan indicated, the British fleet might well come up to finish the job, with the least possible damage to the besiegers, the besieged, and popular feeling at home in France. The British could blockade the harbor from the sea, and the Free French could sever its communications by land. Artillery brought from the landing ports would dissuade the garrison from attempting to break out. The fortress could last only as long as its food supplies.

What the Free French wanted above all to avoid was another fiasco such as Dakar or another Anglo-French clash like the naval engagement at Mers-el-Kebir, of which the Darlans and the Doriots are still making capital. Madagascar was no fiasco. The casualty total was whittled down considerably from early estimates. The fact remains, however, that men in French and British uniforms died on a remote African island while a Nazi army stood at ease in France.

There are other Vichy territories still to be rescued from the threat of Axis control—in the Indian Ocean, West Africa, North Africa, and the Caribbean. The State Department's current adroitness in Martinique has, for once, found favor with the Free French, still pale from the Madagascar ordeal. They appreciate the technique of presenting ultimatums gracefully over a conference table instead of at the point of naval guns. They applaud this government's constant reiteration, to the Martinique authorities and the French in France, of our desire to avoid bloodshed. They know that it really doesn't matter how many faces are saved, when lives are saved as well. If the main purpose—quarantine of Martinique against the Axis—should be achieved without a shot, the victory would be complete.

The De Gaullists fervently hope that Madagascar will be the last head-on collision between ancient allies. But their dearest dream of all is the hour when the British, the Free French, the Americans, and all the liberated armies of the enslaved nations land in force on the soil of France. On that battleground, they say, there will be no French soldiers with orders to fire on the invaders. The creatures of Hitler in Vichy will be mute. The only target will be Germans, the goal Berlin.

Keep Them Out!

I. THE REVEREND GERALD L. K. SMITH

Candidate for the Republican Senatorial Nomination in Michigan

BY WILL CHASAN AND VICTOR RIESEL

[This article begins a series which will deal with the leading defeatists, isolationists, fascists, and assorted reactionaries among the Congressional and Senatorial candidates in the fall elections. The record of each man will be exposed; if he is now in Congress, his votes on major issues will be listed; the political situation in his state or district will be fully examined. Learn the facts about these men. The American people must Keep Them Out!]

PERHAPS our most dangerous professional defeatist, now that Father Coughlin has been partially silenced, is Gerald L. K. Smith, a big, hook-nosed man whom Huey Long once described as a "better rabble rouser than I am." Smith is national chairman of the Committee of One Million, a catch-all for anti-Semites, isolationists, panacea seekers, and labor baiters; he publishes The Cross and the Flag, a monthly magazine that follows the Social Justice "line" and may perhaps inherit its circulation; and currently he is seeking the Republican Senatorial nomination in Michigan on the "Coughlin issue" and as an isolationist.

With a platform manner combining the best techniques of Billy Sunday and George M. Cohan, Smith has been selling panaceas and hate causes since 1934, when he abandoned a fashionable church at Shreveport, Louisiana, to team up with Huey Long. He became the leader of the Share-Our-Wealth clubs, which Long saw as a stepping-stone to the White House, and made nation-wide speaking tours for the Kingfish. He credited himself in 1935 with making 20,000 converts a day. Smith tried to seize control of the Long machine after Huey's death, but was thwarted by the guns of rival contenders. On October 1, 1935, he told a press conference at the Hotel New Yorker that he was "in grave danger of assassination," presumably by some ex-associate in Louisiana. Smith likes to repeat this and similar stories to show that he is prepared for martyrdom. He is still convinced that if Long had lived, "there would have been no Roosevelt in this country, and Huey Long would be the absolute dictator." He once told a friend, "I really believe that the American public will at all times stand directly in back of a man like Huey Long. He bamboozled them, he stole for and from them; and now I am in a position not only to employ his tactics but to improve on his technique."

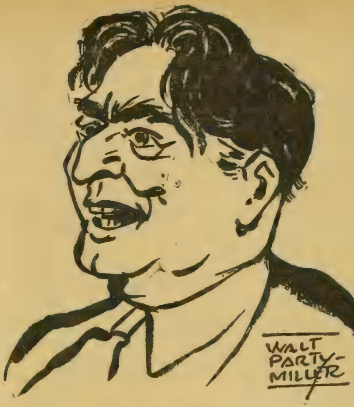
Smith began to organize the Committee of One Million in October, 1936, when it became evident that the Lemke-for-President campaign, in which he had joined with Father Coughlin and Dr. Townsend, was going to fizzle. The committee, which derived its name, according to Smith, from the fact that "a million" of his friends had asked him to start it, was launched formally in March, 1937, as a "nationalist front against communism." Its headquarters at the Hotel Pennsylvania in New York immediately became a rallying point for anti-Semites and fascists of various hues. Patrick Powers, a member of Smith's original entourage, was friendly with Fritz Kuhn. The Bund leader gave his blessing to the new undertaking, and hundreds of Bundsmen attended committee meetings in New York and Philadelphia.

According to a sworn statement by a former employee, Smith was also aided by Merwin K. Hart, who introduced him to many industrialists. The New York Times of June 4, 1937, reported a conference at Carnegie Hall in which both Hart and Smith participated. Among the resolutions passed was one advocating repeal of the capital-gains tax. It's a queer fact that anyone with such radical financial views as "Share-Our-Wealth" Smith should have been invited to this conference. Any sincere meeting of minds between him and Hart, a well-publicized champion of economic orthodoxy, hardly seems possible. William Dudley Pelley, General Moseley, and Allan Zoll also gave Smith a hand, and Father Coughlin, who was an intimate friend, was especially helpful. His followers helped to arrange big meetings for the committee in a number of cities, and the two men appeared together on public platforms and conferred frequently in Detroit and Cleveland. Smith is said to have described Father Coughlin at one time as an egotistical person who would be a nobody without a Roman collar, but apparently their cooperation has been smooth and continuous.

Shortly after the Committee of One Million was started, Smith decided that it might be profitable to combine his anti-communism with a campaign against the C. I. O. He toured the country denouncing John L. Lewis before Rotary Clubs, Chambers of Commerce, and private gatherings of industrialists, from whom he solicited funds. His correspondence in 1937-39 contains endless references to his efforts to sell the committee as an antidote to unionism. An undated letter from Detroit contains the line, "Labor hell has broken out here, which is good for us." He met secretly with industrialists in Akron, Cleveland, Toledo, Detroit, and other mass-production centers, at first with only desultory results. He received a number of moderate contributions, but reported that General Motors had reneged on a pledge of $15,000, and that "the big rubber companies absolutely said no in Akron and passed the word down the line." Smith was often broke during this period, as his letters mournfully indicate, but in 1939 his fortunes improved; he began to broadcast weekly over WJR and extended his activities in other fields. A former intimate of Smith's insists that he was enabled to do so by contributions from Henry Ford.

Smith, who once observed that he was a friend of all Roosevelt's foes, has been closely associated with many of our most virulent isolationists. He failed to join America First, but he "admired many of the things it accomplished"—and helped to accomplish some of them in Michigan. In March, 1941, he arranged a meeting for his old friend Senator Gerald P. Nye at which 5,000 Detroiters cheered the usual isolationist shibboleths and shouted, "Impeach the President!" Smith boasts that he is still an isolationist and is sorry that America First, "that great mobilization of Americans," was disbanded. He charges in The Cross and the Flag, now being hawked in Detroit streets by former sellers of Social Justice, that a "set of highbinders in Washington are trying to sneak us back into the British Empire." He wants Congress to enact a "hoop-of-steel" law to compel the President to bring the fleet back to our shores, withdraw our troops from all foreign theaters of war, and stop shipments of all war materials to our allies until he is willing to "swear under oath that every acre of ground and every human being within the territorial responsibility of the United States is safe from attack, by an actual or a potential foe."

In his campaign for the Republican Senatorial nomination Smith is saying that he is "100 per cent for the war effort," but The Cross and the Flag and his propaganda generally are crudely defeatist. A pamphlet setting forth his hoop-of-steel argument enumerates the defeats suffered by the United Nations, pointing out that experts previously had said of each one, "We dare not suppose such a tragedy," and includes such sentences as, "I am told by well-informed patriotic Americans in Washington, D. C., that much bad news is being kept from us because it is feared that it would break the morale of the people." He has continued to address isolationist meetings and was the principal speaker at one sponsored by William G. Grace's Citizens' Committee in Chicago on February 13, where Britain and Russia were booed and the audience had to be reminded to "be careful that only American sentiments are expressed."



Gerald L. K. Smith

From The Cross and the Flag

We recognize the priorities emergency, but because we know something of the background of Leon Henderson, we think that some place in this setup there are certain Marxists who are getting a real thrill out of seeing the great middle class crucified in the name of this emergency. . . . We are bold to assert that the most serious thing about this crucifixion of the middle class is not only the fact that our bureaucrats apparently don't care what happens to these people, but they actually appear to delight in their annihilation.

The remainder of Smith's program is unalloyed demagoguery. He demands $100 a month for every soldier, claiming that it was the Committee of One Million which obtained the increase to $42 a month. He urges Congress to "cut non-defense spending" and at the same time asks for "an honest hearing in the Senate for the Townsend plan." He also demands "tires for everybody." A press release describing the meeting at which Smith announced his candidacy quoted him as saying, "Take the rubber situation away from the bureaucrats, international bankers, and the rubber trust, turn it over to Henry Ford, and I am willing to wager that we'll have tires by New Year's and not later than Easter." Like Coughlin, Smith continually harps on the "international bankers"; he also has become subtly anti-Semitic. Frank Smothers, who covered a recent Smith meeting for the Chicago Daily News, reported that "throughout his speech Smith reiterated that what he wanted was a Christian America, nor did the cheering crowd misunderstand his implication regarding the Jewish citizens of America." At other meetings he has implied that any

This journal and its editor appreciate the fact that we have real statesmen in Congress. . . . The following are just a few whose words will appear in this journal: United States Senators Reynolds, Nye, Walsh, Taft, Vandenberg, Brooks, Wheeler, and others. Members of the Lower House of Congress: Woodruff, Rankin, Rich, Hoffman, Shafer, Short, Jones, and many others. It is to be regretted that men such as the ones listed here are not in the majority. One of the ideals of this journal is to hope and pray and work for the day when men of this type will constitute a real, effective, vital majority in Congress.

We old-fashioned Americans do not propose to be city-slicked by boondoggling bureaucratic politicians, Communists, British imperialists (the Union Now gang), and a thousand and one other porch climbers, "confidence" men, and "snake oil" salesmen, who are working day and night on conspiracies to compel us to swallow a hundred poison pills in the name of war-time emergencies.

non-Christian is a traitor. He has adopted the slogan "Christ First in America" and would like his followers to believe that he is the American St. Paul.

Smith gives the impression that he is supported by influential Republicans and evidently hopes to become a spokesman for the Republican Party's extreme isolationist wing. He boasted in 1940 of receiving "big money" from Republican interests and said that Ohio and Michigan Republican leaders had sent him to the Philadelphia convention. He told at least one person that he had written its war plank. In his speeches Representatives Clare Hoffman and Roy Woodruff of Michigan, Senator Vandenberg, and a half-dozen other isolationists, including Gerald Nye, Robert Reynolds, and Martin Dies, are frequently mentioned in a chummy fashion and always with praise. Nye and Reynolds wrote laudatory comments for the first issue of The Cross and the Flag; Woodruff inserted its leading editorial in the Congressional Record. Smith tells his meetings that for "real unity" Nye should be made Secretary of State, Reynolds Secretary of War, David Walsh Secretary of the Navy, and Lindbergh placed in charge of the air force. Smith has been in close touch with isolationist leaders in Congress and undoubtedly expects their support in some form in his Senatorial campaign. He has challenged Wendell Willkie, whom he describes as "a New Deal fifth columnist" in the Republican Party, "to come into the state of Michigan and make a speech against me." His nomination to the United States Senate as a Republican, Smith says truculently, will "be construed as the repudiation of Wendell Willkie's fifth columnism."

Political observers tend to disparage Smith's chances of winning in the G. O. P. primary, but his defeat is by no means certain. He has long had connections with important sections of the Michigan machine, and support from his Congressional friends, if it is forthcoming, could be decisive. Smith probably is counting on some help from Michigan industrialists, whom he has been assiduously courting. His frequent and vehement attacks on Walter Reuther, his sugary references to Ford, and his demand that non-defense spending be cut are part of the process. In addition, Smith knows the political game. His ability to trade with political leaders, deal "reasonably" with seekers of special privilege, and talk the language of the ward bosses almost outwitted the tough manipulators in Louisiana. It is conceivable that the same qualities may succeed in Michigan.

If Smith can capture the Republican nomination he will have a better than fair chance to join his "old friends," Nye and Reynolds, in the Senate. Michigan is almost made to order for his type of appeal. The industrial sections are swarming with poor whites from Kentucky and Tennessee; on Woodward Avenue in Detroit one can hear the drawl of thousands who have abandoned their Southern Main Streets for new jobs at River Rouge and other war plants. The Ku Klux Klan is growing in Michigan; it is playing down its anti-Catholic activities and seeking cooperation with Coughlinite groups. It is reported to have 18,000 members in Detroit, many of them in the automobile plants. The Committee of One Million is growing, too, and an alliance of the three would be formidable. The Sojourner Truth riots revealed the hates which Smith can exploit. Prentiss Brown, the incumbent Senator, has been a consistent New Dealer and will have the support of the Michigan C. I. O., but he is a weak candidate. An upstate Protestant, Brown was almost defeated by a Coughlinite in a 1936 primary fight. His hold has since been strengthened, but the influx of thousands of new voters could easily upset his favorable balance.

Regardless of his fortunes in the Senatorial race, Smith will continue to be a dangerous member of our "führer fringe." He is a thoroughly accomplished demagogue and has more political acumen than most of his fellow-messiahs. His new Coughlinite backing will make him the spokesman for American defeatism, a role that he may fill even more effectively than his predecessor. More important, he appears to have become the focal point of a new alliance between outright fascists and their more subtle and respectable friends in politics and industry. Smith is acutely aware of his position. He wrote in The Cross and the Flag, "We expect to be called appeasers, turtles, Copperheads, fascists, anti-Semites, racketeers, fifth columnists, rumor mongers, and even candidates for the Cliveden set." Why not?

Dixie Drive on Labor

BY BERNARD TAPER

THE anti-labor bills promoted by that crusading Southern trio Connally, Smith, and Vinson have at last been shelved, and the nation-wide hysteria that was whipped up in the name of war production but in reality primarily to benefit Southern business and industry is gradually subsiding. The United States has won a respite from organized hate.

During the Battle of the Forty-Hour Week I was traveling through the South, having left San Francisco just as it was beginning, and just as the first casualties of Pearl Harbor were being released from the city hospitals; San Francisco, confronted by that reality, was shocked and sobered.

A shipfitter's helper in one of the San Francisco Bay yards, a young man who had been a museum attendant before taking a vocational course in shipfitting, said to me very seriously, "I want you to write me and tell me about the shipyards on the East Coast. I get a good day's pay here—I can't complain about that—but I want to work a full day for it. Here we don't; the foreman keeps coming around and telling us to go hide out in the hull and kill a little time because the plates aren't ready or because some piece of equipment we need is being used somewhere else." He shrugged. "Maybe that's the way shipbuilding is everywhere. But let me know. I'd like to go to some yard where I can start in the morning and work straight through a whole day."

In the South, further removed from the war and war production, the atmosphere was very different. The emergency was less immediate and could be used as a pretext for hunting witches and making money. And the population of the South was showing the effects of our newspapers' greatest propaganda barrage since the 1936 anti-Roosevelt campaign.

In a fashionable restaurant in Atlanta, Georgia, three women sat at a table near me. One of them took a newspaper clipping out of her handbag. "Have you seen this?" she asked. It was a photograph of an American soldier. "This boy died," she said, "and here's the letter he wrote home the week before he was killed." She read it with emotion. " 'We're going into action, and we need all the equipment we can get. We're ready to fight, we're ready to die. But you have to help us. Please don't allow labor to strike any more, don't let them slow up production any more. What do a few cents matter to them when we're ready to give our lives?' "

There wasn't a dry eye at the table. "I want you to read that tonight at the club," one of the women said. "Yes, dear, you must," said the other. "Just like you read it now."

And the newspapers which had first planted in our soldiers' minds the picture of America as a land torn by strikes, the factories and machines idle, eagerly rebroadcast these prejudices and half-truths.

A welder whom I talked to in Atlanta said, "That's right, we're only working six days a week here. The factories are closed on Sunday."

"How come?"

"There's a law against working on Sunday here. It ain't religious."

Forums on the forty-hour week were held in the washrooms of all the trains. On the Sweetwater-Houston run the fat man said he was a Houston business man. Next to him was a shopkeeper from Spartanburg, South Carolina, who was "just visiting out here in Texas." They addressed themselves to a dark-haired, agreeable-looking sailor, still in the uniform of the Coast Guard though in the process of being transferred to the regular navy. I was shaving.

"They ought to be shot, those strikers," said the Houston business man. "Here are you fellows dying and that goddam labor is layin' down on the job. Ain't that so?"

"Sure," said the sailor.

"They ought to draft them strikers," said the shopkeeper.

"They ought to shoot 'em," said the business man. "Just like sabotoors. That right?"

"Sure," said the sailor, "damn right."

"Now these bills we got in Congress now. Too mild, I say."

This went on. Finally I said, "How many strikes do you think there are now in war industries?"

"Plenty," said the business man.

"Too damn many," said the other.

"But as a matter of fact," I said, "there aren't any strikes of any consequence—there are maybe three hundred men all told out on strike right now."

The men didn't answer, not questioning the facts but not believing them either—not in the way the clubwomen believed the dead soldier. For the newspapers they read had been assiduously working up an anti-labor attitude based on emotion and prejudice. How well the campaign had succeeded was illustrated by the bewilderment of the Baltimore machinist who said to me, "Jesus Christ, I'm working ten hours a day, six days a week, and my wife looks at me like I was a skunk!"

When I spoke of the suggestion to halt inflation by means of cutting down overtime pay, this machinist merely said, "How about deflating some of the fat boys first? I've been lean too long." Though the inflation threat was advanced in the editorial columns as one of the main arguments for the repeal of the forty-hour week, that aspect of the matter was discussed very little; it was too academic for popular consumption in the South.

With one exception all the soldiers and sailors I questioned expressed anti-labor sentiments, not with deep conviction but as if it were expected of them. One air-force private said, "I don't think labor's getting a fair deal in this. I think a workingman should be allowed to make a decent living." Then he looked around to see if this radical statement had been overheard.

Though the instigators of the anti-labor movement attempted to give it the aspect of a popular national uprising, it was very largely a Southern and Southwestern affair, and conservative financial journals now declare that its success would have served the interests not so much of the war industries as of the small, less essential plants typical of the Southern economy. The first editorials urging repeal of the forty-hour week appeared in Oklahoma newspapers, a state containing only 28,000 of the nation's 10,000,000 industrial workers. The campaign got under way in earnest with a circular letter written by Thomas J. Wallner of Nashville, Tennessee, president of the Southern States Industrial Council, which urged Southern employers, Chambers of Commerce, and newspapers to promote mass-meetings and legislation designed to "destroy labor unions."

One such meeting was held in Montgomery, Alabama, on March 30, with about two thousand townspeople present. After a few preliminary remarks attacking labor Colonel George Cleere, former commander of the American Legion of Alabama, read a violently phrased resolution urging Congress to prohibit strikes, restore the open shop, and repeal the forty-hour week. The crowd cheered.

At this point a man in the audience stood up. "I wish to offer a substitute resolution," he said. He pointed out the progress of production, praised labor for voluntarily abstaining from strikes, and urged that "Montgomery, Alabama, stand by the President." This too was received with cheers.

A gray-haired, distinguished-looking man then jumped to his feet. "I consider this resolution incendiary and ill-advised," he shouted. Another man, speaking in a quiet voice, seconded the substitute resolution. When he said, "This country's strength and glory must be free labor, not slave labor," there were cheers again.

An hour-long attempt to work out a compromise failed. "We will now close the meeting," the chairman announced somewhat ruefully. "I urge you all to keep buying defense bonds!" It was obvious that even in the South, haven of prejudice, the anti-labor sentiment was by no means the unanimous mandate that Connally, Smith, and Vinson had claimed.

A Central European Federation

BY MILAN HODZA

IF THIS war is not to end simply by setting the stage for another and even more devastating struggle, the post-war position of Germany must be given central consideration in the formulation of peace plans. The end of "Hitlerism" in itself will not mean the final end of aggressive German nationalism. The continuity of German nationalism is a historical fact, and it must be dealt with as such. How can we guarantee that German aggression shall never again be renewed?

Pacifists may see the means in Germany's disarmament; incorrigible map revisers, in its dismemberment; idealists, in the construction of a worldwide federation which would include Germany as a well-watched member. These are all sound suggestions no doubt, but one thing remains certain: no matter how completely Germany is defeated, it will continue to endanger the security of the world unless the peace to come is protected by measures more far-reaching than any yet tried. We must remember that Germany's armies were thoroughly defeated less than twenty-four years ago, that Germany was disarmed and reduced in territory, and that out of that defeat and post-war turmoil emerged an even more aggressively nationalistic Germany. Whether Germany was represented by Stresemann—"I had to wear the mask of peace"—or by Hitler, Europe has witnessed enough to know the foolishness of presuming that the end of German imperialism will come automatically with military defeat in this war.

In no forceful people's life can there fail to be a nationalistic period. France had to pass through the era of the Bourbons and of Napoleon. Great Britain experienced a similar development from the time of the Spanish wars to Waterloo. When British imperialism had slowed down its violent course, German nationalism was just beginning its career, Bismarck's wars were among its manifestations but were not its climax. That was to come with Wilhelm II's bid for a dominating German position in the world. The bid was defeated—temporarily, at any rate—and German nationalism eventually expressed itself in the animalistic outburst of Hitlerism. This virulent nationalism, even assuming that the present war is indeed to be its climax, cannot be expected to vanish suddenly, and the world will have to reckon with it for many decades to come.

Like any other violent imperialism, it is not likely to bow to measures or decisions unsupported by force. Its impetus will have to be checked by an equivalent force. The philosophy of force, the tradition of force, the idolatry of force can be paralyzed at the source, but only when its exponents are made to realize that another force is able and ready to resist. In the defense of the future peace Central Europe, as the neighbor of Germany, must provide a large part of that counter-force.

The plan of checking Germany by creating a strong Central European bulwark is not new: for a century it was the hope of many political leaders of old Austria—Slavs and Rumanians and even some German Austrians. The necessity for a strong Central Europe which could oppose Germany was what led the Czech historian Palacky to declare that Austria, if it did not exist, would have to be invented. However, the Hapsburgs failed utterly to make of Austria a barrier to Berlin's plans for Mitteleuropa. It is true that from 1906 to 1914 the Hapsburg Crown Prince, Franz Ferdinand d'Este, hoped as heir apparent to achieve this aim by new domestic and foreign policies. In the earliest years of my political career as a deputy in the old Hungarian Parliament I was among those who were urging a federalist plan to replace dualist Austria-Hungary, and it was along similar lines that the Crown Prince hoped to strengthen the empire. Those plans failed; the reformers had to leave to the First World War the historic task of liberating the small nations of Central Europe. One of the greatest things accomplished at Versailles was this liberation. But one of the greatest errors committed at Versailles was the failure to strengthen the freedom and security of the new nations by providing for the organic cooperation of all their economic and military forces. Will the United Nations repeat this error after the Second World War?

Central Europe, the area between Germany and Soviet Russia, can be defined in "geopolitical" terms as the basin of six rivers—the Polish Vistula and the middle and lower Danube with its affluents: the Czecho-Slovak Morava and Waag, the Yugoslav Morava, and the Yugoslav-Greek Vardar. Politically it means eight countries—Austria, Poland, Czecho-Slovakia, Hungary, Rumania, Bulgaria, Greece, and Yugoslavia, the population of which, according to the statistics of 1937, was 110,000,000. In passing, it might be pointed out that united they could have mustered nearly 300 divisions for a common defense, but it is too easy—and quite futile—to argue now that Germany would not have dared to launch this war against the genuinely united strength of these eight countries. The fact is that even while the German machine was gobbling up Austria, Czecho-Slovakia, and Poland, there was no possibility of pooling Central European resources against a common foe.

Now, however, the pattern of a new Central Europe is emerging from the bloody catastrophe of war. Three months ago the International Labor Conference held in New York and Washington issued a declaration emphasizing the "solidarity" of four Central European countries—Poland, Czecho-Slovakia, Yugoslavia, and Greece—"in the common struggle for freedom." By some American commentators the proclamation was hailed as foreshadowing a "confederation of these states, each of which will retain its sovereignty," working "as a unit for common political, economic, and social objectives."

The renewed cooperation announced by the Yugoslav and Greek governments-in-exile has already shown progress. The Polish and Czecho-Slovak governments-in-exile, expressing the unanimous sentiment of their respective peoples, published as early as November, 1940, a joint statement pledging "closest cooperation" and have set up committees to discuss the alignment of Czecho-Slovak and Polish foreign and military policies. There is of course a real difference between "unity" and mere "solidarity," but those who desire an effectively united Central Europe can welcome these preliminary steps so long as they are not thought of as limiting the final political reorganization.

The "cooperation" contemplated by the Polish and Czecho-Slovak agreement reminds us of the Little Entente and the Balkan Entente, which were regional pacts limited to particular local interests and which therefore failed to shape a Central European policy. Like many other Central Europeans, I considered the Little Entente not merely a barrier against the threat of Hungarian revisionism but also a stepping-stone toward more effective cooperation in the whole area of Central Europe. We failed, however, to achieve an extension of the Little Entente, and even its regional effectiveness began to evaporate when Hitler's march into the Rhineland in March, 1936, encountered no opposition.

Of course from then on we redoubled our efforts to eliminate the quarrels which divided the Central European nations. It was too late. At the end of 1937 one member of the Little Entente, Rumania—it would be more accurate to say "the Rumanian regime"—lulled itself to sleep with the comfortable theory that it would never be seriously menaced by Germany and that danger could come only from Soviet Russia. Yugoslavia, unfortunately, was then being led by a politician who seriously believed that his country could live on good terms with Germany and even with Italy. Poland—or rather the Polish regime of that period—had long since been going its own way, and had already signed a non-aggression pact with Germany. In fact, in the period of "cooperation," which lasted until very recently, Central Europe had as many policies as it had nations. Germany, on the other hand, had only one policy for Central Europe—to transform it into an arsenal and larder for the totalitarian crusade against democracy.

Facing these facts, we must see that the attempt to renew Central European "cooperation" or "coordination" would obviously be not only foolhardy but impossible. For the security of the democratic world the peace must provide a new system for Central Europe that will be able to guarantee unity of policy and action. That means a federation. Eight sovereign foreign ministers and eight sovereign armies might fail—as they did fail—to align their policies. Let us therefore unite them in order to obtain a new and effective sovereign power.

With respect to the framework of a federated Central Europe, it is clear that federation implies a common government headed by a federal chancellor and consisting of at least four secretaries responsible for foreign affairs, defense, finances, and economy, including international trade. Communications, shipping, civil aviation, and other common interests ought to be intrusted at least in part to the federal administration. A congress, democratically elected or consisting of delegates from democratic national parliaments, would levy taxes and pass legislation affecting the federal departments.

According to the European constitutional custom, an elected federal "head of state" would be required in addition to the chancellor. Those national dynasties which have provided valiant leadership for their people in the time of their greatest ordeal will survive, and republics should accept them as a fact in the same way that kings should accept the republicanism of their federated partners. Political wisdom would further suggest that each state in the federation occupy some outstanding post in the federal government; in addition to the posts already mentioned, there would be judges for the supreme court, commanders for the army, navy, and air force, and ministers without portfolio. In the individual states federal department business should of course be executed by the nationals of those states.*

What precedents for joint action can be found in the recent history of Central Europe? The Hapsburg empire, which is sometimes cited, obviously cannot be confused with a democratic federation of free nations. But the brief history of the independent nations between the First and the Second World War reveals instances of common action—at any rate in the economic field—whose significance ought not to be underrated.

In 1932, in the midst of the worldwide agricultural depression, six Central European governments undertook an official cooperation which resulted in the organization of the Agrarian Bloc of Central Europe. The importance of this bloc can be fully appreciated only if one realizes that on the average not less than 64 per cent of the inhabitants of the eight countries of Central Europe were farmers. The formation of this bloc was not motivated merely by the usual desire of farmers for higher prices. On the contrary, it symbolized an organized and united struggle to obtain minimum living standards for a rural democracy of about 70,000,000 people and to make them effective consumers of industrial products. In the six cooperating nations there was fostered a feeling of solidarity which did not soon lose its intensity.

In fact, it became and continued to be a political factor. At the meeting of the Interparliamentary Conference of Trade in London in September, 1935, my report on the agricultural situation in Central Europe was given with the full support of the six nations who had been members of the Agrarian Bloc. And in the interests of my own country I was able to obtain the construction of a network of preferential treaties with the other five Danubian countries.

There is ample evidence that most of Central Europe's democracy will not hesitate to take the step toward union, that they see clearly its economic advantages. These were well expressed in a recent article in Free World by Jan Stanczyk, the Polish labor leader, member of the Polish government-in-exile. Under the title A Federation of Central Europe Mr. Stanczyk wrote that "the inhabitants of Central-Eastern Europe and of the Balkans have been exploited by German industry," and that "in the future they must establish a united economic bloc—not a superficial political coalition—which will make possible their participation in a system of international exchange of goods and services." Most of the Polish leaders, regardless of party affiliation, are taking an attitude which may be considered either directly favorable to the idea of union or at least favorable to the principle of closer links between the nations. In Rumania the only democratic, and therefore the only real, authority is sure to desire participation in a union. In Bulgaria the situation seems to be the same.

Austria's position is peculiar to its own nature. There can be no doubt that Austria possesses many of the special characteristics of a nation. Nevertheless, it has sometimes seemed anxious to merge its identity with that of its northern neighbor. The Austrians reason, with a good deal of truth: "Of course we are too small to be independent; we are also too independent to be merely a district of Germany—not to speak of Nazi Germany. We feel interested in Central Europe, but there is no 'power' in Central Europe, and in so far as it seems to be in the making, it does not seem to have a place for Vienna. The fact is that Austria, and more particularly Vienna, requires an economic position in Central Europe which could compensate to some extent for what it lost twenty-four years ago." There is a valid point in this argument, but the problem is not insoluble. The chief difficulty is that the Austrians may not succeed in reconciling their own conflicting views. If the democratic spirit of a Catholic-Socialist compromise prevails, then Austria can surely become a partner in Central Europe.

* A more detailed constitutional scheme is proposed by the author in a book recently published in London.

Hungary, because of its imperialist role in the war, cannot be considered fit for entering a federation at present. However, Hungary is still being led, as it has been for centuries, by its traditional ruling class, which means that the peasants and workers are excluded from political influence. The picture will become more hopeful when the Hungarian democracy eventually gains control.

In this connection it is worth while to recall the relationship between nationalism and democracy in Central Europe. In all the Central European nations except Hungary nationalism evolved simultaneously with democratic feeling. The landlords, the big industrialists, and the bureaucracy, enemies of the political liberties of the people, were also the social and racial oppressors. The German upper classes in Austria ruled over the Czechs, the Posnanian Poles, and the southern Slovenes. In Hungary the Magyars ruled over the Slovaks, the Hungarian Rumanians, and the Serbs. In the same way the Turks, at certain periods, were the rulers, social and political and racial, of the Bulgarians, Serbs, and Danubian Rumanians. This identification of the political with the social and racial adversary resulted logically enough in the identification of nationalism with democracy. On the whole, Central European democracy is strengthened by racial emotionalism, and its nationalism is deepened by democratic principles. Hungary is the exception.

In all Central European countries democracy has had to fight hard to survive; in some of them it has at times succumbed. This enhances the democratic value of a Central European federal congress based upon a strictly democratic ballot, for the weak state democracies would be given the numerical and moral support of the democracy of the whole federation.

A federated Central Europe would represent the final development of a regional pact to the highest possible degree of effectiveness. It is the indispensable prerequisite of any larger federation, of a new "world order," which is the hope of all who are concerned for the fate of mankind.

[Other points of view on the post-war reconstruction of Central Europe will be presented in two subsequent articles, one by Rustem Vambery, chairman of the Executive Council of the American Federation of Democratic Hungarians, and the second by Antonin Basch, noted Czech economist now teaching at Brown University.]

The White Feather

BY JOHN BERRYMAN

Sydney, Australia. Lieutenant Jack Leslie Perry, who lost an eye in action in Syria and was awarded the military cross for gallantry in action, was handed a white feather by a young woman as he walked along the street in civilian clothes. Perry said nothing but dropped his glass eye in the woman's hand.—NEWS ITEM.

Imagine a crowded war-time street
Down Under. See as little as I:
The woman gives him as they meet
Passing, something—a feather. Try
To make out this man who was going by.
The eye stared at the feather.

He could remember sand and sand,
The punishing sun on their guns; he chose
As the men approached the western end
To move to the left. Who would suppose
A lieutenant in civilian clothes?
The feather stared back.

He dropped his glass eye in her hand.
Humiliation or fantasy,
He thought; I have seen too much sand
For judgment or anger. It may be I,
All men deserve the feather's lie.
The eye stared at the feather.

Notes by the Way

SHERWOOD ANDERSON was a "mid-American" D. H. Lawrence. His books, in their day, were hotly defended and as violently attacked because he incited and gave sanction to the powerful, primary impulses of sex and self; in their name he scorned the taboos, social and moral, designed to curb them, and in particular he denounced the searing effects on the "natural man" of our industrial civilization.

Anderson's attitude toward direct experience and his refusal to be bound by the values of the money-grubbing industrial society in which he found himself remain admirable. No one can fail to be charmed by his story, told again in his "Memoirs" (Harcourt, Brace, $3.75), of how at the age of forty or so, having decided that writing was his recreation, he walked out on his business and his family. Yet his early books have ceased to be read, and the reason lies in his attitude toward writing itself.

Anderson considered the artist's power of expression a magic gift which absolved its possessor of the ordinary responsibilities of mankind—this is made very clear in the picture of his father in "A Story-Teller's Story" and in the facts of his own history. But his writing gives abundant evidence of a further, fatal assumption that since the gift is magic, control is neither possible nor desirable. He speaks often of the discipline of writing, but his novels and his memoirs are a study in non-discipline; and he is forever disclaiming responsibility for his imagination and its works.

The effects of this sentimental romantic belief in the infallibility and impunity of the creative impulse, this view of expression as a species of automatic writing, are displayed to the full in his final testament. The "Memoirs" contain some interesting sections, notably his account of what he calls the Robin's Egg Renaissance. There are excellent descriptive passages, amusing stories, to prove that his gift was authentic; and his never-ending interest in and good-will toward human beings finds continuous expression. But like his novels the "Memoirs" are long-winded, repetitious, and soft—the unrestrained outpouring of a writer for whom writing had become increasingly a form of self-indulgence.

His short stories—though, significantly, they are better described as sketches—were less subject to the flaws that vitiate the novels. The single imaginative thrust was suited to his talent and to his primitive and essentially lazy conception of art. "The short story," he writes, "is the result of a sudden passion. It is an idea grasped whole as one would pick an apple in an orchard. All of my own short stories have been written at one sitting." Or again, "I am not one who can peck away at a story. It writes itself, as though it used me merely as a medium, or it is n. g."

Fundamentally, though unconsciously, Anderson scorned discipline, order, and idea—that is to say, conscious intellectual control—in art as well as in life. To him impulse and feeling were all that mattered—and his novels and his "Memoirs" are a chaos of impulse and feeling, rendered inert and shapeless because they lack the bones of thought.

MARGARET MARSHALL

Europe's Future

THE FRANCE OF TOMORROW. By Albert Guérard. Harvard University Press. $3.50.

MR. GUERARD'S book should have been entitled "The France of Yesterday and the Europe of Tomorrow." One seeks in vain for his views on the future organization of France; on the other hand, his analysis of the moral, political, and social conditions which determined the fall of France is the most interesting one so far published in the United States; moreover, the author makes an important contribution to the study of the Europe of the future.

Mr. Guérard warns us that his study is not "mechanically objective"; having "thoughts and feelings, he desires to express them, not to suppress them." He does not limit himself to exposing the facts; he evaluates them. He assigns to the reactionary and nationalist bourgeoisie the responsibility for France's role in the events of June, 1940, underlining the faults of the United States and England in the deterioration of the international situation between 1919 and 1939. He shows the responsibility of the French military, not only of Gamelin, but of Pétain and Weygand. He shows above all the responsibility of the right, whose narrow nationalism prevented any entente between German and French democracy before Hitler's rise to power and the organization of collective security after that event. He recalls that the right refused the offer of Léon Blum in 1938 to form a "Sacred Union, as in 1914, embracing rightists as well as Communists," because it was more preoccupied with defending the privileges of the capitalist bourgeoisie against the Popular Front than with defending France against Hitler.

Without doubt, all this is already known to the American public. But the great merit of Mr. Guérard's book is that it shows that the French right for a century and a half had been constantly dominated by a hatred of democracy and of the spirit of the French Revolution. He recalls the historical importance of the Dreyfus affair. He denounces the upper bourgeoisie of France, who, with sadistic joy, seized from the defeat of the French armies the opportunity of destroying the democratic regime and leading the French of 1940 back to the ancien régime. He heaps contempt upon Marshal Pétain and his entourage of conscious or unconscious traitors.

All this is the more important in that the author makes the necessary distinction between the French people and the bourgeoisie. One of his most interesting chapters is entitled The Dictatorship of the Middle Class. He shows how a regime founded on inequalities of social conditions and wealth could not be a democracy. On the other hand, his analysis of French governmental institutions is weak. Certainly he is right in not defending the constitution of 1875, which he calls "a monarchical instrument, unwanted by the very men who wrote it." But he passes too quickly from his just criticism of the imperfection of this constitution to wholesale condemnation not only of parliamentarianism but of all representative government. It would seem to me more just to explain the weakness of the French regime by the fact that the constitution of 1875 was not sufficiently democratic. Nothing could be decided in France, either in government or administration, without the consent of the Senate; and the Senate, because of the way it was elected, represented not the people of France but the French bourgeoisie and above all the rural bourgeoisie. This is a very important point, to which American public opinion does not give sufficient attention. The dictatorship of the middle class was exercised by the Senate. The parliamentary democracy condemned by Mr. Guérard was not a true democracy.

This error of analysis impairs the value of all that part of the book which treats of the government of the future. The author's approach to this problem is abstract and general; he speaks for the world as a whole and not for France —which is an error, for a good system of government must adapt itself to the temperament of its people. What Mr. Guérard proposes is the absolute government of a president, that is to say, the American system disembarrassed of Congress but enriched by the exercise of the referendum. Mr. Guérard arrives at a government by experts because he refuses to grant to the people or their representatives the competence necessary to solve the political problems of the hour. There is here, it seems to me, a confusion between the political and the technical aspects of government. It is needless to insist on the dangers of such a conception of democracy. Even if it functioned in a world liberated from capitalism, the regime of Mr. Guérard would end by being either the dictatorship of a president or—more probably—the dictatorship of a bureaucracy, that is to say, precisely in the evil of which Mr. Guérard has denounced the effects. By far the main interest of this part of the book is that it incites the reader to reflect upon and to criticize the solutions which are presented to him.

On the other hand, Mr. Guérard makes an important contribution to the discussion of post-war problems with his examination of the question of "the unity of Europe." Certainly one cannot agree with all of Mr. Guérard's ideas; one must smile at his declaration that "the key to cooperation" is the adoption, by the European peoples, of a common language. But Mr. Guérard is right in raising the question of European organization. There is not, for the future, a French problem or a German problem; there is only a European problem.

The author is the partisan of a "unitary" organization of Europe; I think, on the contrary, that Europe will evolve into a federation, or even a confederation of federations. But I approve without reserve Mr. Guérard's assertion, which he supports with historical proofs, that to reserve for Germany particular treatment in the new organization of Europe would be as contrary to justice as it would be devoid of political sense. Mr. Guérard thinks that it is necessary not only to break German unity and destroy German nationalism but to destroy French unity and nationalism. He hopes that the new Europe will be a vast grouping of provinces and of regions assuring "the liberty and equality of all cultures." And he hopes too that we shall no longer continue to confound true liberty, which is that of the spirit, with that famous economic liberty which seems to him just about as reasonable as the liberty which would allow motorists to disregard traffic laws or gangsters to blackmail their neighbors.

In brief, while I am far from approving all Mr. Guérard's ideas, the general tendency of his book is excellent. It should be read and meditated by all who wish to understand what happened in June, 1940, and to reflect upon what the France and the Europe of tomorrow will be.

PIERRE COT

The Book as Experience

THE PRIVATE READER: SELECTED ARTICLES AND REVIEWS. By Mark Van Doren. Henry Holt and Company. $2.75.

IN THE act of bringing his critical writings together Mr. Van Doren makes plain that he will write criticism no more; from now on he is to be a private reader. This book is more than enough to make one regret—and hope that he will revoke—his decision, for he belongs with a few critics in our time who have written about books with sanity and charm. And writing about books is to be distinguished, as a less frequent and more fruitful thing, from reviewing them. Most reviewers look upon a book as a challenge, when, indeed, it is not merely a chore; and hurry into the judicial robe and, wherever possible, the black cap. But to Mr. Van Doren, to whom criticism is "an art at which luck and love assist," and for whom the critic should "dart in with judgments only when they offer themselves to him naturally," a book is something that lies a good deal closer to life and that, as far as possible, is not to be "immobilized" but liberated. That need for releasing it rather than pinning it down is Mr. Van Doren's last word, as it is perhaps his only formulation, and it helps to explain why his criticism, concerned though much of it is with contemporary books and films that have worn rather badly, has managed to wear very well.

For most modern criticism does not wear well, though there are sharper and subtler and far more provocative critics than Mr. Van Doren. There are perhaps two reasons for this: the assumed nature of criticism and the assumed role of the critic. As for the first, it tends to set up conditions and standards too oppressively—to make them something against which a book is not so much to be measured as into which it must fit. As a result, books acquire—or fail to acquire—significance of one kind or another, but lose their identity. We are told what they represent without half the time being told what they are. As for the critic, he is so anxious to arrive at a judgment that he seldom shares the book with us as an experience. There is no longer, in print at any rate, much appreciation of books; there is only appraisal. It was the virtue of older, more personal, more absorbent critics like Lamb and Hazlitt that they gave us both.

Mr. Van Doren is a good critic in any sense of the word, for he has the ability to say interesting and illuminating things about books. He has also read deeply, so that he can fit any new book he reads into the framework of literature. And one would want to say more of all this were not one more impressed by how Mr. Van Doren can fit what he reads into the framework of life. One always gets the feeling that a man is writing this book, as well as a critic. Most critics are interesting for their ideas, their prejudices, their attitudes; Mr. Van Doren is most interesting because of himself. This is not from his being in the least an autobiographical or in the main a "personal" writer: indeed, he lacks the positive and picturesque qualities of a Lamb or a Hazlitt, though he is closer to them in his approach to books than to most of his contemporaries. Actually he is quiet of voice, economical of gesture. His opinions, like his prose, are cool and dry; he is masculine in his tastes, with no foolish or neurotic sensibilities. From this one gets a sense of wholeness in the man, which is not to be confused with completeness, but which is notable in an age of men with divided minds and split personalities. He has, too, an admirable sense of values; he is, for example, among the not too many critics who are less bothered by dulness than falseness.

Now and then one feels that he stands too much on the sidelines—that he has not busted out about this or that as he might have; that in the troubled life of the past ten years his serenity at times approaches remoteness. Yet one knows that this is never callousness; and one comes to feel at last that his humanitarianism is so instinctive that he has never felt the need, as have some of the rest of us, of emphasizing it. But all this is a result of temperament as well; Mr. Van Doren is no more a crusader than a cynic, no more a revolutionary critic than a fashionable one. That may be why he wears well: he does not speak for any one particular moment.

All this leaves me no space for comment on Mr. Van Doren's specific judgments on books and movies. That one doesn't share some of his enthusiasm or agree with all of his opinions is not of much importance, particularly since all the enthusiasms are healthy and the opinions sane. Mr. Van Doren's best insights are at once simple and profound, as when he remarks of "Leaves of Grass" that for all its strenuous gospel of comradeship, it is "one of the loneliest books ever written." But his most characteristic comments lie closer to wit; let me instance a remark about a certain type of modern poetry: "The appearance of labor is not only preferred; it is praised."

Mormon Family Portrait

A LITTLE LOWER THAN THE ANGELS. By Virginia Sorensen. Alfred A. Knopf. $2.75.

THIS novel tells the story of Joseph Smith's Latter-Day Saints during their sojourn in Nauvoo, and ends with the break-up of that community and the beginning of their westward trek in search of a land where they might live unmolested by intolerant neighbors. Mrs. Sorensen, herself a descendant of an old Mormon family and a graduate of Brigham Young University, has presented her people with warm compassion and a sharp sense of personal drama. Instead of treating her material as a historical pageant, she reveals the travail of this determined, often desperate band of believers through the eyes and heart of Mercy Baker, the first wife of the colony who had to accept the ignominy of another wife in her home—a humiliation which weighed even upon her children.

In the dilemma of Mercy and her husband Simon the author has illustrated an ethical problem which must have faced many of the Mormons when the doctrine of polygamy was introduced: Simon, though more than happily married and by no means a libertine, was virtually forced to accept a second wife, in spite of his instinctive repugnance and his fear of wounding Mercy. But the Mormons were told that plural marriage was an inseparable part of their creed—a creed that was more than a theology, that envisaged a total struggle against unhappiness and intellectual poverty. "Man is that he might have joy," Joseph Smith preached to his people, and woman's functions, he clearly implied, were to furnish as much of that joy as possible and to add liberally to the number of God's chosen people. That even the men were actually a hard-mouthed, joyless lot in spite of their theoretical beliefs was due in part to the hardships that constantly attended their lives, in part also to the stern, uncompromising moral sense that they inherited from their Protestant ancestors.

Of the many novels that have the Mormons as a background this seems to me the most intensely dramatic and the most satisfyingly written. Mrs. Sorensen's prose is sharp and distinguished, often poetic without being pretentious. Her instinctive sympathy with the spiritual and physical yearnings of the Saints, who thrived on adversity and refused to yield a single inch in their doctrines or practices in the face of mobs or legal coercion, produces a stirring tale of quiet heroism.

LOUIS B. SALOMON

The Genius of Spain

VIRGIN SPAIN: THE DRAMA OF A GREAT PEOPLE. By Waldo Frank. Duell, Sloan, and Pearce. $3.50.

AT LONG last some intelligent officials at Washington have sent Waldo Frank, upon the urgent request of distinguished Hispano-Americans, to Argentina and adjacent countries to convey to our neighbors the significance of our commitment to defeat Hitler and his satellites. Needless to say, Latin America as a whole, despite the official adherence of its many governments to diplomatic protocols, does not see eye to eye with us in this formidable task. There is a good deal of evidence that thus far we have failed to convince Argentinians and Chileans—and not only them—of our solemn determination to destroy the Fascist hydra threatening our way of life. All the millions we have spent on the propagation of Spanish in this country have not produced among our intellectuals a half-dozen capable of speaking the idiom of Latin America. To speak to Latin Americans the mechanics of Portuguese and Spanish does not suffice. Waldo Frank, who is about to make a tour of lectures and contacts which in reality may be regarded as a continuation of his brilliant tour of 1929, is perhaps the American best equipped to show them that they and we can create and maintain a spiritual solidarity, in spite of the many differences that appear to keep us apart.

If we ask how Waldo Frank achieves the authority to represent us in Hispano-America, we find the answer in his "Virgin Spain," originally published in 1926 and now reissued. The illustrious Mexican poet and critic, Alfonso Reyes, in the new introduction to the book reveals how Waldo Frank, fired by a missionary zeal to make a spiritual entity of the Americas, felt the need to see Spain before completing his vision of an integrated American world. "Having understood that what mattered to America was less what it is than what it can be, he sought in Spain the virginal pulse of the will toward the future, the dynamic love, never exhausted by her historical mishaps, of Spain's transcendent aspiration."

"Virgin Spain" has appealed to Spaniards and their American cousins as no other book among the many written about Spain. Some of its meatier sections were published in Ortega's Revista de Occidente. The books of Gauthier, Havelock Ellis, Borrow, have perhaps greater aesthetic values than "Virgin Spain," but none of them probe so deeply into the very being of Spain or call forth such unquestioning acceptance. León Felípe, the Spanish poet now living in Mexico, transmuted the difficult language of Frank into sonorous Castilian prose. Frank in Spanish becomes immediately lucid and communicable.

But "Virgin Spain" was intended for the people of the United States, and here the response has been disappointing. Its purpose was somewhat like that which made possible Henry Adams's "Mont St. Michel and Chartres." To unravel the motives and moods that went into the composition of "Virgin Spain" would be to produce a long essay on the cultural currents in this country from 1910 to 1930. Suffice it to say here that dissatisfaction with the cultural level in this country, dim apprehension about the future, and nervous yearning for spiritual cohesiveness of a higher order were some of the disturbing factors that drove many of our creative artists into exile and made writers search far and wide for the secrets of the greater peoples. As far back as 1919 Waldo Frank formulated the need: "The problem is rather to lift America into self-knowledge that shall be luminous so that she may shine, vibrant so that she may be articulate."

Frank went to Spain, then, to seek the meaning of American civilization, for in Spain during the fifteenth and sixteenth centuries had taken place a political and cultural experiment which, if understood in all its implications, would throw a flood of light upon the American scene with its groping and embryonic attempts to create a much-needed spiritual unity. This hunger for unity is the key to the book. The reader would do well to start with Chapter VII, The Will of the Catholic Kings. Besides embodying the essence of the book, it may open new vistas upon what is occurring today. Once the book is mastered, one can readily see that "Virgin Spain" is as monistic as its author's philosophy. Its greatness and perhaps its weakness are traceable to the ambitious perspective from which Frank views the complex and recalcitrant world that is Spain. Everything—sky, scene, the psyche of the Spaniard, dances, paintings, the bull fight, monuments, politics, literature—is submitted to the fascinating concept of unity from which they emerged. Frank's thesis is that Spain is the result of innumerable racial strains—Celt, Iberic, Roman, Phoenician, Copt, Arab, Berber, Jew, Visigoth—which the miraculous matrix of the land and its history has reduced to an imposing whole. But the vicissitudes of time and space effected only an ethnic unity, which the clashes of culture have obscured. Spain was the first country in the history of modern Europe to use the weapons of dogma and organized force, church and state, to create an ideological unity that anticipated in more than one sense the blueprints of Nazi totalitarianism. The mastermind of the scheme was Isabel, the Catholic who in her mystical obsession instinctively invented or rediscovered the modern weapons to cow dissidents—the institution of torture or the Inquisition, expulsion of minorities, foreign wars of expansion, and propaganda. Her mad design was fed by the fires of a passion that spared neither friend nor foe. Lest there be a precipitous inference that Isabel's plan was identical with Hitler's, it must be pointed out that Isabel submitted her scheme to the universalism of the church, a universalism which in practice allowed for the assimilation of Jew and Moor.

Sober restraint becomes impossible for the critic who is sympathetic to "Virgin Spain." For enthusiastic response is inevitable once the key to the book is discovered, and any annoying quirks of style or composition are forgotten in the contemplation of the author's unerring grasp of a whole civilization as willed unity. One is forced to share the balanced judgment of Spanish and Hispano-American critics who, knowing their Spain, say that Frank's book is an arresting achievement in the art of understanding a complex and baffling culture like that of Spain. Avoiding details which might blur the contour of the vision, the book has not aged since its first appearance. The Awakening Passion, the only really new section that Frank has added to the architecture of his book, stresses the thesis that Spain achieved a unity which locked its energies, immobilizing it for centuries, and that when in its somnolence it felt the impact of the successful West, the disturbance of equilibrium produced the bloodiest civil war on record. The Struggle for Islam

MEDITERRANEAN FRONT. By Alan Moorehead. Whittlesey House. $2.75.

A GREAT many inadequate pages have been written about the war in the Middle East. Most of the writers have depended on the music and romance of such names as Bagdad, Tyre, Cyrene, Thermopylae, and Damascus. They have failed to present the great war going on from Italy to India, and from the Balkan Peninsula and the Black Sea to Central Africa. Alan Moorehead seems to this reviewer to be the first journalist who has realized that this is not a number of isolated micro-wars but one vast struggle for the control of Islam.

The German invasion of Greece, like the preceding Italian invasion, was part of the great battle still seesawing back and forth between the Nile Valley and Tripoli. The German feint at Syria and Iraq in the spring of 1941 was likewise intended to weaken the British on the northern coast of Africa.

It was perhaps the greatest British blunder of this war—from a realistic military point of view—to go to the aid of Greece, for the sixty thousand men shattered in Greece would have been enough in all probability to enable the English to go on to Tripoli, and if they had arrived on the border of Tunis while Weygand was still in command in French Africa, Allied forces might now have stretched around the entire coast line of the African continent.

Moorehead points out also the vast ill luck which has followed General Sir Archibald Wavell. In every campaign in this war in which he has been engaged, political considerations have forced him to agree to throw away the fruits of victory just as they were ripening, or, as in the Far East, to fight a campaign under conditions of colonial politics and jealousies which made victory impossible. Concerning the decision to go to the help of Greece, Moorehead says:

> Neither Wavell in Cairo nor the War Cabinet in London alone was competent to decide. So Mr. Eden and Sir John Dill got in an aeroplane and flew to Cairo to thrash it out. They talked to Wavell, Cunninghame, Longmore. They flew to Ankara and sounded out Sarajoglou and the Turks; they went on down to Athens. Then they came back to Cairo well pleased with what they had seen and heard. General Smuts flew up from South Africa to give his advice. Little by little the opinion grew that we could risk this adventure, that we could organize another and better Gallipoli in the Balkans. It was not one man's opinion. It was certainly not Wavell's, but Wavell naturally was the man who would have to carry out the job.

And as always, in the background of these decisions (as in the recent negotiations with India) the English faced the necessity of pleasing American public opinion. "And finally America and the world could not fail to be impressed if we honored our pledge of help to the Greeks."

This book shows the Ethiopian campaign in its proper perspective in the battle of the Middle East. It was in fact prolonged only as a delaying action on the part of the Italians to try to keep as many British troops as possible from being freed for use in the western desert and Syria.

Like most keen observers who have been in parts of the world controlled by the Vichy government, Moorehead realizes the complete and basic pro-Axis feelings of most of the minions of the senile Marshal. In our dealings with Admiral Robert in the West Indies and with the Pétain regime in North Africa and Madagascar we have been all too apt to forget the Vichy brand of German perfidy as practiced in Indo-China, in French North Africa when supplies were sent to General Rommell in Libya, and in Syria by the Naziphile French administration.

Moorehead, who saw the British in action in the Middle East, as this reviewer did to a very much smaller extent, must be impatient with the childish anti-British whispering campaign in this country. He shows great admiration for the men and the leaders who barred the Axis from Islam, and looking back on it all, he would say with General Wavell, "We have had some setbacks, some successes." May American troops and generals acquit themselves as well in the months which lie ahead. PETER STEVENS

INTIMATE VIRGINIANA: A CENTURY OF MAURY TRAVELS BY LAND AND SEA. Edited by Anne Fontaine Maury. Richmond: The Dietz Press. $3.50.

The first Maury in this book was a schoolmate of Madison, Monroe, and Jefferson, and a friend of Washington, who sent him to be United States consul in Liverpool in 1786. From then until now the family which produced the first naval oceanographer has sailed, written, and corresponded with famous people. The letters and diaries printed here include some from Jefferson, Madison, and others outside the family, as well as family papers. This volume is not for general readers, except Virginians, but historians and biographers will find it worth delving into for historical sidelights on the nineteenth century from Jefferson's day to Reconstruction.

DIRECTIONS IN CONTEMPORARY LITERATURE. By Philo M. Buck, Jr. Oxford University Press. $3.

The author disarms criticism to some extent by declaring that he has not set out to pick future immortals but the most typical representatives of contemporary families of ideas in literature. Even on this principle, each man would have his own candidates. Mr. Buck's are Santayana, Hauptmann, Pirandello, Gide, Proust, O'Neill, Tagore, Aldous Huxley, Hitler, Sholokov, T. S. Eliot, Romains, Mann. It is an important subject; the author has read widely and intelligently; and the book is well written. Curiously enough, it is not very stimulating. It is a little too leisurely and not very profound. It keeps on the safe side of its subject, so to speak. In short, it is academic.

THE GREEK POLITICAL EXPERIENCE: STUDIES IN HONOR OF WILLIAM KELLY PRENTICE. Princeton University Press. $3.

This distinguished volume by fourteen classical scholars has been planned with a central theme rather than assembled in the usual miscellaneous fashion of seventieth-birthday tributes. In readable style it reviews Greek political evolution from early monarchy through democracy and the career of Alexander, with special chapters on tyranny, the ideal states of Plato and Aristotle, and other pertinent matters.

JAMES MADISON: THE VIRGINIA REVOLUTIONIST. By Irving Brant. The Bobbs-Merrill Company. $4.50.

James Madison, the "Father of the Constitution," lived for eighty-five years and filled the highest offices in the country. The present volume, the first of three projected, is a study of his formative years at home, at Princeton, and as a guiding spirit of the Revolution in Virginia. It closes with Madison's departure for Philadelphia in 1780 to enter the Continental Congress. In a leisurely style, with full documentation not only of Madison but of his place and time, Mr. Brant has produced a study resembling those of the old-fashioned genealogical biographers in its detailed approach but informed by up-to-date scholarship and balanced judgment.

DANCE

Flamenco, Spanish, and Spanish-American

CARMEN AMAYA is the real thing; she is pure gipsy, with tempestuous black hair, a red gash of a mouth, and a scrawny body that has the resilience and speed of an alley cat. Her art is flamenco—that ecstatic, tragic music and dance of the Andalusian gipsies. Composed of Eastern and indigenous Spanish elements, its strange resolution of tenderness and harshness, passion and subtlety is expressed in a tonal scale ranging from deep guttural notes to a thin, high-pitched wail. At once traditional and improvised, it is Dionysian in contrast to the Apollonian classic dance of Spain. In the latter fire and ice are balanced in a firm discipline. In flamenco they merge in a self-destructive ecstasy.

There is a bitter beauty about Carmen's slightest gesture. Her quality, like that of a dervish dancer, is one of abandonment to an inner impulse wholly identified with a traditional dance. Despite her fierce, positive gestures, she has no volition. She not only hypnotizes her audience, she is herself hypnotized. Her every gesture is a proclamation of living flesh and blood, of the personal-eternal. Her feet bite into the ground like small, quick animals driven by a devouring hunger. The supple back sweeps into low-arched turns, snapping back from the long, uncoiling gesture with sudden, impatient arrogance. Arms, legs, and torso are living fuel heaped in climax after climax on a fire that burns with unrelenting brilliance until the dance is over and the lights go out. This is the dance straight and hot from the bowels; as it is felt in the blood, not only of Carmen, but of the ancient gipsy race to which she belongs. Flamenco is as foreign to us in tradition as any art can be. Yet the intense emotions it arouses are familiar and profoundly stirring.

I only hope that Carmen does not become an "artiste." Unfortunately her manager apparently feels otherwise—which may explain the inclusion on recent programs of material so unsuited to her talents as El Amor Brujo. But even here Carmen's barbaric splendor and extraordinarily eloquent gesture emerge only slightly tarnished. Her most successful offerings, however, are the brief, characteristic ones—Ay! Que Tu, the Alegrias, and Fiesta in Seville. There is no point in grooming Amaya to be a

A Congress to Win the War

In coöperation with the Union for Democratic Action, The New Republic issues this week a special 32-page supplement "A Congress to Win the War." The voting record of every sitting Congressman who is coming up for reëlection has been examined. A chart has been made showing how each member has voted on twenty vital issues. At a glance you can see what your Congressman has done or failed to do, how every Congressman in the country has stood up under the impact of these years of decision. No comparable study of Congress, so thorough and graphic, has ever been attempted.

The war may not be won in 1942—but the peace can be! Battles as important as engagements abroad will be fought out this fall in key Congressional districts right here in America.

Who are the worst obstructionists in Congress? Who are the men who retard the war effort out of blindness or partisanship? Who are the best men—those who have seen what was needed and gone in and done it?

The most dangerous men must be defeated in November! The far seeing and courageous leaders must be returned!

Those in between, many of them competent though loyal followers of the party caucus, others mere rubber stamps or victims of unaccountable prejudice, must be sifted and judged.

This supplement can help you make up your mind and you can help others and the nation by quoting it and distributing it. Like our "Voters' Handbooks" of the past, and such supplements as "Democratic Defense" and "The Lessons of Last Time," it will be available for quantity purchase at low cost.

second Argentina. What she is more than suffices. Even tricked up in the phony flamenco of a manager's dream, she is great stuff. But Carmen straight is better still.

Juan Martínez, who appeared in the Revue Iberica at the Theresa Kaufmann Auditorium of the Y. M. H. A. several weeks ago, although not in a class with Amaya, is a fine flamenco dancer. His style is incisive, his footwork sometimes brilliant, and his whole manner disdainfully impetuous, as it should be. Only when he takes a curtain call does his terpsichorean ferocity disappear in a shy, gentle smile and faintly self-deprecatory gesture. It seems to me that he would make a far better partner for Amaya than Antonio Triana, with whom she occasionally dances. Triana's over-slick technique and all-occasion grin have transformed the Spanish zapateado into a kind of Broadway tap. Sofia Novoa, who contributed several very beautiful Spanish songs to the program, sang with a poised, intimate charm, and effortless graciousness.

In a series of performances at the Shubert Theater some weeks ago, Argentinita presented her varied and extensive program of Spanish dances. And she has now, with great fidelity and artistry, added several Latin American numbers to her repertoire. The Viejitos, or Little Old Men, is as close to the original as any theatricalized folk material can be. The music and costumes are authentic, and although the choreography of the indigenous Mexican dance has been modified for recital purposes, its quality and general pattern are largely retained. Argentinita is a pleasant dancer in the somewhat restrained, classic style. A conscious and accomplished artist, she is smooth and subtle, and has an unassuming elegance. But she unfortunately lacks the glamour without which the Spanish dance is not quite Spanish, and though her programs offer enjoyment they provide no excitement.

To return to flamenco, if you feel that way about it, you should hear Villarino, an excellent Spanish guitarist and singer. He does a few numbers at the Casita in the Village, and turns up occasionally on small recital programs. I heard him a few weeks ago at one of the Coffee Concerts at the Museum of Modern Art, where he was the only noteworthy artist on an otherwise dull patchwork program of mediocrities—one of those pretentiously intimate affairs. He plays with feeling and restraint, and he knows the popular music of Spain.

VIRGINIA MISHNUN

RECORDS

VICTOR'S April list offers one of Bach's finest works, the Sonata No. 3 for violin and clavier, played on the violin and piano by Yehudi and Hephzibah Menuhin (Set 887, $2.63). The long, sustained lines of the phrases of the opening Adagio are broken by the swells, the lilts, the rhythmic unsteadiness of Yehudi's playing—to say nothing of his lapse into sotto voce near the end; and his pace in the third movement Adagio is too fast for its proper effect. The two Allegros he plays more satisfactorily; and the mere physical sound of his tone is better—more compact and sweet—than it has been.

For those whose love for Brahms's chamber music I do not share there is the set (883, $4.73) of his Trio Op. 8—an early work with late revisions. Artur Rubinstein, Heifetz, and Feuermann play very well together; and the sound of their performance on the records is excellent, except for some rattles—even with a heavy Astatic pickup—on two of the sides.

Of Brahms there are also two rarely heard songs for alto, viola obbligato, and piano: "Gestillte Sehnsucht" and "Geistliches Wiegenlied," sung by Marian Anderson, with Primrose playing viola and Rupp at the piano (Set 882, $2.63). "Geistliches Wiegenlied" is a setting of the Lope de Vega poem in the Geibel-Heyse "Spanish Song Book" that is the text of Hugo Wolf's wonderful song "Die ihr schwebet"; but in striking contrast to the agitation of the Wolf song is the quiet of Brahms's lullaby—a quite charming adaptation of an old Christmas song. "Gestillte Sehnsucht" I find less interesting. Both are beautifully sung, played, and recorded.

Weber's Sonata No. 1, the least interesting of his piano sonatas, is played by Arrau with admirable musical style and a brilliant technique that manifests itself mostly in the unobtrusiveness with which it disposes of the difficulties of the work. The recorded sound is good, except for rattles on the fourth side.

Victor's February sets of Walton's Violin Concerto, Shostakovitch's Sixth Symphony, and Liszt's Mephisto Waltz still have not arrived; and I am hoping that I won't have to judge these orchestral recordings by their reproduction on the phonographs in record stores.

Of Columbia's April releases I have received the new recording of Brahms's Second Symphony made by Weingartner with the London Philharmonic (Set 493, $5.78). This performance, like Beecham's in the older Columbia set, offers the straightforward statement of the work that I consider most effective—except for a departure from the Weingartner steadiness of pace, in the first part of the slow movement, that is so unusual for him that it strikes the ear. As for other differences, Weingartner's more deliberate pace is better for the first movement; Beecham's less headlong one is better for the last; and his performance has the characteristic Beecham sharpness of contour and accent. The sound of the Beecham performance on the records is clear, with good balance between treble and bass; that of the Weingartner is, of course, richer, smoother, and more spacious, but with the balance tipped markedly toward the bass.

I have also received Columbia's April set (495, $3.68) of the arrangement for symphony orchestra that Jerome Kern made of his "Show Boat" music for Rodzinski, who performs it with his Cleveland Orchestra. If it is all right to play a string of waltzes by Strauss at a symphony concert it is all right to play a string of equally engaging tunes from "Show Boat"; and then there is no need to justify it, as the accompanying notes do, by verbal distinctions without factual differences—no need, that is, to contend that when the tunes are strung together in the order in which they occur with the stage action, and the sequence is called a scenario and is scored for symphony orchestra, then the result is not a potpourri but a summary of the story in musical language and "a new form dictated by the elaborate resources of a symphony orchestra." (There is need, rather, of giving the story for those who, like myself, happen not to have seen either the stage or the screen version.) The performance is excellent; the recording is Columbia's best achievement—as beautiful in sound as the one of Mahler's First, but without its rattles or break-ups.

The Hargail Recorder Music Publishers have issued a set of two 10-inch discs ($2.63)—one (MW101) with five little English duets for alto recorders, the other (MW102) with a Sonata by Schickhardt for alto recorders and harpsichord. Those who play the recorder themselves may get more enjoyment from the music than I do, and will want to know that it seems to be played well by Alfred Mann and Anton Winkler (recorders) and Edith Weiss-Mann (harpsichord).

Letters to the Editors

It's Time to Get Tough

Dear Sirs: I want to commend your attitude on the suppression of the anti-democratic pamphlets, magazines, and speeches of our fascists, whose primary aim is not freedom of speech and press to improve our democratic form of government but freedom to destroy it. As you said in your able rebuttal of Roger Baldwin's fear, we are fighting a war to survive, and liberties must be curtailed in order that we may use all our energies for winning the war; peace-time privileges and licenses must go by the board along with the slogan "business as usual."

It is lamentable that many of our educators and intellectuals, such as Dr. John Haynes Holmes, Robert Hutchins, Norman Thomas, Senator La Follette, Oswald Garrison Villard, and others, have so feared the effects of a war upon our economy that they became blind to the actual facts confronting us, and could imagine that pompous pronouncements would dissipate the danger of war. Such men have proved incapable of being true leaders of the liberal elements of our country. In my opinion, the acts of such bankrupt liberals have retarded our preparation for this war as effectively as the acts of a person in the pay of our enemies could have done. Possibly these men now see the error of their ways, but in my judgment they failed to serve properly during a critical period and thus defaulted on their obligations.

It is high time for us to get "tough" and do those things which are essential for winning this war, regardless of our peace-time rights.

Attention Roger Baldwin

Dear Sirs: I have sent the following letter to the American Civil Liberties Union to explain why I am not renewing my membership.

> I cannot support your attacks on the methods employed by the Administration in banning Social Justice. I can appreciate your contention that a government that acts against a dangerous minority today can likewise act against a defenseless minority tomorrow, and that any action taken must be one in which the minority's civil rights will be protected by the courts. But if the fascists got into power, all your impartial policies would be knocked into a cocked hat; as a matter of fact the Civil Liberties Union would be the first to feel the ax because its purposes and methods are dangerous to the functioning of the totalitarian state. Wake up, Mr. Baldwin, not to your moral responsibilities, which you bend backward in upholding—but to the stark realism of the present. Do not make the mistake of trying to save the withered tip of a small branch of the tree of liberty, when it is being attacked at the roots.

Mr. Bates Answers His Critic

Dear Sirs: Mr. Taylor's right to disagree with the military analysis contained in my article What's Right with Britain is indisputable. But he should not simplify his case by attributing to me views which are not expressed in that article and which I certainly do not hold. In his letter in your issue of April 25 he writes, "Mr. Bates believes that the 130 divisions in England, in addition to the Home Guard, must remain there for home protection." In astonishment I quote my own words, that "while the Britain of 1942, I believe, will have so far passed the mark of defense that it might open a new front, it cannot risk an engagement with the total German forces not occupied in Russia." That, surely, is explicit enough. Later Mr. Taylor says, "While an attack in the West may not, indeed, be possible at this time, Mr. Bates's figures tend to indicate the contrary." Exactly, they were intended to indicate the contrary, and define the limit of expectation. I confess surprise at Mr. Taylor's apparently wavering faith in his doctrine.

I shall not attempt to answer such unsupported assertions as "This tonnage ratio [of two and one-half tons of shipping per man for a Continental invasion] is obviously incorrect" except to say that the error is not obvious and that Mr. Taylor's daring, while admirable, does not provide ships. Nor, by the way, did I argue that Britain's tonnage lack was an insuperable bar to all aggressive action.

And I must protest against Mr. Taylor's distortion of my argument when he writes, "Instead of using the British army for the purpose of attack on the Continent—with American reinforcements—Mr. Bates recommends that additional forces be sent to Libya and Suez." I recommend nothing of the sort. Nor should I care to argue, as my critic appears to do, that the Mediterranean regions and the Continent may be considered alternative battlefields.

Permit me to summarize my views thus:

1. Britain's tremendous achievement, secured at staggering cost, is that it has passed the mark of adequate defense.

2. I believe that Britain has sufficient aggressive power to open, not a second front, for that exists and is preventing Hitler from throwing the whole of his army against Russia, but a new front, perhaps a plurality of them. These new fronts would need vast reinforcements later in order to administer the final blow.

3. I reject all arguments based merely on the belief that we must win victory in 1942 or never. They imply that the Soviets will collapse this summer unless the United Nations can engage the entirety of the German army not occupied in resisting the Red Army.

4. It is the consequence partly of geographic facts and partly of political ones over which the Churchill government has had no control that the greater part of the land fighting now falls to the Soviet Union. Therefore the other United Nations should guarantee recompense to Russia and aid in the post-war reconstruction of that country.

"The Human Understanding Perplexes Itself"

Dear Sirs: Jacques Barzun's unhelpful review of I. A. Richards's twin books on April 25 provokes comment on several counts; but not because it is provocative. Mr. Barzun shows as little inclination to argument as the readers to whom he says the new "Republic" will not appeal. We might well enough borrow his own words to state his attitude to "How to Read a Page." "The way of arguing can hardly be made attractive to those who do not already feel some liking for the enterprise."

What does call for consideration is the position Mr. Barzun takes between the books he speaks of and those who might read them with profit. Easy reading of his complaints may leave the impression: (1) that only a man "aglow with pedagogical earnestness" would think everyone should read Plato; (2) that "How to Read a Page" was meant to be an easy book to read, and failed; (3) that Richards himself can't write, never mind read; that he has "no ear," inner or outer or both; (4) that he is furthermore a pedant.

Views on whether Plato has or has not "said the last word" on any subject may be arrived at only through reading him. Mr. Richards would like more people to do so, and thinks his text may help. Mr. Barzun replies that the "lowbrow" will have a taste only for familiar ideas, never mind the vocabulary, and then refers to "Plato's Spartan regime, with class barriers," etc. Is he indulging himself in this little historical cliché to keep people from learning anything from Plato direct, and must we assume that a liking for new ideas and argument in writing cannot be started in those who haven't it already?

It seems strange that, in commenting upon hardness in reading, Mr. Barzun does not allude to what is said about it in "How to Read a Page." For instance: "It is the hard sentences and paragraphs which can do us good, as readers; our mental gums need strengthening. But the hardness must be of the right sort. . . ." "There is a common saying that what is written with difficulty is read with ease and another of the opposite effect. These seem as misleading as any such sayings."

And again, this time a sympathetic anticipation of Mr. Barzun's perplexities: "Most of the remedies, in fact, for feared obscurity are worse than the disease, and my explanations may well be harder to understand than the passage I am elucidating. No matter. It is the exercise in attending to its own doings which strengthens the reading mind."

The pronouncement on Mr. Richards's own style is perhaps not worth a comment. Mr. Barzun quite evidently sees no distinction between precision in the use of words and the pedantry of "correct usage." His reference to Butler as supplying the definitive reasons for contemporary speech-modes in translation without saying what they are is warning enough of this.

And as to "Francis of Verulam's Great Instauration," the best-known edition (Bohn, 1864) gives the book that title. There was no pedantry in quoting from it; only a reminder that the age which realized Bacon's dream thought of "mighty Verulam" so. "Francis of Verulam thought thus, and such is the method which he determined within himself, and which he thought

Bombard Dies Now!

Dear Sirs: You are absolutely correct in saying about Martin Dies, "If the Texan is to be stopped, laborites and liberals will have to organize now, not wait until a few weeks before his request for a new appropriation comes up next year." Citizens who wish to forestall the wasteful and obstructionist activities of Dies might be organized into units to be known as the "Martin Bombers"—the idea being to bombard both Dies and Congress with criticism of Dies's work. End Divided Allegiance!

Dear Sirs: I am addressing the following petition to the Secretary of State at Washington:

I respectfully petition that in the treaty of peace which will end the present war the United States shall demand, in lieu of such indemnities as it may be undesirable to insist on, universal recognition of the validity of naturalization.

We have too long acquiesced in the contention of certain powers—eminent among which have been Italy and, in very recent years, Germany—that allegiance to them had an inalienable quality, so that their former citizens or subjects, when they had been duly and in good faith naturalized as Americans, nevertheless remained subject to all the obligations and liabilities of their former allegiance. The coming treaty of peace will be a good time to end this scandal.

Some action for this purpose is demanded not only by the interests and self-respect of the United States but by consideration for the rights of man; for it is a right of man to choose his own political association, subject to the assent of those with whom he desires to associate himself, but not necessarily depending on the assent of those from whom he desires to dissociate himself.

When we permit American citizens to be held inescapably bound to the service of a foreign power whose allegiance they have voluntarily renounced, we are acquiescing in a form of slavery for United States citizens.

The Shape of Things

BY ITS ENVELOPING MOVEMENT AROUND Kharkov the Red Army has seized the initiative in the opening round of the 1942 Battle of Russia. Although it is not easy to follow the course of the fighting from the meager Russian communiqués, Marshal Timoshenko appears to have adopted the favorite German strategy of driving wedges into the enemy lines with the immediate objective of forcing evacuation of Kharkov, which the Reichswehr fortified strongly during the winter. If this aim is achieved, the Russians will regain control of the vital network of railroads which center in this city and will imperil the whole system of German communications with the Crimea and the eastern Ukraine. Thus the local and as yet incomplete success of the German-Rumanian forces at Kerch would be nullified. The Germans have acknowledged both the importance of the Kharkov battle and the strength of the Russian drive by throwing in large tank forces, but Moscow claims that all counter-attacks have been repulsed. On the rest of the vast Russian front comparative inactivity continues, but it can hardly be long before the huge opposing armies clash all along the line. Last summer Hitler was able to push forward in Russia with little concern for his rear in Western Europe. This year he cannot neglect the menacing possibility of a United Nations invasion—a possibility which looms larger with the arrival of new and fully equipped American contingents in Northern Ireland. When and where the blow will fall is information Berlin would dearly love to receive. For the present we must content ourselves with Sir Stafford Cripps's assurance that "the time is at hand when we must prepare ourselves to take the offensive in the decisive stages of the war."

AMERICAN NEWSPAPERMEN WHO HAVE BEEN interned in Germany and are now being repatriated have cabled from Lisbon much detailed information of conditions in the Third Reich as it braces itself for a supreme effort to conquer Russia. Their reports tend to confirm the findings of Fritz Sternberg, who in an article on page 595 analyzes the causes of the increasing economic strain to which Germany is being subjected. A reduction in rations, shortage of clothing, and the suppression of the last amenities of life have served to depress the Germans and to warn them that the third year of this war may prove uncomfortably similar to 1917, when every victory only served to bring defeat nearer. A correspondent of the New York Times writing from Stockholm points out that in 1940 the Nazi propaganda slogan was "We have won." In 1941 it changed to "We will win"; and now there is yet a third—"We must win." There have been two major causes for this new mood with its undertones of desperation—the entry of America into the war and the toll of the Russian winter campaign. Louis P. Lochner, former Associated Press correspondent in Berlin, declares that the Germans were dumbfounded when Hitler, reversing his previous political strategy, declared war on the United States. They are not impressed by the constant propaganda efforts to depreciate America's capacity to wage war. They know what happened last time, and they have a shivering respect for American resources and mechanical skill. But if the Germans are gloomy they are not defeated, nor are they ripe for revolt, as the returning correspondents do well to remind us. The economic squeeze from which they are now suffering may already be reducing fighting efficiency. But only a resounding defeat of the still immensely strong Reichswehr can bring about a collapse.

EVEN IN ITALY, WHERE CONDITIONS ARE FAR more desperate and where the whole population is deeply conscious of the fact that Italy has lost the war no matter what its outcome, there is no sign of general revolt, according to returning correspondents. The foundations of fascism have been almost eaten away by the corruption and inefficiency of the Fascists, but the building is being shored up by the German army and police, and until they are forced to withdraw, its final disintegration is likely to be postponed. Herbert L. Matthews reports that the Germans are everywhere in Italy. They make no effort to hide their contempt for the Italians, and the Italians repay them with intense hatred. The wealth piled up by the party big-wigs and the industrialists, who have always cooperated with the regime, is a further cause of bitterness. Mussolini, Mr. Matthews reports, is less hated than despised as a fool who made a bad guess when he jumped into the war. Even his "victory" over France has turned out to be hollow, for it is clear that his boss Hitler has no intention of disturbing Vichy by awarding Italy the prizes of Corsica, Tunisia, and Nice.

NEWS FROM THE BURMA FRONT IS STILL confused. But although the Chinese continue to hold up the Japanese advance in certain sectors, it is evident that the enemy has succeeded in consolidating his hold over the greater part of the country as well as over most of the strategic centers on the Chinese side of the border. Now that the British have completely evacuated Burma, correspondents attached to their forces have been permitted to send dispatches explaining the defeat. They attribute the disaster chiefly to the refusal of the Colonial Government to permit the Chinese to enter Burma until the fate of Rangoon was sealed. Other factors were the failure to send air reinforcements until the Japanese had completely gained the upper hand, the diversion of two Australian divisions intended for Burma to Australia, and panic among the native population. It is possible that the lack of air support was due to conditions which could not be remedied. But mismanagement clearly underlay the other factors contributing to the defeat. The Chinese were not admitted because an unfavorable reaction from the Burmese was feared. Yet there is no evidence that the Burmese population actually resented the Chinese when they did come. As in Malaya, Britain's errors were those of an unregenerate colonial power. No effort was made to mobilize the Burmese for their own defense, or apparently even to train them in air-raid precautions. Unfortunately it is the Chinese, who bear no blame for the disaster, who must pay the heaviest price for the loss of Burma.

NEWS FROM THE SHIPPING FRONT WAS GOOD this past week. Shipbuilding from January 1 to May 10 was fully up to schedule, according to a report submitted to the President by Admiral Land, war-shipping chief. The United States, Admiral Land declares, has been building ships "faster than ever before in the history of the world." But although it looks as if the President's seemingly impossible quota of 8,000,000 tons of merchant shipping would be reached this year, recent sinkings have been so heavy that this will not be enough. So far this year 191 United Nations merchant vessels have been sunk, while only 120 new vessels have been put into service in this country. And if offensives are to be developed in Europe and the Pacific, the need for ships will be greatly increased. As if in answer to the need, the Maritime Commission has announced that on Friday, May 22, National Maritime Day, thirty new ships will be launched, making a total of fifty this month. A further optimistic note is added by the agreement that has just been reached at the National Shipbuilding Stabilization Conference fixing the basic wage for skilled mechanics in the shipyards of the entire country at $1.20 an hour, an increase of 7 per cent over the previous wage. This will eliminate threatened difficulties due to wage differentials. The workers not only accepted what, in many cases, was a smaller wage increase than was provided in their union contracts, but agreed to take the increase in war bonds. May we suggest that the owners of the shipyards, who are known to be making good profits, take a hint from their workers and agree to invest all earnings above a fixed minimum in bonds?

HOW ACTING PRESIDENT CASTILLO OF Argentina is carrying out his program of "neutrality" has been freshly demonstrated through information from Buenos Aires about the recent activities of the Argentine Nationalist Party. Like the puppet statesmen of Europe, Señor Castillo undoubtedly thought that solemn assurances of non-partisanship in the conflict, followed by a few amiable concessions to the United Nations in questions of minor importance, were sufficient to cover a pro-Axis policy. But if there was still anybody who felt tempted to trust the Argentine "Gauleiter" when last December he proclaimed, always in the name of neutrality, a state of siege, his unscrupulous behavior during the March elections could not deceive the silliest appeaser. While the Radical and Socialist candidates were not permitted, under the emergency decrees, to make the slightest reference to foreign policy, the Argentine Nationalist Party indulged in scandalous and open agitation in favor of the Axis powers. It was not surprising, therefore, once the elections were over, to see the Nationalists, whom the Congressional Committee of Investigation had denounced as a Nazi organization, become the masters of the streets. Their meetings and demonstrations and the Hitlerite performances of their leader, Manuel Fresco, the powerful former Governor of the Province of Buenos Aires, have all the flavor of the days that, in Europe, preceded the coming to power of fascist regimes.

ODELL WALLER IS A NEGRO SHARE-CROPPER of Pittsylvania County, Virginia, who shot his landlord after an argument over the division of crops. Although Waller pleaded that he had acted in self-defense, he was found guilty of first-degree murder and sentenced to death. The evidence surrounding the shooting itself is confused and contradictory, and it is not impossible that the killing was premeditated. The fact is, however, that no recent case has served so well to highlight the evils of the poll-tax system. Charged with a crime for which he might have to die, Waller was denied the fundamental American right of trial by a jury of his peers. Since only voters are eligible for jury duty, and only those who pay the poll tax may vote, not one of the talesmen shared Waller's social and economic status. More than half of the men on the jury that was finally chosen were landlords who rented to tenants like Waller. Under the circumstances the Workers' Defense League decided that the Waller case was an excellent opportunity not only to help a man get a fair trial but also to test the constitutionality of the poll tax. Two years of litigation have brought the case to the Supreme Court, which is now for the second time being petitioned to review the evidence. Governor Darden of Virginia has humanely stayed Waller's execution until June 19 in order to give his lawyers more time. A review of the case by the court would be more than a simple act of justice to the condemned man; it would be a reassurance to the Negro population, which has been embittered by discrimination in the war effort and such episodes as the Sojourner Truth riots, that the country which asks them to fight is trying to give them a fairer deal.

TWO "LIBERAL" PATENT DECISIONS HANDED down by the Supreme Court in the Masonite and Univis Lens cases only serve to underscore the need for enacting S 2491, the new Bone-La Follette-O'Mahoney patents bill. The court's decisions will make it difficult, if not impossible, to use patents to enforce resale prices. But the court sidestepped the government's plea that it overrule the old General Electric decision granting a limited monopoly to patent holders and chose not to decide the question of whether a patent holder had the right to suppress his patent. The Bone-La Follette-O'Mahoney bill goes much farther than the War Patents bill previously introduced by the same Senators. It is designed to prevent the use of patents to fix prices and to prevent the suppression of patents. Unfortunately, the section on suppression leaves too much discretion in the hands of the Commissioner of Patents and too many loopholes for clever lawyers. The new bill is an improvement on the old one, but what we still need is a measure for compulsory licensing of all patents at reasonable royalty rates to be determined by an administrative body. Nothing less will end the evils of patent monopolies.

WOMEN WILL BE TAKEN INTO THE ARMY for the first time in history as a result of the passage of Representative Edith Nourse Rogers's bill setting up a Women's Auxiliary Army Corps of 150,000 volunteers. The first step in the organization of the corps was taken with the appointment of Mrs. Oveta Culp Hobby as director, with the rank of major. For the moment it is intended that the women shall perform only such noncombatant services as typing, cooking, baking, and clerical work, but it is probable that the range of these activities will be constantly expanded. In Britain women are serving in ground crews for the R. A. F. and, in some instances, are actually operating anti-aircraft guns. In Russia and China women are performing technical duties close to the front. The WAAC is a start in the right direction, but it is evident that we shall have to make far greater use of women before we can even begin to talk of total warfare. Registration of women is being violently opposed by certain church groups as endangering the "sanctity of the American home." Yet it is certain that an Axis victory would destroy all that is most worth conserving in American life—including the home.

The Rationing Muddle

IN CONTRAST to sugar rationing, gasoline rationing in the Eastern states has not been accepted gracefully by the general public. But it is folly to accuse the man on the street of lack of patriotism or failure to recognize the seriousness of the war because he is disgruntled by the way the gasoline shortage has been handled. If he feels there is something wrong with the rationing scheme, it is probably because the plan has been badly worked out or because the government has done a bad job of popular education.

As a matter of fact, in both these respects the job was bungled in Washington. Even government officials who are responsible for the system adopted admit that serious and needless mistakes have been made. The bungling started last summer when a temporary shortage in transport facilities was exaggerated, and the public, instead of receiving full information and being asked to cooperate, was lectured on the enormity of "jackrabbit starting." This approach caused resentment, which grew when it became clear that the shortage could have been minimized by the mobilization of tank cars. Then came the conflicting stories this spring regarding the severity of the proposed rationing system. This time Secretary Ickes gave a relatively optimistic picture of the gasoline situation, while an unnamed OPA spokesman frightened people by intimating that everyone would have to get along on two and one-half gallons a week.

Thus the gasoline rationing program had two strikes called against it before it was announced. But as it proved to be more liberal than people had expected, it might have been accepted without difficulty if it had not contained several serious technical weaknesses. The most important of these was the failure to put gasoline use clearly on a need basis. People were not asked whether they had to use their car in going to work or whether they had to use their car in business, but whether they did use their car for these purposes. The result was confusion mixed with a considerable amount of bitterness. Many persons who accepted A cards because they did not have to use their cars for business were bitter when they found that some of their neighbors, who could equally well switch to other forms of transportation, had asked for and received B or even X cards. Feeling was particularly bitter in the country because no gasoline was allowed to enable a family to make a weekly or semiweekly shopping trip, though it might be allowed to obtain feed for cattle or chickens.

Some of these difficulties could have been avoided if the OPA had sent out more precise instructions; others, if car owners had been compelled to prove need before obtaining a B or X card. Even now it is probable that much unnecessary use of cars could be prevented by a public listing of all holders of B and X cards, as suggested by the President, coupled with action compelling all cars to carry a letter on their windshields showing the ration classification of their owners. This would bring public opinion to bear on offenders, and the presence of a car with an X or a B at a seashore resort or sporting event could then automatically become a matter for investigation.

Another serious technical weakness in the scheme may be found in the failure to provide any check on the gasoline dealer. As the plan stands, there is no way of knowing definitely whether a gasoline dealer is actually limiting his sales to the three gallons per unit specified by the OPA. Each filling station is limited in the amount of gasoline that it may obtain, but there is no real check on the dealer who fills up the tanks of favored customers. In contrast, the dealer in sugar must deliver coupons for every pound of sugar he gets from the wholesaler, and the wholesaler must produce coupons in getting his supplies from the refiner. There is also reason to question the advisability of allowing the unrestricted purchase of gasoline after rationing had been announced. Fortunately, gasoline is difficult to hoard, but even so a considerable number of people appear to have filled all their available containers in the week before May 15. Hoarding cannot be stopped either by OPA injunctions or by calling it unpatriotic. It can best be circumvented by clamping down restrictions without advance notice.

The worst aspect of the gasoline muddle is its effect on the whole rationing and price-control program. The public has been unnecessarily antagonized, and it is in no mood to accept further restrictions even though these are very much in the interest of the ordinary man. Little effort has been made to tell the average person in simple comprehensible language the reasons why rationing is necessary, or why it has been done in the way that it has. He has not been told why, for example, rationing is necessary in the Eastern states and not in western Pennsylvania, Ohio, and Indiana. Above all, he has not been made to feel that in inaugurating a rationing program the government is acting in his interest as an ordinary consumer.

This, of course, is a failure in public relations and a serious one. The root of the difficulty is a misconception of rationing that lies deep in popular thinking. We did not have rationing in this country in the last war, and most people have associated it with privation and bread lines. Actually, of course, it is intended to forestall these things. It is a device to prevent the well-to-do from hoarding unlimited amounts of scarce articles while the average person goes without. Essentially, it is democratic and fair. Everyone, rich or poor, commoner or official, is placed on the same footing. We can be very sure that if we did not have a system of rationing for tires, gasoline, and sugar the public would very soon be demanding it. But this is precisely where the OPA has blundered. It has not given the public a chance to demand rationing because it has not told it the facts or permitted it to experience, even mildly, the results of scarcity where there is no rationing.

The President himself is partially responsible for this mistake in emphasis. His latest fireside talk was skilfully designed to kindle the fires of patriotism in the American people and to prepare them for sacrifices. But in listing rationing along with higher taxes, stabilization of wages, and sacrificial bond-buying as part of a seven-point program for controlling inflation, the public was given the impression that rationing was simply another hardship that would have to be borne stoically. Similarly, price control—designed solely to protect consumers against the hardships of inflation—was received as if it were something to be endured for the sake of the boys abroad. This interpretation has been encouraged by the anti-Roosevelt press; but Mr. Roosevelt failed to counter it with the skill that is at his command.

Undoubtedly, the public must be prepared to accept sacrifices for the sake of the war effort. These sacrifices will probably be greater than any but a few anticipate at this time. But no great campaign is necessary to prepare people to accept these hardships. By and large, they will accept anything asked of them if they are sure of two points: (1) that it is necessary; (2) that they are not being called upon to make larger sacrifices than their neighbors. The gasoline program has been mismanaged on both counts. Fortunately, it is a temporary program designed only to last to July 1. The six weeks remaining before the creation of a permanent system should allow ample time to remedy the defects and to permit a really good job to be done in telling the public why these drastic steps are being taken. The success of the war effort, in so far as it is dependent on morale, rests to a considerable extent on the skill with which government handles these two tasks.

"Post-War" Planning—Dollar-a-Year Style

WE ARE beginning to pay a heavy price for leaving the mobilization of industry in the hands of business men. In a series of behind-the-scenes decisions the War Production Board has abandoned or curtailed one plan after another for the expansion of industrial capacity. Because we lack the steel to build new steel plants, plans to expand steel capacity by some 15,000,000 tons have been reduced to less than 5,000,000. The new policy is to sacrifice expansion of facilities for making both materials and arms to the immediate need for more steel and copper and other metals to meet the President's huge production quotas for planes, ships, and tanks. The new policy is the fruit of necessity, not strategy, and may mean even greater shortages in 1944 and 1945. But it will please the steel and machine-tool industries, both of which have fought expansion as a menace to monopolistic combinations and "stable prices."

The successful rear-guard action fought by the steel interests against expansion makes it more necessary than ever to put the mobilization of industry in independent hands. Rationalization of the steel industry along the lines of the Murray plan would increase ultimate output. The copper industry is still operating at far less than capacity, and labor's suggestions for increasing its production are still being ignored. In the durable-goods industries drastic reorganization of the WPB's structure is even more necessary. For if we are to build no more new plants for planes and tanks and fewer new ways for ships, it is all the more essential to have complete conversion of civilian durable-goods facilities, to spread orders to small business, and to use new short-cut methods in production, notably in shipbuilding. Though the facts are being kept as secret as possible to shield business from criticism, insiders at the WPB are beginning to realize that conversion is far from achieved. Most of the "war goods" now coming from the automobile, radio, and other civilian industries are normal products and parts on order for the army, navy, and lease-lend.

An exception to the new policy will be plants for making synthetic rubber, explosives, and high-octane gas. Here there is need for breaking the hold of the great oil, chemical, alcohol, and rubber combines on the program in order to cut down its cost in materials and time. The petroleum process for making synthetic rubber seems to be the most roundabout and the most costly in steel and other materials; yet the RFC and the WPB are still fighting against production from alcohol to be made in turn from surplus grain. Were independent men put in charge of these programs and representatives of big business reduced to their proper role as consultants, much time and precious material could be saved. A similar shake-up and a similar new approach are needed to reorganize the railroads for war. Business-as-usual practices in railroading continue with little check, and as a result the building of unnecessary new freight cars is eating up much valuable steel plate and using railroad-equipment shops which should be at work on our lagging tank program. Railroad-equipment shops are ideally suited for tank production, but a major part of their output is still freight cars. New freight cars would be unnecessary if wasteful duplication and competition in railroad service were eliminated.

Another corollary of the new policy is to concentrate making of replacement parts for the civilian durable-goods industries in one or two plants for the duration. Here commercial rivalries and a desire to protect well-advertised brand names are obstacles to productive efficiency. The WPB has just taken its first tentative step toward concentration in the tiny domestic cook-stove industry, but in the meantime valuable materials are still being chewed up for replacement parts in automobile, radio, and other plants. Steel's opposition to expansion, like automobile and radio reluctance to embark on complete conversion, reflects industry's concern with a kind of "post-war planning." Too many business men who are more worried about their competitive position after the war than about winning the war occupy too many of the key positions on the War Production Board.

McCormick's Gas Attack

BY FREDA KIRCHWEY

TO BE attacked by the Chicago Tribune and its satellite, the Washington Times-Herald, is an honor; to be lied about by them is routine. When the Tribune calls an organization or a person Communist, one can assume that it—or he, or she—is pro-war, pro-democratic, and probably pro-Administration. So the Union for Democratic Action and the New Republic and the editor of The Nation, who share this label in a recent blast published by the Tribune and the Times-Herald, can congratulate themselves on their record and their common enemy. In a small way it is like having one's books burned by the Nazis.

The occasion of the attack was the appearance of the excellent supplement to the New Republic on the coming Congressional elections, prepared in the Washington office of the Union for Democratic Action. The supplement summarized the position on all major issues of the present Congress, man by man, showing clearly the obstructionism of a large proportion of the Republicans. In this summary the votes and words of those Representatives and Senators dearest to the isolationist hearts of Pattersons and McCormicks alike shone out with intense luminosity. To dim the glaring effect the Tribune sought to smear the organization and the journal which prepared and published the facts. The writer made the McCormick honor roll only as an official of the U. D. A. but was treated to a rather special dose of lies. The technique is one the Nazis have used from the beginning of their fight for power. It has been made familiar in this country by Mr. Dies and his henchman, Mr. Matthews. You call your opponent a Communist knowing well he is nothing of the sort. That tends to discredit him among those who know little about him and scares off persons who might otherwise be persuaded by his arguments to join his side. And by extension, the false label attached to your opponent gradually fastens itself to the man or party he supports; so when Mr. Dies calls some New Dealer a Communist, the attack is indirectly aimed at the New Deal itself and through it at the President.

The charge that The Nation follows the Communist line answers itself; the charge that the Union for Democratic Action or its officers have any connection with Communist or "front" organizations is categorically untrue. The question that immediately presents itself is the question raised by every similar smear. At whom or what is the Chicago Tribune aiming? In this case the answer is easy. The isolationists see the handwriting on the walls of next November's election booths. And the words written there echo the title of The Nation's series of stories about Quisling candidates: Keep Them Out! The Tribune isn't interested in attacking Communists, real or imaginary. It is interested in electing to Congress those Representatives and Senators—like Day and Brooks in Illinois—who can be counted upon to work for a limited, nationalist war instead of the total war to which this nation is committed, and to prepare the way for an isolationist peace. That is the policy of the Pattersons and McCormicks and of the men whose record is set down in the U. D. A. report. To pack Congress with those men is a necessity if the policy is to be translated into action. Such is the aim of the Tribune's gas attack.

But the lies directed by these newspapers at The Nation and its editor and the New Republic and the U. D. A. are relatively unimportant. The disturbing aspect of the attack is the inclusion of an alleged report on the U. D. A. taken from the files of the State Department. This scurrilous document is described by I. F. Stone in his Washington letter on the next page. Its publication raises a question that calls for an immediate answer from the highest officials of the department: How did this collection of false statements get into the department files, and, once there, how did it get out? Mr. Stone quotes the department's information chief as saying that "anything" might be in the files; and this of course is true. But if the report were merely the unsolicited outpouring of some crank, how did it come into the possession of a Chicago Tribune reporter—a man who, incidentally, has been the medium of at least one other major leak? Casual crank letters in department files are seldom, I should think, turned over to newspaper men to be used in attacks on private citizens and organizations. And why, even if this document was a serious item in the State Department's dossier on "communistic activities," should it have been put at the disposal of newspapers which devote their major efforts to attacking and obstructing the policy supposedly made and administered in that department?

The Chicago Tribune in another column spoke slightingly of the "Life-Time-Fortune axis." Far more interesting than an "axis" discovered within a single publishing house would be an alliance between Administration officials, small or large, and private anti-Administration interests. Is there a McCormick-Patterson-State Department axis? The answer can only come from Washington.

Washington Notes

BY I. F. STONE

Washington, May 18

SOME time ago a minor official at the State Department who is supposed to be in charge of anti-Nazi work of some sort dropped dark hints to a friend of mine about "the most dangerous man in America." This tantalizingly sinister creature, when his name was finally coaxed from the State Department sleuth, turned out to be Frank Kingdon, the clergyman who is president of the Union for Democratic Action. The conversation took place shortly after Kingdon and other officials of the U. D. A. had had the temerity to criticize the department's attitude toward the "so-called" Free French. It may comfort the Free French to know that they are held in no greater odium by some State Department officials than are the free Americans.

On Saturday the Chicago Tribune and the Washington Times-Herald ran an attack on the U. D. A., the New Republic supplement on Congress, Freda Kirchwey, and The Nation. The Nation was described as a "proletarian organ which closely follows the Communist Party line." The Chicago Tribune story reprinted a report which purported to come from the files of the State Department. It described the U. D. A. as "an aggregation of persons whose chief claim to public attention is their long record of affiliation with the front organizations of the Communist Party." In addition to Miss Kirchwey and Dr. Kingdon, the report named Reinhold Niebuhr and A. Philip Randolph among the reds, a classification that must puzzle the Daily Worker.

"Even more sinister than the past records of the Union's members," the supposed State Department report continues, "is the objective of the group." And what is the sinister purpose of the group? "That objective may be summarized briefly," the document says, "as the utilization of America's war crisis for the purpose of effecting what the Union believes to be a program of social gains." There are people who might bring the same indictment against the Four Freedoms. It would surprise no one to learn that some of those people are in the State Department.

Chesly Manly, who wrote the Chicago Tribune story, insisted that the report is in the "communistic activities" file at the State Department. Michael J. McDermott, chief of the department's Division of Current Information, said that he was unable to find any trace of such a document in the department but hesitated to issue a denial until he was sure. McDermott suggested that "anything" might be "in the files" of the State Department. I am inclined to agree with him, though in a somewhat different sense. It would be interesting to know how Manly obtained the document and the extent to which State Department officials cooperate with the appeasement press.

New Dealers, have greeted with approval and relief the President's courageous action in commuting Earl Browder's sentence. Communist influence remains at a low ebb among the liberal and left intellectuals of the Administration, and the party is unlikely ever to recover the influence it exercised in the days of the Popular Front, but Browder's continued imprisonment weighed on the New Deal's conscience. Few here denied, in private, that he was sent to jail for his views on the war, that the charges against him were tenuous, the sentence excessive. It is hoped that there will be a pardon after the fall elections and that the petty and spiteful deportation proceedings against Mrs. Browder will be dropped. With the Browder case out of the way, there remains only the prosecution of the Trotskyites in Minneapolis to haunt our speeches about free government.

Praise is due Administration Leader Barkley for his successful fight in the Senate to eliminate a provision from the Independent Offices Appropriation bill which would have had the effect of discharging Goodwin Watson from the Federal Communications Commission. Senator Barkley's appeal to his colleagues on the Watson case was in the best tradition of the United States Senate. Senator Barkley attacked the appropriations provision as an interference with an executive function, as in the nature of a bill of attainder, and as an interference with free expression at a time when we are "raising an army of five or six or seven million men . . . to fight to preserve the right of free speech in this country, the right of men to think and to express their thoughts." One of the accusations against Dr. Watson is that he once visited the Soviet Union, a fact regarded in some quarters as evidence of what the Japanese call "dangerous thoughts." "I visited Russia in 1930," Senator Barkley said, "and I found some things in Russia which I commended, and I did it publicly when I returned. That did not mean I favored the Russian system or that I believed in communism. . . . I think what is happening now on the eastern front is a tribute to some of the improvements the Russian government has made among the Russian people." Senators Lucas of Illinois, Murdock of Utah, Danaher of Connecticut, Hill of Alabama, Murray of Montana, Mead of New York, and Pepper of Florida deserve honorable mention for the able support they gave Senator Barkley during the debate.

I note that Patent No. 2,281,613, a process for speeding the production of synthetic Buna rubber, has been granted to Heinz Wollthan of Marl-Drewer and Wilhelm Becker of Cologne-Mulheim, Germany, and assigned to Jasco, Inc., "a Louisiana corporation." Jasco was organized jointly by I. G. Farben and Standard Oil in 1930 to hold certain patents, including those for making Buna rubber. "After the outbreak of the present World War," the Department of Justice charged in its anti-trust suit against Standard, "Standard and I. G. entered into negotiations to avoid having the Jasco patents, including the Buna patents, seized by the countries with which Germany was at war." The patents were assigned to Jasco "subject to reversion to I. G. under suitable conditions," presumably after the war was over and the patents could no longer be seized. Apparently the United States Patent Office is still issuing to Germans new patents which are then in turn assigned to Jasco.

Presumably this new patent, like other Buna patents, will be made available to other American companies properly introduced to Jesse Jones by Standard Oil. I call attention to it because the new suit filed by the government against the international dyestuffs trust discloses how easily and quickly the Germans came back into control of our dyestuffs industry after the last war, thanks to the complacency of the Alien Property Custodian, the connivance of the Chemical Foundation, and the cooperation of the du Pont interests. The materials which go into dyestuffs also go into munitions, and this international trust tended to restrict our potential preparedness for war. The German government before 1914 as before 1939 was well aware of the way in which monopolistic tendencies in other countries could be harnessed to the chariot of German imperialism. This new rubber patent granted Germans and assigned to Jasco may indicate that the old partnership is still at work, despite the war.

Europe's Underground Press

BY MICHAEL DE CAPITE

A FEW minutes after Congress declared war against Germany and Italy, WRUL in Boston, WGY in Schenectady, and BBC in London flashed the word to the occupied countries by short-wave radio. In Italy the illegal station Voce Libera heard it; in Yugoslavia, Station Sumadija; in Czecho-Slovakia, Nazdar; in Poland, Chief; in Holland, Flitspult; in Norway, Frihets Sender; in Germany, the Freedom stations. These powerful illegal radios rebroadcast the news to hundreds of mobile stations throughout the Continent. Special editions of newspapers, pamphlets, news sheets, letters, and slogans soon flooded the countryside. Simultaneously demonstrations against the Axis occurred in Belgrade, Prague, Amsterdam, Paris, Warsaw, Oslo, and Brussels.

That people separated by hundreds of miles and subjected to the world's most unremitting propaganda were able to receive this tremendous piece of news unadulterated by Nazi distortions and to react to it simultaneously was due to the underground press. Having started, often, merely as a streamer-slogan, this press now ranges from mimeographed handbills to standardized publications with excellent make-up and typography, and has become a vigorous Continental organ covering every important news event and reaching into every corner of European life.

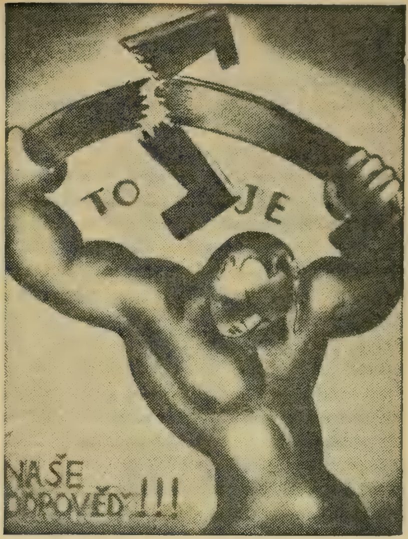
From the underground press the Allies obtain strategic information, military and civilian, that could not be obtained in any other way. To British and Russian agents it gives facts about new war plants and those destroyed by sabotage or bombing, about the construction of airfields, labor conditions, and the effect of slow-down movements on production. Its most important function, however, is to strengthen morale and keep alive the hope of deliverance from Nazi domination. Sabotage methods are discussed in it; active resistance is urged; passive resistance is praised; German propaganda is analyzed and refuted; names of Quislings are printed, together with those of German leaders selected for a day of reckoning. It carries on a war of nerves by methods as persistent and effective as any of the schemes devised by the Germans themselves.

Two and one-half months after the capitulation of the Belgian army a copy of La Libre Belgique was laid on the German commandant's desk in Brussels. Printed and written by experienced newspapermen, La Libre Belgique of World War II, despite German efforts, soon expanded into three editions, with 3,000 copies reaching 100,000 readers. Moreover, today it has fifty-one imitators and competitors. Every group in society—labor, white-collar workers, the church—has its voice. Each keeps up a constant barrage of complaints about the slim rations allowed by the Germans. With respect to outside events, the papers simply ignore German claims and publish the latest news as received from London. So-called German superiority is a subject for puns; Belgians, like the French, know how to use irony. Léon Degrelle, the Belgian fascist leader, is mercilessly lampooned.

The first articulate resistance in France, after the collapse, occurred five weeks after the surrender of Paris. Using a child's toy printing-press, Paul Simon, a soldier of World War I, printed fifty copies of Valmy, France's first underground paper. Simon and his comrades raided German offices for ink and were surreptitiously given supplies by printing establishments. Stenographers and typists in the big business offices duplicated the copies, often with the tacit consent of their employers. One organization made and distributed 10,000 copies in this manner. Voluntary gifts from teachers, clergymen, and workers paid the costs. With the acquisition of a stencil and roller, Simon was able to produce 2,000 copies monthly. On July 14, Bastille Day, a special edition on blue paper with white and red stripes was printed in a regular printing shop. In November, 1941, Simon got word that the Gestapo was on his trail, and he escaped to England.

Pantagruel, a weekly issued in Paris, neatly printed on thin paper the size of typewriter sheets, gave first proof to the outside world of an active De Gaulle movement in France. It was circulated like a catalogue: names were chosen at random from the directory and the paper was sent through the mail. More pretentious is La Voix de Paris, a printed monthly magazine, circulated by hand, which concentrates on the motives of Vichy officials. Others, like Le Feu, a pamphlet, preach the second revolution. Resistance regularly mimeographs sections of "Mein Kampf" side by side with Darlan's speeches. In the north La Voix du Nord exhorts workers to stop working during air raids—this means a considerable slow-down in production, for the R. A. F. is constantly on the wing over northern France. Some twenty-five papers and pamphlets circulate in both zones of France, and in addition one-page cartoons and posters regularly deluge meeting places, cafes, and subway stations.

In Yugoslavia the democratic parties had perfected an efficient clandestine press during the dictatorship of 1931 to 1937. Presses and editors worked in well-concealed caves and forest hideouts. Demands were systematically sent to the Regent Prince Paul or circulated in pamphlet or poster form in all sections of the country. Croats received and sent out news through their farm and dairy cooperatives. Consequently, when war broke out, organizations were already set up with equipment and supplies to carry on the underground war. Yellow and green pamphlets—the color trademark of the press—were printed on very thin paper, folded innumerable times, and slipped in a sleeve or passed from the palm of a hand. Everybody from peasants to waiters distributed them. Information from Dr. Petrovich's broadcast over WRUL was printed and passed on within a week. Today with General Mihailovich's army controlling 20,000 square miles of central and western Serbia, the press publishes regular battle communiqués in the Serbian, Slovene, and Croat languages, with the date line—Unoccupied Serbia.

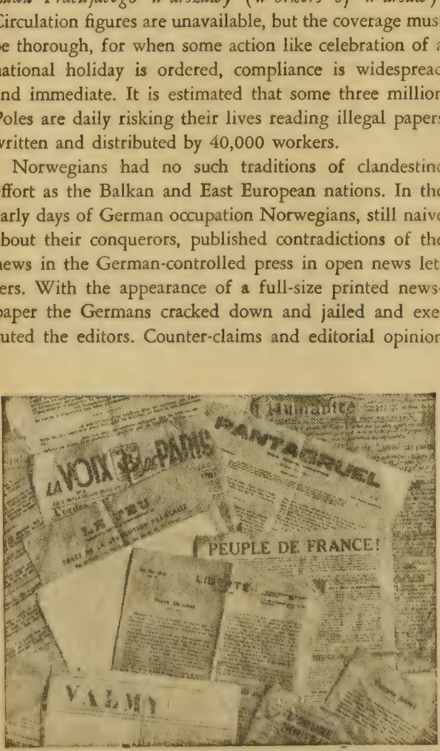


On January 23 last Josef Skalda, a former Czech legionnaire, was charged with high treason for editing the underground paper V Boj (In Battle) and was executed in Prague. On January 24 a special edition of V Boj denounced the German courts for high treason to Czecho-Slovakia. This mimeographed sheet of eight and one-half by eleven inches was the first underground paper to appear in Europe, in the summer of 1939. Old members of the Mafie—the Bohemian secret organization of Austro-Hungarian days—revived their tradition and together with the Sokols, a Czech national society, went to work underground. To supplement the information in V Boj they started thousands of chain letters in all parts of the country.

Since tens of thousands of censors would be necessary to supervise the mails in Czecho-Slovakia, chain letters are a comparatively safe means of disseminating news. The addressee of each letter must copy it ten times and send it to ten friends. The powerful secret radio Nazdar and fifteen mobile transmitters are the principal news source for the letters; and broadcasts to London indicate that the truth about the war reaches every village in occupied Czecho-Slovakia. Also the recent uprising of guerrillas in eastern Slovakia was first made known to the world through the region's underground press.

In Poland, as German suppression has grown, as starvation has increased, so have the bitterness of resistance and the papers that express it. The latest reports reaching official headquarters say that 200 papers, pamphlets, and news sheets of all sizes and descriptions are circulating in Poland alone. The Polish underground press is the most extensive in Europe; its papers cross frontiers into White Russia, Hungary, Czecho-Slovakia, and Scandinavia. A few are full-size eight-column papers, competently printed. Pictures are regularly published, some papers performing incredible feats like printing pictures of Churchill and Sikorski together and of Polish units in recent actions in Libya. The labor and democratic press is today the most powerful. Wolnosc (Liberty), printed and distributed by Polish Socialist groups and Jewish clubs, has emphasized the federation of Poles and Czechs. Tribuna Ludow (Tribune of the People) constantly asserts that the restoration of Poland is only possible with the general restoration of a democratic Europe. Wies i Miasto (Village and Town) discusses a "new deal" for peasants, workers, and farmers. The breaking down of the ghetto walls and the intermingling of Jews and Poles for a new Poland are stressed in the weekly Jewish underground paper Do Ludu Pracujacego Warszawy (Workers of Warsaw). Circulation figures are unavailable, but the coverage must be thorough, for when some action like celebration of a national holiday is ordered, compliance is widespread and immediate. It is estimated that some three million Poles are daily risking their lives reading illegal papers written and distributed by 40,000 workers.

Norwegians had no such traditions of clandestine effort as the Balkan and East European nations. In the early days of German occupation Norwegians, still naive about their conquerors, published contradictions of the news in the German-controlled press in open news letters. With the appearance of a full-size printed newspaper the Germans cracked down and jailed and executed the editors. Counter-claims and editorial opinion went underground for the first time in Norway's history. News letters and papers, often of from six to fourteen pages, stenciled on paper eight and one-half by eleven inches, were written by men who wanted to say something—farmers, workers, intellectuals. About 700 copies of each paper were passed from friend to friend. Some were mailed in open envelopes bearing the insignia of a Quisling organization. Continued circulation was achieved by the simple expedient of printing "east" or "north" at the top. Thus one copy would be mailed and remailed eastward or northward through Norway. Papers from Oslo have been found in isolated northern hamlets, ragged and smudged from much use.



Later an Oslo librarian who with the permission of the German authorities was collecting illegal papers for "scientific" study organized the editors in a group known as the Union of the Free Press. The new union set an editorial standard for all papers and directed the publication of news and resolutions. Some twenty of these combination news sheets and news letters are now being published in Oslo. Their effectiveness can be gauged by the following incident: Last summer Quisling arranged to speak at an open-air mass-meeting to be held in Oslo on July 4. Two days before the event the illegal press published a small squib suggesting that Norwegians come to the central park and lay flowers on the statue of Abraham Lincoln. Some 1,200 persons heard Quisling; more than 5,000 placed flowers on Lincoln's statue.

Despite the severity of reprisals—compositors, editors, and distributors sign their own death warrants when they take up work in the illegal press—between 350 and 400 underground papers are now issued regularly in the European countries. In Germany itself there are a dozen illegal leaflets. Even in Luxembourg, where the German authorities have called the people "stone-faced" because of their passive resistance, hand-printed pamphlets are distributed weekly carrying resistance slogans and sabotage suggestions. They are signed Ligue des Visages de Pierre (League of the Stone Faces). In Holland Vrij Nederland (Free Netherlands), a mimeographed news sheet distributed by hand and through the mail, chiefly pokes fun at German methods and superior airs.

The Nazis' efforts to keep people in the occupied countries from listening to Allied broadcasts by the threat of severe penalties and confiscation of radios have increased the importance of the underground press as a reliable purveyor of news. During the past year an extensive exchange of illegal papers has grown up among the various countries. Papers cross and crisscross Europe, often finding their way into Germany and Italy. They are a formidable barrier to Germanization, Nazi ideology, and collaboration efforts, and serve as a constant reminder to the enslaved millions that resistance is alive and that men are still willing to print and read the truth. Moreover, many of the papers are now discussing post-war problems and federations, thus laying a foundation for future understanding. For example, the once tragically divided French working classes are now being brought together in a unified program for cooperation and resistance.

As the war lengthens, as suffering increases, nationalistic differences are breaking down more and more into the realization that democracy, mutual aid, and cooperation are essentials for any future peaceful Europe. This is the basic principle of Europe's underground press.

Germany Feels the Pinch

BY FRITZ STERNBERG

IN THE third year of the war Germany's economic position is beginning to resemble strongly its position in the third year of World War I, when belts had to be drawn ever tighter and war weariness began to set in. From September, 1939, to June, 1941, when the Russian campaign started, state expenditures rose sharply, but without reducing the consumption of the German people to any considerable extent. In a biennial report entitled "Germany's Economic Situation at the Turn of 1938-39" the semi-official Reichskreditgesellschaft estimated that at that time the total public revenue from taxation, duties, contributions, and borrowing was 35.8 billion marks. The article continued:

> If this sum is considered in relation to the 1938 national income of about 76 billion marks, the government share runs to about 47.1 per cent. This share has steadily risen during the past few years. It shows the remarkable degree of regulation of revenue and consumption within the German economy.

Since then the expenditures of the German government have more than doubled. In the second year of World War II, from September 1, 1940, to September 1, 1941, they ran to about 75 billion marks, of which some 55 billion were for purely military expenses and the remaining 20 billion for other government costs. Frequent mention of these increased expenditures is found in the press, and without an analysis of the methods by which they were achieved one might conclude that they were made possible only by a corresponding reduction in consumption—that the slogan "Guns or Butter" was becoming an ever sharper reality. Actually the doubling of government expenditures has been achieved with relatively small further cuts in consumption.

In contrast to Britain and the United States, production in Germany has not been increased during the war, since unemployment had previously been virtually wiped out. Yet despite the stabilization of production the national income of Greater Germany has risen sharply, thanks to the increase in territory. How great has this rise been?

According to the London Economist of August 23, 1941:

> The official estimate for 1938 amounted to 79.7 billion marks for Germany proper, against 72.6 billion in 1937. The national income of Greater Germany—the Reich plus Austria—was estimated at 88 billion marks in 1938. Meanwhile a number of territories have been incorporated into the Reich, and the total income of those territories is unknown. A very speculative estimate of the total national income of Greater Germany would be 95 to 98 billion marks in 1939 and 98 to 105 billion in 1940.

The Bulletin of International News estimates the German income for 1940 still higher, about 120 billion marks. I regard this figure as too high and would myself estimate German national income at 90 to 95 billion marks in 1939-40 and at 110 billion marks in the second year of the war, 1940-41. It should be noted, however, that this increase in national income from 78 to 110 billion marks took place without the aid of the tribute, euphemistically described as occupation costs, from the conquered nations—France, Belgium, the Scandinavian countries, etc.; the 110 billion marks represents the national income of Germany plus Austria, plus Czecho-Slovakia, plus Alsace-Lorraine, plus parts of Poland.

If we now ask how the financing of the increased government expenditures—from 35 to 75 billion marks—was achieved, we find that a good third of the increase was made possible by contributions from the countries incorporated into Germany. Another third was financed at home by so-called "disinvestments"—reduced inventories, lower depreciation reserves, and a decline in new investments. A bare third only—12 billion marks—was covered by a reduction in consumption.

The Russo-German war brought decisive changes; not only did it cost innumerable lives but it greatly increased the hardships of the home front. Even before the current offensives started, the Economic General Staff reminded the German people in no uncertain terms that the nation was in the second half of the third year of war—it reduced the food rations by almost one-fifth.

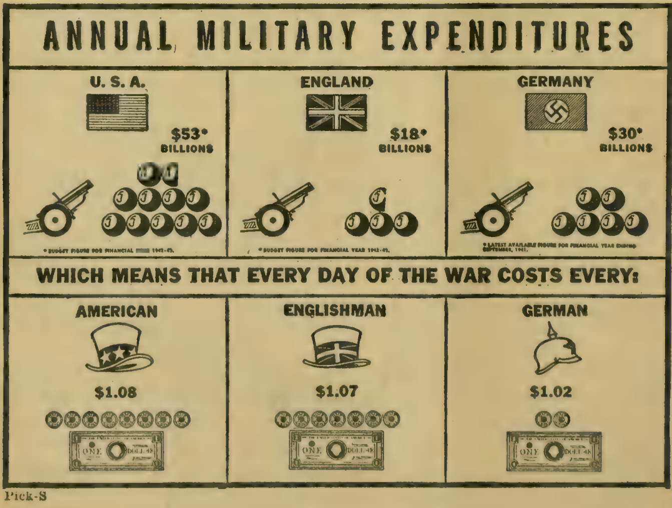
Was this merely a temporary, preventive measure, or was it necessitated by a chronic condition?

In 1940, when Germany was waging war against France, the German army numbered from six to six and a half million men. Today it must far exceed this figure, for occupation armies have to be kept in all European countries, and, furthermore, the Russian successes during the winter made it necessary to employ on the eastern front far greater armies than were used against France. Consequently we may assume that more than nine million Germans are bearing arms. This fact contributes in two ways to the shrinkage of the food supply of the German population: a soldier needs more food than a civilian; and agricultural production must decline if the army takes its able-bodied men. During the campaign against France agricultural workers could still be furloughed for the harvest. During the Russian campaign, however, the situation has been too grave for large-scale furloughs. In addition, the reduced quantity of food available for civilian consumption must be stretched to feed more people. Because of the new millions drafted from industry to the army, the Economic General Staff has been forced to bring in foreign workers from all over Europe, and even slaves must be fed.

Already during the first two years of the war Germany could not feed its population from its own soil, and only considerable food imports from various European countries prevented a rapid deterioration of the food situation. Let us examine Germany's sources of food imports today. The Balkan states used to have large agricultural surpluses and exported a large part of their foodstuffs. From Hungary and Yugoslavia, Rumania and Bulgaria, food was sent to Germany. But today guerrilla warfare rages throughout Yugoslavia, and the destruction caused by the fighting is so great that almost nothing can be exported. Hungary and Rumania are themselves involved in the fighting against Russia and must maintain their own armies. And since in these countries most conscripts are peasants, agricultural production there as well as in Bulgaria is declining. In the last few months Hungary and Rumania—the granaries of Europe—have themselves been forced to introduce bread-rationing cards.

As for supplies from Soviet Russia, hardly anything to speak of has so far reached Germany. Some 90 per cent of the Soviet agriculture is organized in collective farms. Before their retreat the Russians either destroyed the agricultural machinery in the invaded regions or transported it to the rear, and most of the workers qualified to handle this machinery were evacuated. If some tractors were left behind, the Germans could make little use of them: agricultural machinery in the German-occupied parts of Russia used almost eight million tons of oil before the war; today Germany has hardly enough oil for its army. Even German reports admit that the loot from Soviet Russia was nil, just as in 1918.

Is France in a position to send food to Germany? The answer again is no. In the period immediately after the victory over France, the German food situation improved somewhat, since the major part of the German army of occupation was supported locally and thus did not represent a drain on German food supplies. Furthermore, France had vast food stocks which were sent to Germany after the conquest. But that was long ago. Today, in the third year of war, not only have the invading rats stripped the French larder but French agricultural production has declined steeply. France harvested 15 per cent less wheat in 1941 than before the war, and other grain crops and potatoes were 20 per cent smaller.



Pick-S

Food has become scarcer in Germany just as German production also, for the first time, is showing retrogressive tendencies. The decisive cause is the shortage of man-power. The millions of casualties, the millions that have been freshly drafted, cannot be fully replaced by foreign labor. An additional reason may be found in the transport and coal stringency all Europe is experiencing. Furthermore, millions of Germans lack sufficient clothing because of the extraordinary needs of the army during the Russian winter.

The mood in Germany, therefore, is none too good now. The Schwarze Korps charges (as reported in the New York Times of April 12) that the people still lack the right war spirit. Only grudgingly and with a sense of heavy sacrifice do they consent to go without things that are really unnecessary. It asks them to cease giving presents—not because there are no presents to buy, but because Germans should convince themselves that they do not want to buy anything while the war is on. Similarly, they must avoid unnecessary rail journeys —not because there is a ban on travel, but because a patriotic German does not want to travel at this time. And it should be a point of honor to wear old, worn-out clothes.

Thus Germany's entire economy today resembles more and more that of the third year of the First World War. Everything depends on how the next phase of the Russian war turns out. If the Nazis succeed in obtaining decisive military victories, these will compensate for all difficulties at home. If, however, the Soviets are able to hold out till fall, the resemblance between this third year of war and the third year of World War I will become striking, and the way will be paved for Hitler's collapse.

Meeting Mr. Saito

BY IDA TREAT

THE French in Tahiti never worried much about the Japanese. "We have nothing here to tempt them," Papeete officials told me in 1935. There were no deep-channeled harbors in the Society, Leeward, or Tuamotu Islands, and no mineral deposits except the Makatea phosphates. No Japanese had ever settled in the region. Wasn't that proof that it lacked strategic value? "If the Japs had designs on this part of the Pacific, they would be here now," people said.

In the French island of New Caledonia feeling was a little different. New Caledonia had rich nickel mines and a sizable Japanese colony of fishermen and market gardeners. And in Noumea something happened that made me think of Mr. Saito. I had met Mr. Saito in Paris, in the period when the attitude of the League of Nations toward the invasion of Manchuria was still a matter for conjecture. I had stopped at the Coupole one day on my way from the laboratory to wait for P——, who had promised to call for me after the session of the Chamber. We were to dine in the Quarter before he went on to his newspaper. Having found a seat on the terrace, I glanced up and saw a Chinese student I knew slightly—Chen by name—seated at a nearby table with a yellow-skinned gentleman in a dark business suit and horn-rimmed spectacles. When I nodded, Chen rose and came toward me, followed by his companion.

"My friend is anxious to meet you." He presented the spectacled gentleman. "Mr. Saito, professor of anthropology at the University of Tokyo."

"Not anthropology, pa-le-on-tol-o-gy," his friend corrected in staccato syllables, displaying a rectangle of teeth. Then he ducked so low that I saw the crisp upstanding hair on his flattened occipitals.

As he straightened up, it seemed to me I had seen his face before. It was only an impression and I gave no particular thought to it. Later on, when I mentioned it to Chen, he suggested that probably all Orientals looked alike to me. Had I known many Japanese? No, to the best of my knowledge, Mr. Saito was the first.

I found it a little odd that Chen should have Japanese friends. Apparently he too felt it needed some explanation, for he announced that Mr. Saito was not in sympathy with his government. He was a pure scientist, Chen said. That accounted for his desire to meet me. Our field was the same. Mr. Saito was a big man in Japanese science, he explained. I said I was only a little scientist myself, and I knew nothing of Japanese science.

Mr. Saito said politely it was a common failing. Indeed, that was the very reason he had come to Europe. We of the East and West should know each other better. Only the union of the world's brains could bring about world harmony.

At that point P——'s arrival cut short the conversation. I thought him a shade curt with the two Easterners. I reproached him with it afterward.

"That Chen—why isn't he in China?" he asked.

I quoted Chen: war must not submerge all culture; China's brains must be preserved for peace.

"Let the coolies do the fighting," P—— said rudely.

I mentioned Mr. Saito at the laboratory next day. Professor Boule looked perplexed.

"Saito—Saito—I don't recall the name. Must be a new man. Oh, well, we'll be seeing him here one of these days."

I knew what he meant. The world clan of paleontologists is relatively small, and the Paris laboratory was a Mecca for them all.

Mr. Saito did not come to the laboratory. But a few days after our meeting Chen telephoned. His friend Professor Saito, he said, wished to entertain me at dinner. He had discovered a Japanese restaurant and would enjoy introducing me to his native food. I would honor him, he hoped. It would be a modest way of furthering the intellectual cooperation we had spoken about.

Then as an afterthought Chen added: If the honorable Deputy were also free for dinner, Mr. Saito would be delighted. Very much delighted.

The honorable Deputy, when consulted, declined with thanks. He had no time, and no interest in either Chen or his friend. If the man was really a scientist, there was no reason for his, P——'s, presence. If he was not, all the more reason not to go.

"What do you mean by 'really a scientist'?"

P—— quoted his Russian friends about the Japanese at the Far Eastern Institute at Moscow—how authentic Marxist students of long standing were always turning out to be imperial intelligence officers.

"Your scientist probably wants to know about Indo-China and what the government here is going to do about Manchuria."

If Mr. Saito was disappointed that I came alone to dinner, nothing in his manner showed it. His French seemed more meager than at the Coupole. He had trouble understanding my learned conversation on Japanese science (I had been reading up on the subject in preparation for the dinner).

It was my first Japanese meal, but even I could see that it was mediocre. It consisted chiefly of fish, raw and cooked, and it recalled all too vividly the beach at low tide. There was octopus, raw octopus—with horrible rows of little suckers like hostile eyes. Mr. Saito apologized for the dinner. It distressed him to give me so poor a notion of Japanese cookery. He said he hoped to make up for it some day soon.

The second invitation came a week later. Like the first, Chen delivered it over the telephone. This time I was less cordial. I was still recovering from the octopus. I tried to convey as much to Chen.

"This dinner will be different," Chen promised. Then he went on about how depressed Mr. Saito was. He had his heart set on another dinner. It was a point of honor.

I was firm. I hated to wound Mr. Saito's honor, but I simply could not put up with any more raw fish in a Japanese restaurant.

Chen assured me there would be no fish. "It will not be a restaurant. Mr. Saito will prepare it all himself."

"Where does he plan to do it?"

Chen's laugh made the receiver tinkle. "At your house, Madame. Where else?"

It was logical, though not expected. "And when does Mr. Saito—plan to entertain me?"

"Tonight. If you are busy, tomorrow, the next day—"

I had visions of Chen on the telephone for weeks to come. "Very well, tomorrow then." I know I sounded ungracious. Was there anything I should order for the dinner? No, Mr. Saito would attend to everything.

When I told P—— about the dinner, he was more than superior. "Do you suppose for a second it is you they're after?"

I said stiffly that there had been no question of him.

"No? They probably take it for granted I'll be there."

Promptly at seven the next evening the guests arrived. Chen carried a briefcase which I presumed contained the dinner. Apparently it was not to be a big one. Mr. Saito was delighted to discover a Morocco table in the living-room. We could sit on the floor in true Japanese style. Before the portrait of the master of the house he bowed. "A noble face," he said. That was the only time P—— was mentioned.

I sat down in the living-room to wait. The gentlemen had invited me to leave the kitchen. They said they required nothing but a chafing-dish and a large iron pot.

Then Chen appeared in the doorway. "Have you a cabbage?" He seemed surprised I could not produce it instantly—anything as simple as a cabbage. I called Maria, the cook, from the back room where she had retired with her supper and sent her downstairs for one.

While she was gone, Chen came again, to ask for onions. Mr. Saito needed half a dozen onions. And one turnip. A grated turnip was essential. I found onions in the vegetable bin but no turnips. When Maria returned with the cabbage I sent her down again.

For a time there were sounds of cutting and grating from the kitchen. Then Chen appeared again.

"The meat?" he said.

"Meat, what meat?"

"The meat for the dinner." Where was it? Meat was essential. Beef.

I consulted Maria, who declared it could not be done. The market was closed. Why had not the Messieurs said beforehand what they wanted? She eyed them both wrathfully. I asked her, was the charcuterie still open? The charcutier sold pork. Would pork do? I asked the cooks. Chen consulted with Mr. Saito. Mr. Saito said beef would be better. I sent Maria for the pork.

At half-past eight we sat down to dinner. The chafing-dish stood in the center of the table flanked by two bottles, a bowl of rice, and a little mound of grated turnip. Mr. Saito removed the lid of the chafing-dish. There was the pork in a steaming nest of cabbage and onions. Mr. Saito sugared it liberally and sprinkled it with fish sauce from one of the bottles before serving.

"Good Japanese sukiyaki," he beamed.

The taste was curious but an improvement on raw fish. Chen and Mr. Saito fell to with appetite. The second bottle contained rice wine, heady and hot. In the course of the evening my two guests drank it all. Chen, whose round face glistened with beads of sweat, asked for a hot towel, "China fashion." As I rose to get it, I stumbled over something. Mr. Saito had removed his shoes.

Chen talked and talked. Mr. Saito sat bolt upright, his feet tucked under him like a cat on a cushion, but his lids drooped behind the thick-lensed spectacles. Once or twice I thought he was asleep. Then I would see his eyes, like bright bits of black enamel, fixed on something just behind me. I did not realize at first what he was looking at. The clock. It was an amusing toy of brass and crystal. Was that what interested him, or what?

At eleven P—— telephoned from the paper. "They sound harmless," he conceded when I told him of the dinner. "Ring me when they go. I'll not leave here before 12:30, when the paper goes to bed."

My guests still sat contentedly on their cushions and gave no signs of leaving. Chen took up the monologue on the subject of house-furnishings that the telephone had interrupted. There was no repose in Western houses, he said. They were "anarchic," filled with a clutter of things. In the East every object had its place and reason; fitted into a pattern, practical or aesthetic.

Mr. Saito came suddenly to life. Pointing to the portrait that hung behind the clock he asked, "That picture—why is it there?"

I said there were several reasons: first, it was my mother-in-law; second, it was a very good Besnard; third, there was no other place to hang it.

Mr. Saito said something in Japanese to Chen. "He says if it stays there, all the other pictures should go and most of the furniture," Chen translated. "Then your room would be in good taste."

The clock tinkled midnight. After another half-hour I hinted that the last Métro would soon be leaving the city gate. To no effect. Mr. Saito still eyed the clock. Definitely, they were waiting.

At one the telephone buzzed angrily. "What is this pleasantry? A siege?" P—— demanded. "I'm coming now and if I find them there—."

I walked slowly to the living-room. "Gentlemen, I must ask you to excuse me. My mother-in-law has met with an accident. We are leaving for the south."

It sounded feeble. Chen looked at Mr. Saito. Mr. Saito looked at me. I turned to Chen. "My husband is so sorry to miss you. You see, he goes directly to the station."

A silence. Mr. Saito rose slowly from his cushion. He showed his rectangle of teeth. "A most unhappy circumstance," he said in excellent French. The siege was lifted.

When the door closed behind the visitors I drew a long breath. For now I knew I had seen Mr. Saito before and where. It came to me suddenly as he was making his farewell bows in the entry. Two years before, a French engineer had come to the laboratory with a proposal to fit out a scientific expedition to the Gobi Desert. He said he had the necessary backing. He lacked only the technical staff. The younger staff members had been much excited over the plan, but it had fallen through because of difficulties over Russian visas. The engineer wanted to take trucks with ten-ton trailers into Inner Mongolia. (Our traffic expert at the museum said the idea was preposterous. "Ten-ton trailers—they would be as much trouble as a cannon.")

One evening three of us were invited to the engineer's house to discuss the scientific possibilities of the expedition. In the entry we exchanged bows with an Oriental visitor who was leaving. We spoke of it later as we speculated about who the probable backers of the expedition had been. Was the Oriental gentleman Mr. Saito? As he bowed his farewells in the entry of my flat in Paris, I was convinced of it.

After that second dinner I saw no more of Mr. Saito. Chen also disappeared. I heard he had finished his doctorate and returned to China. I even heard he was very active in the pro-Japanese faction of the Nanking government. Four years passed. One July day in 1935, after a year in the South Seas, I took passage on a French ship from Noumea to Marseilles, by way of Australia.

The ship carried few passengers—a sprinkling of French and two Orientals; Japanese, the mate said when he joined me on deck after we cast off. The passengers lined the rail looking back at the drab town with its galvanized iron roofs and the peeled hills behind it. The Japanese stood by themselves on the forward end of the deck—two little men in neatly belted trench coats, each holding a camera. As the ship sidled away from the shore, the shutters clicked industriously.

"What do you suppose they are taking?" I asked the mate.

"Nothing very scenic, I'd say." Then his gaze sharpened. He left me abruptly and strolled forward. "I might have known it," he said when he returned. "Do you know what they are taking? The landing marks."

"Can't you confiscate the film?"

He shrugged. "This isn't Japan and we are not at war."

As the ship swung about and got under way, the Japanese left the rail and came toward us. One of them wore horn-rimmed spectacles. His eyes, behind the thick lenses, were flakes of black enamel. He looked through and beyond me. There was no sign of recognition. The men passed and turned into the companionway.

"Ever seen that fellow?" The mate was eyeing me curiously.

"I don't know. At first I thought—"

When I went below I stopped at the purser's office. "Could I see the passenger list?" I asked.

"Just a minute. I'm making a correction. He wrote carefully and blotted. "Here you are."

I glanced down the list. The names I sought were at the bottom: Messrs. Tonaki and Schiocho; profession, commercial travelers; destination, Sydney. The second name showed traces of erasure.

"Was this the name you changed?" I asked the purser.

He nodded. "The agent got it wrong. The passenger just came in to correct it. Why?"

"Oh, I'm just curious— It wasn't Saito, by any chance, the name you changed?"

"Something like that," said the purser.

War and Public Power

BY RICHARD L. NEUBERGER

Bonneville, Oregon, May 15

AIRPLANES are the key to victory. President Roosevelt has asked for 60,000 war planes this year, 125,000 in 1943. The United Nations have not lost a battle front which could not have been made impregnable with enough planes. Millions of people all over the world base their hopes for freedom on American airplane production. "If our planes could drop a thousand bombs tomorrow on the munitions factories of Tokyo and Osaka," said Senator Elbert D. Thomas of Utah, "we could save the lives of 50,000 American soldiers and sailors."

Aluminum is the key to airplanes—and the public power projects built by the New Deal against bitter opposition are the key to aluminum. Without the Tennessee Valley Authority and the great dams on the Columbia River, American airplane production, the hope of civilized mankind, would be in a sad state. Attainment of the President's goals would be impossible.

William L. Batt, chairman of the requirements committee of the War Production Board, recently told the New York Times that the expanded aluminum program of the United States would be 2,100,000,000 pounds a year. This amount, he said, not only will be enough to produce the number of planes the President wants, but "will be far beyond the reach of anything the Axis powers, together with all the occupied countries, can even contemplate." Censorship rules forbid publication of specific locations of aluminum plants and their individual output, but the Power Division of the Department of the Interior has announced aluminum production by regions. The figures are highly significant and should particularly impress the utility companies and their confederates who have fought so long against the power program of the Roosevelt Administration. They reveal that approximately 48 per cent of the aluminum production of the nation, this year and in the years ahead, will be directly and entirely due to federal power projects in the Tennessee Valley, the Columbia River Basin, and the state of California.

The wisdom and foresight of the President in this matter may be illuminatingly contrasted with the position of the utility companies by recalling two published statements. As long ago as 1934, when army engineers were grappling for the first time with the wild rapids of the Columbia Gorge, the President stood at Bonneville and said, "We are creating power, more power, and I always believe in the old saying of 'more power to you.' I do not believe that you can have enough power for a long time to come." As late as 1939 E. Hofer and Sons, a propaganda agency subsidized by private utilities all over the country, declared, "It becomes more and more apparent that Bonneville Dam is an enormously costly white elephant. It isn't selling enough power to keep even a small stand-by plant busy. So the public-ownership experiment is leaving in its wake plenty of headaches."

Today the only headache is caused by the rush to set up additional generators in the Bonneville penstock chutes so that new aluminum plants on the Columbia's banks can begin production. The Bonneville Power Administration is listed as a vital war agency. Generating equipment for both Bonneville and Grand Coulee has been given full priority. Yet Representative Francis D. Culkin of New York once asserted, "In the region of Grand Coulee, that colossal imposition on the American people, there is no one to sell the power to except coyotes and jack rabbits."

These creatures peer timidly from their lairs now as thousands of workmen hurry construction of Grand Coulee's second twenty-story power-house. The WPB is searching everywhere for generators and turbines to shove into service at Grand Coulee. John C. Page, Commissioner of Reclamation, has just announced that a single installation at the great dam will net 125,000,000 pounds of aluminum for the war effort. Production Board officials plan to transfer aluminum factories from the East because of the immense amount of electricity available at Grand Coulee, which is the biggest source of water power on earth. Copper and steel priorities are cheerfully granted for 220,000-volt transmission lines across the Pacific Northwest uplands.

Not long ago Bonneville, Grand Coulee, and the TVA had to struggle in Congress for their continued existence. In 1940 Representative Walter M. Pierce of Oregon pleaded with his colleagues, "The day is past when we can abandon Grand Coulee. Millions upon millions have been invested. It is a great undertaking and it must be completed." Representatives Jenkins of Ohio, Rich of Pennsylvania, Hoffman of Michigan, and other tories tried desperately during the same year to whittle down appropriations for the TVA. In the month that Norway fell Senator Charles L. McNary of Oregon sought a third Columbia River power and navigation project, but the Senate turned down his bill, thirty-six to thirty-three. The increased river transportation that would have been made possible by this dam would have helped ease the burden on the Pacific Coast's railroads.

By the end of this year, according to Representative Pierce, power generated by the Columbia River will be turning out almost 600,000,000 pounds of aluminum, or more than was produced in the whole United States less than two years ago. Moreover, kilowatts from Bonneville operate the Portland shipyards, which Donald Nelson has called the most efficient in the country. In our expanded aluminum program, Representative Homer Angell of Portland has announced, more than 30 per cent of the 2,100,000,000-pound annual production prophesied by Mr. Batt will be the output of factories built near Bonneville and Grand Coulee. The power companies which opposed the New Deal program, and still oppose it, have not said how they would have taken care of the country's war needs had they succeeded in blocking the TVA and the Columbia Basin projects.

A roll of honor should list the men who kept these vast undertakings under construction while an anvil chorus was referring to them as white elephants and shocking wastes of the people's money. First and foremost comes the President, who had the vision to make use of unemployed workers to harness the rivers of the nation. Beside him stands Senator George W. Norris of Nebraska, who made his first speech for public power in 1912, three decades ago. The TVA is his monument. Most of the dams in the West were built with the authorization of Secretary of the Interior Harold L. Ickes, who insisted on their completion at a time when Charles W. Kellogg, president of the Edison Electric Institute, was ridiculing the notion of a power shortage.

Senators Homer T. Bone of Washington, Charles L. McNary of Oregon, Lister Hill of Alabama, and Robert M. La Follette of Wisconsin have been Norris's main allies in the upper branch of Congress. The torch has been carried for the government's power projects in the House of Representatives by John E. Rankin of Mississippi, Walter M. Pierce and Homer Angell of Oregon, Charles H. Leavy, Knute Hill, John M. Coffee, Martin F. Smith, and Warren G. Magnuson of Washington, Estes Kefauver of Tennessee, and Compton I. White of Idaho. It may be significant that most of these men voted against continued appropriations for the Dies committee. Happily, the President has just appointed Mr. Leavy, one of the ablest advocates of public power, a federal judge in the Northwest.

The St. Lawrence seaway and power project is still an issue on Capitol Hill. William S. Knudsen, Donald M. Nelson, and other business leaders have joined the New Dealers in urging its immediate construction. The best basis for a decision on the St. Lawrence undertaking is to consider what would be the condition of our war effort today had the country followed the advice of the opponents of Bonneville, Grand Coulee, and the TVA.

Everybody's Business

BY KEITH HUTCHISON

It's Smart to Be Thrifty

OUR national income might be compared to a reservoir which is being filled up by freshets from the mountains of war expenditure more rapidly than it can be drained by the existing outlets. Two of these outlets—"taxes" and "savings"—have lately been enlarged, but not sufficiently to compensate for the fact that the third—"consumable goods"—has become seriously clogged. The result has been to weaken the containing walls of prices in this third channel, despite Leon Henderson's price-fixing cement, and they are in danger of being washed out by the rising pressure of income unless it can be relieved by a further drastic enlargement of the other two channels.

The Treasury's latest addendum to its 1943 tax program proposes a lowering of income-tax exemption limits which would make possible the siphoning off of another billion dollars or so; but this isn't very impressive in relation to an estimated excess flow into the reservoir of around $17 billion. Moreover, Congress seems hesitant to vote levies as steep as the Treasury advocates, and the final tax bill may well fall between $2 billion and $3 billion short of the amount for which Mr. Morgenthau has asked. This means still greater dependence on the savings conduit, for the enlargement of which the government has decided to depend on voluntary effort. Consequently a great responsibility is being placed on the self-discipline of all income receivers, and they will have to practice the art of thrift as never before.

Not unnaturally, there is a tendency under present conditions to measure savings mainly in terms of war bonds bought. There may, however, be purchases of bonds which do not represent real current savings—the only kind that are of value in keeping the volume of purchasing power within bounds. For instance, if a man sells an existing investment or draws upon a long-standing savings account to buy bonds, he is not making any sacrifice of his immediate spending capacity and not making a contribution to the checking of inflation. From the standpoint of national economy he is merely engaging in a bookkeeping transaction.

On the other hand, there are many kinds of genuinely useful saving, involving actual abstention from expenditure, which do not involve the direct purchase of government bonds. Many workers, now enjoying steady and comparatively well-paid employment for the first time in years, rightly feel that the first call on their incomes, after meeting daily expenses, must be the reduction of their debts. Hundreds of thousands of home-owners are catching up on arrears in their mortgage payments. The Home Owners' Loan Corporation, which at one time seemed likely to end up with a loss of one billion dollars or so on the properties it had refinanced, now finds that 95 per cent of its accounts are either paid up to date or less than three months in arrears. Many home-owners are even beginning to pull ahead of their contractual obligations. Undoubtedly, insurance companies, banks, and other large holders of mortgages are enjoying the same experience. Clearance of debt in this way is good personal economy, and for the purpose of checking inflation it is just as useful as buying war bonds.

Another form of saving, practiced by a surprising number of people, is as much reprobated by the upright and orthodox as the repayment of debt is praised. The man who regularly tucks a tenspot into an old teapot or under his mattress may be a fool but he is not a menace. By registering distrust of savings banks and paper claims to wealth he is depriving himself of the opportunity of earning interest, but after all, what he hoards he doesn't spend, and thus he is contributing his mite to the restriction of purchasing power.

A more respectable and sensible form of real saving is the purchase of insurance, and nobody need feel unpatriotic because he decides to take out a new policy instead of purchasing bonds. Actually his money is likely to flow into the Treasury, for government bonds are the chief form of investment open to the insurance companies, and the recent long-term 2½ per cent issue was specially designed to meet their requirements.

It is clear, then, that the actual purchase of war bonds is not the only way to exercise a thrifty patriotism. The main thing is for every citizen to refrain from spending as much of his current income as possible. Nevertheless, war bonds ought to attract a very large volume of savings, for they certainly constitute a convenient and extremely attractive form of investment. The yield on the Series E bonds, which are intended for small investors, is 2.9 per cent if they are held to maturity—a very generous return for the best security in the world. The voluntary payroll-deduction plan, which is being taken up by millions of wage and salary earners with the enthusiastic assistance of many trade unions, provides a relatively painless method of saving.

Prior to Pearl Harbor, defense-bond purchases were only around $300 million a month. The country responded to the Jap bombs by jumping this figure to $1 billion in December, and the same pace was maintained in January and February. March, the income-tax month, saw a sad falling off, and April was also a relatively slow period. The Treasury has set quotas of $600 million for May, $800 million for June, and $1 billion a month thereafter. These figures are by no means impossible of attainment if we bear in mind that it is smart as well as patriotic to be thrifty. Those who try to spend now all they earn will be buying in a poorly stocked market; those who save up for the end of the war will be rewarded by the opportunity to buy many new and exciting products.

In the Wind

ALL THE FORCES of the French underground movement, according to a confidential report now circulating in New York, have been moving toward consolidation, but negotiations are temporarily at a standstill. Apparently the reason for this is that one of the three large movements, Libération Nationale (the others are Libération and Liberté) is suspected of having connections with Vichy. The report says that French anti-fascists do not regard Libération Nationale as a German trap, but they do think that it is the instrument of some Vichy officials who are now convinced that the United Nations are going to win. These men have associated themselves with the underground in order that their future will be secure—win, lose, or draw.

ALTHOUGH INTERNAL WARFARE in the American Newspaper Guild has come to an end, a new issue is dividing the left and right wings. Left-wing units have frequently in the last few months passed resolutions approving editorials in their employer's publication. This is a new departure for the Guild, which has always held that a publisher's policies were no concern of the union. It is felt by opponents of the new policy that it may cause trouble in the future if the left wing again abandons unity.

IN ITS FIRST COMMENT on the campaign against defeatist newspapers Editor and Publisher has taken its stand with McCormick, Patterson, and Hearst. The issue of May 9 characterizes the campaign as part of the Communist Party line.

CIVIL SERVICE APPLICANTS in Illinois must answer this question in the form sheets: "Are you a member of any organization which advocates the reformation or overthrow of the existing form of representative government in the United States? . . . If answer is 'yes,' name the organization." (Our italics.)

AT THE EDITORIAL OFFICES of Yank, the new servicemen's paper, a debate over policy is going on. Some editors believe that the paper, apart from providing news and entertainment, should devote itself entirely to building up an aggressive morale; others believe that it should also explain the political and economic issues behind the war.

The Dominance of Air Power

VICTORY THROUGH AIR POWER. By Major Alexander P. de Seversky. Simon and Schuster. $2.50.

GREAT military books are rare. In the years since the death of that twisted genius Homer Lea, the United States has probably not produced a single first-class volume on the theory of war. Prior to that, one would have to go back to the time of Mahan to find an American work on war winning universal acclaim. In view of this fact the appearance of "Victory Through Air Power" is important, for there can be no doubt that it is a major contribution to the philosophy of conflict. It is very possible that it will do for air power what the writings of Mahan did for sea power or those of Clausewitz for military strategy.

Major de Seversky believes that the strategic position of the United States has already changed as a result of the improvement in air power. Instead of being the nation in the world most immune to attack we are rapidly becoming, with our concentrated industrial civilization, the most vulnerable. The increasing range of aviation is making large-scale air attacks more and more likely, and this method of waging war can win victories regardless of our military and naval strength, which does not by itself offer any way to stop bombers. This prospect should not, however, cause panic, since with our resources and technical skill we can be the first to develop long-range air power and to use it.

Major de Seversky boldly claims for the plane today what Mahan claimed for the warship sixty years ago—that it is dominant in modern war. He backs this view by a careful and exhaustive interpretation of the war from the angle of air power. Sea power, he finds, is unable to approach within bombing range of shore bases sustaining real air power without committing suicide. As effective bomber range increases, the domain of the warship shrinks toward an inevitable vanishing-point.

Immediately prior to the war the author had an excellent opportunity for evaluating foreign air power as well as our own. His observation that America is making all the blunders made by Europe before it seems to be well sustained. Our high service officials still do not conceive of air power in terms of a separate long-range striking force, the use which Major de Seversky considers of greater importance than mere cooperation with the army or navy. Obsolete models are still being produced in quantities. Officially inspired propaganda and the typically American habit of boasting have kept the low quality of many American planes from becoming common knowledge. Peace practices in business and government have continued in a period of war, when their cumulative effect is fully as serious as treason. Because most of the men in power at the present moment were responsible for these blunders, progress continues to be slow.

Little is said about our naval aviation,. though Major de Seversky indirectly pays it a compliment; but using personal examples in order not to involve others, he gives enough instances of military stupidity in the handling of Army Air Corps affairs to make any observer wonder if the management of a peanut wagon would not be more nearly commensurate to the capacities of the men who in the past have guided—and in some instances still guide—the aerial destinies of the United States. In the Army Air Corps the best brains do not reach the top, and airmen urging reform or any change which upsets the comfortable inefficiency of bureaucracy suffer the fate of General Mitchell. On repeated occasions Major de Seversky, in private life head of the Republic Aviation Corporation, has urged such reforms as greater fire power, interchangeable and more powerful engines, light bomb racks for pursuit planes so they could be converted to bombers in case of need, and many others. In every case he met a stubborn wall of opposition which did not wish to have the practicability of new ideas proved to it. The lack of fast fighter and pursuit planes with range sufficient to reach the scene of hostilities under their own power was more responsible than any other factor for the loss of the war in eastern Asia. Yet De Seversky offered such a plane to the War Department four years ago and even proved its range at company expense. The Air Corps for three years refused to look at it, and then accepted it recently without explaining to the American public that their losses in the Far East had not been caused by an act of God but by the stupidity of men still occupying positions of responsibility. During these pre-war years Congress had little idea of the actual status of American air power because high officials of the Air Corps lied repeatedly about it. The inevitable result was that we were completely surprised by the success of known German methods and are now timidly copying German tactics when we should be developing more effective ones of our own.

Like most reformers Major de Seversky has a remedy for the unsatisfactory conditions he reveals. Such naval and military aviation as is needed by the older services in their routine tasks should be integrated with them and be directly under the command of navy and army officers. But the bulk of American planes should be placed in a separate department under the command of air officers who possess a genuine vision of aerial strategy and whose minds are not clamped in the strait-jacket of obsolete concepts.

Seen through the eyes of air power, the whole outlook of the war changes. Instead of fighting Japan from a distance of ten or twelve thousand miles, a necessity if we continue our present strategy, we should use Alaska and the Aleutians as a base for attacks by long-range planes, which we must instantly start producing in large numbers; we shall thus cut our communication lines to a fourth of their present length.

It is easy to pick minor flaws in "Victory Through Air Power." Some of Major de Seversky's interpretations of war events are highly questionable. While risking naval vessels near air bases is foolish—as it would be to send them into mine fields—it is not necessarily fatal. Otherwise, how explain the British success in provisioning Malta? In pronouncing future sea power obsolete and future air power invincible

Major de Seversky is running considerable risk of being proved wrong by history. Every new weapon that has changed war has made enormous progress in its earlier development and been pronounced invincible, then has become less effective as new defenses have been found. Sea power has not yet answered the aerial torpedo, but that does not mean that it will not be able to do so. If long-range bombers are to be guarded by long-range pursuits in conducting distant raids, then defending aircraft of similar size, not needing to carry so large a load of gasoline, will still have the advantage in speed, armament, or numbers. In short, Major de Seversky has viewed the long-range plane as an all-powerful offensive weapon without visualizing possible answers. He feels that the failure of the Luftwaffe over England does not invalidate his theories since it was the result of mistakes made by the Germans. The R. A. F. is now trying an all-out offensive over Western Europe, but there are as yet no signs that the results will be more impressive.

While many specific statements of this book may be questioned, an open-minded reader is obliged to conclude that the author is more nearly right than wrong in his views. Regardless of what the future may bring, and it is reasonable to assume that aviation will progress, the airplane has been of enormous importance in this war. It has been vital as a part of the army-navy-air force team and has shown great power as an independent striking weapon. It has certainly limited naval power in many ways. There can be no question that our own land-based aviation has been held back by its enforced relation to the army, though the blame for lack of working harmony is more evenly distributed than one would believe after reading this book. While one need not have absolute faith that the war can be won by air power alone, no sane person can deny that planes of longer range will be of definite advantage to a power so deprived of bases close to the scene of hostilities as the United States. Finally, there can be no doubt that an understanding of modern air power has been seriously lacking among our brass hats or that a thorough house-cleaning among service bureaucrats is long overdue.

The Steel of Victory

THE EDGE OF THE SWORD. By Vladimir Pozner. Modern Age Books. $2.50.

WHETHER Vladimir Pozner, who was born in Paris in 1905 and graduated from the Sorbonne, was chauffeur to his French military superiors over four or forty thousand miles—the front of the dust jacket offers the first figure while the back gives the second—of the refugee-choked roads of France is neither here nor there. Nor does it matter that the title of the book and the jacket design are awkward enough to put one off, or that the first twelve and a quarter pages are out of place where they stand. What is of importance is that Pozner has written a book which in denying nothing and refuting nothing, in apparently seeking no explanations and exonerating or blaming no person or act, establishes on every page two generations and their country in the almost casual, almost accidental, but unmistakably exciting accents of truth.

From the dust jacket can also be learned that Pozner has contributed to Harper's, Town and Country, The Nation, the New Republic, the American Mercury, the Forum, as well as to most of the leading periodicals of Europe. What the nature of these contributions was I do not know, but having read "The Edge of the Sword" I do know that I want to miss nothing that Pozner writes from now on. The quality of truth is alone a rare enough thing, but when this truth is set down by a gifted and subtle stylist we are getting very close to the best that literature can give. I have read the book with satisfaction and with love—with satisfaction because the various themes of the plot make good and moving reading, and with love for the author's clarity of vision, and for the people of whom he writes.

There is Caillol, whom we meet driving "an army truck loaded with scrap iron, all its lights out, burrowing its way through the dark." Caillol has been active in workers' organizations before the war, and his record follows him still. During the days of the débâcle in May, 1940, with the Citroën factories being struck, Orly in flames, Paris bombed, we have:

> "That you, Caillol?" said the non-commissioned officer without ceasing to write. . . . "The captain wants to see you in his office."
> "What does he want of me?"
>
> Bissières looked up. . . . "He didn't tell me, and I would not think of asking him."
> . . . Bissières knew perfectly well what was wanted of Caillol. . . . The plain-clothes man had added, "All you have to do is to say the word. We'll come and pick him up anywhere you say."

Thus begins Caillol's plot, and it proceeds through the book with grace, suspense, and deliberation, moving with and among the other themes in a manner not unlike Pozner's description of the music of Bach:

> The melodic air . . . had divided, and two melodies, alike and different, pursued each other, now soft, now loud, overlapped, blended, split apart again, reflecting each other, became four, rapid without haste, without effort, like a double row of poplar trees reflected in the water of a canal. . . .

Fiercely, and with a sort of angry sorrow because I can no longer see and hear them—no longer being in France and having temporarily closed Pozner's book—I love the three men of the French tank crew, Moustier, Mirabelle, and Vandervenne, and the blind, blundering, and easily symbolic wanderings of that undaunted tank. The character of Colonel Carvin, the French military homme d'honneur fleeing with Caillol as chauffeur and four cases of fine wines as cargo, is profoundly and brilliantly done, and their story as magnificent a chapter of social comment as I have ever read. But Pozner is far too great an artist to mar by argument his own masterly effects. He has made manifest in this book a world of recognizably altering social values, but with the same naturalness, the same human contradictions and confusions with which such a world is actually brought into being. No point is forced, no climax reached except apparently fortuitously. The reader is reading fiction, in the sense that "War and Peace" and "The House of the Dead" are fiction, and at the same time he is comprehending how the foundaions of revolution are laid. The reader is reading fiction, and he responds with delight to incident after related incident—he loves the bridge blowers, the man in the straw hat and the alpaca jacket, and the search for the Battle of the Loire. He loves Caillol's gravity, his courage, and his perfectly tempered tenderness; he will remember for a long time the faces of Jacqueline, Fernand, and Ernestine; he will be implicated with those soldiers who desperately try to make up stories about a war that has been nothing but a retreat to them because an old soldier gives them wine and asks them where they fought and what they saw.

These are characters—all of them—who never passed through the rue de la Huchette; they never had any part to play in such an account of warfare and of a people and its cause as "A Thousand Shall Fall." For Pozner is neither a literary nor a military tourist; he belonged to a country and a people whose words are those he ends his book on: "From your scrap, we shall forge the steel of victory."

KAY BOYLE

Facing East and West

RUSSIA AND JAPAN. By Maurice Hindus. Doubleday, Doran and Company. $2.

MAURICE HINDUS always writes with passionate conviction, and in this, his twelfth book, he permits his passions and certainties to divert his attention so far from the main thesis of his work that the volume might better have been named "Russia, Japan, and Germany." Granting that any detailed discussion of the probabilities and probable outcome of a war between Russia and Japan must give ample consideration to the position of the Soviets in relation to Nazi Germany, this phase of the Russian-Japanese problem does not justify crowding the relations between Moscow and Tokyo into the background.

The heading for the last chapter of the book is The Battle unto Death, and a mighty fine chapter it is. But Japan is not mentioned from the middle of page 240 until near the bottom of page 253. There the author remembers the title of his work, devotes the two final paragraphs to the Russo-Japanese situation, and concludes abruptly on page 254.

Having correctly prophesied that Germany and Russia would go to war in spite of their non-aggression pact of 1939, Mr. Hindus then flouted the opinions of the military experts and boldly declared that Hitler could not conquer the Soviets. Now he predicts that Russia and Japan must engage in formal hostilities, and soon.

Japan, so runs the argument, cannot achieve its ambitions in Asia without pushing Russia out of its way, "with all the violence that it can muster," any more than Hitler can realize his aims without crushing the Soviets. The existing neutrality pact which Moscow and Japan negotiated in April of last year is the Far Eastern equivalent of the Hitler-Stalin treaty of 1939—and just as valueless and insubstantial. The fundamental antagonism of the two nations remains unaltered. The sound argument is put forth that Japan may never again have the chance of challenging Russia while Soviet armies are at the same time engaged in a life-and-death struggle on a European front, and that, moreover, Japan must attack soon as a measure of insurance against a possible Soviet victory over Hitler's Reich.

Even a decisive victory for Japan over the sea powers it is now fighting would not give it real security, the author argues, so long as "Russia sprawls all along Japan's doorstep and is in command of a mighty land army, a substantial fleet of submarines, a powerful air force, an immense hinterland that is in process of feverish industrialization."

Mr. Hindus successfully crams into several chapters much information about the industrialization of Siberia that is real news. And it is important and heartening news, particularly in these days when the German armies may achieve large-scale victories at several points along the winding and vital Russian front. Knowledge of the vast extent of the present industrial resources of Siberia must necessarily minimize the importance of regional German victories and the damage of a probable extension of bombing to factory centers west of the Ural Mountains. The rapid rise of a new steel civilization in Siberia is held up as one of the basic reasons why Japan will feel that an attempt must be made to defeat Russia decisively no matter what the cost.

Even a synchronized German-Japanese onslaught can never bring about the decisive defeat of the Soviets, Mr. Hindus declares, and justifies this declaration as follows:

> If Germany ever throws the Russian armies across the Volga, or clears them out of Europe, and if Japan, driving from the east, pushes them beyond Lake Baikal, Russia will have been horribly devastated, profusely bled, but she will, I must repeat, still have a mighty industry and a mighty agriculture in the Urals, in central Siberia, in central Asia. Including the Arctic, she will still sprawl over a territory larger than all of Europe. She will also have an army of millions. With her enormous man-power she will be continually training new millions; and since the war with Germany Siberia has been her chief training ground.

Not in the army, in industry, in finance, in government, or in agriculture is Russia today under the leadership of amateurs, it is argued, and the record of Soviet resistance against the Germans since last June has demolished the old notion that Russians lack organizing ability. All three of the Five-Year plans, Mr. Hindus believes, were inspired not by economic or political considerations but by the sage conviction that the Soviets would surely be attacked by Germany and Japan. The Russian people, he says, were led into paying an inordinate cost for industrialization, but this cost has been more than justified, for the success of the Five-Year plans alone has made it possible for the Soviets to put up the superb fight for existence which has so thrilled their friends and confounded their foes for the last eleven months.

There is little validity in any counter-argument based upon the fact that Japan's military leaders must know all or most of the facts about Russia's strength which are set forth in this book, and that such knowledge will surely deter them from attempting the impossible. Japan and Russia must fight, and Japan will open the hostilities because it is under the history-old compulsion of all aggressive conquerors. It must use the profits of each accomplished conquest to finance new efforts at expansion, for if it tries to stand still and keep what it has gained by violence, its enemies will surely accomplish its defeat and ruin.

The Great Villager

VERDI: THE MAN IN HIS LETTERS. Edited with a Preface by Franz Werfel. L. B. Fischer. $3.50.

ONE might write a score of essays on the material in this absorbing volume, which presents an altogether fascinating portrait of that rarest sort of man, the normal genius. But two themes impose themselves, and it happens that they enable one to assess the man at his true worth—Verdi and Wagner, Verdi and Shakespeare. In his day Verdi met and, one dares say, vanquished a great adversary, the Wagnerian music drama. So far as opera was concerned, it was a contest between Italy and Germany; in another sense it was a contest between man and the symphonic orchestra grown tyrannous. Verdi saw it that way. In a jovial letter to Mascheroni, written in the warm, triumphant days of "Falstaff," he mocks at the "modernists."

> I am busy now putting the touches on an opera in twelve acts plus a prologue. . . . Every act has an introduction in which all the violins, violas, celli, and double-basses play a melody in octaves, not like those in "Traviata," "Rigoletto," and so on, but a modern melody, one of those lovely ones that have no beginning and no end. . . . I have no time to explain to you how all the singers will furnish the accompaniment.

To Verdi, as these letters prove, the opera was the characters. The swollen importance of the orchestra was, as he said, yet another invasion of the baroque, one that must submerge true drama. In his middle years of success he will not forgo sharp impact and sudden poignancy for the sake of an architectural fabric; he must succeed with the direct lyrical stroke, as later with the passionate arioso phrases of "Otello" he will make profounder revelations than Wagner ever hoped to make.

For that persistence he has been called a reactionary, a "mandolinist." He was for a while the butt of the Wagnerian journalists. Yet the development of Wagner from "Rienzi" to "Parsifal," through the barbarity of "The Flying Dutchman" and the boredom of "Tannhäuser" and much of the Ring," to the pinnacle of "Die Meistersinger," is not more striking than that of the man who moved from "Oberto" through "Aïda" and "Macbeth" to the sheer truth of "Otello." And "Falstaff," second only to "Figaro" in its kind, was a far more wholesome, not to say musically delightful, conclusion than "Parsifal." Even "Macbeth," composed at the time of "Tannhäuser," is musically and dramatically more advanced than that stuffed piece of romantic medievalism.

All his life Verdi was aiming at a more human drama. His attitude to Shakespeare shows that. Nothing in this volume is more interesting than his constant preoccupation with the poet. In a letter to Escudier he writes, "I may not have rendered "Macbeth" well, but that I do not know, do not understand and feel Shakespeare, no, by heavens, no!" The opera may not be the "Macbeth" Anglo-Saxons hear after three centuries of criticism, but I should have said that Verdi understood Shakespeare as an Elizabethan understood him. "There are three roles in this opera," the composer writes, and the third is "the Chorus of Witches, uncouth and garrulous in the first act, sublime and prophetic in the third." That, surely, was the Globe Theater opinion. What is not in Verdi is what Shakespeare alone in his age possessed, that awareness of mockery in the tragedy of human fate expressed in the speech:

> Tomorrow and tomorrow and tomorrow
> Creeps in this petty pace from day to day . . .

Of that disturbing experience the witches were the theatrical symbol.

Tschaikowsky once said of "Aïda" that it showed not only a weakening of lyric power but a surrender to Wagnerism! He was nearer the mark when he declared that the poor taste of the Italian audience hampered Verdi. The Italian would have rejected this with indignation, though various letters disclose that he wrote "Otello" and "Falstaff" for the ideal theater of his own mind rather than for any concrete opera house. But even here one must note that the choice of "Othello" was logical and absolutely in the line of his development. Of all the Shakespearean tragedies it is the one that has fewest overtones. Evil is a man, not a supernatural force; the drama is wholly psychological, and a handkerchief will serve to unloose disaster. For years Verdi had worked with Cammarano on the libretto of "King Lear." It is not hard to see why he never composed music for it. In "Otello," for which Boito had given him a fine libretto, the aging Verdi, in whom age was worldly wisdom grown compassionate and whose sense of drama had as its instrument a new musical technique, wrote his finest work. Then, having revivified opera, this old man grew mellow, as Shakespeare of "The Tempest" did, and gave us "Falstaff."

At eighty-seven years he dropped a collar stud and in crawling under the bed for it suffered a stroke, from which he died. Otherwise we might have had "Lear," and "Romeo and Juliet" and "Hamlet" too. Comparing the tremendous impact of "Otello" and the subtlety of the "Falstaff" score one may believe that even "Lear" would have been a great work. There are no Verdi manifestos and no polemical pamphlets, but the utmost in drama lay along the line of his development. Turn over his scores or read these letters for the proof. RALPH BATES

How Begot, How Nourished? II

[This is the second of a series of commentaries. The third will appear soon.]

MR. LAUGHLIN'S scheme of presenting five young poets in one book must have, in their minds, advantages to compensate for the disadvantage of looking uncomfortably crowded, and also a little comical, like five people in one bed. In addition to the poems, each poet was asked to submit a brief statement concerning poetry in general and/or his own in particular. This kind of invitation is more apt to elicit sententiousness than sense, and while some of the remarks here made are interesting, they are not in general very illuminating. Neither Mr. Schubert nor Mr. Shapiro writes very clear prose; Mr. Mills has rather evaded the issue by casting his statement in the form of a poem; Miss McGahey is unconsciously amusing in the contrast her article affords between her own laconic observations and the effusions of the local maestro whom she quotes in almost double the number of her own words; Mr. Goodman is downright disagreeable. None of the poets seem to have spent any too much time in thinking about how poetry should sound; it might, in future editions, be a good idea to drop the whole business. Another suggestion: instead of photostated fair copies of poems in longhand, might it not be more interesting to reproduce an actual manuscript, with the corrections, erasures, marginalia, and so on?

In his poetry as well as in his prose Paul Goodman pushes his stuff in your face so aggressively that one is put unduly on the defensive. If it matters, I couldn't read his verse play at all; I mean I did read it, but you know what I mean; and the only poem in which I could take any pleasure was the curious little number about "the lordly Hudson hardly flowing." This is not in Mr. Goodman's usual voice, but softer; and while softness is not always a virtue in poetry, stridency is usually a vice.

Jeanne McGahey's verse play contains some clean writing and some fine images, but on the whole I didn't like it much either. This business about old men, villagers, witches, hunchbacks, travelers, wells, and shepherds, especially coming from the West Coast, brings back only too familiarly all that arty little-theater atmosphere of San Francisco, its murmurs and pretensions, its affections and mutual admirations: God save us all! I doubt whether even the genius of Yeats justifies trying this sort of poem. With Miss McGahey's lyrics the going is pleasanter; her landscapes, whether rural or urban, are sharply seen and sensitively felt.

The work of Clark Mills is by far the most satisfactory in this collection. Mr. Mills seems to be a prodigal writer, willing to try his hand at various measures, and possessed of the energy to develop and sustain sequences. It looks as if he might always produce more than he will eventually care to keep, especially when he has learned to curb his unconscious imitations and label his conscious ones. He shows that he has read, understood, and been moved by good literature, and not only in one language—Yeats, Rilke, Auden, Rimbaud. The advance of technology has made the bomb as inevitable in modern poetry as God was in the works of Robert Browning, but Mr. Mills is sensible on the subject. Mr. Mills's work shows careful study of sight and sound; and this is repaid in richness of effect. I wish him a book of poems all to himself; but not in too much of a hurry: let it age, it will be all the better.

Burlingame,

David Schubert's poems are more somber in tone, less rich and warm in sound and image than those of Mr. Mills, and sometimes a little violent in manner. The world he depicts is rather dreary; the biographical note speaks of his having had a not very easy time, "homeless from the age of fifteen, supporting himself by selling newspapers, working as bus boy, soda jerker, waiter, farm hand, various other jobs." One does not wish for a poet a cushioned existence; nor is there any self-pity in Mr. Schubert's work: it is too honest for that. But honesty and accuracy are not enough—I am not meaning to suggest that Mr. Schubert is a drab realist, as the phrase used to run, either. He himself knows what more is necessary: "This exquisite lilt, this dance of sound, must be married to a responsible intelligence before there can occur the poem. Naturally, they are one: meaning and music, metaphor and thought." Mr. Schubert's poems are not yet lilting or dancing; the fragments of metaphor and music and meaning jolt like gondolas being shunted around the switching-yard. There is needed more fusion, more ease. In addition to his own work Mr. Schubert has included some translations from Baudelaire.

Karl Shapiro's progress has taken him around a good deal: he has not been satisfied with what he saw from his front porch, or with much of anything else for that matter. His visits have touched upon the emporium and the drugstore, the midnight show and the honky-tonk, the necropolis and the hospital, Druid Hill Park, the University of Virginia, Scyros (you'd never know the place), Hollywood, Washington Cathedral, and other points of interest around the nation's capital, where "Roosevelt lunched on ballots yesterday/and Archibald performed the minuet." Mr. Shapiro's attitude is not always reverent; he likes to be perverse, in a normal youthful way; his genius is most happily exercised in response to the satirical impulse. His line is firm and not devious, and if Auden's voice cries intermittently in his pages, like the cuckoo in a leafy dell, oh, well, we ought to be getting used to that by this time.

That takes care of Mr. Laughlin's recent output. The Colt Press in San Francisco has also promised a poetry series, and the first number is at hand. This is a collection by Don Stanford called "New England Earth, and Other Poems." The title will fool you badly if you are led by it to expect something in the Paul Engle or Robert P. Tristram Coffin manner. Mr. Stanford does not by any means belong to the of-the-corn-corny school; rather he is an elegant literary writer whose work is calculated (the word must be used advisedly) to attract the attention of his peers. That he has succeeded is evident from a foreword by Yvor Winters; this conveys the impression both of a solo turn in a California mutual-admiration choir and of an apostolic benediction. Poetry, I suppose, can mean all things to all men; to find a poem cited in praise because its detail "escapes the formulary throughout by virtue chiefly of an almost formulary, yet finely managed, hyperbole"—need I say that this is both pedantic and ridiculous? Moreover, in the nice details of the line either Mr. Winters's ear is not so acute as he pretends or else he is being too polite to call attention to flaws; would a really exquisite writer say, for instance, "To you who"; rhyme "dignity" and "tranquillity," and "the year—the ear"; make "fire" and "fear" and "desire" into "fi-yer," "fee-er," and "desiyer"; put down one minute "an hundred" (fancy) and a few lines later "a hallowed" (plain)?

Without the send-off Mr. Stanford's poems would receive a different kind of attention: then they could be read, simply and purely, for what they are; and some of them are very pure and simple and nice. As it is, you feel neglectful if you do not read them with one eye cocked to catch their relation to Collins, Dryden, Donne, Herrick, Rochester, and Vaughan; but maybe that is the way Mr. Stanford wants it.

"See this air, how empty it is of angels!" cries the voice of another young poet, Winfield Townley Scott, in the first line of the collection called "Wind the Clock," published by the press of James A. Decker. If the New Directions and Colt houses have something of the angelic about them, that of Mr. Decker might be described as semi-angelic, or an angel on a shoestring. His firm in Prairie City, Illinois, calls itself "poetry publishers": at hand are Mr. Scott's collection and an anthology of "Seven New Poets." The books are shoddy in appearance: coarse paper, undistinguished typography, and rather tacky binding. Still, it is silly to kick about the quality of the page when the quality of the poetry is as fresh and readable as that of Mr. Scott's work. In the course of his search for angels this author has gone around by himself a good deal, and observed himself in a manner that is level-headed, humorous, and sensitive, "as much for pleasure as necessity," as he remarks about one of his acts of micturition. I like him better in this vein, where he calls himself "I," than when he disguises himself, in rather thin irony, as Festus Prufrock Traman, or somebody. He has also observed other people: the poet Robinson, the dancer Argentina, refugee professors on the campus at Brown, an old boy getting booted out of O'Ryan's bar, Fatty Doran from grade school, another kid in the second grade. How the young, even more than the old, like to remember the days when they were younger!

The term "young" in Mr. Decker's series of new poets is somewhat more elastic than in the New Directions series; here the age limit is forty, and I suspect there might, even at that, be a little cheating. The writers included are Tom Boggs, Marshall Schacht, John Ciardi, Robert Clairmont, Minna Gellert, E. L. Mayo, and Lucy Kent. I know a good many words that might be applied to this collection of verse but will utter only one—a firm and gentle No.

Next time: miscellanea and curiosa, but not erotica; with, perhaps, a few reflections. ROLFE HUMPHRIES

FILMS

NO ONE who is interested in serious films should overlook Paul Strand's "Native Land." It can be described, I suppose, as a propaganda film, though it is not the sort of propaganda that one expects to be shown at the present time. There is, indeed, a reference at the very end to the American people's need to defend their liberties against their foreign enemies, but the main theme is the workers' struggle against native oppressors. The bulk of the film consists of the reenactment of a series of scenes from the social history of the thirties, beginning with the murder of a farmer for his political activities and ending with the massacre of the steel workers by the Chicago police. Of the intervening episodes the most elaborate is an account of the breaking of a union through the introduction of a spy; the most terrifying, the account of an outrage by the Ku Klux Klan. No doubt it can be justly argued that the selection of these scenes reveals political bias, and that the film does not give a wholly fair impression of the fortunes of American labor during the past decade. But the point is that the events it describes did happen and could happen again; and it is good for this to be made known. Moreover, whatever one may think of its political implications, the film is eminently well worth seeing for aesthetic reasons. It has its defects: there are moments when it is sentimental; the distinction between the good and the evil is rather too simply drawn; and it is inevitably episodic in spite of the continuity provided by Paul Robeson's commentary. Nevertheless, the direction, the photography, and the acting make it as moving as anything I have seen for a long time. The creation of suspense is particularly well handled.

Suspense used to be Mr. Hitchcock's forte. But though he makes great efforts he conspicuously fails to achieve it in "Saboteur." The film tells the story of a young factory worker who is unjustly suspected of sabotage and who, instead of sensibly trying to clear himself and secure the arrest of the real culprit by telling his story to the police, sets out to catch him single-handed. This leads to a series of chases which carry the actors right across the United States. Sometimes the hero is shown chasing the villains; sometimes the villains chase the hero; sometimes both are being chased by the police; and at times the hero's girl is in on it too. It all ends at the Statue of Liberty, with the saboteur hurtling to his death. One scene, in which two of the gang of saboteurs who are driving in a car with the hero start singing a Tschaikowsky concerto, recalls the excellent Hitchcock of "The Thirty-nine Steps" and "The Lady Vanishes"; but as a whole the film is wild without being exciting. Robert Cummings and Priscilla Lane as the hero and heroine do no more than perform their function of portraying ordinary people, and the best acting comes from the villains, especially Norman Lloyd.

"This Above All" is an inaccurate but still reverent version of Eric Knight's successful novel, with Tyrone Power and Joan Fontaine in the leading parts. Both of them act well, though the part of a class-conscious Yorkshireman is not ideal for Mr. Power. The film is very long, for the most part very solemn, and rather boring. It does, however, succeed at times in recreating the atmosphere of England during the period of the raids; and it partly fulfils what was presumably the author's purpose of bringing to light some of the social issues which have been sharpened by the war.

MUSIC

WHAT it has meant for Marian Anderson's development as an artist to have a musician like Franz Rupp working with her during the past two seasons was revealed, at her May 10 Carnegie Hall recital, in her subtly inflected phrasing of Schubert's "Suleika" and of the concluding passage of his "Jüngling und der Tod"; and these were merely the outstanding examples of what was evident in everything she did. In addition the voice itself, which seemed to be better used, sounded better: there was no constriction, no forcing; there was, then, only as much power as could be achieved with ease; and if this was not enough for Schubert's "Allmacht" or for Carnegie Hall it was more agreeable to the ear. Not that the new ease restored to the voice what the former constriction and forcing had taken from it; but while the upper range lacked the richness and warmth that were to be heard in the lower range, it was clear, steady, free of the terrific tremolo of two years ago. One thing is clear: the reduced physical proportions of the singing and its new musical subtlety call for the intimacy of a small hall and for programs of the songs of Schubert, Schumann, Brahms, and Wolf that Miss Anderson is now able to sing so beautifully.

Another thing that is clear is that Rupp, one of the finest musicians I know of, should not be heard only as an accompanist. A superb ensemble artist, he should be heard in chamber music; and his recital two years ago revealed a solo pianist who needed only the occasions for continued exercise of his capacities to become outstanding.

The first New York season of Eugene Loring's Dance Players was concerned almost entirely with Loring's own works. Two had already been seen: "Billy the Kid," originally produced by the Ballet Caravan and later presented by the Ballet Theater; and "City Portrait," also produced by the Ballet Caravan. To these were now added "Harlequin for President," which the Ballet Caravan had produced but—for good reasons, it turned out—had not brought to New York; and the new "Man from Midian" and "Prairie." In "Billy the Kid" Loring, Aaron Copland, and Jared French had created a masterpiece; in none of the others that I saw (I missed "Prairie") had Loring had as good collaborators, or had he himself been able to achieve anything like the strikingly original, witty, and touching choreography of "Billy." "City Portrait," to poor music by Henry Brant, had fine moments; but the humor of "Harlequin," to music of Scarlatti, was embarrassing; and what I saw of "The Man from Midian" was as bad in its serious way, with no discoverable relation to Stefan Wolpe's atrocious music.

Lew Christensen's "Jinx" had an interesting idea that was worked out ineffectively on the stage, with music by Benjamin Britten in which noisy facility covered pointlessness.

The two records of the 1933 Fletcher Henderson Orchestra in Decca's Gems of Jazz Volume 4 are worth getting: 18253 for Coleman Hawkins's fine solo in "It's the Talk of the Town," and good solos by Horace Henderson and Henry Allen in "Nagasaki"; 18254 for another and longer Hawkins solo in his most agitatedly florid and complex style in "I've Got to Sing a Torch Song." As for recent jazz records, Earl Hines does some of his brilliant and intricate playing against a large-band background in "The Earl" (Bluebird 11432); Louis Armstrong plays well against such a background in "When It's Sleepy Time Down South" (Decca 4140); the engaging Mel Powell and the Goodman trombonist make the Benny Goodman Orchestra's "A String of Pearls (Okeh 6590) enjoyable for half the side, up to the moment when Goodman himself begins to zigzag in imitation of the playing he used to do; and the Golden Gate Quartet sings "Didn't It Rain" and "He Never Said a Mumblin' Word" (Okeh 6529). And as for "King Joe" (Okeh 6475), a blues about Joe Louis written by Richard Wright, composed by Count Basie, and sung with the Basie Orchestra by Paul Robeson—I have been made uncomfortable by what I have felt to be the phonyness of this piece of synthetic folk-expression; and I have found that others were affected by it in the same way.

"The Jazz Record Book" (Smith & Durrell, $3.50) begins with a description of jazz and a history of its development; and in accordance with this historical progression it then lists recorded performances and the performers who recorded them, and gives descriptive and critical comment. The authors are Charles Edward Smith, Frederic Ramsey, Jr., William Russell, and Charles Payne Rogers, of whom Smith, Ramsey, and Russell were important members of the group who produced the book "Jazz Men," in which the nostalgia for the New Orleans brothels was heavy and the lyricism of expression unreadable. In the present book they are more sober, more factual, and more informative; but their minds and prose styles are cloudy; and for an account of the nature and development of jazz I would take Wilder Hobson's "American Jazz Music," the one first-rate piece of appreciative writing on the subject—as distinguished from Winthrop Sargeant's technical study of it—that I know.

The same cloudiness manifests itself in the second part of the book in undiscriminating inclusion and omission of recorded performances, in equally undiscriminating comments, and in ways of listing band personnels that often are difficult to follow and thus lessen the usefulness of what is to me the only valuable part of the book.

The Conflict in Anderson

Dear Sirs: Permit me all respectfully to say that Sherwood Anderson's beautiful volume of "Memoirs," which Margaret Marshall finds "a chaos of impulse and feeling," "inert and shapeless," and "lacking the bones of thought," appears to me to be a very orderly book. I feel that while the style rambles and digresses, it does so in accordance with the author's intention, and that the formal arrangement of the material is methodical, contributing to the clear illustration of the subject and the force of its expression.

This subject, which is prefigured in the preface, is the conflict between the opportunist and the idealist comprised in the individuality of Sherwood Anderson. The one governed his early manhood and his business relations; the other asserted itself in the form of a sickness with his way of life and began gaining the upper hand as soon as he commenced writing. A morality developed within Anderson: the morality of the artist; a truthfulness to his feeling, a devotion to truth as expressed in art. For a time the two "personalities" ran in harness while Anderson allowed the opportunist to control the writing of the advertisements through which he made his living, the idealist his literary work. But business grew more and more distasteful; temporarily he was enabled to drop it entirely through the commercial success of his books. That success dwindled; there was a temptation to write for the market. But Anderson chose "not to sell out his inner life" and faced poverty in old age with equanimity.

That is his "success story": in itself it suggests that he felt a universal order and stability; for it presents an almost typical instance of the regular and recurrent emergence and entelechy of the artist. And the whole mass of the material pushes forward as to a climax to The Sound of the Stream—the chapter which at the conclusion of the fifth of the six "books" of the "Memoirs" recounts the event of the final decision "not to sell out." Against the background of the American hour and place and the family situation which sharpened Anderson's desire for material success, Book I exhibits the emergence of the two natures and foreshadows the "sickness" in Book II. Book II exhibits the temporary dominance of opportunism, the crucial moments which broke its hold—the crash of the marriage built on the opportunist self and the emergence of the artist's morality. A Robin's Egg Renaissance shows the temporary adjustment of the two selves; Book IV—the book of peregrinations—the efforts to escape entirely from business and the crash of another marriage. The final unity begins at the end of this book—harmony with environment, with a wife, and with art. What is most extraordinary of course is the wonderfully warm and tender feeling with which Anderson, as usual, expresses his subject: it makes me think of him as a sort of Schubert or Van Gogh of prose.

"Total" War-Bond Buying

Dear Sirs: The general executive board of Local 3 of the International Brotherhood of Electrical Workers recently voted unanimously to institute a 10 per cent industry-wide payroll-deduction plan for the purchase of $4,000,000 in war bonds annually by all of its 20,000 members. This plan will remain in effect for the duration of the war or as long as the national crisis continues.

In commenting on Local 3's action Harry Van Arsdale, Jr., business manager of the union, said: "If our government is to receive the billions of dollars which it requires to achieve victory over the Axis powers, there must be an end to haphazard, individual effort in the purchase of war bonds. This is war and all the people must participate in an orderly, organized manner. I hope that other unions and other industries will follow the action of Local 3."

Local 3 intends to use its influence in the labor movement to induce other unions to exert total effort in the purchase of war bonds.

The Position of the A. C. L. U.

Dear Sirs: The letter-debate published recently in The Nation between James N. Rosenberg and Arthur Garfield Hays on the sedition prosecutions instituted by the Department of Justice has apparently created an impression that the American Civil Liberties Union is participating in the defense of the indicted men.

That is not the fact. No action whatever has been taken except to urge the Attorney General to adhere to the "clear and present danger" test laid down by the Supreme Court in World War I; and to raise the question whether the utterances of the particular crackpots (and others) indicted constitute any real danger to the conduct of the war. The Civil Liberties Union, in accordance with its customary procedure, will examine each indictment to determine whether any participation or protest is justified by the "clear and present danger" test.

Mr. Hays was arguing a general case, without committing the Union to any specific action. As Attorney General Biddle has stated, the responsibility of determining what utterances are seditious is "terrific"—for the American Civil Liberties Union as well as for the Department of Justice.

The Shape of Things

DESPITE THE ADVENT OF PIERRE LAVAL, full collaboration between Vichy France and the Axis is proving a slow growth. The underground resistance of French patriots is spreading in direct proportion to the intensity of the terror tactics designed to stamp it out. For all his tremendous paper power the Chief of Government can do nothing to quell it. Nor has he felt strong enough to implement his threats against Britain because of its seizure of Madagascar. Still less dare he outrage public opinion by any move toward a rupture with the United States; so that he has to acquiesce in the Martinique negotiations. Unfortunately, the State Department still fails to grasp the basic weakness of Laval's position—the total absence of popular French support for his policy—and so allows the Martinique discussions to drag on instead of insisting on immediate compliance with its demands. Meanwhile Berlin is engaging in a new maneuver which at first sight would appear an attempt to torpedo Laval but could be cunningly designed to build him up. By Hitler's kind permission the Italians have revived their agitation for "Tunis, Corsica, and Nice." Berlin knows quite well that the whole structure of the Vichy regime would collapse if these territories were ceded to Mussolini, for not even the most fascist-minded French officers would stomach such a surrender. But after allowing the agitation to be worked up to impressive proportions Hitler can either call it off in return for a quid pro quo such as the French fleet or simply as a mark of favor to Laval, who could then be hailed as the savior of the French empire. An alternative theory is that the Nazis have realized that collaboration cannot be effected with the aid of any bought French leader, even Laval, and are therefore preparing to occupy the whole country.

THE WIND OF OPTIMISM WHICH DURING the past few weeks has filled the air waves and press columns with intimations of early victory sprang up as the result of a half-fortuitous combination of events. British raids over German-held Europe have assumed ever greater proportions and destructive force; the successful Russian drive against Kharkov tempted people to minimize the Nazi offensive in the Crimea; stories of hunger and political unrest in Italy and Germany created hopes of early Axis collapse; and various official reports, such as the recent army-navy war review, presented a picture of encouraging progress in American preparations. No one of these stories by itself was untrue; together they tended to distort a total picture which is dark, if not desperate. And so it was extremely wise of the President and Secretary Hull to issue warnings against over-optimism and to urge the press to use restraint in dealing with local or day-to-day successes. The loss of Burma and the growing threat to China, the German push toward the Caucasus, the destructive submarine war in our own coastal waters against Allied shipping—these are factors of greater immediate moment than all the omens of victory listed above.

IT IS NO WONDER THAT THE BRITISH demand for a new front is swelling into a movement of ominous proportions—the sort of movement that drove Chamberlain, against his desire, to threaten war when Hitler moved into Prague; the sort of movement that threw him out of office when Norway fell. Public opinion cannot plan strategy, but it can often create major policy—especially in England. The tremendous demonstrations in London last Sunday, organized partly by the Communists and partly by Beaverbrook's Daily Express, amounted to a popular mandate for a European offensive. The bitter fact, stated clearly by Mr. del Vayo on page 618 of this issue, is that Russia's position is extremely perilous and that time is running short. The stories from Berne and Stockholm, and even from Moscow and Kuibyshev, have concealed rather than exposed the fact. Only by ignoring these dispatches, which are inspired by propaganda or a dearth of real news, and concentrating on the terse communiqués of the Soviet command can one get an accurate if partial picture. Russia is in danger of defeat or a disastrous setback within the next three months. Its situation calls for a strategy which subordinates caution and even complete preparation to daring and speed. Indications that the Allied command has been preparing to send an expedition to some point on the Continent have multiplied in recent weeks. But popular pressure behind such a move is of untold value. It tends to silence the timid and put added energy into the efforts of those in charge of operations. For lack of the eager, aggressive spirit shown at the meetings in Trafalgar Square, Malaya and Burma were lost. It may have asserted itself in time to save the Red Army.

REICH MARSHAL GOERING HAS GIVEN THE most revealing account of the horrors suffered by the German army during the winter campaign in Russia. In a speech obviously intended to key up the home front for more sacrifices he described the hardships borne by the troops—the appalling cold, the breakdown in communications causing scarcity of food and supplies, the constant harassing by the Soviet guerrillas. He hinted that morale had cracked, declaring that only the strength and genius of Hitler had proved equal to the crisis. Then he painted the portrait of a tender-hearted Führer forced to adopt the harshest of measures in order to prevent the line from giving way. Is this an allusion to the suppression of mutinies, to drastic purges among the officers? Göring seems to have made little attempt to console the Germans for their winter losses by promising quick summer victories. On the contrary, he talked in terms of prolonged war and new trials to be endured. He complained that the weather had been very unkind, not only in Russia but at home. Last year's harvest was a poor one, and an exceptionally bad winter—the third in succession—had prevented the germination of crops sown last fall. From other sources it has been learned that there is now a serious shortage of potatoes—the mainstay of the German diet—owing to the freezing during the winter of a large part of the reserve stocks. Every effort is being made to spur the farmers to produce more, but they are handicapped by shortage of labor. Rumors that there are to be further reductions in German meat rations have been encouraged by the granting of a "leave of absence" to Walter Darre, veteran Nazi Minister of Food and Agriculture. These rumors have been officially denied, but there is reason to suppose that Darre has been selected as the scapegoat for the failure of Nazi food policies.

WITH MEXICO'S ENTRY INTO THE WAR THE United Nations have won an ally whose opposition to fascist aggression, from Ethiopia to Spain, has been admirably consistent. And the United States has won more than an ally, for Mexico, once in the war, no longer offers opportunities to the Axis for fifth-column activities dangerous both to itself and to the United States. The situation had become especially alarming since our own declaration of war. In the measure to which the Camacho government increased its support of the United States and strengthened the defense of the country, Axis agitators in Mexico intensified their activities. They enjoyed the invaluable support of the Sinarquistas and the Spanish Phalanx. The government attempted to counteract their influence by arresting several undesirable aliens, among them Edwald Bork, director of the German Bank and the Nazi party chief for all Mexico. These agents were supposed to leave the country at once, but their departure was several times delayed, and private information from Mexico revealed that every sort of influence was being exerted to prevent their deportation. Business firms on the United States blacklist also continued to do business—both commercial and political. A declaration of war will give the Camacho government a free hand in dealing with these Nazi invaders, not to mention the 4,860 Japanese who, according to the latest official Mexican figures, have in recent years established themselves along the coast. No less important are the contributions a country so rich in raw materials, notably in metals, can render to the war effort of the United Nations, and the effect its war declaration will have on other Latin American republics, especially democratic Chile, where Mexico has always exercised a great influence on account of its progressive social policy.

THE SUBMARINE PERIL ALONG OUR COAST is increasing in magnitude despite the additional measures recently taken by the navy and coast guard to protect shipping. Unfortunately, it is not generally realized in this country how important our own Atlantic front is for the war as a whole. That the enemy considers it of vital importance may be seen from the tremendous efforts he is making to keep up the campaign on this side of the Atlantic. We would not suggest for a moment that the navy is not doing all it can, but the government has not been as vigorous as it might have been in enlisting public support in combating the peril. Much valuable time was lost in enforcing the dimout in New York and along the Southern coast. Not much emphasis has been given to the navy's request that private owners turn over their small boats to aid in the anti-submarine campaign. Walter Lippmann has issued a dramatic and timely appeal to our civilian seamen—yachtsmen, fishermen, and tugboat captains—to fight as guerrillas against the enemy that has invaded our territorial waters. The navy would doubtless oppose the idea of amateurs operating independently against the U-boat menace, but there is much that could be done under the navy's direction. And if unorthodox methods will help, as they helped at Dunkirk, let us by all means use them.

AS USUAL THE TAX PROGRAM WORKED OUT by the House Ways and Means Committee has proved to be far less satisfactory than that proposed by the Treasury's tax experts. The committee's bill frankly shifts the tax burden away from the well-to-do. Forgotten is the $25,000 ceiling asked for by the President in his recent message to Congress. Instead, a person having an income of $1,000,000 is allowed to keep $157,000. Families with incomes of $10,000—the Congressional level—escape with a tax of only $2,064 under the committee bill as compared with the $2,549 asked for by the Treasury. The increase for the $10,000-a-year man over this year's tax amounts to a little more than 50 per cent. It is even less for the higher brackets. In contrast, a married man with an income of $2,000 will pay more than three times as much under the committee's bill as he now pays, or $152 as compared with $42, while an unmarried person earning $20 a week will be taxed approximately $90. An unmarried person earning $700 a year—less than $14 a week—will pay a tax of $32 under the committee plan as compared with $16 under the Treasury's proposals. Although the House committee has substantially raised the tax on single persons in the lower brackets, revenue derived by this increase by no means offsets that lost by the reduction of the burden on the well-to-do. It is estimated that the yield of the bill as it stands will fall short of the Treasury's estimates by nearly $2,000,000,000. Although no action has yet been taken in that direction, there is grave danger that Congress will seek to make up this deficiency by a sales tax that will again fall chiefly on the lower income groups.

THE ADMINISTRATION'S POLICY ON WAGES became somewhat clearer last week when the President openly opposed the granting of voluntary wage increases by three West Coast aircraft corporations. The action was taken on the ground that the proposed increase would unsettle wage scales throughout the industry and might contribute to general labor unrest. A few days earlier William H. Davis, chairman of the War Labor Board, indicated that some method might be worked out for keeping low wages approximately in line with rising living costs. The two statements of policy are, of course, not at all inconsistent. Wage increases cannot be ruled out entirely during the emergency, but they should be linked to need and changes in living costs and not to any one company's ability to increase its remuneration. It is possible that as the shortage of skilled workers becomes more acute some minor adjustments will have to be made in order to assure an adequate supply of trained men. But it is important that all changes be subject to orderly review and not left to the whim of the employers. To date the War Labor Board has handled all requests for wage increases, but its authority is limited to settling disputes that arise through collective bargaining. There is need for a new wage board such as has been recommended by an inter-departmental committee to take responsibility where the NWLB lacks power. A clear-cut statement of government policy by such a board would probably do much to allay the fears of organized labor and help put an end to the reactionaries' demand for a freezing of all wages.

IN ASKING THE SENATE TO CONFIRM THE nomination of Thomas F. Meaney to a federal judgeship, the President has again gone out of his way to meet the wishes of Boss Hague of Jersey City. Meaney is more than an ally of the Hague machine; he is such an uncomplaining stooge that he resigned his own job several years ago because that was the only way to make a place for the Mayor's son, Frank, Jr. Young Hague, who aspired to be a lawyer, had been thrown out of several colleges and was obviously immune to the higher learning. His father, for once referring to the law, discovered an ancient statute that permitted "lay judges" to sit on the state Court of Errors and Appeals. Deciding that this was the job for Junior, the Mayor obtained Meaney's resignation and told him to bide his time until a suitable opening appeared. When there was a vacancy on the New Jersey District Court, Hague and his man in the Senate, William Smathers, prevailed upon the President to nominate Meaney without even considering other candidates. If the President does not withdraw Meaney's name, the Senate ought to reject it. Any one of Governor Edison's candidates would be better.

Will China Be Next?

JAPAN has been quick to take advantage of the isolation of China as a result of the cutting of the Burma road. For the first time since 1938 it has launched a number of simultaneous drives against Chiang Kai-shek's major bases. The drive through Burma into the province of Yunnan appears to have been stopped, for the time being at least, by effective Chinese resistance and the approach of the rainy season. But in Chekiang, where the Chinese have retained a rich coastal region not far from the southern islands of Japan, the enemy has made considerable progress in a four-pronged drive that may have as its ultimate objective a link with the Japanese forces to the west in Nanchang. Another enemy force, said to number at least 25,000, has landed near the important port city of Foochow, just south of the Chekiang border. There are also reports of a new drive against Changsha, scene of at least three previous Japanese disasters. Minor operations are reported in southern Shansi, where the Japanese have likewise encountered difficulties in the past.

The progress of these drives is somewhat obscure as we go to press. So far the Chinese appear to be holding their own in the defense of Foochow, although the Japanese have effected a number of landings in the vicinity of the city. In Chekiang the situation is grave. It seems likely that the important city of Kinhwa, the temporary provincial capital, has already fallen to the invader. Capture of this city alone would justify whatever price the Japanese have paid in making the offensive in this region.

It is possible that the drives in Chekiang and around Foochow are primarily to locate and destroy any air bases that the United Nations might be planning to use for attacks upon Japan. This would seem the most logical explanation of the extraordinarily heavy air attacks upon this region during the past month. It is reported from Chungking that the enemy has made twenty-two raids there since April 18, employing a total of no fewer than 554 planes. One city, Kian in central Kiangsi, has suffered thirteen raids, the heaviest of which was carried out by forty-three planes. Since Kian itself is a relatively unimportant town, it must be assumed that the Japanese believe it to be an actual or potential base for air operations against Tokyo. But even if the immediate objective of Chekiang operations is the elimination of air bases, the drive is a serious threat to China's survival. Not only is Chekiang a rich province in its own right, but it has served for the past four years as one of the principal routes by which supplies have reached Free China. The Japanese naval blockade has never been very effective. By the payment of a sort of illegal tax to the naval patrols the Chinese have been able to import substantial quantities of goods, including many Japanese products, through the free Chinese ports that dot the Chekiang and Fukien coastline. The closing of these ports of entry after the barring of the Burma road would be an extremely serious blow to Chungking. If, in addition, the Japanese were able to capture Changsha and open north-south communications along the Canton-Hankow railway and east-west communications along the railway that runs from Hangchow to Changsha, China's plight would be desperate.

The gravity of the situation is emphasized by an urgent call for help from a Chinese official spokesman. The Chinese are not cry-babies. They have fought this war without very much aid from outside. But until now they have always had assurance that some supplies would reach them. During the first four years of the war the Russians maintained a steady, though inadequate, flow of planes, trucks, and light guns. For the past twelve months American supplies have been rolling in by way of the Burma road. And many needed articles have trickled in through the southern ports. Now that all these avenues are virtually closed, the Chinese naturally are anxious. They look to the United States with its vast capacity for building transport planes as their one hope of survival. Military secrecy prevents us, of course, from knowing what steps are being taken in Washington, but past experience leads us to fear that help may be delayed until it is too late.

It is possible that Japan can be defeated even if China goes down. But the loss to the United Nations of from three to four million experienced soldiers who would drive the Japanese into the sea if they were given arms could not fail to prolong the war for many months. It might even necessitate the raising and sending of an equivalent American army to the Far East. Great sacrifices may be necessary to deliver to China while there is yet time the modest minimum of goods it must have in order to carry on. But nowhere else in the world today are supplies more bitterly needed, and in no other place are they likely to be used more effectively.

The Walsh Case

ON APRIL 30 Gustave Beekman was convicted in County Judge Leibowitz's Brooklyn court on a harge of operating a house of male prostitution. His premises in Pacific Street, Brooklyn, had been raided on March 14 by city detectives and Naval Intelligence officers after having been under surveillance for six weeks by three federal agencies, whose attention had been attracted to the place by the many members of the armed forces visiting it. After the jury's verdict Beekman was told by Judge Leibowitz that the length of his sentence would depend on the extent to which he cooperated with the authorities—a procedure which may be undesirable but is certainly hallowed by custom in our criminal courts.

As a result Beekman signed an affidavit parts of which were published on May 1 by the New York Post. This document gave full and unprintable details about orgies which took place at the Pacific Street house, named two Germans who were in the habit of bringing soldiers and sailors there and questioning them closely about ship movements and so forth, and referred at some length to a United States Senator who was alleged to be a frequent visitor. In its story the Post withheld the name of this man, together with many other particulars, in order not to interfere with official investigations said to be in progress. Not unnaturally, however, even though other newspapers left the matter severely alone, rumors began to spread, and the name of the Senator supposed to be involved was soon widely known.

On May 6 the New York Post stated that the man named by Beekman and other witnesses in the course of official investigations was David I. Walsh, senior Senator from Massachusetts, chairman of the Senate Naval Affairs Committee, and a prominent member of the isolationist bloc. Declaring that the evidence suggested that the Senator had visited the Pacific Street house since America entered the war, the newspaper urged editorially that a full investigation should be undertaken by the Senate. Informed of the accusation, Senator Walsh said: "It's a diabolical lie. . . . I have never in my life been in such a place."

In Washington no official cognizance was taken of the charges until May 20, when Majority Leader Barkley told the Senate that he had received an FBI report from Attorney General Biddle which completely exonerated Walsh. While he did not read the report to his colleagues, he summarized some parts of it in his speech. In the course of their investigations, it appeared, FBI officers had interrogated Beekman, who recanted his original sworn statement and admitted that the man he had identified as Walsh was another elderly New Englander, not from Massachusetts, who was about the same weight and age as the Senator but otherwise completely unlike him. Other witnesses also agreed that this unnamed man was a visitor to Pacific Street on the dates Walsh had been said to be there, and in an interview with FBI investigators the man himself admitted the fact. Senator Barkley made no suggestions for further action, but after his statement four isolationist Senators—Clark of Missouri, Tobey, Wheeler, and Nye—took the floor and denounced the Post, its attorney Morris Ernst, and Judge Leibowitz in unmeasured terms. Senator Clark said that there had been a "filthy conspiracy to smear a member of this body" and suggested that "the old hussy who runs the New York Post" should be summoned to the bar of the Senate together with Judge Leibowitz, who "must have been a party" to subornation of perjury. Similar accusations were made by the other Senators, with Nye contributing a dark hint about the existence of a secret society devoted to the collection of information for the purpose of smearing individual members of the Upper House.

The only real support for these proposals for a Senate inquiry has come from the New York Post itself, which has asserted that the FBI report was a flagrant piece of whitewashing and has demanded the right to be heard on the charges made against it by Senator Clark and his friends. In support of its stand the Post has published a third affidavit by Beekman stating that his recantation was made after hours of high-pressure questioning by FBI agents and reasserting his identification of Walsh as a frequenter of his establishment. Clearly Beekman is an unsatisfactory witness for either side of the case, but in our view the unpublished report of the Justice Department does not wholly dispose of the matter. If Senator Walsh has indeed been vindicated, then the New York Post has been guilty of an atrocious libel and should be indicted before the Senate or some other court. But it, too, has a right to be heard in its own defense and to be given an opportunity to disprove the very grave charges of conspiracy which have been hurled against it.

There is a point of public interest, also, which ought not to be overlooked. So summary an attempt to bury an unpleasant affair may involve the sidetracking of a full and open investigation of the house in Pacific Street. The statement that Nazi agents were habitués of this place has not been denied, and, in fact, two of those named have been interned at Ellis Island. But if their activities have been correctly described, they should not merely be locked up but should be brought to trial. Let us not forget that the exploitation of sexual irregularities has been a favored Nazi method of gathering information and organizing fifth columns. We cannot afford to encourage such methods by covering up a case in order to protect someone whose name, justly or unjustly, has been brought into it. The Nation strongly supports the Post's demand for a full and public inquiry.

Russia in Danger

BY J. ALVAREZ DEL VAYO

EVERYBODY foresaw that there was nothing to be complacent about. It was clear that as soon as the Battle of Russia renewed its violence the general uneasiness over the outcome would be reflected in an intensification of the pressure for a second front. That is what has happened, and the last debate in the Commons and the demonstrations in Trafalgar Square again have revealed England leading the movement in favor of an invasion of Europe.

The worst thing that could happen would be to have the demand for a second front become a political issue or degenerate into a cause of bitterness and suspicion. The question should not involve any consideration whatever except the interests of victory. Not even one's attitude toward the Soviet Union should be permitted to play a role in this debate. And to suspect anyone who doubts the advisability of opening a second front of defeatism or appeasement would be equally stupid and groundless. In Spain one found the best military chiefs insisting, as was their duty, on the difficulties of a proposed military operation and afterward, when the government had decided to carry it out, welcoming the decision with relief. It would be disheartening if any group should repeat the spectacle of abusing today the people who tomorrow will again be eligible for praise.

In addition, anyone who has sat in the supreme council during a war has observed the natural irritation produced in those who bear direct responsibility for the conduct of operations by advice from outsiders on when and where and how they should attack. In this particular case, the irritation must be even greater, because those who are on the inside must have the sensation of controlling an overwhelming industrial power that assures them in the near future indisputable superiority in the air, on land, and on the sea. Those people who are in the secret, who hold or believe they hold all the elements of judgment in their hands, surely anticipate with confident joy the moment when the portentous war machine now in process of construction will begin to crush under its wheels the German motorized divisions. Only imagine the day when all the fighting resources of the United Nations are mobilized for the terrific assault! For every plane of the Axis, ten of ours; for every tank, twenty; and all that splendid war material at the service both of the young expeditionary armies and of the men trained during two years of struggle in hurling the Nazis back. It is then that the Russians will receive compensation for having "held the line" until the hour struck for the invasion of Europe.

"Hold the line" becomes thus the supreme appeal addressed to an ally who in the eyes of the anti-Hitler world embodies the will to resist. And that would be all very well if "hold the line" were not offset by a terrifying alternative—the possibility that that line may break under the strain of its prolonged effort.

As the Battle of Russia develops, the opening of a second front seems, more and more, the only means of helping an army whose survival is acknowledged to be essential to the winning of the war. The clamor for an early invasion of Europe springs out of the double conviction that neither the heaviest bombardment of the German bases in France and Northern Europe or of Germany itself—of Berlin, even if it could be entirely destroyed—nor the sending of war material to Russia in the greatest possible quantities can save the Red Army if the German drive gathers the impetus that must be expected. In the opinion of people with the most authoritative knowledge of the eastern front, even if every plane and every tank that comes from an American assembly line were to be sent to Russia, the problem would not be solved in the few weeks or months available.

The only way out is a new front in Europe opened, as has been suggested in these columns, in one country or two or four, with armies attacking wherever an attack can be launched, not checked by the barriers of artificial neutralities or by the advices of a diplomacy which, since the beginning of the war, has not yet been able to register a single success.

Of course, a risk and eventually a great risk must be run. But not even the most unfortunate outcome of an attempted debarkation in Europe would lead to the loss of the war, while the smashing of Russia might well do just that.

And just what is meant by a "failure" of an attempted invasion? Nobody could expect an expeditionary army to cross Europe in a triumphant blitz and make a junction with the Russians. In the present phase of the war it would be enough if a second front forced the Germans to withdraw a considerable number of troops from the east, upset the Nazi plan of attack, and disturbed the distribution of forces which, to the last best battalion, have been sent against Russia. This would be sufficient to achieve the main objective—to prevent a great Russian defeat. It is thus that the problem must be visualized: the opening of a second front could never lead to a total disaster; the loss of Russia would be the greatest disaster that could overwhelm the United Nations.

Let us assume that, before this article is published, the last German focus of resistance in Kharkov has fallen into Russian hands. That would be a piece of excellent news. Timoshenko's successful offensive in the Ukraine is greatly to the credit of a general who, with MacArthur, shares the honors for the most aggressive strategy on the Allied side and whose armies appear to be in the same excellent condition as in December and January. But just as during the winter the Russian effort, though it saved Moscow and Leningrad, failed to dislodge the Germans from the key positions that provide the basis for the next offensive, so now a success in the Ukraine—even the capture of Kharkov—would not remove the terrible threat that hangs over the oil fields of the Caucasus.

Nobody wants to minimize the importance of the fight around Kharkov even from the point of view of its effect on the German attempt to push into the Caucasus. The Ukraine has always offered the most precious booty to be won through the conquest of Russia. Not only on account of its agricultural treasures but also for its production of steel, pig iron, iron ore, coal, and manganese and its powerful industries, the Ukraine has seemed to Hitler worth the greatest sacrifices. But if ten years ago the loss of the Ukraine would certainly have brought to Russia irreparable disaster, the immense program of industrialization, particularly in the fabrication of war materials, in the Urals and Kuznetz has today secured for the Russian armies a considerable supply of arms and munitions, which can be supplemented with the planes and tanks that are coming from abroad.

On the other hand, the loss of the Caucasus would be a blow from which the Red Army could hardly recover. Upon the oil of Baku depends not only the maintenance of Russia's motorized divisions, of its planes and its tanks, but of the mechanized farm equipment which produces the food for its soldiers and its heroic civil population. A serious cut in the oil supply would reduce the wonderful Russian armies to a vast conglomerate of guerrilla forces, fantastic in numbers but without adequate means to fight a machine like the German army. The war would be indefinitely prolonged and the possibility of opening an effective second front somewhere else reduced to mere sentimental speculation.

Nor is it possible to comfort oneself with the idea that the courageous scorched-earth policy practiced in the Ukraine could be equally well applied to the Caucasus. First, in the view of German experts, the oil wells, even if they were thoroughly wrecked, could eventually be restored to use. And even if they were to be rendered entirely useless for the invading army, their loss to Russia would be no less catastrophic.

It is for the oil of Baku that Hitler strikes. This is not a revelation of today. Allied experts foresaw it months ago. To immobilize the Soviet armies, to destroy the value of the war material America sends to Russia by turning tanks and planes into dead machines, and at the same time to seize the fuel Germany needs to prolong the war—that is Hitler's double objective. It is around the oil wells of Azerbaijan that the fate of Russia and the world may be decided.

What to Do About Rubber?

BY I. F. STONE

Washington, May 25

AXIS Prisoner. Modern war is war on wheels, and the wheels have rubber tires. Rubber is the first great victory of the Axis in the field of basic war materials. Japan now controls areas which produced more than 90 per cent of the world's rubber supply in 1940. In rubber we and our allies have become have-not powers.

How Much Rubber Do We Have? The Truman committee's report on the rubber situation, which will be released before this appears in print, says Leon Henderson testified that the United Nations "started the year 1942 with a total of 693,000 tons." That is less than our own consumption of rubber last year. Henderson testified that by May of 1943 the United Nations will have run entirely out of crude rubber.

Why Have We Not a Bigger Stockpile? The reasons are: (1) We were confident of our ability to hold Far Eastern rubber-producing areas. (2) The British-Dutch rubber cartel was reluctant to permit increased production. Jesse Jones, according to the Truman committee report, had a great deal of trouble in prevailing on the cartel to permit a greater rubber output. "Even . . . with Dunkirk behind them," the report says, "the British and Dutch objected to relaxing the quota." Like many of our own big business men, these rubber magnates were more concerned with control of post-war markets than with victory: "They . . . feared that if the emergency failed to materialize, excess stocks of rubber in the United States would enable the United States to control market prices." (3) By 1941 rubber output was at 100 per cent of capacity, but shipments lagged because of "business-as-usual" practices in transportation: each of the allies sought to keep as large rubber shipments as possible for its own bottoms; "a great many ships made the lengthy trip to the Atlantic coast of the United States instead of going to West Coast ports, where they could have unloaded and returned for new cargoes"; much shipping space was wasted on non-strategic materials. (4) Purchase of rubber for the government stockpile was in the hands of a committee of six, made up of one representative from each of the Big Five rubber companies, with the head of the Rubber Manufacturers' Association as chairman. They took care of themselves and their rubber needs first. (5) "Despite all efforts to increase the flow of rubber into the government stockpile," the Truman committee reports, "there was no substantial increment in the spring of 1941. . . . This was due to the unprecedented sky-rocketing of consumption by the public for non-defense purposes, principally automobiles, through 1941, culminating in the all-time high rate of over 900,000 tons per year during the second quarter of 1941."

Basic Trouble. The difficulty here, as in most sectors of war production, was explained to the Truman committee by a witness who has given little indication in the past of radical views. He was being questioned about the price paid for natural rubber. It cost 7 cents a pound to grow rubber on the better plantations of the East, 12 cents on the submarginal plantations. Our government was paying 18 to 20 cents a pound, yet finding it hard to get increased production. "We were continually after them," the witness said. "We did not complain about the price because it appeared to us that if we were going to get the rubber, we had better give them a price that would stimulate them and encourage them to get it out, because they were not governmental—they were private people, and they are no different from people in this country. They all want to make a profit." The witness was Jesse Jones.

How Much Synthetic Rubber Do We Have? In the form of proposals on paper, 800,000 tons. In existence: 20,000 tons of du Pont neoprene capacity and 10,000 tons of capacity at Goodrich. Both represent private enterprise. The former, however, is a specialty rubber which does not fit into the tire-producing program. Under construction: four government-financed plants of 10,000 tons capacity each, which Jesse Jones says will yield 15,000 tons each. Construction of the first began in May 1941; of the last, in February, 1942. We are told that the synthetic-rubber program will produce 350,000 tons in 1943, but the Truman committee, after examining the contracts and their completion dates, is dubious.

Suggestions. Several interesting suggestions for meeting the rubber crisis are put forward in the Truman report. The committee seems to think that military specifications for rubber could stand an overhauling. "The best information available in this country," the committee says, "is that the German army was built and has been rolling on less than 200,000 tons of rubber a year. The English have not used any quantities of rubber comparable to those our army is now seeking. . . . It may be that many military specifications are too high in view of the concededly short life of military equipment when it is engaged in battle." The committee thinks that to date the military have "been content to require the elimination of rubber for civilian use and have acted on the assumption that what rubber they need will be available." Some changes have begun to be made, but the committee seems to think more economy in the use of rubber by the military is possible.

Our Biggest Stockpile. "There are 1,000,000 tons of rubber on the wheels of motor vehicles in this country—the biggest stockpile in the world," the committee reports. "Every day that 'driving as usual' continues, 600 tons of rubber are lost." In the writer's opinion it would be wise to ration gasoline all over the country as a rubber-conserving measure, and to make the rationing regulations stricter than they are at present.

Junk Coordinator Needed. One source of rubber, as of steel, is the scrap-heap. In rubber, as in steel, the junk-man entrepreneur is unsatisfactory. We need to organize the junk business under a federal authority. Our present facilities for reclaiming rubber can handle 350,000 tons a year. Last year only enough scrap was collected for 275,000 tons. "In the junk heaps of America," the committee reports, "is hidden a greater wealth of vital rubber than our enemies could assemble from all sources available to them today. Estimates of the total amount of scrap rubber in this country vary from 500,000 to 10,000,000 tons." Let's get it out of the junk pile.

New Sources of Butadiene. Of the 800,000-ton synthetic-rubber program, 700,000 tons is for the rubber known as Buna-S. This is made from an intermediate material called butadiene, which can be made from oil or alcohol. Plants for turning the butadiene into Buna-S, the committee reports, "can be erected in a relatively short period and would require relatively small amounts of high-priority strategic materials, but to date we have expected to obtain nearly all of the butadiene through catalytic cracking of butanes which are obtained from petroleum." New cracking plants must be erected, and these require a longer time for construction and call for "large quantities of high-priority materials which are equally important in other essential war industries." Two new possibilities for the production of butadiene from petroleum are touched upon by the committee. "Some of the technical sources consulted by the committee have indicated that it is possible to obtain large quantities of butadiene speedily by converting vapor-phase thermal cracking plants now in existence." Another possibility "now being investigated by the Office of the Petroleum Coordinator" is the utilization of some small refineries which will be forced to shut down as a result of the gasoline-rationing program. These "could be converted to production of butadiene from excess gasoline of other refineries." The objection to these methods is their cost. "Cost," of course, means money cost. Both represent savings in time and materials.

This article on rubber will be continued next week.

The Pope's Neutrality

BY G. A. BORGESE

ROMA LOCUTA, Rome has spoken, and her counsel is a negotiated peace.

> We make a warm, fatherly appeal to statesmen [so broadcast the Pope on May 13] that they may not let any occasion pass that may open up to the nations the road to an honest peace of justice and moderation, to a peace arising from a free and fruitful agreement, even if it should not correspond in all points to their aspirations. . . . The destruction wrought by the war among the nations on the material and spiritual plane is all the time accumulating to such an extent that it calls for every effort to prevent its increase by bringing the conflict to a speedy end.

We have heard similar words on many occasions from many lips. As late as April 20 we read: "We real Americans think it no crime to pray for peace. The sooner peace comes, the better for all of us, unless the Second Person of the Blessed Trinity who was crucified was a subversive when he prayed for peace." These words, however, in the last issue of Social Justice, bore the mark of Father Coughlin—whom few judge worthy of speaking in behalf of Christ as the Prince of Peace—while a warning pronounced by the Pope carries enormous weight with hundreds of millions, inside and outside his church, who are prepared to consider him the highest moral authority on earth.

There can be no argument against the desirability of peace—of speedy peace if possible. War as a supremely delightful adventure, as a parade of energy, as a triumph of self-expression, we leave to Nazi-Fascism and its drunken philosophers. No democrat—if modern democracy is, as we know, the offspring of Jewish prophecy and Christian hope—disagrees for a moment with Pius XII when he recalls with dismay the broken families, the ruins piling up, a spectacle of blood and grief unequaled in the past and surpassable, probably, only by what is still to come.

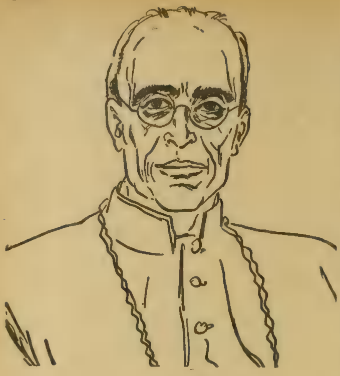
In this attitude toward war in general there is an unfailing coincidence between the permanent trends of the Catholic church and those of modern democracy. It is even such an attitude that accounts, partly at least, for whatever half-heartedness or lack of initiative may be found in the democratic conduct of the war. War, for Western civilization, ceased long since to be enjoyable or smart. It is accepted as a grim necessity, as a cruel duty; and even the exultation of victory, when victory comes, is not without mourning.

From this point of agreement, however, the two roads divide. A misunderstanding widens between the democracies and the Roman church, not indeed with respect to war in general, but with respect to this war or this cycle of wars. At least since 1914 we have been teaching ourselves and others that our purpose in the fight is of an ideal, even religious nature. Two generations have grown up in the concept that we have been fighting the last or the next to last war, with final victory appearing as the demolition of all hatred and slaughter, the world safe for democracy, the Four Freedoms granted to everybody everywhere. It is this conviction that, while it deprives the war of its brutal glamor, of the Homeric "joy of battle," provides the combatants with an indispensable faith, weakens the objections of the conscientious objector, even purifies to some extent those war-mongers and prophets, women and aged, who, absent from actual battle, yet deem the battle to be necessary and holy.

The attitude of the church, or of its supreme spokesman, in this respect is different. It is noncommittal and aloof. We surely do not deny that democracy has its evils. We contend, however, that our enemy is Evil. But the Pope distributes equally blame and prayer. He is above the battle, a distressed and unheeded umpire. "Now," said he on May 13, "we take the opportunity to speak once again a word of peace, and we speak that word in the full consciousness of our absolute impartiality toward all the belligerents, and with equal affection for all peoples without exception."

To many in our world the consciousness of such a radical disagreement between ourselves and the most influential of the Christian churches is all but unbearable. The hope that this church might finally speak openly in behalf of our cause has persevered even against evidence. Hence the unusual mission of Myron Taylor to Rome; hence so many tireless endeavors of so many political rulers and intellectual leaders. Imaginative minds have even conceived the possibility that the Pope might consent to be rescued by us from his "captivity" among the Fascists—with the obvious implication that a papal flight to a refuge abroad, even if asylum were sought in a neutral country, would mean a condemnation of Fascism and a full indorsement of our purpose.

Not only against the horror of a protracted war but also against the error of such desires has Pius XII raised his voice. The broadcast of May 13 is a declaration of neutrality absolute. It is not the first, to be sure. It is, however, the most univocal, if neutrality can be univocal, that he has pronounced so far.



Pius XII

Many, it is to be hoped, will now become aware that the "captivity" of the Pope, much more than physical in Fascist Italy, is moral and doctrinal under the systematic command of his allegiances and responsibilities. Those in the Western world who so fervently want the Pope to cast his lot with liberal democracy have forgotten the words of Metternich, a wise man who said that he could imagine everything except a liberal pope. The Syllabus had not yet been published in Metternich's time. The Syllabus in its eightieth and final article, which follows the condemnation of religious freedom, anathematizes whosoever holds that the Roman pontiff "could and ought to reconcile himself with progress, liberalism, and modern civilization." The stern verdict has not yet been repealed by pope or council. Nor has the genealogy of the revolutions of the common man—as outlined, for example, by Vice-President Wallace, on May 8, from the America of 1775 to the Russia of 1917—ever been legitimized by the Roman church. Common men, in the papal allocution of May 13, are not urged to be "free under God" as we want them to be. They most strictly are asked to be "obedient to those who command them and to God" (italics mine).

On the other hand, no doubt is admissible about the contrast, basic by nature, between the Christian substance of the Catholic faith and the doctrines of Fascism and Nazism. It is sheerly inconceivable that any pope could ever agree with them ex cathedra. Racialism, nationalism, deification of the state have been repeatedly disowned, ex cathedra. Thus error is here and error is there. Evil and sin face sin and evil. We in the democratic world like to think that ours is a crusade, a holy fight, that God is with us. The Pope does not think so; nor does he think the other way. He does not seek asylum on the questionably neutral shores of Eire or Portugal. Spiritual neutrality and world-wide pity, equally extended to all who suffer for their "love of country," whatever the country is, are his chosen refuge.

Yet a question arises. Is it hypothetically admissible that of two "evils" of such relevance neither is lesser? And should the Christian Pope finally judge that a judgment between evils is mandatory, would he give his preference to Fascism and Nazism in so far as they countenance the principle of totalitarian authority which is doctrinally inherent in the Roman church? Or would he concede that democracy is the lesser evil in so far as it upholds certain fundamentals of Christian ethics and Christian hope which are paramount to the Catholic faith? The answer remains hidden.

All of us, however, have been brought up in the belief that there is a difference, that there must be a difference, between the shrewd ambiguity of pagan oracles and the decisions of Christian frankness. We have been taught that our communication must be "Yea, yea; nay, nay: for whatsoever is more than these, cometh of evil." The evasion that no choice between evils is legitimate, and that any evil is equally condemnable regardless of its size and features, would not give peace to many souls in the waging of such a war. For all of us have heard that the infallibility claimed by the Christian Pope refers to all things of "faith and morals," and the immense majority of the human race feel that all moral values are at stake in this war.

Thus the neutrality of an institution that for nearly two thousand years has specialized in the supreme business of discriminating between moral values may imply for many, Catholic or not, some kind of desertion. Many, by the gesture of the Pope, may be reminded of the gesture of Pilate. And the "impartiality" of his attitude may result in an addition to the confusion.

But let us admit for one moment that the principle of impartiality between evils is logically and ethically tenable. Let us grant that he who stands for absolute goodness is not bound to choose between relative evils. He soars above the conflict. He shuns all commitments.

If, however, the Pope declines to take sides with either democracy—let alone revolution and socialism—or Nazism, this is because he considers himself the warden of a superior truth and justice which transcend ab aeterno the errors of both sides. This truth and justice should suggest the terms of an "equitable" and "honest" agreement designed to stop the destruction and massacre. Indeed, the Pontiff avers, implicitly and explicitly, that such terms are thinkable. They can be found; they exist somewhere. They certainly exist in his mind. Yet he comes to the sad conclusion that it would be inopportune to make them specifically and technically known since "in the present state of affairs the formulation of specific proposals of a just and equitable peace would not have any well-founded probability of success." Inopportuneness thereby becomes a synonym for the danger of diplomatic failure. The prestige of the Curia would suffer from the lack of success. "Indeed," said the Pope in a helpless mood, "every time that one speaks a word of peace one runs the risk of offending one or the other side."

Is is impious or disrespectful to wonder whether a preoccupation of this kind is not too worldly? There are risks that must be run if opportunity is not to become a synonym for opportunism. In a Catholic epic novel with which Pius XII is certainly familiar a saintly bishop and cardinal, intrepid defender of the common man, says that "to suffer for the cause of justice is our victory."

Specific proposals from such an uplifted place as the Papal See might illumine many minds. They might also provide many a doubting Thomas with a touchstone to test the good and ill will of the contending parties. But openness in proclaiming neutrality and mystery in regard to specific proposals do not make for justice or peace. The Pope himself is aware—and how could he not be?—of the present military situation. "One side," he says, "bases its security on the results obtained; the other rests its hopes on future battles." But if a movement in favor of an immediate negotiated peace should start in the wake of the papal admonishment—while no concrete papal advices have been imparted as to the terms of such a peace—and if such a movement should achieve a preliminary success, it is clear enough that the Axis would negotiate on the basis of its "results obtained," while the United Nations would not even be allowed to offer in opposition their hopes of "future battles." The odds would not be "honest."

Independent thinkers and a number of orthodox believers as well are disturbed by a neutral intervention which, were it successful, would, however involuntarily, play into the hands of the Axis. It is not easy to believe that Cardinal Faulhaber listened with undivided consent to the papal broadcast. But progressive or democratic Catholics in Germany, or for that matter in any other part of the world where they need not fear tyrant or police, have not yet risen to the restoration of that medieval freedom which allowed the medieval layman or churchman to criticize and openly oppose the policy of the official church.

No institution will go changeless through the "infuriate tragedy," as the Pope calls it, of this era. The time may not be far off when the democrats within the church will make their voice unmistakably clear.

The Long Road to Victory

BY DONALD W. MITCHELL

SINCE 1939 the United Nations have lost to the Nazis Norway, Denmark, Belgium, Poland, the Netherlands, Luxembourg, France, Yugoslavia, Greece, Crete, and a large part of Russia. Since December 7, 1941, the United States, tacitly regarded as the Allied champion in the Pacific and the indicated antagonist of Japan, has suffered defeat at Pearl Harbor and lost Wake, Guam, and the Philippines; the Japanese have also seized Malaya with Singapore, the Dutch Indies, parts of the Solomon Islands and New Guinea, the Andaman Islands, and all the valuable areas of Burma.

On the other side of the ledger are the conquest of Italian East Africa by British Empire troops and two purely negative victories scored by the United Nations between 1940 and 1942, when the R. A. F. saved Britain and the Red Army stopped Hitler's invasion of the Soviet Union. To date not a single major victory has been chalked up to the credit of the United States, though small American forces have repeatedly given good accounts of themselves.

Nor do these facts give a misleading impression. Our losses have been as strategically serious as they have been extensive. Japan's conquests have enormously increased its military potential and at the same time have injured our economy and made even final victory extremely doubtful. Germany is striking now for strategic raw-material areas, possession of which would, in the opinion of expert military critics, put it beyond any reasonable likelihood of defeat. The needed American offensive in Europe is being put off by a submarine offensive which has been sinking ships faster than new ships can be built, depleting a tonnage already only 50 per cent adequate to present commitments.

This unpalatable review is a necessary foreword to any discussion of a strategy of victory, for only if we face the situation with all its disasters and base plans upon realities rather than wishful thinking shall we have a chance for ultimate success. We are fighting a war on two major fronts against opponents who up to the present have far excelled us in preparedness, understanding of the requirements of war, and generalship. They are today in a much better position to launch major offensives than we are. To win, we must not only achieve greater production but demonstrate better military qualities than the Axis.

Yet the requirements for victory are not complex. First, the United Nations must have an unconquerable will to win; then they must have the weapons to implement this determination effectively, the shipping to bring men and equipment into effective use in chosen sectors, and the military brains to direct these forces wisely.

Specifically, we must eliminate from all posts of power and responsibility officials content with mere lip-service as well as all demonstrated incompetents. Business as usual, politics as usual, labor as usual must go "for the duration." The spirit of willingness to sacrifice all for victory is an indispensable prerequisite for achieving that victory. The people of the United States have repeatedly demonstrated their understanding of this necessity to a greater extent than have their politicians. Every poll of public opinion has revealed Americans as clamoring to make sacrifices far beyond anything political leaders would dare suggest. Yet dollar-a-year men with minds attuned to the desires of business continue to delay progress in our production program. Government propaganda announces that the manufacture of such things as radios and typewriters is to stop and then permits it to continue. Men like Admiral Adolphus Andrews, under whose jurisdiction the Normandie fires occurred, receive promotion. Our production front has been enormously strengthened, but we are not yet doing everything possible or as much as the situation demands.

The number of planes, men, and ships now needed to win is comparative and probably cannot be set down in black and white. Nevertheless, the survey made by the Joint Board of the War and Navy Departments less than a year ago is of some value. An army of 7,000,000 men, greatly increased naval strength, an air force of sufficient size to permit 7,000 bombers to be used against Germany, and 18,000,000 tons of additional shipping were reported as necessary. Two unforeseen factors have since changed this picture. The first was the utter failure of both British and Americans to gauge correctly the caliber of Japan, with the consequent disasters in the Pacific. The second is the unexpectedly strong defense by Russia. The two may or may not balance, but they certainly change our requirements for carrying on a war.

As regards the army the change may be a favorable one. No great numbers of troops have been used by Japan in its push southward, and the American land forces that can be profitably employed in a primarily aerial and naval struggle are also limited. In Europe the formidable stand of the Red Army has entirely changed the complexion of the war. If an American-British offensive on the Continent can be undertaken while the Soviets are still engaging the attention of 90 per cent of Hitler's forces, nothing approaching the 5,000,000 men in 215 divisions contemplated by last year's plan will be necessary.

But if the changes of the last year have reduced the size of the armies we shall need, they have been sparing nowhere else. The burdens on shipping have been enormously increased by the need of supplying expeditionary forces in the southern Pacific. At the same time the German submarine offensive in our own waters, successful largely because of diversion of most of our sea power to the Pacific, has greatly reduced the available merchant tonnage in either ocean. We are desperately short of cargo ships, of oilers, and of their naval escorts. Our shipping program has meanwhile climbed to 23,000,000 tons in two years. It is now behind schedule and even if realized may not be adequate. Unofficial estimates of new ships needed run as high as 30,000,000 tons.

Japanese successes have of course increased the need of planes, though in this field production has gone up so rapidly that long-term prospects are rosy and the immediate future looks only less so. Greater emphasis upon certain types, such as long-range bombers and pursuit planes, is obviously needed. Our air program can very conceivably be the difference between defeat and victory. Aviation men who have maintained that air power alone or air power supported by naval and land strength can win wars have a splendid opportunity at hand to prove their words. In Western Europe the British now have a decisive superiority over the Luftwaffe and with our aid are rapidly adding to it. The development of British aviation has placed emphasis upon air power as an independent striking weapon rather than as an aid to sea or air forces. Less than a year ago the intelligence officers of our Army Air Corps expressed the minority view that a military invasion of Europe would not be practicable within the next three years, but they added that if an air offensive over Germany succeeded, a military invasion might not be necessary.

In the days before Pearl Harbor many persons believed that some other factor than supreme military-naval-air power would defeat Germany. Blockade, shortages of vital materials, internal division, propaganda, and fifth-column work, each had its champions. Now the public sees more clearly that such measures cannot destroy a Germany that is militarily triumphant. They have their use, however, as supplementary lines of attack. The United States has been scandalously negligent in not seeing the possibilities in such non-military offensives. Before our entrance into the war we actually supplied Germany with needed fats, via Finland. We have been disastrously slow in acting upon blacklists, breaking up defense-hindering monopolies, freezing Axis assets. Our raw-materials program has been an administrative mess, and departmental delays and disputes have robbed measures of economic warfare of much of their effectiveness.

All things considered, it looks as if the only way to throw Germany out of the war will be to beat it decisively on the field of battle. Since it would be the height of folly to expect Russia to accomplish this task alone, an Allied expeditionary force, largely American, is indicated. But invasion of the Continent cannot be attempted without overwhelming air superiority and is hardly feasible until German submarine sinkings have been brought under control. We are at present well on the way to gaining the necessary air superiority. The adoption of convoys along our coasts as soon as more destroyers and other escort types of ships have been completed should take care of the submarine situation, though not at once. Balancing these reasons for caution are the enormous advantages to be gained by striking—even with a smaller force—while the Soviet Union is absorbing all the punches that Germany can put over. If Russia should be defeated and rendered militarily impotent while we are preparing, an Allied offensive would have to start in regions remote from the center of German power and be undertaken in great force in order to stand a chance of success. Should Russian resistance continue on a large scale until the middle of 1943, formerly regarded as the earliest date on which a great American army could be ready, with the requisite shipping, Germany's chances of victory would probably have already vanished even if its vital oil supplies were not yet exhausted.

All this has been written without regard to Japan, which has shown it must be very much a factor in our calculations. Japan's project of a Greater East Asia predated the dreams of Hitler, and there seems to be no reason for the often-expressed view that the defeat of Germany will as a corollary involve the collapse of Japan. Another common error in popular thinking is the view that what has been lost may later be regained. It is true that this might happen, but the cost of reconquering territories against an alert and prepared defender is almost certain to be several times as great as that of defending them in the first place.

Any expectation of starving out Japan by distant blockade is foolish. Its situation with regard to raw materials is probably not serious save for iron, where gains by conquest have certainly not replaced loss of imports from Britain and America. In a long war this lack might well be serious. No one has suggested a weakness in Japanese morale or any likelihood of success for fifth-column or propaganda offensives. Japan will hardly surrender before it has been soundly thrashed on land and sea and in the air. Even then an invasion of its homeland might well be necessary.

There are two main schools of thought about the best means of winning in the Pacific. The air-minded group believe that Japan could be ruined by bombardment of vulnerable points on the Japanese mainland from the air. They liken this to smashing the head of an octopus in preference to dealing with its tentacles one by one. Such a plan has in its favor the great vulnerability of the Japanese target and the low probable cost in lives and material. Its practicability, however, is doubtful. We have not enough long-range bombers to attempt frequent large-scale attacks from the Aleutians, nor are our carrier-based planes equal to the land-based defenders they would encounter. The use of Russian bases, however, would change the entire picture. The raids already carried out have probably been from secret bases on the Chinese coast; here the difficulty is to accumulate enough gasoline and other supplies for frequent strong attacks.

Older plans for knocking out Japan use naval force primarily but include close air and land support. A naval force can reach Japan by following a northern route from Alaska along the chain of the Aleutian and Kurile islands and Sakhalin; by threading the Japanese-mandated islands of the central Pacific with the Philippines or Formosa as the main objective; or by taking the southern route now being used by our Australian convoys. The first is the shortest; the last by far the longest. The northern route threatens few interests really vital to Japan in its earlier stages; taking the southern route would require us to attack a long series of shock absorbers, Japan's earlier conquests, before we could strike at the enemy in his homeland. We are already committed but not confined to use of the Australian route. All involve heavy risks of failure. But in our favor is the fact that Japan has now dispersed its forces so widely that it cannot possibly be strong everywhere.

Whatever route is taken, the technique of the attack will be much the same. Since American bases are too distant to permit direct and effective blows, advanced stations will have to be seized, garrisoned, fortified, and, if possible, converted into air bases. Both sea and air superiority is necessary to success, and no advance can safely be undertaken without firmly established base facilities. Ordinarily regarded as slow, this type of campaign can be very rapid, as Japan's lightning thrusts southward revealed, if it is conducted with sufficient force.

By choosing the southern route we were able to use British possessions in the southern Pacific as our stepping-stones westward. At the time Japan was too busy with more important campaigns elsewhere to interfere with this process, though it has repeatedly made weak gestures at New Guinea and the islands directly east. The advanced stations of the opponents have now become so close that they offer a threat to each other's supply lines, abnormally long for both powers. Since Japan closed its southward campaign, sniping tactics by submarines and planes have favored the United States, though hardly to an extent likely to cripple future Japanese efforts. To date no major action has taken place, but preliminary skirmishes and reinforcement of advanced positions are a sign that the main naval battle of this war may not be far off.

In what has become a truly global war we should guard carefully against dispersion of our efforts against non-vital objectives. We now have forces stationed in every continent, many serving no very vital purpose and not strong enough to beat back heavy attack. The military principle of concentration of effort calls for the use of all available forces on the crucial front. In what is essentially a war for survival we cannot afford to continue making mistakes.

Keep Them Out!

II. MARTIN L. SWEENEY OF OHIO

Candidate for a Democratic Congressional Nomination

BY WILL CHASAN AND VICTOR RIESEL

NO CONGRESSMAN has been more deeply involved in efforts to obstruct our war program than Martin L. Sweeney, the bumptious Ohio isolationist and anti-New Deal Democrat whom the Cleveland Plain Dealer described shortly before Pearl Harbor as "one of Hitler's little helpers in the Congress of the United States." "If Sweeney's views had prevailed," the Plain Dealer said, "Hitler by this time would have won the war, and this country would be unprepared to resist Nazi aggression in the Western Hemisphere."

The statement is not editorial hyperbole. A key member of the Fish-Nye-Wheeler bloc, Sweeney voted against repeal of the arms embargo, against the Selective Service Act, against the Lend-Lease Act, against lend-lease appropriations, and against extension of the draft period. His extreme criticism of the draft, which he characterized as "the methods of a Hitler," caused Representative Vincent to denounce him on the floor of the House.

Throughout the foreign-policy debate Sweeney was one of the New Deal's noisiest and most intemperate opponents. Typical of his behavior was an outburst on March 20, 1940, in which he advised James Cromwell, then the United States Minister to Canada, "to get the hell out of this republic." What had incensed him was a statement by Cromwell that Germany "frankly and openly seeks to destroy the institutions and social and economic order on which the United States is founded." He viewed this as an "affront to our established neutrality affecting all the warring powers in Europe," and demanded Cromwell's immediate recall. Last summer, in a particularly heated speech, he warned Roosevelt that history would regard him as an "abject failure and a leader whom generations yet unborn will look upon with disdain and contempt." Later he read into the Congressional Record an article which said, among other things, "To make it appear to the thoughtless that it is our war, Voltaire's counsel, 'Lie, lie, lie, and some of it will stick,' has had the floor; hence we have had nothing but the false in premise, the illogical in conclusion—an atrocious mass of the ridiculous and the deceitful."

A violent Anglophobe, Sweeney often rose in Congress to denounce Great Britain, which he represented before Pearl Harbor as a more dangerous enemy than the Axis. In a speech last August he asked, "How long will the Congress supinely submit to the influence of British plotters?" and suggested that the song God Bless America be paraphrased to read, God Save America from British Rule. Together with Fish and Wheeler he persistently criticized the Dies committee for its failure to investigate British propaganda, and he spoke of the British as the "fifth column in our midst." He opposed the official reception for King George and Queen Elizabeth during their visit here, calling them "advance agents for a new world war," and interrupted Congress with sneering anti-British remarks, some of which might easily have originated in Berlin propaganda broadcasts. He inserted in the Congressional Record many anti-British editorials and articles from Irish newspapers, including one in which the Committee to Defend America by Aiding the Allies was described as "more dangerous to the well-being of America than the Fifth Column or the Trojan Horse." In 1939, for the benefit, perhaps, of those of his followers who lacked short-wave receiving sets, he delivered a long harangue against Britain at a German Day meeting in Ohio.

Sweeney's isolationist activities included serving as vice-chairman for Ohio on the Make Europe Pay War Debts Committee, organized by the late Senator Lundeen to campaign against aid to Britain and France. Lundeen was linked with Nazi propagandists, and the idea of the committee is said to have been suggested to him by the Nazi agent George Sylvester Viereck. Sweeney has called this a smear by the "same sort of rabble who convicted and crucified Jesus Christ," but the evidence against Lundeen is irrefutable.

Prescott Dennett, the committee's treasurer, operated the Columbia Press Service, in which Viereck also had a hand. The Columbia Press Service sent out the release that announced Sweeney's affiliation with the committee. It quoted him as saying that he planned to "cooperate energetically" with Senator Lundeen, and Lundeen was reported as saying that Sweeney was a "valuable addition to our forces" and that it was upon men like him "that our nation must depend for its protection against the schemes and stratagems of foreign agents and manipulators."

Examination of the Congressional Record shows that Sweeney, as protector of the nation against foreign agents, disseminated quantities of pro-Axis literature. On August 13, 1940, for example, he inserted a shoddily written article by a Colonel Ashby Williams which unqualifiedly indorsed the fascist Lebensraum theory. A brief quotation will indicate the substance of the article, which was specifically approved by Sweeney in his introductory remarks as an antidote for the "fog and hysteria created by the war-mongers."

> The single obstacle to the evolutionary process by which Germany and Italy would normally have acquired more land in order to support their people is Imperial England with her far-flung possessions. . . . Nazism and fascism are not ideologies, because there are no ideologies in government, but merely forms of political or-organization. . . .

Sweeney has also said in various articles and speeches:

> Our danger is not from some man-made dictator across the sea; our danger is from the subversive groups within the country.
>
> The war is only beneficial to the world trade grabbers and the international bankers who furnish its sinews.
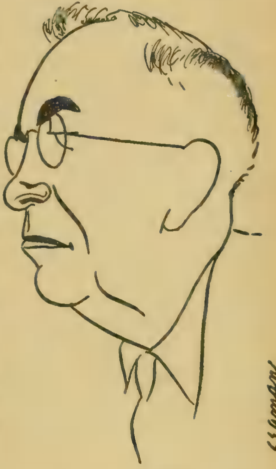
> We are permitting aid to go to the communistic Russia and Red Joe Stalin, who killed 20,000,000 people by the cruel process of starvation in the Ukraine.

Much of this Axis-line propaganda came from the Make Europe Pay War Debts Committee, Social Justice, and the Gaelic American, the last a pro-Coughlin periodical, whose editor, Michael O'Reilly, was also on the war-debts committee. The rest was improvised by Sweeney or taken from such sources as Dr. Giselher Wirsing's "The 100 Families That Rule the Empire," a book published by the pro-Nazi Flanders Hall Company, another of Viereck's interests. Sweeney quoted this book directly in a speech over the NBC network and used the material on numerous other occasions.

Sweeney was not only associated with the Make Europe Pay Committee but served on the executive committee of Hamilton Fish's Keep America Out of Foreign Wars, spoke for America First, and worked with the Coughlinite Mothers of the United States, which in the Cleveland area has considerable strength. The Cleveland "Mothers," who are now an important part of his political organization, have been cooperating with Gerald L. K. Smith's Committee of One Million. The Cleveland News, in an editorial entitled The New Mother Racket, has charged flatly that they are anti-Semitic. Reports of their meetings indicate that they are also frenetically anti-British and anti-Roosevelt. At one meeting last June Sweeney told them, "They're getting ready to intern you in concentration camps" as soon as the United States enters the war. The "they" referred to President Roosevelt, whom the Reverend Edward Lodge Curran, another speaker, denounced as "the self-appointed dictator of the Western Hemisphere."

Although Sweeney has brought libel actions against Pearson and Allen, the United Features Syndicate, and individual newspapers for a Merry-Go-Round column in which he was described as a Father Coughlin spokesman and inferentially as an anti-Semite, both allegations seem supported by substantial evidence. Newspaper files reveal that as far back as 1933 he was extolling Father Coughlin as the "great crusader of the air," and Cleveland political reporters recall that for several years he organized National Union for Social Justice clubs and arranged mass listening parties for Coughlin's radio speeches. He was temporary chairman at the Coughlinite convention in Cleveland in 1936, and in the same year headed a Social Justice Congressional slate, predicting that Father Coughlin would send seventy-five Representatives to the House. He joined the Smith-Townsend-Coughlin coalition behind Lemke, supported the inflationary Frazier-Lemke bill, defended the Townsend plan against economic criticism and the Townsend movement against charges of racketeering, and upheld Father Coughlin, his program, and his right to be in politics.

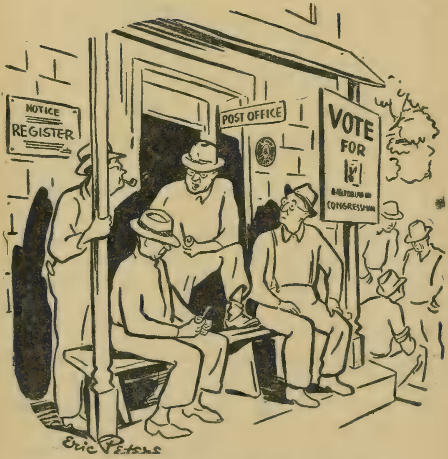


Sweeney of Ohio

Further evidence of the fact that he is a Coughlin spokesman can be seen in Social Justice's flattering references to him. Before its seditious utterances caused it to be banned from the mails, the paper frequently expressed its pleasure at Sweeney's views. "The American public," it observed after the conscription fight, "will graciously remember that it was a Democrat—an anti-New Deal Democrat in the person of Representative Martin Sweeney of Ohio—who, careless of patronage and Presidential pump-handling, defied not only Franklin D. Roosevelt but the unseen war bosses whose war-will he [Roosevelt] has supinely followed for more than four years."

Sweeney has denied being an anti-Semite, possibly because his Congressional district, the Twentieth, has a significant Jewish vote. His suit against the columnists Pearson and Allen is based mainly on their allegation that he opposed on anti-Semitic grounds the appointment of a Jewish lawyer to a federal judgeship in Cleveland. Although he has been able to establish that the charge of anti-Semitism may be construed as libel, he has failed to persuade the courts that he never in his life "entertained an anti-Semitic feeling." His actions against newspapers carrying the controversial column have been thrown out in more than twenty courts, and in at least one a jury ruled that the Merry-Go-Round charges were true.

However, the ability of Pearson and Allen to support their charges legally seems almost irrelevant. The truth or falsity of their assertion that Sweeney opposed the appointment of a Jewish lawyer and remarked that "damned Harvard Jews have taken over the capital" is less important than the fact that Sweeney's closest political connections are with groups and individuals who unmistakably represent religious and political bigotry. At numerous Coughlinite meetings, for example, both Sweeney and the Reverend Edward Lodge Curran, Coughlin's Eastern representative, have denounced "international war-mongers," and the audience knowingly has jeered at the Jews.



"It Ain't Only Who His Friends Is; It's Who His Enemies Ain't!"

Sweeney, according to a Cleveland political reporter, "has been raising hell in Cleveland and Ohio politics since a year or two after he attained his majority." He began his career some thirty-five years ago by becoming a Democratic ward leader, and worked his way up through the machine to a Municipal Court judgeship, to which he was elected in 1923 despite opposition from the local Bar Association. As a judge he began to denounce prohibition as "a crazy law enacted by fanatics," and this line reelected him in 1929. Two years later, although Anti-Saloon Leaguers demanded his defeat, the thirsty voters of the Twentieth Congressional District sent him to Congress. Almost immediately he began to reach out for power in the local Democratic machine. In 1932, after his return from the Democratic National Convention—where he had voted for Roosevelt although he had pledged himself both to Al Smith and to former Governor George White of Ohio—he began to organize Roosevelt clubs in competition with W. B. Gongwer, the Democratic boss, who threatened to "read him out of politics." Sweeney ran against the Gongwer candidate in the mayoralty primaries in 1933, was defeated, and thereupon threw his strength to Harry L. Davis, leader of the powerful Cleveland Republican organization. Davis was elected and rewarded Sweeney by allotting a number of political plums to his followers. This was the beginning of a series of political deals through which Sweeney, at various times, has sought to dominate Cleveland politics.

In 1933 Sweeney campaigned for the mayoralty nomination as the "original Roosevelt man in Cleveland." Part of his campaign propaganda was a parody that went, "Put on your Sweeney bonnet with NRA upon it." He continued to support Roosevelt until 1936, when he followed Coughlin into the Lemke coalition.

In Cleveland politics, with the aid of Coughlin and Townsend groups, he continued to maneuver for power, but always unsuccessfully. He was on the losing side in a fight for Democratic leadership in 1938; he lost again in 1940 when he tried to capture the county chairmanship. In 1941 he again sought the Democratic mayoralty nomination, attempting to turn the primaries into "an unofficial war referendum." His candidacy was indorsed by Senator Nye, and his most energetic support came from the United Mothers, whose officials appeared with him at every meeting. Fearing, however, that attacks on New Deal foreign policy might not prove sufficiently alluring, Sweeney combined his isolationism with an ardent defense of "bingo," which periodically has been banned by Cleveland administrations. He gave free bingo games at his campaign rallies, inviting the police to arrest him, and used as one of his campaign songs the parody, "Bring Back My Bingo to Me." Nevertheless, his meetings were poorly attended, and he was snowed under by a two-to-one vote.

Sweeney has been able to stay in Congress largely because the Twentieth is a district which votes the Democratic ticket regardless of candidates or issues, and he has been able consistently to win the Democratic nomination. This year he has two opponents and may win again unless one of them drops out. An earnest fight against him by County Chairman Ray Miller could end his political career, but Sweeney cagily has been trying to buy Miller's support by urging him to run for governor. Miller tried unsuccessfully to defeat Sweeney in 1940, but the isolationist has been losing ground ever since, and political observers agree that the coming election will provide an excellent opportunity to oust him.

Inflation Under Price Control

BY HAROLD MAGER

THOSE who take comfort in the fact that the recent freezing of prices has staved off a disastrous inflation have still to learn that prices can no more be controlled by legislative fiat than planes and tanks can be built by invocation and prayer. The merit of price regulation lies in its affirmation of public policy, not in its ability to lay the specter which stalks the land. For it fails to reach the root causes of the inflationary crisis, and it creates, moreover, a host of new problems.

It is commonly believed that inflation, with its destruction of consumer purchasing power, is always characterized by a price rise. This is a serious misconception. The United States experienced a vigorous inflation under stable prices back in the palmy twenties, when prices failed to fall with declining costs owing to monopolistic price controls and the injection of new money and credit into the economic system. Today, with price regulation in force, we are confronted with a somewhat analogous situation. If prices remain the same while product deterioration sets in, is this not tantamount to a price rise?

The general preoccupation with rising prices has resulted in neglect of this aspect of inflation, an aspect which is destined to become more sinister as the Administration succeeds in stabilizing the price structure. Yet product deterioration has been going on for some time. Consumers have been getting less for their money not only because prices have been on the rise but because even where prices have not risen the quantity or quality of the goods has been reduced. Cakes and loaves of bread are smaller; cotton shirts have a large admixture of rayon; many packaged foods have lessened content; some soft drinks have lost their zip. With the general imposition of price regulation the trend will undoubtedly gain momentum, though inasmuch as the limits of product debasement are hardly comparable with the limits of currency debasement, it is unlikely to assume a runaway character. However, the process should not have to develop into a catastrophe before we take alarm.

Interestingly enough, the price-regulation order contained no provision covering product deterioration. This may have been because the problem is infinitely more delicate and complex than price control itself, or because the authorities recognized that the diversion of materials to more essential uses might compel the employment of substitutes. There is some evidence, however, that the Office of Price Administration is becoming increasingly alive to the possibility of such a disguised inflation. In an interpretation of the price regulations made public on May 14, Price Administrator Leon Henderson declared that if the quantity of a product offered in a unit were reduced, the price would have to be reduced proportionately, but there has been no word on the subject of quality deterioration. The order does prohibit, however, a variety of practices that sellers would undoubtedly have employed to keep within the letter of the law while violating its spirit. Section 2 provides that "no seller shall change his customary allowances, discounts, or other price differentials unless such change results in a lower price"; and that "no seller shall require any purchaser . . . to pay a larger proportion of transportation costs incurred in the delivery or supply of any commodity or service than the seller required purchasers of the same class to pay during March, 1942." These provisions suggest that a direct assault on product deterioration is considered an administrative impossibility.

If the refusal to undertake the impossible is a sign of the realism of the OPA, it is none the less an implied indictment of price control as a means of combating inflation. Generals have saved themselves from disaster by withdrawing in the face of a superior adversary, but no general in that situation has been able to claim a victory. Mr. Henderson is in much the same situation.

To many people the present price regulation is proof that Mr. Henderson has been won over to the views of Bernard Baruch, chairman of the War Industries Board and member of the Price-Fixing Committee in World War I, who has strongly advocated a universal price ceiling. In his "Taking the Profits Out of War" and in testimony before the War Policies Commission and the House Committee on Military Affairs, Mr. Baruch has stated that his ceiling was intended to cover "every price in the whole national pattern," including "rents, wages, interest rates, commissions, fees—in short, the price for every item and service in commerce." These sweeping proposals, of which Mr. Henderson has always been rightly skeptical, have achieved only partial realization in the OPA scheme.

Hailed as a venture in direct, complete control of the price structure, the price-regulation order applies actually only to a circumscribed area, and in important fields is compelled to rely on indirect controls. Real property, for example, has always constituted a convenient avenue of escape for "hot money" during inflation; but no attempt has been made to set a ceiling on the price of real estate. (To some extent, of course, real-estate prices can be controlled indirectly through rent limitations.) From an administrative standpoint the wisdom of this policy is manifest: the price authority will be spared the headache of trying to determine whether the "price" of an acre of land is the cost to the owner, the recent price of adjacent land, the asking price, the offering price, or a multiple of a smaller unit. The OPA's control of contract work—painting, carpentry, electrical repair—is also indirect. The lack of standardization in such services probably rules out any venture in direct control.

The two most important factors in the price rise—wages and agricultural prices—are not made subject to regulation. The standardization of farm products would make control of their prices a relatively simple matter, but the political power of the farm bloc has been great enough to exempt agricultural prices from the operations of the Emergency Price Control Act until they have attained 110 per cent of parity. If the broad advance in farm prices is allowed to continue, it will play havoc with any attempt to stabilize the cost-of-living index. According to the Department of Commerce, the index of prices received by farmers advanced from 88 in August, 1939, to 143 in December, 1941 (1909-14=100). These figures should not be confused—though the base period is the same—with parity prices; their significance is as a measure of the inflationary crisis.

No realistic attempt to come to grips with the problem of inflation should ignore the dominant share of the national income received by wage- and salary-earners, approximately 70 per cent in 1941. But this does not imply that the solution lies in wage control. In fact, the stabilization of wages and salaries at prevailing levels—if this were the only method resorted to—would be no bar to inflation at all. There would still remain the problem of siphoning off the more than $17 billion in excess purchasing power that will be created this year. Mr. Henderson himself admitted this in the addendum to his price-regulation order when he declared that "there can be no effective price control while at the same time there is so large an amount of excess purchasing power." At best, wage control could only prevent the situation from degenerating completely by prohibiting competitive bidding among employers for the services of labor in short supply.

It is doubtful, moreover, whether the OPA could successfully police the wage structure. Official wage control leads to a wilderness of theoretical and administrative brambles. Is the wage fixed for the individual or for the service he performs? Is no higher pay per hour, per day, or per week allowed? Would promotion violate the wage order? How would a disguised increase in pay through lighter duties or free lunches be handled?

That price control is likely to create more problems than it solves seems an inescapable conclusion. Sooner or later we shall have to tackle the basic factor in the price rise, the failure to achieve that redistribution of expenditures which corresponds to the planned redistribution of real resources. If this end is to be reached, our main reliance must be on fiscal policy, not on price control.

Unless through taxation and borrowing private income is converted to public use in the same measure that private production has already been converted to public use, price control must break down by virtue of its inability to withstand the accumulating pressure exerted by private expenditures far in excess of the available supply of goods. In that case, if general rationing is not resorted to, the short supply of goods will be quickly taken off the market on the principle of "first come, first served"—a result as haphazard and inequitable as inflation itself; product deterioration, as in the last war, will set in as a result of the creation of a sellers' market in which all prices tend to press against the ceiling; and black markets will spring up where people will be able to buy what they have the money to pay for. It will be inflation under price control.

Russia at War

MOSCOW WAR DIARY. By Alexander Werth. Alfred A. Knopf. $3.

NOT because politics is given disproportionate place in this brilliantly written diary, but because an author's opinions invariably color his reporting, it is important to summarize Mr. Werth's distinctly personal and sometimes curious views concerning Soviet history. He believes the principal factor in Soviet evolution has been fear of war. "Probably Stalin knew from the outset that his job was to prepare Russia for a German invasion." Stalin "knew that an internationalist Russia could stand up to it less well than a national Russia." It follows that the revolutionary opposition had to be removed if a war industry was to be built up. Again, in Mr. Werth's words, "there were the Old Bolsheviks. To show them up as traitors to Russia before liquidating them was essential if their liquidation was to be accepted by the mass of the Russian people." Further, Mr. Werth says that if Stalin "had called upon the Russian people to 'defend Marxism' the result might have been much less unanimous." In his opinion, therefore, Stalin's effort, so far as Russia was concerned, was to blend two ideas that the original revolution had regarded as incompatible, Marxism and nationalism. Thus Mr. Werth accepts the Trotskyist description of Stalinism and, indeed, quite frankly labels the 1917-29 epoch Trotskyist. He freely expresses his contempt for the Communist parties outside Russia and in no sense is a fellow-traveler, since he is very happy to believe, for no clearly stated reason, that Stalin has abandoned world revolution.

The validity of Mr. Werth's views need not be debated. The advantages they give him are enormous, however. Since he warmly approves of these changes and is not interested in revolution, he is never troubled by intellectual doubts. The result is a book scrupulously honest in its reporting of facts and entirely free from special pleading. The author's sophisticated acceptance of the present regime and his passionate anti-Nazism set him free to enjoy Moscow life, and his enjoyment reawakens his love for the country of his birth. That love is simple and exuberant and very moving; the reader is constantly refreshed by the naturalness of Mr. Werth's reactions. "Moscow War Diary," like all war books, is often grim, but I have read no other war book about any country which gives such exhilarating, brilliantly imaged descriptions of a people and their cities and landscapes.

"Moscow War Diary" helps one to estimate the temper of the Soviet war effort. It would seem that the regime has provided a sound emotional nexus, in which party members and non-members alike have their place. It is utter folly to say that the war effort is being run by the G. P. U. So searching are Mr. Werth's inquiries that one may almost read, as it were, the recipe for compounding stern, even ruthless discipline with natural emotion. For instance, he gives a good deal of space to summarizing a striking article on Red Army training written by General Krassilnikov. The new disciplinary statutes introduced in October, 1940, are, the author says, completely ruthless. He quotes the General thus: "Present-day warfare requires such enormous moral tension that only the most firmly disciplined troops can face it. . . . That is why such drastic steps have had to be taken toward the final liquidation of the pseudo-democratic traditions in the army." Pseudo-democratic is perhaps a harsh word to use in description of a tradition that was the life-blood of such an incomparable force as the International Brigade; yet I believe that the general experience with non-ideological troops confirms Krassilnikov. Of the spirit of the troops the author met there can be no doubt. It was exemplary.

So it is with the propaganda to sustain civilian morale, which would appear to be composed of equal parts of incitement to hatred based on patriotism and appeals to defend the status quo for its future promise. The campaign is waged in every medium—cinema, theater, opera, newspaper, radio, and itinerant, al fresco satirical shows of hard-hitting three-minute skits. In these the reach is for the belly laugh and the yell of rage. On a higher level the opera, playing Tschaikowsky to an enraptured throng, awakens pride in Russian culture. Old propaganda plays have been adapted to the new occasion. In one of them, which contrasts a good and a bad collective farm, a character exclaims that there is nothing so annoying as an invasion just when one is putting the roof on one's new hut. The remark brought a storm of cheers, as did the love poetry of Juliet delivered by a peasant-girl character rehearsing her Shakespearean part for a performance at the collective.

Recently Stalin made an excellent speech distinguishing between the Nazi Party and the German people. He may well have been addressing his own subchiefs. Mr. Werth attended two exhibitions of war films. An Englishman present objected to the "snarling" tone used toward German prisoners, the author dissenting.

> They were very ferocious—slapstick and Wild West—but ferocious for all that. . . . A group of Russian soldiers eating sandwiches are seen taking charge of a German airman. The hungry Hun looks enviously at their sandwiches. "No bread, no ham for you, my lad," one of them remarks, munching away. . . . It's a little different from the happy prisoners' camps, pictures of which are dropped on the German trenches.

Similarly the author, who insists Stalin has solved the Russian minorities question, approves the expulsion from their homes of the Volga German community of several hundred thousand people.

Mr. Werth closes his book with speculations about the Soviets' place in the post-war world. A tired and devastated Russia "will not be interested in world revolutions; she hasn't been for years," he says. The Soviets will be ready to collaborate with Britain and other powers. In a passage of extraordinary ferocity Mr. Werth insists that Russia and Britain should be, and will be, ready to deal sternly with Germany. Apparently Mr. Losovsky's statement that it would be good to execute the entire S. S. and the Nazi Party, some 300,000 people, was meant to be taken seriously. Moscow's pan-Slav propaganda may or may not be effective, but the small Slav countries will be eager to enter a security bloc with the Soviets, and this will contribute to world peace, the author believes. One may take or leave these speculations, but there is no denying the colorfulness, the vigor, and the breadth of interest of this excited and exciting book.

The McCaslins of Mississippi

GO DOWN, MOSES, AND OTHER STORIES. By William Faulkner. Random House. $2.50.

WILLIAM FAULKNER'S latest volume is brought out as a collection of stories, but six of the seven stories deal with a single theme, the relation of the Mississippi McCaslins to the Negroes about them, and they have a coherence strong enough to constitute, if not exactly a novel, then at least a narrative which begins, develops, and concludes. The seventh and alien story, Pantaloon in Black, is inferior both in conception and in execution; why it was placed in the midst of the others is hard to understand, for it diminishes their coherence. But conceivably Mr. Faulkner intended it to do just that, wishing to exempt the collection from being taken for a novel and judged as such. Yet it is only as an integrated work that the group of McCaslin stories can be read.

Mr. Faulkner's literary mannerisms are somewhat less obtrusive than they have been, but they are still dominant in his writing, and to me they are faults. For one thing, I find tiresome Mr. Faulkner's reliance on the method of memory to tell his stories. No doubt we can accept what so many Southern novelists imply, that in the South a continuous acute awareness of regional, local, and family history is one of the conditions of thought. But the prose in which Mr. Faulkner renders this element of his stories is, to me, most irritating; it drones so lyrically on its way, so intentionally losing its syntax in its long sentences, so full of self-pity expressed through somniloquism or ventriloquism. Then, too, while I am sure that prose fiction may make great demands on our attention, it ought not to make these demands arbitrarily, and there is no reason why Mr. Faulkner cannot settle to whom the pronoun "he" refers. Mr. Faulkner's new book is worth effort but not, I think, the kind of effort which I found necessary: I had to read it twice to get clear not only the finer shades of meaning but the simple primary intentions, and I had to construct an elaborate genealogical table to understand the family connections.

These considerations aside, Mr. Faulkner's book is in many ways admirable. The six McCaslin stories are temperate and passionate, and they suggest more convincingly than anything I have read the complex tragedy of the South's racial dilemma. The first of the stories is set in 1856; it is the humorous tale of the chase after the runaway Tomey's Turl—it takes a certain effort to make sure that this is a slave, not a dog—of how old Buck McCaslin is trapped into marriage by Miss Sophonisba Beauchamp and her brother Hubert (rightfully the Earl of Warwick), and of the poker game that is played for Tomey's Turl; the humor is abated when we learn that Turl is half-brother to one of the poker players. The last story is set in 1940; its central figure is the Negro murderer Samuel Worsham Beauchamp, descendant of Tomey's Turl and related to the McCaslins through more lines than one.

The best of the book does not deal directly with the Negro fate but with the spiritual condition of the white men who have that fate at their disposal. The Edmonds branch of the McCaslin family—there are three generations of Edmonds, but Mr. Faulkner likes to telescope the generations and all the Edmondses are really the same person: this does not exactly make for clarity—represents the traditional South; Isaac McCaslin, who is by way of being the hero of the narrative, represents the way of regeneration. The Edmondses are shown as being far from bad; in their relation to their Negroes they are often generous, never brutal, scarcely even irresponsible; but they accept their tradition and act upon their superiority and their rights, and the result is tragedy and degeneration both for the Negroes and for themselves. The effects are not always immediate and obvious; one of the best passages in the book, and one of the most crucial, is that in which, as a boy, Carothers Edmonds asserts his superiority over his Negro foster-brother and then, seeking later to repent, finds the tie irrevocably broken and his foster-family, though wonderfully cordial, stonily implacable; and this failure of love which Edmonds's tradition imposed upon him seems to affect his whole life.

As against the tradition which arrests the dignity of possession and the family, Isaac McCaslin sets the dignity of freedom and the unpossessable wilderness. The experience by which his moral sensibility is developed is a kind of compendium of the best American romantic and transcendental feeling. Cooper, Thoreau, and Melville are all comprised in what he learns from Sam Fathers, the Chickasaw Indian (but he was enough of a Negro to be glad to die), from the humility and discipline of hunting, from the quest after a great bear, a kind of forest cousin to Moby Dick, from the mysterious wilderness itself. So taught, he can no longer continue in the tradition to which he is born; at great and lasting cost to himself he surrenders his ancestral farm to the Edmonds branch.

It will of course be obvious that so personal and romantic a resolution as Ike McCaslin's is not being offered by Mr. Faulkner as a "solution" to the racial problem of the South; nor, in representing that problem through the sexual and blood relations of Negro and white, is he offering a comprehensive description of the problem in all its literalness. (Though here I should like to suggest that Mr. Faulkner may be hinting that the Southern problem, in so far as it is cultural, is to be found crystallized in its sexual attitudes: it is certainly worth remarking of this book that white women are singularly absent from it and are scarcely mentioned, that all the significant relations are between men, and that Isaac McCaslin is the only man who loves a woman.) But the romantic and transcendental resolution and the blood and sexual ties are useful fictional symbols to represent the urgency and the iniquity of the literal fact. They suggest that its depth and its complication go beyond what committees and commissions can conceive, beyond even the most liberal "understanding" and the most humanitarian "sympathy." Mr. Faulkner not only states this in the course of his book; he himself provides the proof: the story Pantaloon in Black is conceived in "understanding" and "sympathy," like every other lynching story we have ever read, and when it is set beside the McCaslin stories with their complicated insights it appears not only inadequate but merely formal, almost insincere. Report on the South

BELOW THE POTOMAC: A BOOK ABOUT THE NEW SOUTH. By Virginius Dabney. D. Appleton-Century Company. $3.

A BETTER subtitle for this book would be "A Newspaperman's Report on the South." Essentially that is what it is—and this is not meant in a deprecatory sense. It is good to be offered a calm, matter-of-fact appraisal of the South as it is today, particularly since we have quite recently had excellent impressionistic studies—Jonathan Daniels's "A Southerner Discovers the South," for one—and the late W. J. Cash's searching inquiry into "The Mind of the South." Virginius Dabney's book was written for those who seek current information about Southern progress, and it does a good job of providing just that. Were it not for that always misleading and involving phrase, "The New South," which Henry Grady first used in 1886, Mr. Dabney would have spared himself and his readers a labored first chapter which successfully and, it is to be hoped, unnecessarily proves that the "Old South" was neither a large-scale model of Uncle Tom's Cabin nor an aromatic compound of magnolia and mint julep.

That out of the way, Mr. Dabney proceeds vigorously to an examination of the Southern scene. In Southern politics he finds much that liberals everywhere, including Mr. Dabney, would like to see cut out from the body politic; even if the two suggestions made in "Below the Potomac"—abolition of the poll tax and the regeneration of the two-party system—would not immediately make Norrises out of the South's tawdry display of a Reynolds and a Dies and a Smith, they would at least constitute a step in the right direction. On the question of civil liberties, Mr. Dabney turns in a verdict that can be summarized as "better, with more improvement desired, and more on the way." He throws some light on the explosive problem of the Southern Negro by discussing such recent occurrences as the Supreme Court decision on graduate-school facilities for Negroes. Here in particular Mr. Dabney's study of the issues involved can be recommended to the Northern liberal.

In short, "Below the Potomac" is the product of a native son who wants to see the South come abreast of the times and, in Maury Maverick's phrase, "join the United States." In the slow but inevitable disappearance of sectional animosities and in the economic advances of recent years Mr. Dabney sees grounds for believing that this will not be too long in coming, even though he instinctively distrusts the apparently simple and generally logical programs pushed by reformers who too frequently do not understand the nature of the backwardness out of which they earnestly wish to drag the

Mary McCarthy,
AUTHOR OF THE COMPANY SHE KEEPS

THE PUBLISHERS are certain that the publication of The Company She Keeps, Mary McCarthy's first novel, marks the inception of a distinguished literary career.

It is a novel in six episodes, dealing with the experiences of a girl in her twenties alone in New York. The milieu is the world of advertising men, radicals, writers, publishers, art dealers, teachers – glorified white-collar workers and declassed professional people.

Mary McCarthy approaches her heroine in the manner of an experimental photographer. Each episode is a different portrait of her, shot from a different angle, in a different light, and the author shifts the point of view as the photographer moves his camera. The result is a three-dimensional portrait of a woman. The author is the wife of Edmund Wilson and formerly a book reviewer for The New Republic. (Just published. Price $2.50)

South. So Mr. Dabney, in discussing the New Deal's work in the South, which by and large he indorses, finds reason to regret that so much of the experimenting blundered even while the greater part of the work outdid the effects of decades of unenlightenment and poverty.

This ought not to surprise anybody, and it probably won't, if we except those whose convictions are too firm for facts to move. If there is a specific recommendation to be made for future reference, it might be this: that we stop talking about the South, which is now, after all, only a handy geographical abstraction that has very often turned out to be extremely unhandy in attempts to help the South assume its rightful place in the nation. Everyone who has set out to "do something" about the South, the New Dealers included, has invariably proceeded on the assumption that the similarities to be found among its component parts were more significant than the differences. If this reviewer has read Mr. Dabney correctly, one conclusion that should be drawn from "Below the Potomac" is that it might be time to try that theory in reverse. WILLIAM JAY GOLD

The Great Steal

OUR LANDED HERITAGE: THE PUBLIC DOMAIN 1776-1936. By Roy M. Robbins. Princeton University Press. $5.

WHEN President Roosevelt on February 5, 1935, withdrew all public lands from private entry, his act marked the end of the frontier, whose passing historians had been heralding for over forty years. It also marked the end of one of the most discreditable chapters in American history—the spoliation of the public domain. With a wealth of documentation Dr. Robbins has chronicled this phase of our history from 1776 to 1936. Unlike other historians of the public domain, he has patiently related the development of public-land policies to contemporary events and thereby made his work a notable improvement over prior books on the same subject. All the pertinent historical facts about the public domain are probably collected in this volume, including the history, background, and main provisions of every Congressional act and executive order relating to the public lands. Unfortunately, however, Mr. Robbins has compiled a source book rather than written a history. Here is a wealth of information in search of an author with a thesis, or, if not a thesis, then at least a few leading ideas which would serve as a frame of reference for the mountainous accumulation of factual material.

The only thing of general significance that Dr. Robbins apparently sees in this long story of theft, chicanery, and fraud is that once upon a time we, the people of the United States, owned the most magnificent public domain on the face of the earth and now, in 1942, our inheritance is but a fragment of what it should rightly be. Far from reading any historical meaning into this state of affairs, or relating it to the rise of American capitalism. Dr. Robbins is content to note the fact itself. He divides the history of the Great Steal into four periods: from 1780 to 1850 the individual pioneer was the chief looter; from 1850 to 1862 the corporation, organized for plunder, was the pickpocket; from 1862 to 1901 the great industrial empires organized the pilfering on a more grandiose scale; and from 1901 to 1935 the government, suffering a few qualms, undertook to conserve what remained of the public lands. Having recited the facts of spoliation, Dr. Robbins abruptly ends his narrative, leaving the reader to inquire, I fear, "So what?"

Unquestionably there is something to be said for the technique of letting the facts speak for themselves, but when morosely pursued through 441 pages the technique seriously militates against the interest, readability, and significance of the story itself. As an example of how facts are noted but their significance ignored, consider one item. For years we have been nurtured on the idea that at one time America was a land of homesteads, that the homestead principle was a cornerstone of our agricultural policy. Yet what are the facts? The first homestead act was passed in 1862, by which time the bulk of the best farm lands had already passed into private ownership. Not only was the homestead principle established late in the history of the public domain, but it was subject to almost universal abuse in actual practice. Furthermore, its stupid application to the arid lands of the West brought into production lands that should have remained unplowed, thereby luring tens of thousands of settlers to subsequent economic ruin in the Dakotas, Montana, and Nebraska. Here is a phase of land policy which has a direct bearing upon current agricultural migration, upon the problem of soil erosion, upon the consolidation of farm units, but these aspects of the matter are not even mentioned.

From 1776 to 1936 our public-land policies were, in fact, one continuing fiasco, with blunders and stupidities endlessly repeated. Even when the government in moments of penitence tried to correct some of its past mistakes, the very amendments designed for this purpose were generally used by predatory interests to tighten their control over the public domain. Our acquisitive society, it would seem, was bent upon complete spoliation—of farm lands, of mineral lands, of timber lands—with the government apparently powerless to hold back the invaders. When it was realized, for example, that the railroads, in many cases, had not built the roads for which grants had been made, the government was never completely successful in recapturing title to the grants; with few exceptions the railroads continued to retain title to lands which, in effect, they had stolen from the public. By the time the conservation program of Theodore Roosevelt and Gifford Pinchot was put into effect, most of the damage had already been done, and conservation of the remaining resources actually aided the lumber companies to tighten their monopolistic control over the timber lands.

There is no doubt that the material so laboriously collected by Dr. Robbins is the stuff of which an exciting history might have been written. A little indignation, a little social insight, a passion for ideas as such might have pulled the loose ends together into a coherent pattern. In part, also, Dr. Robbins, by merely reciting instance after instance of fraud and theft, seems to accept the past in a rather apologetic way, jotting down the misdeeds of past years much as a clerk might make entries in a ledger. Actually the treatment of the public domain—the thefts, misuse, and undemocratic distribution—profoundly influenced the growth of American capitalism. It made possible the swift expropriation of thousands of small farmers; it accelerated the concentration of important timber and mineral resources in corporate ownership; it was responsible for the anomalous spectacle of land monopolies in frontier states. And by the same token it weakened the base of American democracy just at the time when there was great need of forces capable of imposing some restraint upon industrial power.

Today we have just begun to realize the vast reconstruction that must be undertaken to overcome the ravages worked in our landed heritage by an unfettered indulgence of the profit motive. Today there is a dawning realization that all land must be regarded as a public resource. There is, moreover, as Dr. Robbins points out, some indication that, through the purchase of submarginal lands and the acquisition of tax-delinquent lands, a considerable portion of the old public domain may once again come into government ownership—unfortunately, much as junk drifts back to the original manufacturer. In formulating the land policies of tomorrow, thanks to the research of Dr. Robbins, there can be no excuse for repeating the catastrophic blunders of the past. CAREY MC WILLIAMS

The Lady of Lourdes

THE SONG OF BERNADETTE. By Franz Werfel. The Viking Press. $3.

WHEN Franz Werfel was attempting to escape from France, he spent some weeks at Lourdes. During that period he vowed, he tells us, to write the story of Bernadette Soubirous as an offering of thanks if he did make his escape. "The Song of Bernadette" is that story. As the story of Bernadette herself it is a biography in fictional form of the saint who, as a child out gathering faggots one raw February day in the middle of the last century, saw the vision of "the beautiful lady" in the niche of the cavern of Massabielle, a place of refuse and offal, "not at all an unprecise and ghostly or a transparent and airy image, no changeful dream vision, but a very young lady, delicate and dainty, visibly of flesh and blood." To the child Bernadette it is simply "the lady," whom she loves and with whom she wishes to commune privately. But from the first the world intervenes—her family, pious old women who wish to dominate her, the children at school. Small crowds begin to follow her on her daily visit to the cavern, crowds of the curious, the skeptical, the devout, the hopeful. The mysterious spring appears in the cavern, and the first healing occurs, the healing of a child who in the last chapter of the book reappears as a guest at the canonization of Bernadette; he is then a simple, hale old man who after the ceremony goes out to eat a plate of noodles at a sidewalk cafe and falls asleep fingering his beads, while a war plane drones across the clear Roman sky. But after the first healing the world intervenes more and more violently, and the story of Bernadette, the simple, candid child, is absorbed into another story, the story of the impact of the vision upon the world.

Of this second, broader story "the lady" rather than Bernadette is the heroine. Her antagonists are numerous and constitute a panorama of nineteenth-century European society. There is the nun, Sister Vauzous, daughter of a general, the teacher of Bernadette, who for years cannot kill a suspicion of her old pupil, but who in the end discovers that she herself has all along been wondering why the vision had not, more appropriately, been granted to her. There are the officials who feel that the vision strikes somehow at the very root of the modern state, but who are defeated when Napoleon III reverses the edict closing the cavern. There is the intellectual, Lafite, a defeated poet, a romantic, who feels that "God did not place him on life's stage but invited him to sit in the royal box," but who in the end, an old man suffering from a cancer of the throat, comes back to Lourdes and receives, if not relief from his disease, a sense of humility and a sense of unity with the mass of humanity whom he had scorned. There is Mayor Lacadé, the opportunist, whose motive "was the most sincere and strongest of the whole age, namely, good business," and who dreams of commercializing the spring for its medicinal minerals. There is the physician, Dozous, who says to a colleague at the time of the first cure, "It is not an agreeable thing for us. . . . I too am not accustomed to believe things I cannot see." Then, among many other figures, there are the churchmen who have their own special struggle with the child Bernadette and with "the lady," the bishop who says, "The extraordinary is poisonous to any institution, be it state or church," and the other bishop who, upon hearing Bernadette, goes out into the garden and murmurs, "Quel poème . . . quel poème!" Almost no one can understand Bernadette because all "were accustomed to estimate life by the sole measure of success." And the vision shakes the age because a "miracle supported by proved but inexplicable cures meant so enormous a breach in the official deism and non-official nihilism of the age as to shake to their foundations both the certainty of unbelief and the uncertainty of faith."

Werfel has handled the personal story of Bernadette with grace and simplicity. Her character is tellingly rendered, not only in its effect upon others but in direct terms, and her conflict with the world is treated with great narrative skill. In fact, the suspense maintained by Werfel up to the point where Napoleon intervenes to open the cavern is a technical achievement of a high order. In his treatment of the larger story the novelist has perhaps been a shade less successful, if one applies the ordinary standards of fiction. It is only natural that the characters should tend to become somewhat schematic, too much like figures representing certain social forces. But this tendency has been held in check for the most part, and two of the most moving scenes in the book, that of old Lafite in the church and that of Peyramale at the death of Bernadette, involve such characters and suddenly vivify them. But even when this transformation of the intellectual shadows does not occur, the book is effective in presenting in terms of ideas the dramatic conflict of "the lady" and the world.

FROM MY HIGHEST HILL. By Olive Tilford Dargan. J. B. Lippincott Company. $3.50.

Olive Tilford Dargan writes also under the name Fielding Burke. The nine short stories in this volume were originally published several years ago under the title "Highland Annals." They have been revised and are now republished with fifty photographs by Bayard Wootten. The author is here writing of her highland neighbors in the Carolina mountains. Entirely plotless, the stories are perhaps more truly sketches, but whatever they are called, they are written with sincerity and great skill in characterization. Even more worthy of praise is the absence of that sentimental awe with which most authors approach the mountain people. These stories are worth reading.

THE MUSIC OF SPAIN. By Gilbert Chase. W. W. Norton and Company. $4.

This is an interpretative rather than strictly chronological history of Spanish music, from the cántigas of the thirteenth century to De Falla and after, with chapters on folk music and dances, one on the music of Portugal contributed by Albert T. Luper, and one on Hispanic music in the Americas. Its value for the student is increased by notes, full bibliography, and extensive gramophone record lists. Varied and interesting illustrations, appropriate design and typography, and an enchanting yellow binding add to its charms for the general reader.

DRAMA

The Heart of a Wookey

AMERICAN plays about the war have at least been various in incident and approach, but as far as one can judge from the three specimens to reach these shores, the English treatment of the subject has already become standardized. "The Heart of a City," like "The Wookey," relied on an air raid for its big scene, and the point of both was that falling bombs are great adjusters of individual differences. Now Paul Vincent Carroll's "The Strings, My Lord, Are False" (Royale Theater) gives us a group taking refuge in the crypt of a church instead of in a theatrical dressing-room or an official shelter, but otherwise the play is much the same despite its pretentious title. It is not surprising that an Englishman who thinks about the war should think about an air raid, but on the stage it is getting a bit monotonous.

Mr. Carroll appears to have started with the intention of discussing a large intellectual question. His action is set in a slum community on the Clyde, and several of his principal characters, including a liberal-minded priest, a conscientious objector, and a Communist workman, do not think that England before the war was a very green or very pleasant land. In fact, the Communist composes some last words which he never gets a chance to use but which were to be, "I do not die for the system but for the people." Mr. Carroll, however, gets so involved in local color, conventional melodrama, and a couple of other plays he would like to write some day that there is not much time left over for the discussion of his theme. When the elegant monsignor comes to remonstrate with the social-minded canon, the play appears about to turn into another "Shadow and Substance." Much of the rest of the time it is so occupied with a big-hearted whore and a nice girl about to have a baby by a man she doesn't really love that only the sound effects remind us that this is not the melodrama about the good in the worst of us.

Nor, to tell the truth, do the specimens of his more thoughtful writing which Mr. Carroll manages to find time for arouse very profound regret that there is not more of it. What he wants to say is that at least half of England is not fighting to save what it had but fighting for a chance to make something better, and that those who do not see why victory is a necessary condition of any future hope are a diminishing minority. But on this subject he is not very clear, very forceful, or very original. The conscientious objector whose father had been clubbed to death by the police raves; a Jew who lost his arm at Dunkirk prophesies in a mock-heroic vein; and at the end the priest delivers a long, dull speech intended to sum the whole matter up. But none of the eloquence is very effective, and the author seems more certain that he has something to say than sure that he is capable of saying it.

A large cast which includes some very capable performers works hard without ever succeeding in pulling the play together or giving more than competently stagy performances. Walter Hampden, a dignified priest, is perhaps the best of the lot. Ruth Gordon, who rarely fails to make much of any character she plays, can do little with the girl who is going to have a baby. Margo Graham plays her part in "The Wookey" over again, and Ralph Cullinan does very well in a standard Abbey Theater character. Philip Bourneuf is all that could reasonably be expected as the objector who—it would not be hard to guess—ceases to object when his sweetheart is killed in a raid.

JOSEPH WOOD KRUTCH

MUSIC

VIRGIL THOMSON'S discussion of three chapters in "Radio Research 1941" (Duell, Sloan, and Pearce; $2.50), edited by Paul F. Lazarsfeld and Frank Stanton, led me to get hold of the book and read the chapters myself. The book comprises six studies of the relations of broadcasts and listeners —studies "directed from Columbia University's Office of Radio Research, financed by a grant of Rockefeller funds"; studies through which "the social scientist may help to contribute toward a more constructive use of radio." Three of the six deal with music.

The Popular Music Industry, by Duncan MacDougald, Jr., describes how popular songs are produced and how they are promoted by intensive "plugging" over the air; and shows that the preference of millions of people for a "hit" is not spontaneous but is predetermined by this "plugging," which prevents these people from actively exercising taste and compels them to yield passively to the song industry's standards.

Edward A. Suchman's Invitation to Music, an interesting "study of the creation of new music listeners by the radio," would be more valuable if it were not blurred by poorly ordered progression of thought and unprecise writing, and were not obscured further by the jargon with which a social scientist achieves his scientific precision of statement in the statistical investigations that are his exact science—all of which may be why my summary of the chapter's contents will be different from Mr. Thomson's. The listeners investigated were approximately every tenth subscriber among the 9,000 who got Station WNYC's Masterwork Bulletin. Of 765 such listeners 15 per cent said that radio had initiated their interest, 38 per cent said that radio had developed or nursed an already existing interest, and 47 per cent said that radio had merely supplemented other sources of music that had satisfied their interest. Among the newly initiated there were twice as many men as women: men who had been unwilling to give the necessary effort and time to study of an instrument or attendance of concerts now listened to the music which radio made easily accessible in their leisure time. In this group, also, there were a great many over thirty years of age: those who had failed to develop an interest during adolescence had responded to the second chance that radio had offered them; and to some who had developed an antagonism to music in childhood from being compelled to listen, radio had offered the opportunity for a voluntary choice which they had accepted. The role of radio, for the newly initiated, had been to provide the opportunity to listen that had made other influences—like those of family background, formal education, friends' example—effective; and in two-thirds of the group there had been some predisposition toward listening which radio had activated in this way. The tastes in music of the newly initiated were less sophisticated than those of the other two groups of listeners; and so was their attitude toward the music: "Signs of real understanding are lacking. . . . Music is listened to for romantic relaxation or excitement, without any concern for the development or the relations of the music." For most of the newly initiated radio continued to be the only source of music; when radio led elsewhere it was mostly to the phonograph; if a concert was attended it was from curiosity about the musician who had been heard over the air.

"Further discussion of listless listening, which would seem to be the only radio kind that is possible," says Mr. Thomson, "is offered in T. W. Adorno's analysis of the 'radio symphony.' " But the Suchman report does not demonstrate that listless listening is "the only radio kind that is possible"; and I find it difficult to write temperately of the motivation, the method, the results of the Adorno performance—of the pretentiousness, the ostentation, the aggressive awareness of his own "brilliance" that leap out at one from this German philosophy professor's tortuous and occasionally ferocious thinking and jargon, from his musico-socio-psychological schematizations which yield the lurid conclusions that Mr. Thomson welcomes "with cries of joy": that because of the inadequacies of radio transmission the meaning of a Beethoven symphony movement "automatically shifts from the totality to the individual moments [since] their interrelation and articulation by dynamics and colors is no longer fully effected," and that "the symphonic particulars become atoms"; that this causes the elements of the movement to acquire the character of mere quotations, and the radio symphony to appear "as a medley or potpourri in so far as the musical atoms it offers up acquire the touch of having been picked up somewhere else and put together in a kind of montage"; that the isolated detail acquires more weight, more importance, more expressiveness than it had in its context, and so radio not only atomizes and trivializes the music but romanticizes it; that these changes in the movement's essential structure mean "not only that this structure is not adequately conveyed but that what does come out opposes that structure and constitutes a serious obstacle against its realization"; that radio transmission provides an "exact and objective technical foundation" for "the tendency toward atomistic listening" and "prejudices the capacity to listen in a spontaneous and conscious way," forcing listeners "to passive sensual and emotional acceptance of predigested yet disconnected qualities, whereas those qualities at the same time become mumified and magicized." And more of the same.

The alarming thing is that the matter goes further than this chapter. It isn't only Mr. Thomson who utters cries of welcome; Adorno's tripe is the sort of thing that social science research institutes, foundations, and journals go for. He is, we are told, "associated with the Institute for Social Research at Columbia University" and "has been in charge of the music research at the Office of Radio Research"; his influence in this research, his status and power are attested by the other writers' genuflections to his suggestions, ideas, and writings: even MacDougald cannot mention the song publisher's dictation to the song writer without a "Cf. T. W. Adorno, 'The Fetish Character of Music and the Retrogression of Listening,' Zeitschrift für Sozialforschung, Vol. 7, 1938, p. 336."

And the matter goes further than Adorno. But that will have to wait.

Letters to the Editors

A Soldier's Wants

Dear Sirs: I am amazed at the meager understanding of soldiers' problems expressed by civilians. Soldiers in the mass want more pay and more time off. They do not seek to avoid the danger of warfare or the hardships of maneuvers or training. They want to avoid boredom. A soldier does not relish entertainment of the manufactured kind practically thrown at him near the camps. What he wants is spurts of hard training and then long passes, furloughs and week-ends with money for travel, hotels, food, and entertaining girls or else old cronies. I have never met one yet who did not know exactly what to do with himself on a free week-end. The idea that morale will deteriorate if distraction and entertainment are not publicly provided for soldiers is pure nonsense. More pay and more frequent passes is all in the world a soldier wants, be he a veteran or a draftee. They all know exactly what sort of thing in a city is their idea of a good time, and they need only money and time to attain it. Desire to race out of camp after retreat in the evening or on a week-end simply indicates that like any workman a good soldier likes to leave the factory or office at the end of the day and relax in a different environment.

From June, to December, 1941, I received training on transports for landing operations and in the Carolinas for land maneuvers. It was an unending physical-endurance contest. But the number of complaints, serious ones, and the number of desertions were negligible. After climbing up and down the side of a ship again and again with pack and rifle, enough to sink and drown me, and after being over a month in the Carolinas without having one night a roof over my head, I believe I could endure any form of hardship man could invent. But I never felt better in my life, except for the infrequent bathing facilities. A thing we all experience in either civilian or barracks life—that profound disinclination to get up when first awakened—is strangely absent when you are in the field. The ground is so hard you are glad to get up when awakened. Also you are glad to lie on it after walking all day. No soldier regrets the hardships of maneuvers. He regrets being broke or being cooped up in camp week-ends or being unable to start out for home because of the distance and the lack of plane fare.

Soldiers resent any pure stupidity perpetrated by a public official. They resent generalized regulations, such as age restrictions on pilots or officer candidates, instead of individual, personal tests as the deciding factor in the conferring of various privileges and opportunities. They resent red tape. Also they resent nauseating emotionalism, particularly as applied to patriotism. They regard the Germans and Japanese as weeds which must be destroyed and themselves as a sort of lawnmower which will in time do the destroying. They resent any domestic disorder which delays the forging of that machine.

There is a high degree of tolerance of racial differences and personal idiosyncrasies among soldiers. I can't remember ever having heard any bitter or insulting remark cast at Negroes, and it was with real surprise that I read of fighting between white and Negro soldiers at Camp Dix.

I have easily adapted myself to this life; I like men and people and find little to complain. But there is one thing I wish to mention. That is the lack of really adequate facilities for testing men to the limit for unusual powers. I have every confidence in the world that I could function as a major general or even lieutenant general, but what processes exist for testing or proving this one way or the other. I sought a second lieutenancy avidly and constantly from October, 1940, to June, 1941, and have done so indifferently since, but I have been stalled all this time by red tape. Now I have concluded it isn't worth the struggle.

Let Taxation Be Just!

Dear Sirs: Advocates of the general sales tax too frequently fail to appreciate the unjust distribution of its burdens. Consumption never has been accepted as a fair measure of ability to contribute to the support of government. One's sense of justice denies any claim that the father of a large family of dependent children is better able to pay taxes than the bachelor with an equal income and no dependents at all.

Some who admit the sales tax to be regressive favor its use as an equalizer of the general tax burden. They hold that a sales tax is equivalent to an income tax of an equal per cent for those persons who have to spend all their income for the necessaries of life, but amounts to only a fraction of this per cent for those who do not spend all their income. Such an argument ignores an important difference between the two types of tax. An income tax always exempts a subsistence minimum and makes an additional exemption for each dependent child, while a general sales tax allows no exemption.

It is agreed that in determining the tax burden we must look at the tax system as a whole. We must include all kinds of tax levies, direct and indirect, those imposed by towns, villages, cities, counties, and states as well as by the federal government. In the commonwealths and their subdivisions the property tax is most universal. Special studies have revealed that more than 90 per cent of intangible property escapes taxation altogether, and that the assessed value of tangible property declines from the true market value as the holdings increase. The poor man owns little or no intangible property, and his small holding of tangible property is assessed at nearly 100 per cent of its full market value. Since the proportional rate is applied in determining the tax on property, the burden is regressive, falling relatively heavily on the poor.

It is sometimes argued in support of the sales tax that it yields promptly and continuously very substantial revenues to the state; and also that such a tax causes everyone to be interested in the affairs of government. But if the principle of justice is to be ignored, the confiscations and excessive fines employed by medieval kings would be even more productive of immediate revenues. Unjust methods, knowingly employed for raising revenue, are unbecoming a democracy. And, it must be remembered that it is important to induce citizens to think approvingly of the activities of government rather than disapprovingly. Since our colonial forefathers fought a successful war in opposition to unjust taxation, let us be mindful of the justice for which they sacrificed so much.

Correction from Mr. Herskovits

Dear Sirs: A much-belated copy of Franklin Frazier's review of my book, "The Myth of the Negro Past," has just reached me here in Bahia. There is one statement in it that, in all justice to the men named, I should like to see corrected.

Mr. Frazier says, "The conclusions of such scholars as Robert E. Park, Edward B. Reuter, and Guy Johnson may be wrong, but they are not the result of race prejudice. . . ." The imputation here is not justified, for nowhere in my book, either explicitly or implicitly, have I made charges of race prejudice against any of these gentlemen—as I have not made them against Mr. Frazier himself, whose work, as he modestly refrains from stating in this review, is cited again and again as making an outstanding contribution to the perpetuation of the "myth" that the Negro has no pre-American past worthy of note. On the contrary, I am at some pains to point out how, with the idea of African cultural inferiority accepted, it was just such men of good-will as these who felt that the less said about this aspect of the Negro's past the better.

Anti-Nazis in Australia

Dear Sirs: A friend of mine, once a well-known educator in Germany, went to England in 1939. Being unable to get an immigration certificate for Palestine, he lived in the Kitchener Camp in Richborough. Although he was considered a "refugee from Nazi oppression" by a government tribunal after the outbreak of the war, he was interned in 1940 without any charges and sent to a camp in Australia. He is known to be an anti-Nazi, and, indeed, his wife and child were deported by the Nazis to a Polish ghetto; yet he has been confined ever since.

In a letter I have just received from him he writes: "The unbelievable is true: thousands of people are kept behind barbed wire in this Empire of Humanity, year after year, only because nobody wants to have them. There is no other reason, for nobody seriously believes that we are enemies. Thinking of the world outside that claims to fight for right and freedom, we are in constant danger of becoming enemies of human society."

Many people have criticized the French for interning anti-Nazi refugees when the Nazis invaded France. I am afraid that a similar thing is being done in Australia right now. The people in internment camps would do anything to help the small population of large Australia in their war effort. This country, which is now helping Australia so much, ought to be able to do something about Australia's unfriendly treatment of the Allies' friends.

Karl Heinzen

Dear Sirs: I am collecting material for a biography of Karl Heinzen, German revolutionist and radical American editor and publicist, whose American activities centered in Louisville, New York, and Boston. I would be grateful if anyone having unpublished Heinzen material would communicate with me at Oberlin College.

Our Returning Consuls

Dear Sirs: You recently published a most accurate and informative article regarding the activities of some of our "mis-representatives" in Europe (Our Consuls at Work, by Varian Fry, in the issue of May 2).

Many of these fascist-minded and anti-Semitic gentry are now returning to our shores in exchange for the German, Italian, and Japanese diplomats who left this country a few weeks ago. It is too bad that we have no "democratic compression chambers" on the order of the devices used when tunnel workers return to the air after their day's work, for these people are so indoctrinated with fascism that they will surely spread a lot of it over here. What about a little publicity about this matter? It is really a shame that some of them could not be brought to book on charges for their behavior abroad.

Thanks and the Contrary

Dear Sirs: Thank you for Pierre Cot's remarks on "Europe's future," in his review of Albert Guérard's "The France of Tomorrow." No thank you for Hal Lehrman's suggestion that the De Gaulle forces should have been permitted to repeat at Madagascar the blunder of Dakar!

I view with discomfort the tendency to give all-out support to French royalists. Military support at places where they are already in possession is enough.

The Shape of Things

THE MEMORIAL DAY SPEECH OF SUMNER Welles might have been written as a supplement to the now famous address by the Vice-President at the Free World dinner three weeks earlier. It put into the language of plans and intentions the fundamental democratic principles set forth by Mr. Wallace. "The age of imperialism is ended," said Mr. Welles. "If this war is in fact a war for the liberation of peoples, it must assure the sovereign equality of peoples throughout the world. . . . Discrimination between peoples because of their race, creed, or color must be abolished. . . ." Such words express more than a hope; they imply a promise. They could not be spoken on a solemn public occasion by the Under Secretary of State without being taken throughout the world as an official pronouncement of the government of this country. Ordinary people everywhere will accept them as our plan for a post-war world. They will create hope in millions of hearts; they will arouse fears, too, and some resentment, for they already announce the dissolution of empires for the preservation of which many statesmen in the United Nations believe they are fighting. They imply a willingness on the part of the United States to undertake jointly with its allies not only the winning of the war but the overthrow of powerful and vested political interests. It is a tall order, but we are glad the Under Secretary had the courage to formulate it.

TO CARRY IT OUT CALLS FOR DETERMINATION such as he and his department—and indeed our nation as a whole—have never consistently demonstrated. It demands, to start with, a thorough revision of traditional methods of dealing with foreign problems and with American problems that relate to the war and the world to come. The policy of the State Department toward struggling democratic forces everywhere—from St. Pierre to the Argentine—has been coldly uncooperative. Its treatment of "free" movements organized in this country has served to dishearten honest anti-fascists and encourage the representatives of reactionary interests and discredited regimes. Its appeasement of every dictator not yet openly lined up with Hitler has alienated liberal sentiment here and in the countries struggling for their freedom. Mr. Welles's blueprint of a free world will be accepted at full face value only when its lines begin to take concrete form in American policy. Its application cannot safely be postponed till after the war, for the war must be won by men and women who have faith in America's promises.

WHILE TOBRUK WAS ROMMEL'S IMMEDIATE objective in the suddenly renewed Battle of Libya, the larger strategic considerations prompting his campaign are far from clear. Was it intended to prepare the way for a pincer movement against Egypt? There have been many reports of concentrations of German troops and transport planes in the Greek islands, but an air-borne invasion of Syria—the other arm of the pincers—would demand overwhelming air strength in that sector. Yet it would appear that the Axis is experiencing great difficulties even in maintaining air equality on all fronts. In Libya the British have kept control of the skies, and the R. A. F. has played a great part in breaking up Nazi armored formations and disrupting supply columns. Mr. Churchill has told Parliament that the North African forces under General Ritchie were by no means taken by surprise. The British line held firmly on both flanks against the triple-pronged Axis assault, but Nazi tank columns succeeded in penetrating the center to some depth. Thereafter, however, they found themselves in some danger of encirclement, with retreat restricted to two narrow lanes between British minefields. As we go to press, the latest dispatches suggest that Rommel has succeeded in extricating the major part of this force, though not without considerable losses, including the capture of his second-in-command.

FOR THE ATTACK ON REINHARD HEYDRICH, Prague is paying in the blood of innocent hostages—the toll as we write is 108. Yet the news that one of the most hated men in Europe had been paralyzed for life if not killed must have sent a thrill of satisfaction through the occupied lands that could not be entirely wiped out by the knowledge of the swift and brutal vengeance that must follow. Dozens of lesser Nazis have been killed; hundreds of hostages have been murdered. But Heydrich is the first high Nazi official to be successfully attacked by others than his "comrades." And this in the third year of the new order. Writing from Berne, G. H. Archambault calls the rising wave of resistance the "third front" and ascribes it to the belief, "which has become axiomatic," that American production makes a second front and a final Allied victory inevitable. The "new feeling," he says, "has reached even prisoners of war held by the Nazis in camps." If this is true, resistance may be expected to grow rather than diminish, even though repression will undoubtedly become more brutal.

THE LULL ON THE AUSTRALIAN AND INDIAN fronts during the past few weeks seems to confirm Chungking's fear that Japan is now devoting its entire energies to an effort to knock China out of the war. The outlook is far from reassuring. Held up for the better part of a week at Kinhwa, capital of Chekiang, the Japanese are reported to have used poison gas on at least three occasions in order to gain control of that strategic city. New Japanese attacks have been launched along the Chekiang coast, at Nanchang, and at Canton. A Chinese counter-offensive of undetermined strength has developed in Anhwei, 100 miles west of Nanking. The Chinese urgently require air reinforcements. Kinhwa and the surrounding area were subjected to scores of unopposed raids before the Japanese finally succeeded in gaining the upper hand. Although the American Volunteer Group has continued to harass the enemy along the Burma front, it is reported to be in desperate need of replacements. What is called for, as Lin Yu-tang pointed out in a masterly letter to the New York Times, is not a few planes thrown to the Chinese as a sop without any real appreciation of China's needs, but a "realistic consideration of . . . China's role in the war." Our record so far in aiding China is little short of disgraceful. We have virtually ignored the immense strategic value of the territory which the Japanese are now seeking to wrest from China and have been content to send token aid. It is still not too late to provide the weapons that will enable us to utilize China's vast resouces of manpower and its strategic position. But we must act soon or lose China.

JOHN L. LEWIS'S MANNER OF REMOVING Philip Murray from the vice-presidency of the United Mine Workers was both ruthless and insulting, in the well-known Lewis tradition. It looked for a few days as if the miners' policy committee would at least go through the motions of preferring formal charges against Mr. Murray and citing him for trial, but suddenly Lewis let it be known that Murray had been removed and his successor named. Lewis's action took place while Murray was at the White House conferring with Lewis's pet hate, F. D. R., and was undoubtedly designed in part as a thrust at the President as well as Murray. Some observers thought that the unceremonious removal of Murray was also connected with a report that a meeting in Buffalo of local unions affiliated with District 50 of the U. M. W. had protested against the attack on Murray. The protest is significant because District 50 is the spearhead of Lewis's drive to gather strength for a new attempt to dominate the labor movement. Murray has indicated his intention of carrying his case to the membership of the U. M. W.; several months ago it was reliably reported that he commanded very wide support among the rank and file of the union he has served so aithfully for twenty-two years, but the Lewis dictatorhip has ways of dealing with such subversive lay opinon. Meanwhile, Lewis is preparing the way for the next move in his campaign for power—a break between the miners and the C. I. O. Their relations are already badly strained by the refusal of the miners to pay per capita dues on the ground that the $1,665,000 which Lewis as head of the U. M. W. advanced with such generosity to Lewis as head of the C. I. O. was not a gift but a loan. The final showdown, however, may be put off until the C. I. O. convention.

THE "WORK OR FIGHT" STATEMENT ISSUED by the War Manpower Commission seems to have been misinterpreted in various quarters and thus to have caused unwarranted resentment among both labor and management. A careful reading of the statement will show that it is not a "work-or-fight order" such as was issued in the last war. Workers were not told that they must accept any job offered them—"or else." The statement merely reiterated what must obviously be the case: that skilled workers who fail to heed calls from the United States Employment Service to accept employment in war industries at suitable wages cannot expect to be deferred by their draft boards as "necessary men." To aid in the classification of workers the War Production Board is rating war plants in order of importance. Draft boards can no longer take men from critical occupations for military service without the consent of the United States Employment Service. Action also has been taken by the commission to prevent employers from pirating labor from other plants by the use of private employment agencies or by paying wages in excess of the market rates. The orders issued by the Manpower Commission so far seem to be both wise and moderate. The commission has been negligent, however, in not clearing its plans in advance with the management and labor groups which are most directly concerned with the operation of the new policy.

THE PLIGHT OF THE WEST COAST JAPANESE who have been crowded into temporary "assembly centers" is described in some detail in an article by Charles Iglehart on page 649 and in two letters in the correspondence columns of this issue. Regardless of the necessity for the evacuation, which Mr. Iglehart questions, it is obvious that both the removal and the resettlement of loyal elements in the Japanese population have been badly bungled. Part of the blame lies with the states and communities which are unwilling to accept the evacués for civilian relocation. But if the federal government had the power to uproot these people as a war measure, it should be able to insist that communities and states in the interior accept them and accord them full civilian rights. The evacuation of loyal American citizens along with Japanese aliens was defended on the ground that there was no time to make the full investigation that would have been necessary to weed out the dangerous elements. Whatever validity this argument may have had at the time of the evacuation disappears now that the entire group has been assembled in the interior. There would seem no reason why all American citizens, together with the aliens whose loyalty is established after careful investigation, should not now be permitted full freedom. But freedom alone will not compensate them for the loss of their jobs and the virtual confiscation of their property. Pressure must be brought on the federal government to see that plans for work projects and rural resettlement are put into operation.

SINCE IT IS IMPORTANT THAT WE HAVE ample supplies of quinine, the German-owned patents for synthetic substitutes should be thrown open to use by all manufacturers. The Japanese now hold Java, with its cinchona plantations. Sterling Products Company, on assignment from I. G. Farben, holds the patents for atabrine and plasmochin, both effective synthetic substitutes. Sterling Products makes a virtue of the fact that it has licensed Merck and Company to produce these synthetics, but Merck was one of the two American firms connected with the Dutch quinine monopoly. It would be folly to leave ourselves at the mercy of a possible combination between one company linked with a German cartel and a second linked with a Dutch. Leo T. Crowley, the Alien Property Custodian, through his control of the German-owned majority shares in General Aniline and Film, now controls Sterling Products and could order it to make its patents available to all manufacturers. He could also force Sterling Products to leave the market open to American-invented processes for making synthetic quinine. In the past Sterling Products has used its German patents to block the marketing of American discoveries. But Crowley is reported to be concerned about his "fiduciary" relationship to this property interest under his control. We hope the Senate Patents Committee will ask Crowley just what he conceives his "fiduciary" duties to be. "Seizure" of foreign patents in war time is the emptiest kind of thunder if these patents are to be tenderly guarded for return to our enemies after the war. If the Patents Committee needs inspiration in this inquiry, let it remember the shortage of quinine on Bataan.

THE SECOND REFUSAL OF THE SUPREME Court to review the case of Odell Waller is a shocking evasion of an issue the court should face. As our readers will recall, Waller is under sentence of death in Virginia for the murder of his white landlord and has appealed his conviction on the ground that he was tried before a jury from which men of his class were excluded under the state poll-tax law. Of the all-white jury which convicted him, ten members were employing farmers. A statement put out by the Workers' Defense League exactly reflects our own opinion:

> . . . This case not only involves justice for Waller; it involves the whole Southern practice of creating a second-class citizenship by means of the poll tax. At this solemn moment when America is embattled to defend the four freedoms, the Supreme Court has twice evaded this vital and inescapable issue. Twice it has refused to say whether it regards a jury of white poll-tax payers as peers of the disfranchised black man. Twice it has, in effect, condemned Odell Waller to die in the dark. Once again, as in the Mooney case, it has signally failed to fulfil the purposes for which it was created. It has not the right to remain silent on an issue which affects millions of Americans both white and colored.

The War at Dead Center

AS HIGH summer approaches, the military scales in Europe are poised at dead center. No longer has the Axis the preponderant weights on its side; no longer can Hitler throw his millions from one end of the Continent to the other with confidence that the desired objective will be attained.

In the far north of the Russian front spring is passing, and still there is no full-scale German offensive. Are the reserves which the Reichswehr has accumulated in the east to be flung into one desperate attempt to break through to the Caucasus or into yet another assault on Moscow? Or will the Nazis try to hold the Russian line while the main army is hurried back to the Channel in an effort to invade Britain before Anglo-American power is built up to overwhelming strength? And if this plan is adopted, can the Red Army develop an offensive of its own vigorous enough to roll the Germans back over their own frontiers? Hitler's celebrated intuition appears to be having some difficulty in finding the right answers to these questions.

But if Hitler no longer has full command of the initiative, the United Nations are not quite ready to seize it. They have not yet reached the point where they can dictate their choice of a battlefield; they are still keeping their strategy sufficiently fluid to meet one of several possible moves by the Axis. Even so, the equilibrium of the military balance does not mean stalemate. The weights that will tip the scales in our favor are being forged in American training camps and factories.

The devastating R. A. F. raid on Cologne may in fact prove the first sign that the scales have begun to lean our way. We write while the story of the blow at the capital of the Rhineland has still to be filled out in detail, but it is clear that if raids of the same magnitude can be repeated often in the next few months, German capacity to resist is going to be seriously weakened. The frantic clumsiness of the German attempts to minimize the effect of the bombing suggests that panic is reigning in the Wilhelmstrasse as well as in Cologne itself. And the British propagandists have been quick to exploit the situation, recalling Göring's boast that no enemy bombs would ever fall on German soil, reiterating Churchill's advice to the Germans to get out into the fields, and emphasizing that this raid was only a sample of what would happen when the R. A. F. was joined by the American Air Force. The equally powerful attack on Essen two days later should prove to the Germans that Cologne was no isolated incident. Nor are they likely to be reassured by General Arnold's promise that American fliers will join the fray without waiting for "ideal planes, airports, or situations."

The experts are still arguing about whether or not a war can be won by air power alone, but majority opinion holds that in this particular war Germany is not likely to be knocked out except by a combined offensive of all arms. Raids like that on Cologne, repeated on an ever larger scale, can do much to soften up the enemy for the invasion of the Continent that must precede victory. They can do much also to disorganize industry and communications and to undermine the morale not merely of the civilian population but of the German troops on distant fronts, whose enthusiasm for further aggression is likely to ebb as they learn what is happening to their homes. Again, a sustained air offensive over Germany is calculated to interfere with Hitler's vital time-table. If he hopes for success in the east he must maintain at least equality in the air with the Russians; yet he cannot forge ahead confidently while his western frontier is being burned and blasted.

It may well be that the activity of the R. A. F., combined with Anglo-American preparations for a second front, has played a part in the postponement of Hitler's much-advertised spring offensive. But the major factor has undoubtedly been Timoshenko's counter-offensive in the Kharkov region, which the Russians claim has achieved its primary objective—the diversion of a threatened German move against Rostov, the recapture of which would have placed the Reichswehr in a position to follow up its local success on the Kerch Peninsula. The Germans have also claimed a great victory, but the most they seem to have accomplished is the halting of the Soviet counter-attack—a negative result which has cost them dearly in men, machines, and above all in time.

In viewing the situation on the eastern front, however, we must remember that, although the fighting around Kharkov has been heavy, the bulk of the German army is still held in reserve ready to strike with fearful orce. The threat of a second front may restrain Hitler rom staking all on one irretrievable throw of the dice in Russia, but the chances are it will not, for he knows that f the present deadlock remains unbroken, ultimate defeat is certain. And the possibility that he would be able to batter his way through to the Caucasian oil fields is not to be dismissed lightly, as Alvarez del Vayo pointed out in these columns last week.

There is no doubt that Anglo-American strategists are now giving very serious consideration to ways and means of establishing a second front, and that the staff conferences taking place in London are not mere window-dressing. The present trend of opinion, however, seems to be for waiting until Hitler shows his hand completely in the east, since until the German reserves are absolutely committed to an offensive on that front, the possibility that they might be turned westward cannot be entirely ignored. That is the dilemma the Anglo-American staffs are grappling with, and it is, of course, the reverse side of that with which Hitler's intuition is struggling. Or rather it is a Gordian knot which must be cut by the sword, and we must hope that our leaders are ready for the decisive stroke. Cologne, at least, encourages us to believe our weapon is sharp and loose in the scabbard.

What About Harlem?

THE problems of the Negroes in Harlem have been increased rather than lightened by the war boom which has aided the Okies, tenant farmers, and many other "forgotten men" in our population. Such is the disheartening conclusion that must be drawn from a study of the reports of the four subcommittees of the City-Wide Citizens' Committee on Harlem which were released last week. The report on employment shows that very few Negroes have found their way into the war industries. This is partly because New York is not a defense center, but it is primarily the result of discrimination against Negroes in the more skilled occupations. There has been, it is true, a steady rise in the relative number of Negro placements through the New York section of the United States Employment Service. But this means very little, since 83 per cent of the placements were for women and consisted largely of short-time domestic jobs. Only 1.8 per cent of the Negroes placed were skilled workers, a decline from 4.5 per cent in 1939. It is estimated that only about 1,500 Harlem Negroes have been able to find war jobs outside the New York area.

Harlem's wretched housing situation has been aggravated by the war. Private and public housing construction has practically ceased owing to the existing shortage in materials. Although the number of vacancies in New York City appears to have increased somewhat as a result of the war, the change has been too slight to ease Harlem's problem. The severity of the overcrowding in this section may be seen from the fact that 3,871 persons live in a single Harlem block. At this density the whole of the population of the United States could live in one-half of New York City. Although there is a greater proportion of structurally sound houses in Harlem than in other slum areas in the city, the overcrowding is much more serious than elsewhere. It is, of course, a direct result of low incomes. Half of Harlem's families have incomes of less than $837 a year, and at all income levels from $500 to $3,000 Negroes pay higher average rents than white families. To meet the situation a very large proportion of Harlem's families take in lodgers. Among the families studied the average ran considerably more than one to a household.

Bad housing conditions and low incomes are reflected in the statistics on health, crime, and low educational opportunities. Harlem has four times as high a death rate for tuberculosis as New York City as a whole. The death-rate for syphilis among Negroes in New York is seven times higher than among whites. The accident rate is also materially higher. Schools are operated on a three-shift basis; teachers are badly overworked; playground and recreational facilities are grossly inadequate.

In an effort to alleviate the situation, the four subcommittees have made a number of recommendations. These include plans to promote more liberal employment policies with regard to Negroes, suggestions regarding new public-housing projects to be constructed at the end of the war, and a number of very concrete recommendations for new schools, lighter teaching loads, admission of Negroes to nursing schools on the same basis as whites, and expansion of health facilities. So far as they go, these recommendations are excellent, and a vigorous effort should be made by all social-minded citizens to see that they are put into effect. This will not be easy. The LaGuardia administration and Tammany have apparently been trying to outdo each other in recent months in seeking the curtailment of vital social services. We believe that we can trust the City-Wide Citizens' Committee to wage a vigorous campaign to see that its recommendations are adopted. But we hope that it will not stop there. The committee is doubtless well aware that the basic problem of Harlem will not be solved by the building of schools or the extension of social services. It cannot be solved until Negroes obtain full equality, in fact as well as in law, in employment opportunity, and until the practices which result in housing segregation are eliminated. A great deal of education is required before we can expect legislation to achieve these ends; but the present moment, when public opinion is aware as never before of the evil results of racialism as practiced by Hitler, would seem an auspicious time to begin.

Biddle and Bridges

BY FREDA KIRCHWEY

NO ONE who has read the Attorney General's ruling on the Bridges case—and no one who knows Mr. Biddle's character—can believe that his decision was based on anything but honest legal reasoning. I am convinced that no political motives lie hidden behind the deportation order. Indeed, no decent political motives were available. Politics could have entered into the decision only in some utterly unworthy shape such as a desire to punish Bridges for his attack on Mayor Rossi of San Francisco or to placate the fascists and reactionaries who protested against the freeing of Earl Browder. Such motives would never control the conduct of Francis Biddle, and they may be dismissed without discussion.

The only political motives that could properly have influenced him weighed strongly the other way. He might have been moved by major considerations of national welfare. He might have said to himself: "The law can wait upon the war. Bridges is an important factor in maintaining stability and a high level of efficiency in one of the key sectors of the war effort. He'd better be kept at work as long as ships must be loaded with guns and planes for our troops abroad." He might have said: "I have convinced myself that Bridges is a Communist and that communism is a doctrine calling for the revolutionary overthrow of the government. But by a marriage of convenience Communists are joined today with the rest of the country in ardent prosecution of the war. The revolution has been adjourned for the duration. So this seems a peculiarly inappropriate moment for a showdown on the question of force and violence."

The Attorney General is by no means a coldly technical man of law. Nor is he unaware of the overriding claims of the national emergency. He has not hesitated, for example, to adjourn anti-trust suits until after the war even in cases where his department has in hand substantial evidence of monopolistic practices. In adopting this policy the Department of Justice has consciously put the demands of war production ahead of the duty of enforcing the law. This policy may not achieve its purposes—it may indeed interfere with them, as The Nation has frequently argued—but at least it offers clear evidence that when the Attorney General believes the national safety calls for a pro tem adjournment of legal processes he acts without hesitation and without even waiting for legislative sanction. The same may be said of his attitude on wire-tapping, an illegal practice employed by his department and condoned by Mr. Biddle when he felt that the national interest was involved. And presumably he acquiesced in the President's decision to free Earl Browder not only as an act of justice but as a contribution to national unity.

So there were both arguments and precedents the Attorney General could have used to persuade himself that a decision against Bridges would be inopportune. Why, then, did he make such a decision? Ruling out all dishonorable motives, one is driven to the unhappy conclusion that Francis Biddle is not as sharply aware as a war-time Attorney General should be of the social and political effects of administrative acts. His ruling is obviously the work of a man who had conscientiously sifted the conflicting findings of the various inquiries and arrived at an opinion that seemed to him inescapable. One can differ with him; one can put less credence than he chose to put in the testimony of admittedly partial witnesses like Harry Lundeberg; one can question his choice of authorities in deciding the moot question of Communist doctrine. But the final rightness of Mr. Biddle's judgment is not, in my opinion, the most important aspect of his decision. What is important is the blind spot that prevented him from foreseeing its effects.

Undoubtedly the Attorney General knew the ruling carried political implications. He pointed out, even as he released it, that it could be appealed to the highest court and that it must be looked upon as a test case. His mind, if I may pretend to analyze so complex an instrument, probably sought to protect itself against a full recognition of the explosive consequences of the decision by dwelling upon the legal safeguards that still protect Bridges, upon the time that must intervene before his deportation, and upon the value of a Supreme Court decision on the Communist attitude toward the use of force. But these quite legitimate peace-time considerations only dramatize the Attorney General's failure as a political realist.

The ruling against Bridges fell like a shower of bombs along the West Coast waterfront. It has been received with astonishment even by employers who have fought Bridges in the past but who today acknowledge his masterful handling of labor on the docks. Organized labor has reacted to the order with a bitterness amounting to open hostility. Division and turmoil have been created at a time when unity and order are essential. The pretense that Bridges can go on with his work while his case moves slowly from court to court is ridiculous. No labor leader can serve as an effective aid to a government which has ordered his deportation as a dangerous alien. The anomaly of his position must either weaken his influence with his followers or lessen their respect for the government. The second alternative seems far more likely.

Whether or not Bridges is a Communist, whether or not Communists favor the violent overthrow of the government, are questions that can be settled at leisure when the war is over. To force their decision today without reckoning the cost in wasted ability and disaffection is reckless and irresponsible. Integrity is perhaps the first virtue in a public official, but even integrity is no substitute for good political sense—especially in time of war.

What to Do About Rubber

Washington, May 28

SEVERAL principles must be recognized and applied if we are to get maximum results from our synthetic-rubber program.

1. Cost must be measured in terms of time and materials, not money. In terms of money, it may be more costly to make Buna rubber from grain alcohol than from petroleum. In terms of time and materials, the former is the cheaper method. We are promised butadiene for Buna rubber from petroleum in eighteen months, but the other day I managed to get a glimpse of one of the RFC contracts and I found that they allow the companies twenty-seven months. Evidence before the Gillette committee indicated that synthetic rubber can be made from grain alcohol in less than twelve months. The petroleum process requires new cracking facilities to obtain butane and new plants to turn the butane into butadiene. The alcohol process is a "one-step" process which obtains butadiene directly from the alcohol with a minimum of new equipment.

2. It took a long time to learn to handle natural rubber. The big problem today is to learn to handle synthetic rubber. We know comparatively little about the processing of any synthetic rubber. Therefore, in working out a synthetic-rubber program it is foolish to put all our eggs in one basket, as the RFC is doing. Of the 800,000 tons scheduled, 700,000 tons are to be Buna-S. The remaining 100,000 tons are to be divided into 60,000 tons of Standard Oil's closely guarded butyl rubber and 40,000 tons of du Pont's as closely guarded neoprene. Of the 700,000 tons of Buna-S, only 80,000 tons will be made from alcohol; the rest is to come from petroleum. The program ought to be revised and redivided in a way that would allow for more production from grain alcohol and for more butyl and less Buna-S. It is high time, too, that some committee questioned the du Ponts about their neoprene. The patent for it has not been put into the rubber patent pool, and although it is supposed to be a specialty rubber only, someone who worked for the du Ponts tells me that neoprene has been made into tires at Wilmington and that the tests showed extraordinary wearing qualities. The gossip around the plant was that neoprene tires would outlast any car.

3. The making of synthetic rubber and its fabrication into tires or other products involve two distinct sets of problems. One requires men skilled in chemistry; the other men experienced in manufacturing rubber products. The wider the participation in the synthetic-rubber program, the more trained men and managements taking part, the greater the chances of those "lucky accidents" to which so many technical improvements are due.

A vivid example of what I mean was provided by the little-noticed testimony given before the Senate Patents Committee by Robert M. Hunter, special assistant to the Attorney General in the Standard Oil–I. G. Farben case. I. G. Farben had had trouble with the fabrication of Buna. In 1932 du Pont announced its synthetic rubber, duprene, later called neoprene. I. G. Farben tried to obtain the German rights to duprene. The negotiations dragged on for two years. In 1934 the Nazi government, intent on speeding the development of synthetic rubber, appointed a Reich Rubber Commissar with full powers. He seems to have ordered I. G. to furnish every rubber firm in the Reich with samples of its synthetic rubber for experimental purposes. The results are indicated by a letter Hunter read before the Patents Committee. This letter, dated November 12, 1934, was from I. G. to its New York representative.

> The situation in the synthetic-rubber field [it said] has changed considerably as a result of progress made in the last few weeks. . . . All German firms have been supplied with samples of our synthetic rubber for experimental purposes. This was done at the request of the Reich Rubber Commissar. After an astonishingly short time a small firm succeeded in getting favorable results so far as the use of synthetic rubber for the manufacture of tires is concerned. . . . It is possible that we are no longer directly interested in reaching an agreement with du Pont in the synthetic-rubber field.

The German government is "totalitarian," but the result of its policy was to set loose a maximum of private enterprise and initiative on the problem of fabricating synthetic rubber. Our government believes in free enterprise, but the influence wielded in it by Standard Oil creates conditions in which enterprise is stifled. Compare the way Buna was developed in the Reich with Hunter's testimony on Standard's curious unwillingness to develop butyl:

Butyl was discovered in the latter part of 1937 by research employees of the Standard Oil Development Company, a wholly owned subsidiary of Standard of New Jersey. The policy applied by the Reich Rubber Commissar was suggested time after time by subordinate officials. Hunter read into the record no fewer than six different letters or memoranda in which Standard officials asked permission to collaborate with tire manufacturers and with manufacturers of wire and cable insulation in order to hasten the development and use of butyl. Although Standard had dutifully reported its butyl findings to its Nazi cartel partner from the beginning, permission for its development in this country was long denied.

In November, 1939, two months after the war began, F. A. Howard, president of Standard Development, was upheld by the executive committee of Standard Oil in his belief that "the sounder policy" was to "confine the development [of butyl] to our own organization." In their own organization development work was lackadaisical. Hunter testified that "as recently as May, 1941," Standard had "no more than three technical employees working on this valuable development." Not until June, 1940, did Standard supply samples of butyl to any American tire company, and then it chose those two companies of the Big Four with the least experience in the synthetic field and the least interest in developing synthetic rubber. Goodrich and Goodyear had both been working with synthetic rubber, and one of Standard's subordinate officials had suggested Goodyear as a "partner" in the development of butyl. Instead, Standard picked Firestone and United States Rubber. These two had the largest investments in natural rubber plantations. United States Rubber had another adverse interest in that it is controlled by the du Ponts. The du Ponts, according to Hunter's testimony, not only have neoprene but are developing another synthetic rubber "which would be in competition with butyl and Buna for tire and tube uses."

As though to make certain that poor results would be obtained, Standard provided Firestone and United States Rubber with but meager amounts of butyl. "Part of this," according to Hunter, "was second-grade material." The results were surprising. In October, 1940, Firestone predicted a possible market for butyl outside the tire field equivalent to 104,000 long tons of natural rubber per year. In November, 1940, after trying butyl for tires, one United States Rubber executive thought it might replace natural rubber. Though encouraging, this was not encouraged. "From November, 1940, until within the last few weeks," Hunter testified, "not another tire had been made of butyl rubber by the United States Rubber Company." Firestone tried butyl for inner tubes and in January, 1941, found it "greatly superior to natural rubber tubes, particularly with regard to holding air." As a reward, Firestone seems to have got no more butyl.

A much better record than that of either of these two big companies was made by the Acushnet Process Company of New Bedford, Massachusetts, a small rubber-products concern. Early in 1939 the Army-Navy Munitions Board obtained some samples of butyl from Standard Oil. The Chemical Warfare Service picked Acushnet to test the use of butyl in gas masks. Acushnet found it superior to natural rubber for gas masks and "became enthusiastic about its other possibilities." Acushnet's reports show an ingenuity, persistence, and imagination superior to the big companies', but little came of its work.

4. This brings us to another important point. To obtain maximum results, there must be the freest exchange of information among all companies working on synthetic-rubber problems. "One of the difficulties in connection with the whole testing program," Hunter testified, "has been the unwillingness of Standard to pass on to one of the companies ideas or techniques acquired from another." He gave several examples. United States Rubber is still struggling with the problem of making a butyl inner tube a year and a half after Firestone succeeded in making one superior to the natural-rubber product. Standard has known for more than a year that Acushnet had quickly and successfully solved the problems of butyl's rapid vulcanization and adherence to metal. "There is no evidence," Hunter says, "that this knowledge was ever passed on to the two rubber companies." This is equally true of Firestone's recent—and very important—discovery of a method for making a butyl tread adhere to a natural rubber carcass.

5. What we need is not merely a central rubber authority with full power to develop the synthetic product, as suggested by the Truman committee, but one free from the influence of Standard Oil and its allies. None of these basic conditions for a successful synthetic-rubber program can be achieved so long as the oil-chemical-rubber-alcohol combine dominates the RFC, the WPB, and the Petroleum Coordinator's Office. Do we need a fresh approach to the problem of cost? Standard Oil emphasizes the fact that Buna from alcohol costs more than Buna from petroleum, but by stifling the development of butyl, which costs one-third as much as buna, it shows a total disregard for economy. Do we want wide participation in the program and free interchange of information? These would destroy the Standard Oil monopoly.

There are two keys to a successful synthetic-rubber program. The first is the butylene-glycol process for developing butadiene for Buna rubber directly from the fermenting grain without making alcohol at all. This is a Department of Agriculture discovery of which we are just beginning to hear. It would put farm surpluses into the synthetic-rubber program and make monopoly impossible. The other is butyl, which can be made easily and directly from a common petroleum by-product, isobutylene. There are ample supplies of isobutylene available, and no special facilities are needed to obtain it. But neither of these keys can be used until we have a truly independent National Rubber Authority, with power to seize patents and commandeer laboratories. What is needed is the will to put America's safety first.

Citizens Behind Barbed Wire

BY CHARLES IGLEHART

A RECENT visit to the West Coast gave me an opportunity to see at first hand how the present removal of the Japanese from the defense areas is working out.

The evacuation policy was a strange compound of war necessity and mass hysteria. Behind it lay thirty-five years of determined effort by certain West Coast groups to eliminate Japanese from any share in American life. Persisting economic competition, racial antipathy, and venal politics played their part in it. In addition, the Japanese immigrants have been slow in adopting American ways. And since Japan launched its expansionist program, the older settlers have reacted to the heightened nationalism of their homeland by emphasizing their un-American habits, bowing toward Tokyo and celebrating Oriental festivals as they never used to do. Moreover, the Japanese-language schools are using textbooks recently brought from Japan which exalt the new ambitions rampant there. These developments have been in general quite innocent, but they have not tended to allay the suspicions of Caucasian neighbors.

In the first two days after Pearl Harbor the Department of Justice drew its net around two thousand Japanese aliens; later it rounded up two thousand more; and all these are now in detention. I talked with some of them in their camps and found them living in very decent conditions and uncomplaining. I understand that only one or two in a hundred were suspected of actual complicity in any subversive activities; most of them had merely subscribed to some fund or belonged to some organization that was open to question. This group is not our present concern.

Before the publication of the Roberts report on Pearl Harbor on January 25 no apprehension was expressed concerning those Japanese residents and their American children who had been left undisturbed. But the report ushered in a period of feverish excitement, stimulated by press and radio, which reached a climax when the West Coast Congressional delegation petitioned the President to empower the army authorities to handle the entire situation and to deal summarily with "aliens and subversive persons." This action has since been defended on the ground that the Japanese themselves were in danger. I talked with a good many people of all sorts and found no evidence of any serious danger. Nor could I discover a single case of subversive activity, although the air was filled with unsubstantiated rumors. A minority group always has a grapevine which carries news with uncanny speed and accuracy, but no Japanese whom I met had heard of more than three instances of violence resulting in death, and all of these were said to have been the work of Filipinos.

I cannot escape the conclusion that even as a war measure evacuation was unnecessary. The slumbering embers of public antagonism to this alien group were, it appears, deliberately fanned by interested persons and organizations until a conflagration was threatened, but at any time it could have been quenched if the authorities had shown the proper firmness.

On March 2, under the President's executive order of February 19, General DeWitt took over, and the West Coast was zoned for the control of aliens. In Mesa, Arizona, I saw how this measure affected the lives of Japanese residents. Most of them lived on farms in Zone B, which was a restricted area. The boundary of Zone A, the prohibited area, ran through the city, and the market and schools were on the other side. Thus the Japanese were unable to sell their produce or to send their children to school. One man told me that he had sent 800 pounds of peas to the market by a Mexican truckman, but that somewhere along the way the whole load had been mysteriously lost. Soon persons representing themselves as government agents were moving about among the Japanese farmers advising them to dispose of their holdings. Often these men were themselves large farm owners who would benefit by the dumping of Japanese property.

Actual evacuation began on April 1. It was then found that the order was not to apply to German or Italian aliens, at least for the present, but only to Japanese. What is certain to cause the greatest difficulty in the future, however, is the fact that it made no distinction between the alien Japanese and their sons and daughters, who are native Americans. In everything except physical appearance, these young people are as far removed from their Japanese ancestors as we of European lineage are. Most of them, to the despair of their parents, know little or nothing about Japan. They have no desire to be anything but Americans. The alien generation are almost all over sixty, while many of the American-born are under twenty-one. In the degree of their Americanization this second generation compares favorably with other foreign groups. The process has already gone far enough to disprove our fears that the Orient and the Occident could never mix. In these young people the mixing has actually taken place without any detriment to the American way of life. Nevertheless, they are being treated exactly as if they were aliens, owing allegiance to Japan. In one California city I found a legal effort being made to remove from civil-service positions every American Japanese who had ever attended classes in the Japanese language.

Community after community showed the effects of the shock of evacuation. Selling-out signs on retail shops told of the forced liquidation of small businesses on a few hours' notice. I heard ugly stories of intimidation and exploitation. One farmer was said to have sold a thousand dollars' worth of equipment for a hundred dollars, thinking he had to. A hardware merchant was so threatened that he sold his business for a song, and then saw a sign on his store announcing "The Japs are going." His business was in a zone not yet evacuated.

In many places the people were living with the sword of Damocles hanging over them. I talked with the old people and found them silent and impassive. This was just another event beyond their control in strange, contradictory America, where life alternates so unpredictably between calm sailing and shipwreck. They do not complain, but it is plain to see that their physical resistance, spiritual resiliency, and economic resources have been shattered. When this crisis is over they will have to be carried by their children.

The young people react differently. They are not afraid, but they are desperately perplexed and puzzled. One said to me: "This thing has taken all the starch out of us. We thought we were Americans; now we don't know what we are, or what on earth to do about it." Other thoughtful young leaders feared that the disillusionment and frustration would destroy all ambition and even self-respect. How could they hope to go on with college, or to qualify for decent living again? However, most of them keep their chins up. An old friend of mine and his bride have gone to camp, and this week she writes: "In spite of all the sacrifices we had to make in selling our home, giving up a good business, and coming here, we still believe that democratic America is the best, and we too are praying for an early end."

Evacuation is now almost completed: 110,000 people—40,000 aliens and 70,000 of their American sons and daughters—are moving into "assembly centers." Evacuation, of course, was to be followed by resettlement in other less exposed areas; apparently the authorities hoped that this might be accomplished with reasonable ease. But the opposition in the receiving areas is so stubborn that it has become necessary to multiply and expand the temporary filter-stations into something like semi-permanent camps. Near most of the larger towns and cities there is a race course or fair grounds, and many of these have been taken over, inclosed in barbed wire, and provided with hastily built barracks for the evacués—rows and rows of sheds made of thin pine boards, the sides and roof covered with tar paper.*

The congestion in the assembly centers is caused by the unwillingness of other communities to accept the evacués. The Tolan Congressional committee for the study of migrant populations made a canvass of the sentiment in all states west of the Mississippi. It met with a unanimous refusal, expressed by the respective governors in their replies to the committee's questionnaire, to permit civilian relocation of these unfortunate people. Only one state made a distinction between the older aliens and the second-generation Americans; the others classed all of them together as aliens, undesirables, and subversive agents. The most that any of the states would agree to was to set aside one unoccupied area, to which the federal government might bring five or ten thousand evacués, putting them behind guards and supporting them for the duration, on the distinct understanding that they should be removed again at the end of the war. In a talk with the governor of one of the Middle Western states I got an epitome of the general sentiment. He said: "The people of California needn't think they can push their problem off on to us. We aren't going to mop up for them. If the federal government wants to bring any of these people into a camp in our state it can, but it will have to take them out the day this thing is over."

Because of the prevailing attitude the better areas are being denied the federal authorities, and it is likely that only small sites will be set aside for new concentration camps differing very little from the present subhuman assembly centers. Indeed, reports from persons who live in the vicinity of one or two of these contemplated resettlement centers indicate that they are being built on exactly the same lines as the temporary camps, with the same flimsy shacks, the same barbed-wire barriers, and in general the same prison-like setup.

The need for labor to get in the food crops may operate to modify to some degree the bleakness of this picture. We hear of "furloughs" to be granted the men of some camps to permit them to go out to work. But friends of the evacués express the fear that this will mean the continuation of the temporary assembly centers and that the women and children will be left there indefinitely. It may also mean that the men will be taken under guard to distant places, where their work will be little more than an extension of what is now virtually prison life. Wages will, of course, be paid, and undoubtedly the men will have the option of going out to work or remaining idle in camp. But this will be a far cry from relocation, and it will offer no solution of the problem of future integration in American community life.

One prospect that is now being explored by the War

Burlingame, Calif.

Relocation Authority is the possibility of releasing all college students for transfer to other regions where they can finish their education. There may be two or three thousand of these young men and women. Their fate depends on the guaranteed willingness of other college communities to receive them.

Confronting this baffling situation, all persons of good-will must be asking what can be done. It is too late to do anything about the basic policy of evacuation. That is an accomplished fact. Now we have the assembly-center phase to deal with. As life in the camps shakes down into routine, the worst physical hardships may be expected to moderate. But the crowding, the lack of privacy, the idleness, the forced intermingling of persons of widely divergent social levels and ideals and character will increasingly undermine morale. The authorities intend, they say, to utilize every possible resource of personnel within the camps in developing programs of recreation, health, education, and other types of activity. We can only hope that this will work out according to plan.

Pressure should be brought to bear upon the federal authorities to induce them to discontinue the assembly centers as the way of dealing with the problem. And every effort must be made to obtain separate treatment for aliens and for second-generation Americans. Discrimination against citizens because of their racial lineage cuts straight across the American tradition. It is our duty, difficult as it may be, to find some way of extricating Japanese Americans from the operation of this war measure. In Honolulu they are at liberty, and the authorities have said, "We trusted them and they have proved worthy."

But the great task is the creation of an informed public opinion. If we had had it, evacuation need not have occurred. If it prevailed now, relocation would be possible. Unless we have it after the war, we shall be helpless in the presence of an awakened Asia with whom we must share the world. The logical implication of our present concentration camps is the deportation after the war of all Japanese—aliens and American citizens alike. If we choose that course, dark and heavy times will lie ahead. An intelligent policy of adjustment to our thousand million neighbors across the Pacific demands the fearless application of our American tradition of controlled assimilation. This calls for a repudiation of racial pride and privilege and for improved social practices within the community.

New Caledonia: a French Australia

BY IDA TREAT

FOR most Americans the island of New Caledonia rose for the first time out of the vast Pacific the day United States troops landed on its shores. With that discovery went another: the New Caledonians were our allies. They belonged among the fighting French who at home and abroad have staked their lives on the hope of a Free France in a liberated world. They were already there, lined up for battle, months before some of us in America acknowledged that the battle was ours.

It took courage not to capitulate when France fell. The island was entirely unprotected, and Germany's powerful ally, Japan, had long coveted it. Mineral wealth and strategic importance made it a predestined victim for aggression. But the New Caledonians are fighters. Whatever the cost, they would not endure the fate of Indo-China. To submit to Germany meant submission to Japan. Loyal Frenchmen, they saw but one way to preserve their freedom—resist the Axis to the end.

For the second time in their history New Caledonians realized the full meaning of their isolation. During the first Great War and the years immediately following, their distant island had been forced to fall back on its neighbors for its very existence, hampered as it was by colonial tariffs and unfavorable exchange. The fall of France once again brought home to it that its ultimate destiny lay in the Pacific, closely linked with that of its near neighbor Australia, whose climate, ways of life, and general problems were much the same.

Often during peace times the settlers of New Caledonia had found themselves at odds with the home government. The time-honored French policy of colonial subordination, which placed all effective power in the hands of metropolitan officials, frequently failed to take into account the needs of the colony and hindered its free development. The New Caledonians are a hardy, independent lot, impatient of restraint. The pioneer spirit is strong. Theirs is no tropical island—its population counts a higher percentage of Europeans than any other French colony. It is a "colony of settlement."

Frenchmen in Paris—a good many Frenchmen—used to look down their noses when New Caledonia was mentioned. I found that out when I tried to get information about the island before leaving for the South Pacific. It was so far away—14,000 miles from France, nearly two months by ship. Was it conceivable that any patriotic Frenchman should choose to live so far from home? Not unless he had to, people said, and reminded me that New Caledonia had been a penal settlement for thirty years of its history.

On the ship from Marseilles civil-service and army people on their way to Noumea seemed to feel they must apologize for being sent there. New Caledonia stood, so to speak, at the bottom of the Colonial Administration. Appointments there were generally reserved for beginners, for the headstrong who needed curbing ("five years at the antipodes will cool him off!"), and for unambitious plodders who were contented anywhere. The New Caledonians on shipboard—students and well-to-do folk who had been visiting relatives in France—kept strictly to themselves. That was characteristic, according to administration officials. New Caledonians had developed a curious personality of their own, they said, a "certain unruly independence." They laid it to Anglo-Saxon influence, the proximity of Australia.

Early one June morning we sighted the high rocky coast that prompted Cook to give New Caledonia its name. Bare headlands, topped here and there with "column" pines—tall, incredibly thin, like clustered masts. Noumea from the harbor was no beauty spot—a huddle of iron roofs against burnt, peeled hills, and the stacks of Caledonia-Nickel smoking at the left. Beside us lay the bare low island of Nou, with the stone walls and buildings of the former bagne, the penal settlement. We had time to look at it all as we waited in the harbor flying the red explosives flag—we were carrying dynamite for the mines and munitions for French troops in the South Pacific. We also carried several hundred Tonkinese contract workers for the mines and metal plants—neat little folk who were taken ashore in a string of empty coal barges black with dust, a foretaste of what awaited them on shore.

Lined against the rail, the officials of the administration looked depressed. The faces of the New Caledonians were bright with homecoming. "Don't look at Noumea," one of them counseled. "Wait till you see the interior. You'll feel at home there. It is like your own Far West."

Topographically, New Caledonia's 8,000 square miles are distributed over three levels. Leaving Noumea and the coast, the main road climbs to a hilly plateau—wide stretches of open country overgrown with bush and coarse grass and dotted everywhere with gray-green niaouli trees. This is grazing land, unbroken miles of it, with only now and then a frame house standing lonely beside a fenced-in garden. Where a river winds through a shallow valley you find scattered farms, an occasional coffee plantation, or, more rarely, the clustered houses of a village. Above, the slopes of the central chain are black with forest. Here grow the precious hardwoods—ebony, sandalwood and ironwood, rosewood and kauri, little exploited. "It costs more than it's worth to get it out," the New Caledonians say. The island lacks roads.

New Caledonia's chief wealth is mineral. The island is "a solid block of metal," colonials tell you proudly—nickel, chrome, iron, lead, zinc, and manganese. Of these, nickel comes first, New Caledonia's output being second only to Canada's. A single company, Caledonia-Nickel, controls the richest mines.

In recent years both Japan and Germany have shown a marked interest in New Caledonia's metal production. Until 1935 no nickel ore was shipped abroad, only "pig" nickel from the Caledonia-Nickel plant. Then a new mining company with all-Japanese capital quietly bought up several mines that had been neglected because of the poor quality of their ore and began shipping nickel ore. (Both Nippon-Soda and Krupp have developed processes for the profitable extraction of nickel from low-grade ore.) By 1938 annual shipments reached 33,000 metric tons, all of which was taken by Germany and Japan. In 1938 Japanese capital founded a company to mine New Caledonia's iron. Experts say there are some twenty million tons of ore in the island. The company began its ore shipments in 1939 and planned to reach a yearly figure of 500,000 tons.

As in all colonial countries, cheap labor helped attract foreign investors. The labor, however, had to be imported—Javanese from the Dutch East Indies and Tonkinese from French Indo-China, brought in by boatloads on three-to-five-year contracts.

The Japanese-owned nickel and iron companies tried repeatedly to obtain the right to import Japanese labor. Popular feeling was dead against it. Like the Australians, the French colonials of New Caledonia have always been uneasy about Japan. Many viewed the sale of mining property to Japanese interests as an unqualified mistake. They insisted that the fishermen and market gardeners—and opium-dealers—who made up the local Japanese colony were all there for a double purpose. Over and over again I heard the story of a boatload of Japanese "troca fishers" who had come to grief during a recent cyclone. The entire crew, it turned out, was made up of Japanese naval officers.

When France annexed New Caledonia in 1853, 50,000 native Kanakas (some writers maintain 100,000) lived on the island. These were Melanesians, black-skinned, heavy-featured, and stocky-bodied. In their treatment of the natives the first French settlers chose a policy as ruthless as our own with respect to the American Indian. They deprived the Kanakas of their lands and herded them on reservations in the interior, where they were virtual prisoners. Today 28,000 Kanakas live on the island reservations.

The Kanaka is a stubborn, intrepid fighter and resisted the white invader for years. And from the first he resisted work. Neither force nor persuasion could break down that wall of stubbornness. His needs were few; he acquired no artificial needs. Why should he work for the white man? Why should he work at all?

Only one Frenchman, to my knowledge, ever succeeded in setting large numbers of Kanakas to work. He was a gendarme sent out from France as Head Commissioner for the natives. He knew nothing whatever about Kanakas, he said, or about any natives. He discovered the Kanakas and liked them. Then he had his idea. Since the native refused to work for the white man, might he not be willing to work for himself? The gendarme told the Kanakas that if they wanted to keep their land they must plant it. He suggested they plant coffee and promised them a market. To the surprise of everyone except the gendarme, the Kanakas did plant coffee, hundreds of acres. They were working for themselves.

In five years' time the gendarme's term of office expired. He was about to return to France when I saw him, highly pleased at the results obtained but fearful that his successor might lack courage to carry on the work. It had met with strong opposition from one colonial faction, which accused the Commissioner of encouraging "unfair competition."

In the early ground-breaking days of the colony the settlers made use of convict labor. The bagnards, however, proved to be as unsatisfactory as the Kanakas. They worked half-heartedly and were expensive. The state, if not the convicts, required pay for their services. They had to be fed. White men, even bagnards, need more food than black men. But Kanakas or bagnards it had to be. There was no other choice for the old-style planters, who went at things in a big way—acres of coffee, herds of cattle and horses, with perhaps a little copra on the side or a few gallons of niaouli oil just for pin money.

In 1893 the bagne was discontinued. During the thirty years of its existence 20,000 deported criminals—and nearly 4,000 political prisoners, after the Commune—came out from France. Some died, others returned home after having served their time, only a few hundred stayed on to start life anew. In the old buildings of the bagne only the "lifers" remained, and men too old and broken to go back. I saw them there—white-haired and pitiful.

New Caledonia's brief heyday of prosperity was linked with the development of the metal industry. After the Great War Javanese and Tonkinese were brought in by thousands to work in the mines and metal plants. Imported labor came high, not because of wages, which were shaved to a minimum, but because of transportation charges. However, New Caledonian metal interests were making money and could afford it.

Though the metal industry boomed, the colony as a whole remained backward. Before 1929 it had built barely one hundred miles of road. Agriculture was in a bad way. Of the old coffee plantations, many were run down and neglected. Fruit orchards and market gardens were practically non-existent. In 1937, with nearly a million acres available for pasture, settlers owned a little over 100,000 horned cattle. Milk, butter, vegetables, and fruit had to be imported from Australia.

Administration officials asserted that the New Caledonians lacked energy and initiative. The settlers blamed the administration. Why raise coffee if no profitable market was assured them? As for meat and wool, how compete with their big neighbor Australia in the world markets? They were building a meat-freezing plant; but what about ships to carry the product overseas? Hold space in ships to France was already taken up with copra from the New Hebrides and Oceania. Farm and grazing lands needed irrigation. Had the administration ever launched a large-scale irrigation program adapted to the needs of the colony? Or any large-scale program—transports, communications, buildings, or even schools?

The depression struck metal interests and up-country settlers alike. Little that the island produced was salable. Imported labor became a liability. Many Tonkinese were shipped back to Indo-China; they could be more easily sent home, contract or no contract, than the Javanese, for the colony had a hard-and-fast agreement with the Netherlands government.

Those years of stagnation widened the rift between Frenchmen at home and Frenchmen of the colony. Each group said the other exacted too much and did too little in return. "France neglects us," the New Caledonians complained. "France's own troubles come first—she cannot do the impossible," the administration retorted. Official reports carried lines like these: "In agriculture as in stock-raising the colonials show tendencies that bode ill for the development of economic activity." There was justification for both attitudes, though my sympathy was with the New Caledonians. There was a breezy something about them that reminded me of Australians or our own Westerners. I liked their "unruly independence."

"The trouble with us is, we began wrong," says a New Caledonian friend. "We started with the old colonial idea: big estates and slave labor—let the convict and the black, brown, or yellow man do the work. What this island needs is small farmers, men not too proud to roll up their sleeves and dig in. And free labor, whatever its color. There would be fewer big fortunes, but we would learn to stand on our feet. We need a working agreement with Australia and New Zealand; they are the ones we must live with, and many of our problems are the same. Our relationship with France, however close, is primarily a sentimental tie. Our economic future is out here."

Will it be autonomy—a "dominion status" within the restored French empire for this French Australia? New Caledonia is now in the battle zone. There may be fighting any day among the niaouli trees. One thing is certain—the island will never again be isolated. The war has brought the Western world to its shores; it has put France's "down under" definitely on the map.

We Must Pay as We Go

BY JOHN CUNNINGHAM SPARKS

WE FACE the urgent problem of paying for the war. Both production and fighting are ultimately more vital, but no amount of glibness can minimize or dissipate the fiscal problem. We face also, apparently, a strange incapacity in our responsible officials to decide how we should pay. What is especially discouraging is the likelihood that our fiscal experts, preoccupied with their ritual of traditional procedures, are overlooking the obvious. And these are the men determining policy. We laymen can pretend to no expertness and are consequently not consulted. But we should like a word now, before it is too late.

We must clear the air with two elementary propositions which should be manifest to expert and layman alike.

First, there is only one time when we can, in any common-sense meaning of the phrase, pay for the war. It is when we fight the war. A corollary is that war costs cannot be shifted to future generations, except in so far as war damage actually continues in the future. Soldiers maimed now must be maintained, and areas devastated now must be rebuilt, in the future. So in the future the nation must pay a part of its current income, or production, for that maintenance and rebuilding until it is completed.

Were we to borrow abroad the materials and services used in fighting, then in so far as the war did not consume our own current production, and in so far as we left the loans to be repaid from future production, we could shift the war cost to the future. But in this war we are, in fact, on the other end of the stick.

Beyond these contingencies, then, we as a nation must pay the war cost now and cannot shift it to the future. For if current national production is worth, say, $100 billion, and if war materials and services constitute half of this, then we are spending $50 billion of production on the war and keeping $50 billion to live on. There is no way around it. We must pay now for the obvious reason that a war can be fought only with what is on hand. It can be fought only with accumulated stocks—past production we did not consume and current production we do not consume but devote instead to fighting. These war-consumed materials and services are the economic cost of the war.

Secondly, the government, the nation, is the sole possible buyer of the war production which constitutes half of our total production, and there are only two basic ways for the government to get title to the buying power, the half of our total income, representing this war production. It can tax the income out of the hands of original receivers, in which case the money changes hands permanently. Or it can borrow the income, in which case there is a promise to repay with interest in the future. We need only note a further alternative. The government could, as was done in the Civil War, simply print sufficient quantities of legal tender and use it to pay for war production.

What are our fiscal officials doing in terms of these propositions? They are simply trying to decide how much of the war cost can and should be met by taxing and how much by borrowing. But implicit in their approach are two fallacies, one born of ambiguity and the other of a historical illusion.

The ambiguity arises from assuming that we cannot possibly pay the full war cost "as we go," and from confusing what is possible for the individual with what is possible for the nation. For while the nation cannot avoid paying "as we go," and cannot shift the war cost to the future, an individual can in fact do both if the government finances the war by borrowing.

To illustrate, if Mr. Smith, with a $10,000 income, could choose between paying $5,000 in war taxes and lending $5,000 by buying bonds, he would lend. Of course, in ten years the government must levy $6,666 ($5,000 plus interest) in extra taxes to retire these bonds. But while a minority of citizens will, like Mr. Smith, own the bonds being retired, the whole nation must pay the necessary taxes. So even if Mr. Smith's post-war tax burden is, say, $1,666 greater because of the extra bond-retirement levies than it would otherwise have been, he will still get back his full $5,000.

In retiring war bonds the people will pay the Treasury a sum in extra taxes and get the same sum back in exchange for their bonds. Those with no bonds will pay the extra taxes and get nothing back. They, as individuals, will still be paying for the war. Financing the war by borrowing is, then, a way for bond-buyers to shift much of the war cost to future taxpayers.

The offending historical illusion is that in war finance the Treasury should take in all it can in taxes, meeting as much of the war cost as possible "as we go," but that this is never enough, and therefore the deficit must be met by selling bonds. This is patently nonsense.

How could there be any question, as the historical illusion implies, of there not being enough current income to be taxed? The income receivers have it because they cannot avoid having a total income equal in value to the total national production. The only possible question is whether the Treasury is to obtain its half of the total income by taxing or by borrowing. It is an either-or proposition. In other words, if individuals have the surplus income to buy war bonds, they must have the same surplus income to pay war taxes.

One qualification accompanies the proposal that the Treasury finance the war solely through taxation of current income. The post-war shift from war-time to peacetime production will require extensive individual adjustments. With this in mind, war bonds and stamps have been promoted as a backlog of savings for post-war contingencies. The problem is a very real one. By taking its cue from the Federal Deposit Insurance Corporation, the Treasury could permit everyone to buy war bonds up to a maximum of, say, $5,000. This would be for personal post-war security. Corporations as well as individuals must survive the reorganization period, and they should similarly be permitted to buy war bonds up to a limit calculated individually or by size-group. But all surplus current income beyond the backlogs should be taken in taxes.

How would these war income taxes be calculated? The Treasury and other government agencies have all the data required. They can calculate what the individual in each income group requires to buy his equitable share of what is available. To illustrate, assume that a family normally spends a $2,400 income as follows:

Food	$480	Automobile	$120
Rent	480	Other travel	60
Clothing	240	Tobacco	60
Household operation	180	Reading	60
Furnishings	120	Taxes, gifts	120
Medical care	120	Savings	240
		Miscellaneous	120

A glance tells the story. Many of these items will be unobtainable for the duration of the war. The income they normally absorb when they are produced must now be used by the government to pay for war materials and services which are being produced instead. If the income receiver has buying power left after paying for his equitable share of what is available, the surplus belongs to the government, to the nation. There is no reason why the nation should have to promise future repayment in order to get the money.

There are manifest differences in the budgetary requirements of individuals in different income groups. The big-income man has fixed obligations in interest or insurance-premium payments, for example, which the small-income man does not have in like degree. Allowances must be made for all variable factors. But when all of the calculating is finished, the government will be taking in taxes the total national income above the value of non-war goods and services available on the market—still allowing, of course, for the backlog bond purchases in lieu of taxation.

There would be no trouble with the statistical task, which is complicated but quite feasible. The Treasury can calculate the tax schedules with great precision. And what it would end up with for the 1942-43 fiscal year, in order to meet war-plus-normal expenditures of $59 billion, would be not $26 billion in taxes but something more nearly approaching the $59 billion, and a bond plan not for $33 billion but for nothing beyond the aggregate of backlogs.

Meanwhile the Treasury continues to think in terms of classical but irrelevant taxation concepts. It acts in terms of the "law of diminishing total revenue"—the rule that people react to an increase in excise rates by buying fewer of the articles taxed. But a proper war income tax does not depend on anybody's buying anything. It depends solely upon a nation of individuals receiving the national income, which can scarcely be avoided.

Some will claim that war-bond buyers voluntarily deny themselves the equivalent in purchases, that after the war they simply get back what they denied themselves during the war, and that bond interest is the reward for abstinence. And contrarily, those not buying bonds use their surplus for personal benefit. This argument suggests that war-bond buyers, instead of plotting to shift the burden of war costs, sacrifice the most, and that nonbuyers are the ones evading the burden.

Our concern is not personal motives but total national effects. But the answer is that you cannot abstain from something you cannot get. To illustrate, if normally one consumed annually 104 pounds of sugar costing $5.20, and if now one cannot legally or honorably consume more than 26 pounds costing $1.82, it is nonsense to claim voluntary abstention from spending $3.38 on sugar. There are only four real alternatives for using the surplus $3.38. If one were not forced (a) to pay it in taxes, and if one were not permitted (b) to buy war bonds with it, there would remain only two uses one could possibly abstain from: (c) saving it in cash, or (d) using it to bid up the prices of available goods and services. In short, as actual consumer buying power this surplus income is a fiction. For the only goods on the market representing the surplus income are war goods which only the government buys.

What is the over-all result when the surplus income is used to compete for available goods? Again assume $100 billion of production, half war goods and half consumers' goods. Assume a government tax revenue of $25 billion and that individuals buy no bonds. Then $75 billion of current consumer income will compete for the $50 billion of current consumers' goods on the market. Consumers will pretend that $50 billion of goods are really worth $75 billion and pay out their income accordingly. Obviously the aggregate of consumers get the same amount of goods. But beyond this absurdity, the prices of war production will undoubtedly rise sympathetically; so that the government will need not $50 billion but considerably more. In order to get what it needs beyond tax revenues, the government must force the creation of bank credit and sell bonds to banks. The over-all result is that during the war the aggregate of consumers get no more goods than if they had left prices alone and paid their surplus income as taxes. And after the war the government, hence the taxpayers, must repay the borrowed billions plus interest to the banks.

And what happens when surplus current income is used for neither taxes, nor bonds, nor price inflation, but is simply retained as cash deposits? Clearly the government, with a tax revenue meeting only half its needs, must borrow from the banks. Prices need not rise. But after the war the taxpayers must repay the banks, while the surplus income owners will have title to cash deposits. This would mean that after the war these depositors would have buying power, cash balances in the banks, representing no production on the market whatever. In three or four years of our stupendous war expenditure the aggregate accumulation could easily be $75 to $150 billion. That it could serve as a stimulus to post-war production is no justification for such an accumulation, which is technically possible only at the cost of burdening post-war taxpayers with debts to the same amount plus interest. It is unthinkable that any group should be permitted to build up such a post-war cash reserve out of our national expenditure for survival.

The war gives the maxim of "taxation according to ability to pay" its ultimate meaning. Progressively the nation requires every scrap of production, hence every cent of income, that everyone can spare beyond the requirements of maintenance. All he can spare. If he can spare it in war bonds he can spare it in war taxes.

Consider the ten million men soon to be in our fighting forces. Can they quibble about what they can spare? People feeling half guilty and half pleased about how well they are doing out of the war, resent this comparison. But they must face it. The obligation of sacrifice is not the exclusive prerogative of young men in good health. Fighting men cannot continue their occupational training, or improve their positions, or save money to invest in post-war security, as civilians are doing. They spare everything a man can give, including their lives, and to make this exaction the government does not have to promise to repay everything after the war at 2.9 per cent cumulative interest. The fighting man, in return for maintenance, contributes the whole of his current life to fighting the war for all of us. Surely, in all equity, the civilian can do no less. He can give the whole of his current income beyond what is required for maintenance.

All the Administration need do is work out a realistic "pay as we go by taxation" proposal, and explain all of the "reasons why" to the public at large. Surely there are enough millions of little people, patriotic little people, who are eager and impatient to sacrifice and who have had more than enough of special privilege, to force even a reluctant Congress to do its duty.

Why Tires Must Be Conserved

FROM the clamor of authoritative statements on the rubber situation only one point of general agreement emerges—the certainty that ordinary civilian motorists will have to go without new tires for the duration. This, by itself, should greatly stimulate economy in their use but not to the extent necessary to keep the essential minimum number of cars moving for the next two or three years.

The chart on the next page illustrates our dependence on private automobiles for normal mobility, though it does not tell the whole story. For the statistics on which it is based refer only to inter-city travel, excluding commutation and other local traffic, which, it is estimated, accounts for at least an equal volume of passenger-car mileage. One thing is immediately clear from the chart: we cannot, as a nation, expect to accomplish our normal amount of gadding about by falling back on mass-transportation methods. Air travel is already being drastically reduced by the army's need for transport planes. Railroads and long-distance buses are being hard pressed to take care of both military and civilian passenger traffic, and priorities for railroad seats are becoming a near probability. Even if we assume that 50 per cent of the inter-city automobile journeys are for pleasure only and can be cut out entirely, we are still left with a volume of more or less essential traffic too great to be handled by the buses and railroads.

Similarly, at least 50 per cent of the annual short-distance passenger-car mileage is both essential to the maintenance of economic life and of a character which makes its diversion to mass-transportation systems almost impossible. In a pamphlet just published by the Brookings Institution, Charles L. Dearing shows that less than 10 per cent of all passenger cars in 1936, when a survey was made by the United States Public Roads Administration, were used exclusively or almost exclusively for recreational or social purposes, while approximately 82 per cent accounted for more than 30 per cent of their total mileage by business activities. He points out that about 57,000,000 people living in rural areas are preponderantly dependent on some 10,000,000 cars for their normal mobility. Another 13,000,000 living in urban centers without means of mass transportation are primarily dependent on 3,000,000 cars for local mobility. This means that more than half the total population would have their lives seriously disorganized if they were entirely deprived of private automobiles, although most of them could no doubt manage on a considerably smaller annual mileage.

Even in metropolitan districts with highly organized bus and street-car services, the tendency of the population to spill over into the suburbs has made the automobile an essential means of transport for many workers. And the situation has been complicated by the location of great defense plants outside the cities. In the sprawling Los Angeles district, for instance, 70 per cent of the workers drive to their jobs. No possible expansion of mass transport can serve as a substitute for their cars. Yet within a year a large proportion will be immobilized by lack of tires.

Facts like these highlight the necessity of conserving enough rubber in our greatest stockpile—the tires now in service—to keep rolling the essential minimum of cars, estimated by Mr. Dearing at around 20,000,000. But if normal driving habits continue, the visible supply of tires will not, he declares, maintain adequate automobile transportation much beyond the first quarter of 1943, and by the end of that year we shall have only 10,000,000 usable cars.

It is difficult to find fault with his conclusion that in order to avoid wholesale requisitioning of tires we must submit to enforced conservation by drastic restriction of non-essential motoring. The only feasible method appears to be nation-wide gas rationing. But the problem of how to get the tires thus saved upon the wheels of the particular cars which must be kept moving will still have to be met.

AS PART of its campaign against all liberal movements, Colonel McCormick's Chicago Tribune has been forced to attack several of its former employees. On May 25 the paper carried a three-column article apologizing to its readers because William L. Shirer, Edmond Taylor, George Seldes, and Jay Allen had once served as foreign correspondents for the Tribune.

SOME OFFICIALS of the California branch of the Office of Civilian Defense wrote headquarters in Washington asking for a high priority rating on materials needed for a gas-decontamination school. They received a reply from Maury Maverick saying that the materials were unavailable, but that he would promise quick delivery when the war ended.

SPEAKING BEFORE the Atlanta Federation of Women's Clubs, W. T. Anderson, a local editor and raw-food addict said, "If I were Governor of Georgia, I'd burst up every cook stove and send the scrap to war. The cook stove is the curse of our day. In six months' time we'd all be strong enough to beat the Germans and the Japs put together."

A RADIO ANNOUNCER on a foreign-language radio station in New York was recently fired on suspicion of being an enemy agent. On a nightly broadcast of recordings he dedicated each number to the crew of a ship leaving port that evening.

ALTHOUGH he told reporters that he was giving up his political work and seeking a job in the war effort, Earl Browder is back at his desk as general secretary of the Communist Party.

THE CASE of a young man who was drafted despite the fact that he was the father of six children is only the first of many bookkeeping errors in Selective Service administration that will be exploited by the isolationist press.

MANY PROMINENT liberals are campaigning for the appointment of Elmer Davis as co-ordinator of all the government information services if they are reorganized. According to Washington observers, the reason that the various agencies have not yet been merged is that the army and navy are reluctant to subordinate their news and information services to any civilian-controlled agency.

Notes by the Way

I WAS inducted into the Church of Jesus Christ of Latter Day Saints at the age of eight by being totally immersed in an ice pond—in October. I absorbed the story of the settlement of Utah as one absorbs one's family history. Perhaps for that very reason I have read very few of the books and tracts, pro and con, which make up the literature on the subject. I don't qualify, therefore, as an expert on Mormon history in the usual sense, but I can bear testimony, as the Mormons say, that Nels Anderson's portrayal of their ways and attitudes in "Desert Saints" (University of Chicago Press, $4) is completely authentic. And for me, at least, he has put the curious and impressive Mormon episode in its proper perspective in relation to our frontier history as a whole. Mormonism was, and is, a compound of archaic theology and crude pragmatism; the secret of its success and its survival is to be found in this combination—and in the fortuitous fact that the two elements were so nicely joined in the practical theocrat, Brigham Young, who succeeded the religious fanatic, Joseph Smith, at just the right moment.

Without the empire-building drive of Brigham Young, Smith's queer religious sect might have gone the way of oblivion—along with the many other queer sects that sprang up in America in the first half of the nineteenth century. On the other hand, without the absolute theocratic structure which Smith had built, and which Young continued, the Mormon settlement of Utah would probably have failed. Utah lay on the main trail to California and gold; only the fanatic faith and complete obedience of his followers enabled Young, first, to enforce his choice of territory and, second, to implement to an extraordinary degree his plan for a cooperative society based on cultivation of the land rather than the exploitation of the get-rich-quicker resources of the American frontier. Young chose the basin of the Great Salt Lake because his plan for a self-sufficient theocratic society required isolation. In the end his dream was thwarted. Isolation became impossible, and the Mormons were inevitably drawn into the main current of American development; whereupon the church, for self-preservation, accepted its decline as a theocracy, turned to the "worldly" pursuits, such as mining, which it had previously forbidden to the faithful, and itself became an entrepreneur in the America of industrialism and big business.

Mr. Anderson deals briefly with the founding of the church, but his main story covers the period beginning with the arrival of the pioneers in Utah in 1847 and ending in the late seventies, when the vision of "Deseret" had faded, and Utah's principal objective was to become part of the United States.

Mr. Anderson gives a detailed picture of family and communal life in Deseret and a full account of Zion's struggle with the hostile outside world. Needless to say, he deals at length with the institution of polygamy—which the Mormons finally sacrificed in order to achieve statehood. Mr. Anderson maintains that to Brigham Young, if not to Joseph Smith, polygamy was essentially a political expedient to speed the growth of Zion and implement its desire to become an independent empire. Likewise to the Gentiles it was a political issue, a weapon with which to wrest control of Utah from the church, rather than the moral issue they made it out to be.

Mr. Anderson lived in Utah for a total of eighteen years. He joined the church in 1909, and he still retains a "nominal" affiliation with it. The nature of this affiliation is revealed in the tone of his book—a mixture of friendly skepticism toward Mormon theology and of respect for the vigor, integrity, and ability of the men and women who made the "desert blossom as the rose" by sheer hard work and fanatic faith. He is a trained sociologist and had funds for research. His friendly relations with the Mormons gave him access to many church records and unpublished private journals; and he also had at his disposal the fruits of the research done by the Writers' Project and the Historical Records Survey. His book, therefore, is thoroughly documented—each chapter is followed by copious notes which the general reader may skip but which contain much fascinating detail—and it gives by far the most comprehensive and objective account I have read of the Utah frontier.

It goes without saying that the figure of Brigham Young dominates the book. Mr. Anderson's portrait is the familiar one, but it has a perennial fascination. One is struck anew by Young's gusto, his intelligence, and his humor, which was as broad and crude and indigenous as the Western plains. I liked particularly the story of his encounter with P. T. Barnum's Tom Thumb. The little man told Young that he didn't understand polygamy. "Don't worry," said Young, "when I was your size I didn't understand it either."

Waugh and Peace

PUT OUT MORE FLAGS. By Evelyn Waugh. Little, Brown and Company. $2.50.

AS A satirist of that period in the history of the English upper-middle classes known as the twenties—which in this particular sense includes most of the thirties—Evelyn Waugh is without parallel. That he should produce a book in his customary vein during the war would seem impossible, but in "Put Out More Flags" he has bravely ushered familiar characters from his previous works into the new era, and produced a satire with an undertone of regeneration—an experiment more successful than it sounds. Admirers of "Vile Bodies" and "Decline and Fall" may wish that Mr. Waugh, like Proust when confronted with a similar situation, had ignored current events and pursued the past. However, for Mr. Waugh's purpose the Sitzkrieg period in England proved very similar to the twenties, and he has contrived to make his characters pursue familiar paths, only slightly inconvenienced by the war. There is every reason, in fact, why this book should be as good as any of his previous work, were it not that Mr. Waugh has to some extent outgrown his characters, and instead of now regarding them with sympathy and concealed admiration is inclined to treat them with a certain hauteur.

In a foreword dedicating the book to Major Randolph Churchill Mr. Waugh puts his finger on its weakness. He remarks that "these characters are no longer contemporary in sympathy," an admission that Mr. Waugh has himself lost sympathy with them—an error for the satirist who, in order to be completely successful, must secretly admire while publicly chastising. Mr. Waugh is, of course, a snob—a characteristic which contributes considerably to the more successful portions of the book, for in Basil Seal, the unscrupulous hero-cad with a titled mother, in Angela Lyne, whose income is still very much in the upper brackets despite war-time taxation, and in Barbara Sothill, who can still be mistress of her beautiful country home even though it is overrun with evacués, he has a complete confidence which allows him to treat them with the warmth, only moderately tempered with superiority, conducive to his best type of humor. At such institutions as the War Office and the Ministry of Information he can also poke the most delightful fun, assured that when the real test comes, they, like the British aristocracy, will come through with flying colors.

But unfortunately he is not content to deal with safe and familiar subjects, and attacks with more enthusiasm than subtlety a fading pansy with a witty tongue and an appearance and manner familiar enough to prove that it is a waste of time for Mr. Waugh to describe him, and a bunch of parlor pinks equally common or garden. One of the parlor pinks paints in the manner of Dali, and the remainder practically slop cocoa on the studio divan in the stress of discussing the case of Parsnip and Pimpernell, two English poet collaborators who happen to be in America—good enough for Punch maybe, but not for Mr. Waugh. However, apart from these errors in taste and one or two longueurs there is much of the very best Waugh and a little even better. The activities of the Anti-Religious Department of the Ministry of Information are quite hilarious and alone make the book worth reading.

Jews and Gentiles

JEWS IN A GENTILE WORLD. Edited by Isacque Graeber and Steuart Henderson Britt. The Macmillan Company. $4.

WHEN a group of learned men join together to illumine a vexing problem, the result is usually a threefold one, and this symposium is no exception. Some of the wise men really throw new light upon the problem by their presentation of relevant facts and their interpretation of those facts. Some of the learned men hold the candle light of the obvious to the daylight of common experience. They tell us what almost everybody knows, dressing out common-sense knowledge in scientific jargon. Some of the wise men are not so wise. They talk pretentious nonsense.

In this discussion of the important problem of Jewish-Gentile relations the historians really come off best. They clarify the problem by their historical research. An anthropologist, Professor Carleton Stevens Coon of Harvard, contributes a valuable chapter on the question: Have the Jews a Racial Identity? He believes that a racial identity has been preserved through all the centuries of the Diaspora and offers a wealth of scientific-historical data to support his conclusions. His thesis is challenged by Professor Melville Jacobs, but not very convincingly.

Miriam Beard's chapter entitled Anti-Semitism, Product of Economic Myths, marshals her great learning in the field of economic history to refute the widely held belief that Jews are greedy and unscrupulous in economic life. She guns particularly for Werner Sombart, whose "The Jews and Economic Life" in her opinion "gave as much support to Hitlerism as the works of Gobineau and Lothrop Stoddard." The presupposition of her chapter is, however, mistaken. Economic myths cannot be the primary cause of anti-Semitism, particularly when they are as obviously untrue as she proves them to be. The question is, what predisposes people to create and to believe such myths?

Other valuable historical chapters are The Position of the Jews in the Economic Life of America by Jacob Lestchinsky, The Jewish Role in Western Culture by Professor Joseph W. Cohen, and three imaginative studies of Jews in specific American communities, one on the Jews of "Milltown" by Professor Jessie Bernard, one on the Jews of Buna by Professor Leonard Bloom, and finally a study of the economic structure of the Jewish community of Stamford, Connecticut, by Professor Samuel Koenig. It may be stretching a point to include all these excellent studies in the category of "history." But they all present significant historical data.

At least one reader finds much less value in the efforts of sociological and psychological scientists to interpret the realities. One sociologist, however, Professor Carl Mayer of the New School of Social Research, rises considerably above mere scientific analysis in a profound examination of the Religious and Political Aspects of Anti-Judaism.

Many of the other chapters arrive at rather obvious conclusions after a great expenditure of learning. We learn that "Jews have always stood out as a relatively homogeneous group over and against the Gentiles in all modern civilizations. This means that there has always been latent anti-Semitism, because there is always latent hostility between in-groups and out-groups, even when in certain respects the in-group includes the out-group as the total national group includes the Jewish-national group in a democracy." Precisely so. This is the basic fact about the anti-Semitic problem. If fully understood it would obviate some of the tortuous and specious explanations given for the hostility between the Jews and Gentiles in some of the other chapters, and even in the chapter in which this conclusion is reached. We learn there that anti-Semitism represents a displacement of aggressive and hostile attitudes. But this does not help us very much. For having transferred to the Jews hostility actually meant for the mother-in-law, we are at a loss to find another proper object of "displacement"; and we can't count on "molders of public opinion" having "either the time or the inclination to undergo psychoanalysis." Perhaps, it is suggested, we can try psychoanalysis on the children. These futile suggestions prove that nothing is more fatuous than to deal with group conflicts in purely psychoanalytical terms, hoping and yet not daring to hope that we can make over all individuals to such a degree that there will be no friction between collective entities in human society.

In several instances the scientists seem to reach doubtful conclusions. Some regard the conflict between Jews and Gentiles as primarily racial and see no solution for it but to invite the Jews to commit ethnic suicide. Others think the conflict is primarily cultural and religious. Interpretations of Jewish culture and religion produce some very strange notions, among them the idea that Jewish monotheism is "quite obviously compensatory, when one looks at the history of this maligned and persecuted race." Jewish monotheism is a good deal older than the anti-Semitism of the Diaspora; and psychoanalytical interpretations of culture are very dubious. What was Plato compensating for in his monotheism?

An anonymous author thinks that what passes for racial antipathy is actually a profound conflict between the Jewish and the Christian ethos, and that the difference between them is found in the Christian emphasis upon humility and self-sacrifice and the Jewish indifference to these virtues. Of all the explanations of hostility this is the most improbable. "If one group preaches the beauty of the doctrine of self-sacrifice," declares the anonymous author, "and tries however unsuccessfully to live up to it while another preaches just the reverse, the outcome is to be expected." It is difficult to understand why this kind of libel against Jewish ethics was included in the symposium. REINHOLD NIEBUHR

Thurman Arnold, Trust Buster

DEMOCRACY AND FREE ENTERPRISE. By Thurman Arnold. University of Oklahoma Press. $1.

THE history of the American economy is one of increasing efforts, verging on the superhuman, to prevent the people of this country from obtaining the goods that our great resources and technological skills have made possible. American capitalists, noted for their ingenuity, have outdone themselves in this endeavor to keep production low and prices high, employing patents, financial controls, boycotts, combinations, trademarks—in fact, every imaginable device. The rest of our society has followed suit in desperation. Small business men have formed trade associations; farmers have fought for parity prices by legislation; labor unions have limited membership and resisted new methods and materials. "Thus," says Thurman Arnold, "the four horsemen—fixed prices, low turnover, restricted production, and monopoly control—rode through our economy from factory to farm." The picture Mr. Arnold presents of a nation striving so earnestly to throttle itself is not new, but it is always a shocking one.

Mr. Arnold, as all who read the daily press know, believes that this "disease of cartelization" can be cured by exposure and indictment. He insists furthermore that we should do it now if we are to obtain sufficient production to win the war. And lastly he has a vision of an era of plenty after the war achieved through free and unrestricted enterprise. These ideas and beliefs constitute the core of this little book of fifteen or twenty thousand words, a printing of some lectures recently delivered at the University of Omaha. It is not a sensational book compared to Mr. Arnold's usual standards; it lacks the wit and pungency of the "Folklore of Capitalism," and it is repetitious despite its brevity. Its main value is as a background to the recent revelations of the anti-trust division and as a statement of Mr. Arnold's own economic philosophy.

Mr. Arnold is performing a useful war function. The attitude of the Administration, under pressure from the dollar-a-year cartelists, in begging Mr. Arnold to cease exposing restraints of production in order not to hamper production is paradoxical to say the least. "Hush, please," say the dollar-a-year men, "everything is all right now; let's get back on the job." But a few weeks ago L. Gerald Firth, president of the Firth-Sterling Steel Company, testified that General Electric was still preventing him from selling tungsten-carbide to Canada. The anti-trust division should be permitted to function, as Mr. Arnold says, "as a watchdog, to see that neither new curbs are imposed on independent enterprise nor old ones perpetuated."

Mr. Arnold is essentially a prosecutor and detective rather than a first-rate economist. His thinking is too breezy for sound theory even when his language is heavy, and he has an offhand arrogance toward ideas other than his own that is exasperating. Having so ably exposed the essential inefficiency of a capitalism which has as its goal profits rather than high production and wide distribution, Mr. Arnold offers us for the world of tomorrow only a return via the Sherman Anti-Trust Act to a primitive capitalism. "All we need to do," he says, "is to catch the vision of how surpluses distribute themselves in the absence of restricted control." It is this kind of talk that moved Sidney Hook to use the word "naive" five times in six lines in one of his essays on Thurman Arnold. Mr. Arnold maintains that free competition is more efficient than planned production, but he actually fails to draw any distinction between planning to increase trade and distribution, as in a socialist state, and planning to restrain trade, as in our cartelized capitalism. In damning the latter Mr. Arnold seems to feel sure that he has disposed of the former.

Confronted, then, by the paradox of Mr. Arnold, the reviewer can only resort to James Thurber's kind of mixed metaphor: let us turn our backs on his economic visions but put our shoulders to the wheel behind his present efforts.

The East European Puzzle

PROBLEMS OF THE DANUBE BASIN. By C. A. Macartney. Cambridge University Press. $1.25.

TORNADO ACROSS EASTERN EUROPE. By Josef Hanc. Foreword by Jan Masaryk. The Greystone Press. $3.

THESE two volumes were written by scholars, one a historian, the other a diplomat, and they supplement each other. Mr. Macartney, who next to Wickham Steed and Seton Watson is the outstanding authority on his subject, has chosen the historical approach to the Danubian problem. His succinct yet complete outline of the life and death of the Hapsburg monarchy proves that the dissolution was inevitable. But the 1919 settlement, which "roughly reversed the earlier positions," made "an often brutal clearance of the past." As a result of this development the whole Danubian area succumbed economically to Germany, and in Macartney's view the "pressure from Germany . . . is likely to be permanent."

We hope not. In order to secure the national and economic freedom of the Danubian and Balkan nations against the imperialism of their neighbors the author hints at some new organization but does not suggest a definite solution. It is to be regretted that a serious historian like Macartney should occasionally become the victim of the racial theory. We are told for example that "the Jews are after all a profoundly different people who can never be assimilated," although the author himself admits that in Galicia and northern Hungary "they assimilated rapidly to the majority nationality" and were, indeed, "the chief inspirers of Magyar chauvinism." Nor do facts confirm his opinion that "the almost universal anti-Semitism" is an expression of a post-war "new nationalism." Neither Czecho-Slovak nor Yugoslav nationalism has provoked an anti-Semitic wave.

In dealing not only with the Danubian problem but with all East European issues Mr. Hanc starts from the complex ethnic structure rather than from the historical background. What he offers is, indeed, a perfect textbook of all political entanglements in Eastern Europe. He dissects the past and present of the countries and nations between Germany and Soviet Russia with lucidity and inpartiality and explains how the difference of methods in the quest for stabilization resulted in the dissolution of Anglo-French relations. It was

The first analysis of its kind of any society, primitive or modern, to be done on a comparable scale.

YANKEE CITY SERIES

Edited by W. Lloyd Warner and Paul S. Lunt

More than ten years of intensive field work have produced this comprehensive picture of the American way of life in a modern New England community. This series, to be complete in six volumes, studies the social relations and class characteristics of virtually everyone in Yankee City. It is a subject of immense importance and value at this time when the social and economic position of the average citizen is undergoing revolutionary changes.

THE SOCIAL LIFE OF A MODERN COMMUNITY
Vol. I 460 Pages. Price $4.00

THE STATUS SYSTEM of a MODERN COMMUNITY
Vol. II 246 Pages. Price $3.00

From reviews of the first volume:

"A series of studies by a group of social anthropologists undertaken for the general purpose of getting a better understanding of human behavior. The first volume concentrates on 'social class' . . . and studies the question of how it is affected by such factors as housing, occupation, political office, reading habits, and many others." —Book-of-the-Month Club News

"A magnificent achievement in fact-gathering and compilation, as well as the conception and partial elaboration of the most important contribution to social theory that has appeared in many years . . . It is hard to see how social theory could have proceeded very much farther without this contribution. With it, the possibilities are boundless." —The New Republic

the lag of Allied armament behind rampant Nazism, a lag increased by the economic crisis, which paved the road to disaster. Mr. Hanc's compendious account of the "great maelstrom" shows how the Nazis drew into their orbit the small countries they found in their "living space."

How prevent the process repeating itself after another Allied victory? As an answer to this crucial question Mr. Hanc suggests "a more perfect union" of the East European area, "on the basis of common agreements" but with the support of Allied enforcement. This goal may be desirable, but the author himself is aware of "certain practical difficulties." Unfortunately, most of the nations in this area suffer from the emotional political temper exemplified by Nazism, which has led mankind, in Grillparzer's word, "from humanism through nationalism to bestiality." It may take some time for the nations of Eastern Europe to start on the return trip, for which these two books are useful and readable guidebooks. RUSTEM VAMBERY

How Begot, How Nourished? III

[This is the last in a series of three commentaries.]

POETRY is not served by indiscriminate remarks; and the reviewer who thinks that by commenting on everything in sight he is promoting a renaissance is under a grave delusion. Still, it might be interesting, now and then, to search the obscure and neglected areas: the optimist will hope to find a curious shell in the infinite litter along the sea-marge, or, in some dark unfathomed cave, some gem of purest ray; or the theorist to unearth a significant impulse or vital trend. But the critic who ventures on such ground will find that, without being able to say just where, he has crossed over into territory whose occupants must be dealt with no longer strictly as poets but rather, by virtue of their innocence, as artless, solitary, and apparently rather unhappy human beings. In a more populous quarter of the terrain are to be found those whose impulse to self-expression has led them to become the prey of the vanity publishers. For practical reasons alone, it might be useful to survey, occasionally, the output of even these; for their first defense, when attacked, is to retort that their critics do not read the books which they damn. Of course not; but even so, there is more fact than merit in their argument. Once your grocer gets a reputation for selling rotten eggs, even the hardiest conscience does not require you to eat a half-dozen a day, merely to keep proving your point.

None of the half-dozen books at hand, however, appear to bear the imprint of any of the more notorious vanity houses. In every case but one, I should venture, the author has personally assumed the entire risk of publication (correct me if I am wrong). Most of the half-dozen are sorrowful in tone; in most the writer seems more inclined to place confidence in his prophetic than his aesthetic viability.

"The Mending Year," by Claude T. Barnes, has little in common with the other five. This small book is copyrighted by the author, printed and bound by the Caxton Press at Caldwell, Idaho, and offered for sale by the Deseret Book Company in Salt Lake City for $1.50. This is said to be a "second edition," but I have an idea the phrase refers to a second brand-new series, and not a revision or reissue of the earlier version. The text takes the form of quatrains, one or more for each day in the year, usually descriptive of the changing seasons in the region of the Wasatch: here, for instance, is the entry for February 20:

> Where clinking juncos flock the weeded trail
> And crested jays outcry from barren limbs,
> The flickers drill above the strutting quail,
> And frozen brooklets hum their muffled hymns.

Sometimes, however, the author utters sentiments of a more reflective nature; as appropriate to May 30 he observes

> Below the sward of unregarded graves
> The heroed bones of valiant soldiers lie,
> Yet gratitude from dark oblivion saves
> Their rusted names, no longer doomed to die.

This, as you see, is not at all fashionable, nor is it particularly good; but one interesting point is that it is every bit as good, on its own level, as a great deal of the fashionable stuff that receives popular attention; and it shows a rather better ear than most. Also it is interesting to find such a survival in stream-lined, modern, up-to-date America of the literary mode of Thomas Gray, not merely in the formal metrics but also in sensibility.

M. N. Garnet's "October Bread," priced at 75 cents, is published by "The American Folk Group," but on what street in what city this group has headquarters there seems to be no way of telling. The tone of these works is that of early twentieth or late nineteenth-century verse rather than eighteenth-century poetry; the impulse alternates between the lyrical and the rhetorical. Machines replace nature as a field of observation; the pathetic fallacy is transferred to these. Like most contemporary writers Mr. Garnet is aware of the immanence of evil and fatality—"he knew that the present was sicker than the past/and that it grew sicker every year/and he sensed calamity in the end." In some ways Mr. Garnet's ideas seem even more obsolete than those of Mr. Barnes, by the operation of that law which makes things ten years out of date seem farther off than things a century or so away; how quaint, how dated, statements seem when they blame the evils of the world on the capitalist system! Who ever uses such language nowadays?

John Beecher, a young American of a family whose name is illustrious in the annals of Protestant preaching, hints at a similar diagnosis. His book, "Here I Stand," is issued by Dorothy Norman's Twice-a-Year Press and priced at $1.50. This autobiographical narrative in verse deals with the tragedy of the unavailable man; its direction is not always entirely clear, since the author has a difficult time in struggling against his sense of total recall; it is painfully honest in that it conveys the impression that the writer, for all his willingness to be used and his "creativity," might be a little difficult to get along with personally. Mr. Beecher's conviction is intense; his statement, however, is more apt to arouse pity than indignation: so its success as art seems inadvertent and its success as prophecy inadequate.

Ezra Goodman's "Twenty-five Poems" are published by the Rudor Press in New York City and priced at 75 cents. They are arranged to form a sequence, more or less, of variations on the familiar theme "We were born into an age of death and violence," touched, here and there, with the hope that hate may engender love or the flower break out of the stone. Mr. Goodman's line is controlled, his cadences are not unmusical; but he tends to drift off into a Spenderian vagueness, in spite of his attempts and occasional successes at pulling himself up short with an abrupt Audenesque concrete effect. The trouble seems to be that the language in general, however exact the image in particular, is conventional; the properties are too familiar; the tone might be that of any reasonably sensitive and competent person. Some of these poems have been printed in magazines that pay for poetry; and every season books more pretentious but no more viable are published by well-known firms: but perhaps Mr. Goodman has his own reasons for impatience.

Phelps Morand has been closer, in actuality, to the world of death and violence than many of us have been, even in imagination. His little book, "I Had a Country," describes the emotions of an émigré from France to America; it is published by the Carmel Press in California with an introduction by Joseph Warren Beach. There are about twenty-five pages, unnumbered; the price is not stated. Writing in a language not his own, Mr. Morand expresses difficult feelings in a perfectly simple manner; he is factual and restrained, unhysterical. "Men strike. And women hate/ Because they cannot strike." His justness and severity give his utterance real emotional force. Like Mr. Beecher he feels himself an unwanted man, but there is no use in being self-pitying about it. Face and state the facts. M. Morand is so good when he is doing just this that perhaps his poem should have concluded before the last section.

"Death at the Purple Rim" was the Yale University prize poem of 1941 and has been brought out in book form by the author, Hyam Plutzik. The Artisan Press of Brooklyn did the printing; the book is priced at $1.50. There are thirty-seven pages. The lurid title is, by intention or otherwise, ironical; for this is no extravagant tale of mysterious adventure over exotic landscape but a description of the feelings of a young man before, during, and after killing a woodchuck on a Connecticut farm. You do not need to look for more than that in these pleasant running hexameters—which run on a bit too much, maybe—but it is only fair to pass along the typed description that the author has forwarded in his hopeful—and hopeless—memorandum to literary editors: "a poem of Connecticut—and of a civilized person who, like all his neighbors, is more than ready to do his assignment in this war, whatever it may be, but who, nevertheless, cannot resist crying out one last time against the odiousness and tragedy of killing." It is out of such feeling, one believes more and more, that the vital literature of the present and future will derive, official sanctions to the contrary notwithstanding. It is not only the killing that is odious but the invited degradation of the spoken and written word. Kill a man clean if you have to and have done with it; and spare friend and foe alike the slogans, the slop, and the horrible, horrible cant.

To sum up: each of the six writers mentioned above has in his work something of interest. I do not mean to sound patronizing in saying just that; neither do I urge that the study of such work will justify steady attention. As literature this writing is not very memorable; but it seems honestly felt, it is not being exploited, and its publication—which has cost the writers something—has proceeded as much from conviction as from fond and inordinate pride.

Just as I finish these remarks, there arrive three volumes from the press of Henry Harrison, "poetry publishers." The reviewer is usually affected by the sight of this imprint to peremptory dismissal of the books that bear it or to perhaps unnecessary compassion for the authors. The three books are "Mississippi, I Love You," by Charles Granville Hamilton; "Why Hold the Hound," by Eleanor Slater, whose first volume of verse was Number 21 in the Yale Series of Younger Poets; and "Liebestraum," by Stanley Polk Higgins, with a foreword by Clement Wood. Mr. Hamilton deserves a better fate: the other volumes do not fall perceptibly below Mr. Harrison's usual standard.

IN BRIEF

THE SEASON. By David Walden. The Greystone Press. $2.50.

Summer in the Catskills is the theme of a first novel of real if homely talent. It's a bad season, and Sam Barsky, proprietor of Pinecrest, isn't a very good business man. To make matters worse, he has a new wife to cope with. The only way he can wrest a profit from his hotel is to exploit his assorted "helps," which he does unscrupulously. Mr. Walden deals with characters of the Weidman-Kober sort, but he has neither Weidman's bitterness nor Kober's mocking humor. Perhaps his novel lacks bite just because of his simple kindliness, but he has written a pleasant book, refreshing in its unpretentiousness.

THE COMMANDOS. By Elliott Arnold. Duell, Sloan, and Pearce. $2.50.

An American who fought with the Spanish Loyalists becomes an officer in the British commandos and with the help of his Nazi-hating sweetheart attempts to finish in Norway what he began in Spain. There is a broad streak of Hemingway in this novel—in the conception of its hero and heroine, in its love scenes, and in its concern with the techniques of a highly specialized kind of warfare. The author of "For Whom the Bell Tolls" still has nothing to fear from his disciples, but his influence has done a good deal to raise books like this above the common level of adventure fiction.

THE SUN DIAL. By Richard Austin Smith. Alfred A. Knopf. $2.50.

The sea in this writer's blood does strange things to his prose and to his notions of people. A novel about the life of a Maine sea-going man who talks prose-poetry and is answered in kind by all the other characters.

HURRICANE CAYE. By Margaret Shedd. Harper and Brothers. $2.50.

Love and death in Central America—all the familiar tropical ingredients, from native drums to hurricanes, mixed in a fancy concoction and seasoned with phony references to Darius Milhaud and a violin concerto of Prokofieff's. Miss Shedd is hailed by her publishers as a gifted stylist. Example of style: "One answer veered sheer diagonally above Seven Hills: Jules Olcutt's plane, gleaming like a surgeon's knife to dissect clean the orbicularity of hills and sky."

ASHES OF GOLD. By Helen Virginia Botsford. Dodd, Mead and Company. $2.50.

The white man, seeking gold, comes to a remote village in Mexico and upsets the traditional world of the natives. The story has often been told: the good peons, the greedy foreigner, the inevitable revolution and readjustment. Miss Botsford's novel won an Honorable Mention in the Intercollegiate Literary Fellowship. It is written in the "primitive" style that is becoming so tiresome—Burgess Meredith speaking a continuity by Steinbeck—but competently, and one hopes the young author will get beyond this sterile manner.

ARCHER PILGRIM. By Don Jackson. Dodd, Mead and Company. $2.50.

The hero of Mr. Jackson's novel, another Honorable Mention in the Intercollegiate Literary Fellowship, is a boy with a consuming passion for farming. Archer Pilgrim's parents are farmers themselves, but they have greater ambitions for their son. To please them, the boy tries college without success, business with some success but no satisfaction. It is only when he returns to the soil that he finds happiness. The author is a student of agricultural journalism at Iowa State College. He has little to add to an already familiar theme, but he writes with simplicity, and he does nicely with the scenes of his hero's childhood.

THE BERTRAND RUSSELL CASE. Edited by John Dewey and Horace M. Kallen. $2.50.

Though very different methods were used, the issues in the case of Bertrand Russell and in that of Giordano Bruno, who was burned alive 340 years ago, were essentially the same. As the nine philosopher-guardsmen of civil liberty who contribute to this book make clear, not only has academic freedom been violated but justice has miscarried. Freedom of teaching, too, has its limits, but none of its assailants have so far propounded the argument that the students of City College were unfit, because of their immaturity, to attend lectures on mathematics by a scholar whose moral views were unconventional. From the records in this unsavory case it appears that heresy in sex ethics is the more resented the less its rules are observed. Therefore not even Professor Kallen's brilliant summarizing chapter is likely to convince "the Anglican churchman, the Catholic judge, and the Judaist lawyer" how un-American their activity was.

RECORDS

COLUMBIA'S remaining April releases include the new Busch-Serkin version of Beethoven's Violin Sonata Op. 47 ("Kreutzer") (Set 496, $4.73). Busch is himself, to my ears, an unstimulating violinist; but he appears to provide the at once stimulating and restraining influence that makes Serkin play his best in their ensemble performances; and even with Busch's temperamental and stylistic limitations this performance of the "Kreutzer" Sonata is excellent in itself and unquestionably the best now available on records. On a Scott 23 machine with the wide-range, flat-response, and extremely light Brush PL-25 pickup the piano's sound is true but dull, and the surfaces of my review copy crackle; on the same machine with the Astatic Tru-tan, which has a terrific peak around 4,000 cycles and is heavier, the piano is a little brighter and the surfaces are quieter.

In addition to the fine sets of Brahms's Second Symphony and Kern's "Show Boat" Columbia's April list offers a set (X-218, $2.63) of the wonderful Prelude to Act 3, the charming Dance of the Apprentices, and the procession of the mastersingers from Wagner's "Meistersinger," performed by Reiner with the Pittsburgh Symphony. For me there is too much fussing with sonority and pace in the opening of the Prelude, and the first passage for brass soon afterward is not well balanced; otherwise the performances are good. With the Brush PL-25 the overall sound of the orchestra on the records is normal and clear, but without expansive resonance, as though the performance has been recorded in a "dead" studio; with the Astatic Tru-tan it is a little brighter.

Even with its occasional distortions and prettifications Stokowski's performance of Strauss's "Death and Transfiguration" is one of his more acceptable achievements; and it is at present the only one available on records. But if you want it you had better get the one he recorded with the Philadelphia Orchestra for Victor; since the one he has done for Columbia with the All-American Orchestra (Set 492, $3.68) comes off the records muffled, strangulated, without color, body, or even volume for the climaxes, like something heard through the wrong end of a telescope. Moreover, the surfaces of my copy crackle.

The only music I have enjoyed hearing conducted by Barbirolli is Mozart and Haydn; and he has recorded a good performance of Mozart's Symphony K. 183 with the New York Philharmonic-Symphony (Set X-217, $2.63). But though Dr. Einstein ranks this early work with the Symphonies K. 200 and 201, I am astonished by its lack of all that makes these two such marvelous pieces of music. With the Brush PL-25 the sound of the orchestra on the records is at once hollow and muffled, and the surfaces are extremely noisy; with the Astatic Trutan the sound is still hollow but brighter, and the surfaces are quiet.

On a single disc (17305-D, $.79) are Nos. 1 and 7 of Debussy's Etudes for piano, those elaborations of Debussyan piano style in a musical vacuum. They seem to be well performed by Jakob Gimpel; and the sound of the piano on the record is true, if dull; but mixed in with it, on my copy, is the grit, crackle, and other noise of extremely bad surfaces.

The few Victor May releases that have arrived include a single disc with Arthur Benjamin's Overture to an Italian Comedy, performed by Stock with the Chicago Symphony (11-8157, $1.05). The piece is pleasantly inconsequential, providing the occasion for excellent playing by the superb orchestra, and for recording that gives us the radiance of the violins without a trace of shrillness or sharpness, the clear definition of the woodwinds, the depth and warmth and firmness of the low strings, the over-all richness, spaciousness, balance, cleanness. Surfaces are not as quiet as they should be with the Brush PL-25.

Quite a fine recording is to be heard in the set (890, $2.63) of Telemann's Suite in A minor for flute and strings, a mildly engaging example of the style of its period, beautifully played by William Kincaid and the Philadelphia Orchestra under Ormandy. And it is to be heard on the single disc (11-8111, $1.05) that offers Corelli's charming Sarabande, Gigue and Badinerie, of which the Sarabande is subjected to thunderous Stokowskian distension in Kindler's performance with the National Symphony, but the other two pieces are well done.

Life in a California Concentration Camp

Dear Sirs: I inclose excerpts from a letter to a member of my household written by a Japanese student, American-born, registered at the University of California in the Department of Home Economics, who for the last year and a half has lived in my home.

Since I do not know how the neighboring American citizens would be disposed toward Japanese criticism of their local "Assembly Center" I feel that it might be inadvisable for you to identify the writer or the camp.

MARION RANDALL PARSONS

Berkeley, Cal., May 26

[The excerpts follow.]

We are now in our "apartment" in —— Assembly Center, having arrived here yesterday after a heavy shower. —— is famous for black clayey soil; so you can imagine what the mud was like. Lunch was a horrid affair—one frankfurter, a mess of overboiled cabbage, white bread, pasty rice, and canned cherries. All the workers are volunteers from the camp, and the cooks are quite inexperienced or else rusty with disuse, since many of the farmers from our vicinity were house boys and cooks some thirty years ago. Dinner was better—canned carrots and peas, one slab of canned pork, lettuce salad, apricots, and plenty of milk. There is a great shortage of waiters and common laborers. My brother was asked to help, but upon hearing that they are paid 70 cents a day and that board and room is subtracted from that, he said no!

The "apartments" are rooms with four, six, and eight beds. Usually they assign one "apartment" to a family. The rooms have screened windows, concrete or wooden floors, and a door that may or may not fit. Some doors are at least two inches too small for the doorway. When we first saw our living quarters we were so sick we couldn't eat or talk—couldn't even cry till later. Since they will not allow less than four in one room my two brothers are living with H— and me. We have put up canvas partitions. These things are tolerable, but you should see the latrines! Ten seats lined up; hard, fresh-sawed, unsandpapered wood; automatic flushing about every fifteen minutes.

My parents feel humiliated but are quite resigned. I admire their stoicism or whatever it is that enables them to hold up under so much. P— is in the hospital, one of the many that filled up the temporary wards as soon as they entered. . . .

I have been offered a job as dietician! Was busy till 10 p. m. yesterday. There is no regular dietician we can work under. Another girl and I have had our hands full helping with the mess halls, planning menus, even cooking. There is great need for trained nurses and decent hospital equipment. The only fresh fruit we can get is bananas and the only fresh vegetable is cabbage. Many people need special diet—allergies, diabetes, stomach ulcer, high blood pressure. V— and I feel overloaded, especially because we don't know a thing about planning menus from equations, balancing calories, weighing out grams, etc.

Three-fourths of the population loaf all day while the mess-hall boys and girls and the hospital staff work like horses. Right now the nurses are on duty twelve or fourteen hours a day. We greenhorn dieticians on ten hours can't complain.

We are slowly getting adapted to the diet, lack of privacy, etc., but every time we think of the white plastered walls, sunny rooms, and green gardens we left behind we again drop into depression. . . .

Last night it rained—for many people on their beds. Our head nurse says she cries every night when she thinks of the old folks, many of whom will most likely die here very soon, and of the children, who don't understand why they can't leave this horrid place.

Thanks, millions and millions, for those books. They are life-savers, especially for H—, who feels there's hardly anything left to live for except books.

I have been giving you the worst side of life here—the side most obvious. There is another side to the picture too. Some of the boys play all day, stopping only to sleep and eat. Some of the formerly busy mothers have time to look after their babies and chat with the neighbors. For many this is a long vacation in somewhat drab surroundings.

One man says he has a new slogan. Instead of "Remember Pearl Harbor" it is "Remember the Concentration Camp."

Until our dying day we'll not forget.

[The following letter from a Japanese-American girl in another California "assembly center" has also been forwarded to the editors.]

The telegram telling us to leave the following day at twelve came around five o'clock, and you can imagine the jump we made.

Turning a room in barracks into a cozy home is something a woman has pride in and can work at with zeal, is it not? We were given a broom, a bucket, beds with mattresses, and tags with our mess-hall number and shift. The very first thing we did was to wash the floor before even putting in our luggage. It was a good thing we had two neighbors whom we knew, for there were spaces between each board of the partitions, and when we turned the lights off we felt as if we were in a cage.

We had one of the best barracks in the whole center. (I say "had" because later we had to move on one hour's notice.) The mess-hall was right in front, the washroom on the right side, and the store and post office two blocks away. Now we are twelve to thirteen blocks away from the center.

School hasn't started, but many other activities have sprung up; classes in embroidery, wrestling, and piano are finding their path to light. The newspaper will be out soon, I imagine, because they have advertised for those interested in that work.

I put in two to three hours of study each day, but one does get restless when one has nothing to do but eat and sleep. I have volunteered for work and am on the waiting list, which is so long it seems hopeless. The recreation field will be open tomorrow, though.

Gerald L. K. Smith's Reply

Dear Sirs: The thing that amazes me is how such intellectual prostitutes as yourselves can continue to fan flames with no apparent awareness of the conflagration you are obviously stimulating.

You have called us lunatics so long that you actually believe it yourselves. This has been our greatest asset. Who fears a lunatic? You hypocrites! For a generation you have posed as the apostles of great freedom. You have defended the most violent revolutionists in their desire to express their opinions.

A Letter to the Living

In one of the most moving pieces of fiction The Nation has ever published, Walter Van Tilburg Clark, the distinguished author of "The Ox-Bow Incident," records the thoughts and memories of a young Frenchman about to be killed by the Nazis. Georges Dubois, a writer and artist, is to be shot or guillotined, he does not know which, for his part in a conspiracy to blow up a munitions train. Because he realizes that though his life has been unimportant, his death is not, he writes a letter to the living.

No one who has read the stories of Nazi terror coming out of occupied Europe will want to miss this stirring "fictional document."

And now you would bring down upon the Wheelers, the Lindberghs, and the Gerald Smiths all the tyranny and intolerance at your command.

What dangerous opportunism you practice! What foolish opportunists you have become!

The frightful part about it all is that freedom of expression has been so completely annihilated by intimidation that people like yourselves and political bureaucrats are unaware of the frightful animosities that have been created by intolerance. You and your kind occupy a very unenviable position in America. You are like a stranger in a forest. All seems tranquil, except for the occasional chirp of a cricket—but he never knows who or what lurks behind the nearest tree.

Gossip columnists and smear artists who enjoy bureaucratic favoritism have so intimidated the people that scientific polls of public opinion are now meaningless. Who's going to express himself frankly to a Gallup poller if he thinks that an honest reply is likely to result in political persecution?

Unless I am assassinated by the same gang, or a similar gang, as that which assassinated Huey Long, I will finish this discourse on the floor of the United States Senate in January, 1943. And I will be sent to the United States Senate by a million Michigan citizens, many of whom no longer feel free to criticize a political bureaucrat any place except behind a drawn curtain in the ballot booth.

Go to it, you wretched scoundrels, you contemptible liars, you damnable character assassins—crucify us, crucify us. But remember, there is a resurrection which always follows the crucifixion.

Cops and Robber

Dear Sirs: May a humble reader question some of Milan Hodza's assumptions (see The Nation of May 16)?

Why assume that Germany must go through an imperialist period? Isn't it clear that much of the trouble was created by interlocking cartels which wanted to build up heavy industry by fostering the war party? Isn't it clear that American, British, and French groups wanted a "strong" German barrier against the Russians? If the Allies take no action to make Germany "strong" and if they compel their metal, oil, and armament industries to keep their fingers out of Germany, the main mischief can be tempered. And if they encourage the democratic forces in Germany, as they never have done in the past, that will help too. If they play the old game of fattening up the thug and putting some "coppers" around him, he just might be able to sandbag the "coppers" again.

Dear Sirs: The intelligent magazines are falling out because of publishing difficulties, and are under continual fire. Fortunately the best of these survives with amazing strength. Since the time indubitably will come when I shall not find American newsstands on the corners of nearby towns, I must now subscribe to this country's most enduring voice of liberalism.

The Shape of Things

IN ASSESSING THE SIGNIFICANCE OF THE Battle of Midway we cannot, pending further details, go beyond the cautious claims implied by the official communiqués. On the known facts it is safe to say that a Japanese attempt to seize and garrison Midway has been thwarted and that a strong enemy task force has been compelled to retreat after suffering heavy losses. Nevertheless, it seems probable that the bulk of the Japanese fleet has been able to limp off beyond the limits of safe pursuit. This means we had at Midway or within easy call defensive forces strong enough to repel effectively a formidable assault, but we were not able to send into action the kind of offensive forces required for a "kill." The battle appears to have been in the main a contest between our land-based aviation and a balanced Japanese fleet including several aircraft carriers. These proved "cold meat" for our fliers, who attacked them so fiercely that the enemy was rapidly deprived of essential aerial support. Thereupon the Japanese battleships, which had perhaps remained in the background during the early stages of the fight, found it prudent to withdraw and succeeded in getting out of range of our bombers, though not without suffering some hits. It was at this point that we were evidently handicapped by inability to take up the pursuit with a swift and hard-hitting squadron of capital ships. Nevertheless, it seems likely that the punishment inflicted on the enemy, together with his losses in the rather similar Battle of the Coral Sea, have reduced his offensive power and brought nearer the day when we shall be able to count on effective naval superiority in the Pacific.

THE BATTLE OF MIDWAY HAS DEMONSTRATED the potentialities of land-based aircraft as a means of coastal defense so decisively that we can feel greatly reassured about the security of our long coastline. But by the same token we must expect to encounter grave dangers when our forces take the offensive against the Japanese bases. In their conquest of the East Indies the Japanese avoided this problem to a considerable extent by their tactics of hopping from one island to the next, and we may have to adopt their policy in reverse so as to insure for our fleet the protection of long-range land planes as well as a sea-borne air force. This thought may serve to curb the unjustified optimism of those who see the path to Tokyo opened by two partial victories. More sober considerations of the recent Pacific fighting suggest that we have still a long way to go. Nevertheless, there are good reasons for encouragement, not the least being the evident alertness of our present naval command. The review of the background of the Midway battle given by Admiral Ernest J. King, commander-in-chief of the United States fleet, in his first press conference since his appointment, made it clear that our naval intelligence has been operating successfully. But what is more important, it provided evidence that our naval and military chiefs have shown considerable imagination in anticipating Japanese moves. The attacks on Dutch Harbor and Midway did not take us by surprise, and as the outcome proves, we were well prepared to meet them. The dispositions that were ordered involved, as Admiral King pointed out, the taking of "calculated risks," but it is clear that the calculations were accurate and the risks well justified.

JAPAN'S REVERSES IN THE PACIFIC HAVE been at least in part offset by continued successes in China. According to the most recent reports, at least five strong Japanese drives are under way in various parts of the country. The most serious of these is, of course, the Chekiang offensive, since success in this area would eliminate all possibility of our using China as a base for an aerial offensive against the Japanese mainland. In Chuhsien the Japanese have captured a first-class air field which had been prepared for long-range bombers. Other air fields doubtless remain in this area, but the Japanese have already seized the most convenient bases. Another Japanese drive in Inner Mongolia has as its purpose the cutting of the road between Russia and China via Urga and Outer Mongolia. The main Russian supply line through Lanchow is fortunately well beyond Japan's reach; but it is doubtful whether Russia can spare much material for China at this time. Responsibility for getting aid to China's hard-pressed forces rests almost entirely on the United States.

WHEN THE BRITISH WERE BEING BLITZED night after night, Nazi propagandists complained that the stupid people didn't know when they were licked. Can the Germans now be counted on to display a similar fortitude under even heavier attacks than London and Coventry suffered? Britons were sustained by a blind faith that some day, with American aid, they would gain mastery of the air. The Germans on the other hand know that the long head start their Luftwaffe enjoyed has been lost and that with American production in the race they will never catch up again. The next few months will see the air fleets of the United Nations driving home this fact with ever stronger emphasis. The R. A. F. has already proved that there was nothing exceptional about the attack on Cologne. That raid merely opened an offensive which in its first week sent at least 3,000 bombers roaring over Germany. The Ruhr district—basis of German armed might—has had three visitations, and the often bombed ports and shipyards of Bremen and Emden have experienced heavy new blows. Of equal importance is the R. A. F.'s daylight offensive over the "invasion coast," which in the past week has been not only more intensive but more extensive than ever before. Swarms of British fighters accompanied by light bombers are crossing the Channel day after day, challenging the Nazi airmen and bombing every kind of objective. Among the targets are coast defenses, air fields, cantonments, freight trains, railroad yards, power-houses, and docks. Thanks to the R. A. F. and the Commandos, the French Channel coast is no longer a comfortable resort for tired Nazi warriors. Nor are their nerves likely to be soothed by British warnings to French residents to evacuate the coastal zones, which will "become more and more a theater of war operations."

A PASTORAL LETTER ISSUED ON MARCH 22 by the Roman Catholic bishops of Germany provides an ironic commentary on the bitter Nazi complaints of British destruction of Rhineland churches. For this very outspoken and detailed document not only charges the government of the Third Reich with the confiscation and desecration of churches but with an effort to destroy Christianity itself. "For years," the letter declares, "a war has raged in our fatherland against Christianity and the church, and has never been conducted with such bitterness. . . . Even in war time, when solidarity has been a matter of course, the fight continues, nay, increases in sharpness and bitterness and lies like a tremendous incubus on the German people." The bishops buttress this accusation by quoting one by one the provisions of the Concordat of July 20, 1933, in which the German government gave guaranties to the church, and by showing how they have been and are being ignored. Pressure is brought on Catholics "to conceal or deny" their faith; freedom of worship is restricted; religious instruction of children is more and more seriously hindered; priests are spied upon and punished for carrying out their duties; the property of religious orders has been confiscated and their activities increasingly curtailed; seminaries and church refectories for students have been seized and other obstacles placed in the way of training candidates for the priesthood. The bishops, however, do not confine their protests to the specific grievances of the church. They also take their stand for "the human rights bestowed by God on mankind" and condemn emphatically such Nazi practices as the punishment of persons without juridical proof of crime and the killing of incurables. The publication of this very courageous letter should help to open the eyes of the too numerous American Catholics, including some priests, who still fail to understand the nature of Hitlerism.

THE BROAD OUTLINES OF NAZI STRATEGY IN Russia have become fairly clear despite the recent lull on the eastern front. The powerful air attack on Sevastopol last week-end shows that the Nazis are anxious to seize that stronghold in preparation for a combined land, air, and sea drive against the Caucasus in the double hope of cutting off Russia's supply of oil and replenishing their own needs. Fortunately the Russians are strongly intrenched at Sevastopol, and there is reason to hope that they can hold out and so prevent the Nazis from taking advantage of their recent success on the Kerch Peninsula. At the same time there is every indication that Germany is preparing a major drive in the north which has as its ultimate objective the cutting of the Allies' supply routes through Murmansk and Archangel. Considerable military activity has been reported in the past week on the Kalinin front—which includes most of the area between Moscow and Leningrad. While none of the German attacks have been on a large scale, the activity appears to be of the type which frequently precedes a broad offensive. Hitler's visit to Marshal Mannerheim has been almost universally interpreted as a bid for Finnish support in a new drive on Leningrad. Since this great Baltic port is heavily defended, there is, of course, a possibility that the Germans may by-pass it, and that they are seeking Finnish help for a direct attack on the supply lines farther north. With the anniversary of the invasion of Russia only a little more than a week away, it is probable that we shall not have to wait much longer for the 1942 edition of Hitler's Blitzkrieg.

PIERRE LAVAL'S USEFULNESS TO THE NAZIS appears to be increasing. A few weeks ago, it will be recalled, rumors were circulated to the effect that he might be deposed and his job given to some more zealous collaborationist such as Doriot. But in the past week the Vichy government has announced the closing of 1,300 large French factories so that their employees might accept jobs in Germany or help in the production of foodstuffs. This action, it was pointed out, will not only free men for the German war effort but will result in a great saving of coal and raw materials for "essential industries." The step is believed to be an important part of the Nazi economic plan for France. A few hours before the closing of the factories was announced, Laval took personal command of the national police in an effort to curb the rising tide of anti-Nazi violence. The French Legion of War Veterans, the sole legal political organization in France, was placed under the command of Raymond Lachal, one of Laval's closest associates. To cap the climax of a week of useful service for their masters, Laval's Secretary of State for Information, Paul Marion, issued a statement charging the British with attempting to foment a civil war in France with Russia's aid, and denouncing the bombing of Paris factories as "private and collective murder." Laval may not have his job cinched yet, but no one can deny that he is making progress.

✶

A SCHEME FOR MEETING BRITAIN'S COAL shortage has finally been worked out after months of controversy. Under the new plan efforts will be made to increase production as well as to curtail consumption through rationing. The newly established Ministry of Fuel, Light, and Power, headed by Major Gwilym Lloyd George, will have complete authority over coal production, but the mining properties will remain in private hands. Operation will be left in the hands of the existing managers, who will continue to be responsible to the owners although subject to removal by the government. Essentially a compromise, the plan is not liked by either the Liberal or the Labor Party. Labor, in particular, is dissatisfied; it has long maintained that the necessary reorganization and modernization of Britain's archaic mining industry could only be achieved by wiping out the vested interests created by private ownership. Even the Liberals wanted to see something closer to outright nationalization. Details of the new rationing scheme which is to supersede the one withdrawn a fortnight ago have not been announced, but it is known to be drastic. The public's attitude toward it will doubtless depend largely on the energy and sincerity of the government's efforts to increase production.

THE NEW PLAN FOR GASOLINE RATIONING on the East Coast, as tentatively announced by Joel Dean, OPA fuel-rationing administrator, avoids many of the weaknesses of the preliminary scheme now in operation. Having learned from experience that some check on filling-station operators was necessary, the OPA has changed the basic plan so that dealers as well as all gasoline users will have to surrender coupons in order to obtain gasoline. While the allowance for non-essential users will be somewhat more generous than the three gallons per week of the existing arrangement, motorists will be able to obtain additional amounts only by going before the local rationing board and proving that a supplementary ration is indispensable. At the time of our going to press no decision had been reached on the controversial question of extending gasoline rationing to the rest of the country as a tire-conservation measure. The logic of the situation, however, would seem overwhelmingly on the side of such a step. A study recently completed by the Brookings Institution estimates that at least two-thirds of our automobiles, or approximately 20,000,000, are needed for essential transportation purposes. Unless drastic steps are taken to conserve tires, the number of automobiles suitable for service will drop below this minimum by June, 1943, and tires will be completely gone by 1945. It is to be regretted that a few Congressmen have been so shortsighted as to exploit the average American's aversion to rationing and thus unnecessarily to increase the difficulty of evolving a satisfactory plan for the entire country.

THE STRIKE OF NEGRO WORKERS AT NASSAU in the Bahamas received little attention in the American press, which noted chiefly its effect in cutting short the Duke of Windsor's official visit to Washington. But we ought not to ignore the fact that the strike and the rioting that followed were the result of long-standing dissatisfaction with the conditions of work on American defense projects on the island. In accordance with our customary practice, local unskilled workers, most of whom are Negroes, have been receiving the island's prevailing wage of four shillings—about 81 cents—a day. In contrast, imported American workers, mainly whites, have received a dollar an hour and up. The local workers naturally resented such an unreasonable disparity in wages, and they were further angered by the tendency of local shopkeepers to take advantage of the high wages paid the Americans by raising their prices. These facts, which are bad enough, have been allowed to leak through the censorship. What has not been told is the degree to which the situation was made worse by American treatment of the proud, sensitive Negroes of the Bahamas. Our military authorities appear to be trying to hush up the entire matter lest unpleasant issues be raised; but it is far too serious for that. For the sake of racial harmony here at home, as well as of good relations with our allies, in the Caribbean, the whole affair should be promptly investigated by a Congressional committee.

ODELL WALLER, THE NEGRO SHARECROPPER who was convicted of murder by an all-white Virginia jury, is to die on June 19. One last legal effort to save him will be made by the Workers' Defense League, which is planning to apply for a writ of habeas corpus in the federal courts. This step, it must be recognized, is only a forlorn hope, especially in view of the Supreme Court's decision to ignore the constitutional aspects of the Waller case. We place greater trust in the appeal which is being made to Governor Colgate W. Darden of Virginia, who has displayed a very fair attitude throughout the case, to commute the sentence of death. On Saturday of this week the Governor will hold a hearing on the case in response to a petition from a group of prominent persons, including many citizens of the state. Nation readers can support this effort by writing or wiring Governor Darden at Richmond, urging clemency on the ground that no man should die who has been denied a trial by a jury of his peers.

The New Crisis in Copper

ON WEDNESDAY, June 3, William L. Batt, chairman of the Requirements Committee of the War Production Board, held a press conference with A. I. Henderson, his successor as head of the Materials Division. What Batt had to say was alarming. "I can see times ahead," he declared, "when a shipway may stand idle for lack of steel and an ammunition line may slow down for lack of copper and brass." Though Batt only sees them "ahead," such scenes are already with us. He fails to mention the most important—the slowing down of plane-production lines in some factories for lack of aluminum. In steel, nickel, manganese, chromium, tungsten, aluminum, copper, tin, and chemicals we are suffering from shortages.

"This," Batt told the press, "comes as no surprise to us who have been living with the problem." If this situation is no surprise to Batt and Henderson, it is a commentary on their competence. Both have been closely associated with the materials problem since the defense program began. Batt was Stettinius's deputy, then chief in charge of materials under the Office of Production Management. Henderson, who comes from the famous Wall Street law firm of Cravath, de Gersdorff, Swaine, and Wood, was first chief counsel of the Materials Division and then Batt's deputy director. Among the ruck of dollar-a-year men both are outstanding in intelligence and in readiness to see the need for subordinating business considerations to the job of speeding war production. But the record shows neither has been good enough. Neither has had the vision, the will, the fighting power to shake the grip of accepted methods and powerful monopolies on the production of our basic raw materials. Most of the key posts in the Materials Division continue to be manned by the servants of the metal monopolists, and these are the men who make the decisions. Batt, the roller-bearing manufacturer, and Henderson, the corporation lawyer, are themselves too much a part of the world of big business and high finance to do the job of expanding production of materials.

In the case of some metals, like nickel, we can do little to increase production, though it is a pity the Canadian Parliament has no investigating committee which could have a look into the workings of the International Nickel Company. In the case of steel, the shortage is so great that we are told we cannot spare the steel necessary to build new steel-making plants. In the case of manganese, chrome, and tungsten, supply depends on work now begun to develop new domestic sources of supply. In the case of several other materials—magnesium, a variety of chemicals, and zinc, lead, and copper—powerful monopoly influences still block larger production. A fresh approach and new vigor are needed for the development of new methods and new sources of supply, and independent fighting blood must be brought into the business-dominated War Production Board if the monopolies are to be forced to produce their maximum. This is particularly necessary in copper, for copper makes brass, and brass encases shells.

In an editorial The Case of Copper in the issue of December 27 last, The Nation called attention to the serious shortage developing and to the proposals put forward by the Mine, Mill, and Smelter Workers' Union for expanding production of copper. Under pressure from the Truman committee, which was the first to reveal the alarming lag in copper production, Batt announced that hearings would be held on methods for increasing output. The hearings were first postponed, then abandoned. Written proposals were asked instead, and these seem to have been consigned to the wastebasket. Labor's plan was shunted aside, though it was the only constructive suggestion presented at the Truman committee hearings. Batt's deputy at the time, Philip Reed of General Electric, contributed the spectacle of an extraordinary ignorance; the other dollar-a-year men who testified could suggest only higher prices and more tax privileges for the copper companies.

It is a measure of the gravity of the situation that two days after Batt's press conference last week there was a burst of publicity from the WPB designed to give the impression that labor's proposals are being adopted. In the double-talk of the press releases and the make-up of the new committees announced we see no evidence of a real change of policy. Nelson announces a drive for more local labor-management committees. Henderson, after all these months, wakes up to the fact that copper, lead, and zinc mining overlap and appoints a new three-man "coordinating" committee—but the committee is made up of the same dollar-a-year men who head the copper, zinc, and lead branches. Labor is still being "jim-crowed" instead of being invited to full participation. The emasculated Labor Production Division of the WPB is setting up a new non-ferrous division "to work with" the Materials Division in "the war-production drive." All this is a long way from the over-all supervision and coordination of the mining industry suggested by the union. The copper industry does not want that kind of supervision, nor does it want to be forced to improve conditions in the mines to permit larger output. It is being as niggardly with production as it safely can in the hope of higher prices and special excess-profits tax privileges. In copper, as in the other materials, shortage will continue as long as the WPB's Materials Division continues to take its lead from men with a vested interest in restricted production.

Behind Closed Doors

BY FREDA KIRCHWEY

GREAT decisions are in the making behind official doors in Washington and Moscow, in London and Chungking. So much everyone knows, and no one will know more until the decisions are ripe for announcement to the world—including our enemies. But already some events have occurred which offer a hint of the shape of things to come. The recent speech of Sumner Welles—following that of the Vice-President; the lease-lend agreements with China and Russia; our declaration of war on Hungary, Rumania, and Bulgaria; Mr. Hull's warning to Finland; the all-but-open planning for a second front in Europe—taken together, these pieces fit, with gaps, into a slowly emerging pattern.

It adds to rather than lessens the importance of Mr. Welles's speech that it came out of this context of inter-Allied negotiation. It was a bold statement of policy and far more explicit than any which had previously come from an official source. And since, in the circumstances, it must have had the indorsement of our Allies, his proposals for dealing with the post-war world become momentous. Not only does Mr. Welles look ahead to a prolonged armistice period during which the disarming of the aggressors and the policing of the world will be carried out by the victorious United Nations, but, more significantly, he foresees the end of the whole system of imperialism and the establishment of peace on a basis of national and racial equality. This revolutionary proposal must also have the general assent of our major ally, the British Empire; otherwise it could hardly have been made by a responsible official at this moment.

Less startling but no less important for the building of the future world order are the lease-lend agreements with China and Russia. Based on the "master" agreement with Britain signed last February, and stemming from the economic principles set forth in the Atlantic Charter, they bring these two nations definitely into the framework of post-war economic cooperation and assure them "most-favored-nation" treatment in the crucial matter of financing their war purchases and liquidating their obligations. As for the declaration of war against the Eastern European states, this was clearly a concession to Russia, against which Hitler has thrown forces contributed, however unwillingly, by the three puppet governments. By the same logic a break with Finland seems likely. Washington has tried hard to maintain good relations with Finland, but no past sentiment or present faith in the democratic sympathies of the Finnish people can wipe out the fact that the armies of Finland are holding a long line for Hitler and constantly threaten the railway between Murmansk and Moscow, which is one of the two principal routes for the delivery of American war supplies to the Red Army.

So the pattern begins to take the shape of full-fledged alliance among equal partners leading toward a democratic peace. To arrive at this end one must, to be sure, fill in wide gaps with bold and generous acts. But no one can doubt that pressures stronger even than the fears and prejudices of Foreign Offices are pushing the United Nations in that general direction. The feeling dominating the recent Labor Party conference in England was one of impatience with official slackness both in waging the war and in planning the peace. The conference demanded the gradual socialization of essential industries, beginning now, as part of the war effort. It urged the reopening of negotiations with India. It cheered the announcement of a plan to ask the Soviet authorities to receive a British Socialist delegation which would try to establish closer relations with the Russian labor movement. The party recognized the necessity for starting to organize the post-war world while war still rages lest peace bring dangers hardly less overwhelming. The changing temper of England, particularly of labor, is one of the powerful forces at work behind the scenes. It is a power no English public man today would think of ignoring.

But British feeling is the least of the influences which have combined to force conservative statesmen to adopt revolutionary attitudes. As Walter Lippmann wrote last week, "in a war of survival the realities of international affairs are infinitely stronger than theories, ideologies, sentiment, and prejudice." The failure of the Cripps mission to India, following the procession of Allied defeats in the Far East, threatened China's ability to continue its unparalleled resistance; and the threat has not yet been lifted. Russia faced—and still faces—the grave danger that Hitler's summer offensive may smash the Red Army before a second land front in Europe can develop. Both Russia and China expressed clearly their reluctance, as well as their probable inability, to go on holding long and desperately contested fronts with insufficient equipment while the great Western powers reorganized their shattered or discredited commands and prepared for future offensives when their vast resources should become fully available. Something had to be done and done fast. It was necessary, if our fighting alliances were to hold, that we and the British take all possible steps to reinforce Russia and China and to establish their confidence in our aims as well as our strength. The plans and promises and acts of the last few days have grown not out of the imagination of statesmen but out of the fierce necessities of the world struggle. They are not to be discounted for that reason. Indeed, their chief importance lies in the fact that power is behind them—the power of an awakened public opinion in England, the growing power of Russia and China in the councils of the United Nations.

Biddle and the Facts

BY I. F. STONE

Washington, June 4

MANY people think that the only thing wrong with the Biddle decision on Bridges is that it is politically untimely and unwise. I believe a careful examination will also show many weaknesses in its interpretation of the law and of the facts. Because of the importance of the case at home and abroad I should like to discuss the decision in some detail, considering it in the light of the three Bridges decisions which went before it—those of Dean Landis, of Judge Sears, and of the Board of Immigration Appeals.

Before examining the Attorney General's ruling, however, I want to report a relevant piece of news. I am reliably informed that Mr. Biddle has decided not to press the case against Coughlin. I am told that the Attorney General is not sure that he has a strong case and fears that prosecution would be politically untimely and unwise. The Attorney General's decision may or may not be a sound one. The question I would like to raise is: are the political considerations which argue against the prosecution of a pro-fascist Catholic agitator of a higher order than those which argue against the deportation of an anti-fascist trade-union leader? Can an Attorney General who takes political considerations into account in the one case refuse to take them into account in the other?

There are circumstances, of course, under which no one could ask the Attorney General to consider anything but the law and the facts. Were it clear that Bridges is a Communist and that the Communist Party is actively attempting to overthrow the government, Mr. Biddle could not be expected to rule otherwise than he did. But in that case the "political considerations" involved in the Bridges case would no longer exist. For the most pressing and immediate argument against the deportation of Bridges rests on the fact that he and the Communist Party, whatever their motives, are now doing their best to support the government in its war effort. The political considerations in this case are of a different order from those which dictate the dropping of the Coughlin case or, to take another example, the appointment of a Hague man to the federal courts of New Jersey. The position of the Communist Party on the war is itself one of the facts of the case.

The law under which Bridges is to be deported does not mention the Communist Party by name. The law makes any alien deportable who has been a member of or affiliated with a party which advocates the overthrow of the government by force and violence. To judge from the Sears and Biddle opinions, this advocacy must be more than past doctrine or theory. It must be reflected in present practice. This becomes clearer if we recall that there was a double charge against Bridges. One involved membership in or affiliation with the Communist Party; the other involved membership in or affiliation with the I. W. W. For the law also makes it a deportable offense for an alien to have been a member of or affiliated with an organization which advocates "unlawful damage, injury, or destruction of property, or sabotage." Bridges denied that he was ever a member of the Communist Party but admitted that he was for a time a member of the I. W. W., and the I. W. W. is as closely associated in the public mind with sabotage as the Communist Party is with revolution. Sabotage is part of syndicalist theory, as revolution is part of Communist theory.

But Judge Sears declined to consider theory as sufficient basis for deportation. "The difficulty here," he said, "is that there is a failure to prove by a fair preponderance of the evidence that the I. W. W. at the time of Bridges's membership in it favored and advocated or published or circulated pamphlets or written or printed matter advocating or advising such acts as would constitute sabotage even under the broad definition suggested." The Attorney General agrees with Judge Sears on this. "A contrary conclusion," the Biddle decision says on this point, "would not seem to be warranted." Both accept Bridges's admission that he was a Wobbly. Neither considers this basis for deportation.

Were the same test applied to the Communist Party, membership in it at the present time or in recent years would not be ground for deportation. Biddle cites three Communist documents which call for revolution. One is the "Communist Manifesto" of 1848; the second is the program of the American section of the Comintern as announced in 1919; the third is from the Thesis and Statutes of the Third International (1920). These are hardly enough to prove Biddle's finding that "the Communist Party of the United States of America, from the time of its inception to the present time," has been an organization that "advises, advocates, and teaches the overthrow by force and violence of the government of the United States" (my italics).

The Department of Justice introduced in evidence four Wobbly publications to prove that the I. W. W. was in favor of sabotage, and produced an ex-Wobbly as witness. But Judge Sears pointed out that one of the documents bore no date and that the other three were issued in 1916 and 1917. He objected that the witness had left the I. W. W. "at least six months" before Bridges joined it in June or July, 1921. But the Communist documents used by Biddle as evidence of the party's purposes appeared before Bridges entered this country, indeed, before any period in which he might have joined the party.

In this connection, an important point must be kept in mind. Bridges admitted that he had been a Wobbly and therefore brought forward a witness to testify that at the time he joined the I. W. W. it had renounced sabotage. Judge Sears found this testimony impressive. But since Bridges denied that he was or had been a Communist, he brought forward no witnesses to testify on the question of the Communist Party and revolution. Neither before Landis nor Sears was any testimony heard in behalf of the Communist Party. Thus a point of great political importance at this time, with the widest repercussions in foreign relations and domestic affairs, was decided by Biddle on the basis of testimony from one side only.

I am not arguing that we should pretend that Communists are democrats. I merely want to make clear that as a matter of fact and law there was no obstacle to such a common-sense ruling by Biddle as the following: The Communist Party, whatever the theories it holds, is not at this time trying to overthrow the government by force or violence. On the contrary, whatever its motives, it is using all its influence in the trade-union movement to support the government and the war effort. If its position changes, its legal position will also change. But at this time an alien is not deportable for membership in or affiliation with the party because its present conduct and policy do not bring it within the force-and-violence provisions of the immigration laws.

Of course the Attorney General need not have handled this political hot potato at all had he decided differently the question of whether Bridges was a Communist or affiliated with the Communist Party. Landis held that Bridges was not a Communist. Judge Sears held that he was. The Board of Immigration Appeals unanimously reversed Judge Sears. If these three decisions and that of the Attorney General are read side by side, it will be seen that Mr. Biddle was not only free to rule either way but that the case against Bridges is a good deal weaker than the case for him and that some very odd reasoning was indulged in by the Attorney General. If the Attorney General had held that Bridges was not a Communist, it would have been unnecessary to decide whether or not the Communist Party came within the purview of the Immigration Act.

Under the law it is a deportable offense to be either a member of or affiliated with a party which advocates overthrow of the government by force or violence. Landis, who rendered the first decision, held that Bridges was neither. Judge Sears, as the presiding inspector in the second Bridges case, decided that he was both. The Board of Immigration Appeals overruled Judge Sears on both counts. Biddle reversed the board and upheld the findings of Sears.

Let us take up the question of membership first. The Department of Justice brought fifteen witnesses before Judge Sears. "Much of this evidence," Biddle admits, "is rejected as being untrustworthy, contradictory, or unreliable. However, the evidence of two witnesses is accepted as showing that Bridges was a member of the party. If this evidence is believed—and Judge Sears believed it—the doubt is decided. The question is substantially one of credibility. The Review Board did not think the evidence credible." Biddle relies on Sears because "Judge Sears saw the witnesses on the stand, watched their demeanor and expression, and was in a far better position to judge their truthfulness than the Review Board, dealing with the cold print of the record."

The question of "demeanor and expression" is a highly subjective one, and appellate courts feel no shyness about deciding for themselves on "the cold print of the record." In case of doubt, the Attorney General can hear the testimony himself. As it happens, the "evidence" of the two witnesses relied upon by Sears and Biddle is so contradictory that it appeared untrustworthy and unreliable to the Board of Immigration Appeals. I put the word "evidence" in quotation marks because one of these two witnesses did not testify that Bridges was a member of the Communist Party. This witness was James D. O'Neil. What did O'Neil testify? If Biddle's account is placed beside that of Sears, it will be seen how anxious the Attorney General was to give O'Neil's "evidence" a good deal more weight than it deserves.

Biddle says O'Neil was publicity director of the C. I. O. in San Francisco after 1936 and shared offices with Bridges. "The two men were intimate," the Attorney General declares. "In October, 1941, he made a statement to two FBI agents, which was taken down by a stenographer who was present, that he joined the Communist Party in December 1936; that he walked into Bridges's office one day in 1937 and saw Bridges pasting assessment stamps in a Communist Party book; and that Bridges reminded the witness that he had not been attending party meetings. O'Neil admitted making the statement, testified that what he had stated was the truth, but that it was garbled, and untrue in the particulars mentioned."

This is the cleverly misleading statement of a prosecutor, not the words of an administrative officer sitting as a judge of the facts. The account given by Sears, whom Biddle upholds, is far more candid. Sears quotes O'Neil's actual testimony:

> Q. Did you during any time that you were so employed in Mr. Bridges's office walk into his office one day and see on Bridges's desk a Communist Party Book in which Mr. Bridges was putting assessment stamps?
>
> A. No. At this point I want to say that that is exactly what I told the FBI men that questioned me.
>
> Q. Now, just a minute! I haven't asked you that. I am asking you if you saw him.
>
> A. I did not.
>
> Q. You did not?
>
> A. No.
> Q. Did you see Mr. Bridges putting assessment stamps in a Communist Party book about 2 p. m. in Bridges's office in the Balboa Building at 593 Market Street sometime in 1937?
> A. I did not.

Sears said O'Neil "denied that he had ever been a member of the Communist Party; he denied that he had stated to the FBI officers that he was a member of the Communist Party; he denied stating to the FBI agents that Bridges was a member of the Communist Party." The opinion of the Board of Immigration Appeals makes this even more explicit. The board declares that O'Neil denied the truth of all the statements he was alleged to have made to the FBI "with the exception of the sentence, 'It is my belief that Bridges never at any time attended any Communist Party meetings.'" This is considerably different from Biddle's "O'Neil admitted making the statement" but "testified . . . that it was garbled." Mr. Biddle here shows himself a master of understatement.

The key to this confusion may be a simple one. Sears says O'Neil "denied specifically that he had dictated any statement to a stenographer in the FBI office at the interview of October 7, although he stated that there was a stenographer present while the officers were asking him questions and that she took notes." Why wasn't O'Neil placed under oath at that time and asked to sign the statement he is supposed to have made to the FBI? The regulations of the Immigration Service provide, in Biddle's own words, "that statements of persons during an investigation must be taken down in writing, the signature requested, and the interrogation made under oath." Was it because O'Neil's explanation on the stand was true? "O'Neil," according to Judge Sears, "testified that the statement [alleged to have been given the FBI], while incorrect in the particulars already mentioned as well as in others, was a garbled and incorrect summary of several interviews" (my italics).

By failing to place O'Neil under oath when they questioned him and to obtain his signature to his statement, the FBI men ran a grave risk. The Board of Immigration Appeals ruled that the alleged statement was inadmissible as evidence because these departmental regulations were not complied with. The board also pointed out that the whole procedure was highly irregular and violated elementary rules of evidence. Courts are not accustomed to admit as "evidence" testimony by others of what a man swears on the stand that he did not say. Biddle dismisses the second point primarily on the ground that "technical rules of evidence do not apply to administrative procedures," though this is hardly a "technical" point. He himself then falls back on technicalities to meet the board's contention that the statement was inadmissible because it had not been taken under oath, as required by the department's regulations.

I will let Biddle speak for himself on this point. "Had the alien raised the question at the time of the hearing," Biddle says, "compliance with the departmental regulations would have been obligatory." But since the question was not raised at the hearing, Bridges "waived the right to object." This is to clothe an administrative procedure with the formality of a high appellate court in the same breath that one argues that an administrative procedure is too informal to be bound by "technical" rules of evidence.

Whom Does the Greek King Represent?

BY LEIGH WHITE

GEORGE II of Greece is expected to arrive in this country from Egypt on June 10. He will be accompanied by Prime Minister Emmanuel Tsouderos and other members of the Greek government-in-exile. The King and his party will be guests at the White House and will be honored at a state dinner by President Roosevelt; they will also be honored at dinners given by the Secretaries of State and the Navy and at numerous banquets and patriotic celebrations throughout the United States.

Greece has been one of our most gallant allies, and there would be every reason for the leaders of our government to receive its ruler if it were not for one unfortunate fact—George II is cordially hated by all but a fraction of his martyred subjects. For that reason his reception by the President of the United States will disturb friends of Greek democracy everywhere.

At a time when unity should be paramount, it is a disagreeable and thankless task to question the leadership of an allied government. But since George II has chosen to visit the United States in the name of the Greek people and since there is danger that he may be hailed as the coming liberator of Greece, there is no choice but to recall his unsavory past and register a strong protest.

For the fact is, George II is neither a popular leader nor a friend of freedom. Nor, for that matter, is he a Greek. He is merely the current representative of the Glücksburg dynasty, which he can be counted on to do everything in his power to preserve, even at the expense of his subjects. Certainly that has been his policy in the past. He is the grandson of George of Denmark, who was assassinated in Salonika in 1913. He is the son of Constantine, the Kaiser's brother-in-law, who was deposed in 1917 and again in 1922. He himself was originally excluded from the succession because of his pro-German intrigues in the last World War. Finally enthroned in 1922, he was forced to flee for his life in 1923, and in 1924 the Glücksburg dynasty was formally expelled from Greece. In the following period, until his restoration eleven years later, Greece enjoyed the nearest approach to a parliamentary democracy it has ever been permitted in the modern era.

Since the republican revolution of 1821-29, the long-suffering Greeks have had five unwanted monarchs foisted upon them. Three (including George II) were dethroned once; one (Constantine) was dethroned twice; one (George I) was assassinated; only one (Alexander) was permitted to keep his throne, and he died three years after his coronation. These facts would seem to be sufficient proof that what the Greek people want is the republic for which they have fought for 120 years, not the monarchy with which shortsighted British politicians have repeatedly tried to saddle them.

In 1935, with the help of British politicians and a sham plebiscite, George II engineered his restoration. Only he and his camarilla failed to appreciate the paradox of the elections of January, 1936. Whereas his plebiscite of the previous November had indicated that 98 per cent of the people favored his restoration, the election, despite the intimidation of voters by Royalists and Fascists, returned 135 Venizelist Liberals to Parliament against 125 Royalists, 14 Communists, and 9 Metaxas Fascists. It was characteristic of George's concern for his subjects' wishes that he immediately turned the government over to General John Metaxas.

On August 4, 1936, the blackest day in the history of modern Greece, George II signed a decree permitting Metaxas to abolish the constitution and create the "Third Hellenic Civilization"—a cynical euphemism for the most despotic regime in Europe outside Germany and Italy. Thereupon Metaxas instituted permanent martial law, abolished elections, political parties, and trade unions, imprisoned or banished to the islands all dissenters, created the Asphalia, a terrorist police force modeled after the Gestapo, and the Ethniki Neolea, a Greek copy of the Hitler Jugend. For good measure, he also suppressed municipal government, forbade the teaching of constitutional law, banned the study and presentation of Sophocles, Thucydides, and other classics—and even went so far in his zeal to silence all "subversive hymns to democracy" as to ban Lincoln's Gettysburg Address.

George II of Greece

Such was the government which kept George II in power until the Italians invaded Greece in October, 1940. From that day on the Greek people fought against the invader despite their ruler and his Fascist government. Metaxas and George II followed their policy of resistance only because of the certain knowledge that if they did not they would be overthrown as George's father, Constantine, was overthrown in 1917. But throughout the entire Italian phase of the war, King George and his government maintained cordial relations with the Germans, even to the extent of permitting the German military attachés in Athens and Salonika to observe and note in detail the arrival and deployment of British forces up to April 5, the eve of the German invasion.

The exalted heroism of the Greek soldiers at the front was an inspiration to all who knew them. I myself had seen nothing comparable to it since the war in Spain. But life at the front was one thing; life at the rear was another. Despite the pleas of the people, neither Metaxas nor King George would consent to the release of political prisoners, the lifting of the Fascist censorship, or any other measure that would have given meaning to the suicidal heroism of the soldiers.

I shall never forget the celebration of Independence Day in Athens on March 25, 1941. Instead of a civilian parade, George insisted on commemorating the freedom of the Greek nation by reviewing a parade of the Ethniki Neolea. While Greek soldiers were dying at the front for what they hoped would mean democracy, blue-shirted Fascist thugs of military age were marching up and down Constitution Square. The thin crowd of civilians who watched them were apathetic. They knew that thousands of police agents were circulating among them, ready to arrest them for a single "subversive" word.

"How can you be pro-Greek when you see a spectacle like this?" a colleague asked me. "The Greeks are as bad as the Italians—worse, even. There aren't as many police spies in Rome."

We argued. I insisted that what was happening at the front could never be undone. Somehow, I said, the war would purge Greece of its betrayers.

Later I was surprised to find that I was right. Paradoxical as it may seem, the German occupation had the effect of freeing the Greeks from their oppressors. After being wounded at Corinth, I arrived in occupied Athens to find a different atmosphere from that which I had known before. The Greeks were starving and were embittered by their defeat, but in one sense they were happy. They were at last united as free men against the conqueror; they were free at last to speak their troubled minds. There was no more Asphalia to spy on them, and the Gestapo could not speak Greek.

One of the first tasks the Greek patriots set themselves was the liquidation of their betrayers. Before they ever engaged in sabotage against the Germans and Italians, they had assassinated many of their own brand of fascists. That was why such worthies as Constantine Manyadakis, the chief of the Asphalia, and Constantine Kodziás, the mayor of Athens, found it necessary to seek refuge in the United States. They were fleeing from the wrath of their own people, not from their friends the Germans. Kodziás is still in this country, thankfully in retirement, but to the credit of our Immigration Service Manyadakis was not allowed to enter. He was last heard from in Argentina. The most hated man in Greece, he will certainly be murdered if he ever dares to return.

Three weeks before my departure from Athens last September, the Italians—of all people—released 300 political prisoners of the Metaxas regime. They were the survivors of more than a thousand professors, journalists, writers, and students who had been imprisoned since 1936. The rest had long since died of sickness or starvation. A score of these human wrecks were admitted to the hospital where I was convalescing. One of them had to have both his eyes removed, having contracted some incurable eye infection in his dungeon. All these men had sworn eternal vengeance against Manyadakis and similar henchmen of Metaxas and the King.

During my stay in the hospital I talked with Royalists, Metaxists, Venizelists, Communists, and just plain Greeks. From what they told me, each according to his lights, I realized that neither King George nor any of his camarilla would be any more welcome in post-war Greece than the Fascists. Hence it would be foolish and unjust for the United States, as the most influential member of the United Nations, to support their cause.

My stay in Athens convinced me that what the majority of the Greek people want is a government as much like that of the United States as possible. What little I know of the Greek character convinces me that though it will be a long time before they can achieve a government as stable as ours, achieve it they finally will, if it takes them a hundred years. It will be our duty as Americans to help them all we can.

One way we can help them now is to insist upon a reorganization of the Greek government-in-exile and demand that King George be made to follow his spiritual counterpart, Carol II of Rumania, into permanent retirement. Should M. Tsouderos or his Vice-Premier, Panayotis Kanellopoulos, be unwilling to break with the King, then they must be replaced by others who have the courage to take up the cause of a people's revolution. Above all, such notorious Fascists as Alexander Sakellariou, the present admiral of the Greek navy, must be eliminated from the government-in-exile before it can be considered worthy of the valiant people it presumes to represent.

A Letter to the Living

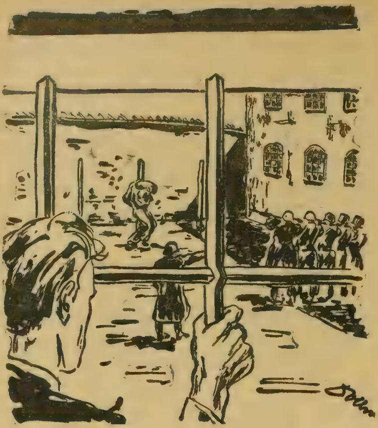
BY WALTER VAN TILBURG CLARK

I GEORGE DUBOIS, once writer and artist who lived chiefly by other work, am about to be executed. They brought me back to this cell yesterday, after I had been sentenced, apparently by a tribunal of my countrymen but actually by a silent colonel with a face like Dante's. They won't tell me when or how I am to die, which is the hardest thing now. It seems to me that if I knew to the minute when, whether it will be by bullet or by guillotine, how many will go with me and who will watch, I could stop these dreadful declines into panic, make my mind firm, and die as I wish to die, with dignity. As it is I give way to foolish dreams of Casanova escapes, and to even more difficult memories of walking with Annette in the spring evenings, talking with my brother at a sidewalk table, feeling the common affection that is in a theater because everybody is living the same lives from the stage—to innumerable such small and profound joys of being. Such retrospective desires sooner or later plunge me like steep water down into a degrading animal terror.

This doesn't really matter, however, except to me. I suppose I hope to save a little of myself in the minds of you who read this, but the big reason I write is because I am like you, and want you to know what I know now, that my fears don't matter, that though my life is unimportant, my death is not, and that it may even be that my death is more valuable if I die badly than if I die like a hero.

I am thinking of two executions I saw this morning. My cell is in the third story of the prison, over the entrance to the court. I can see the opposite wall, which is windowless, and more than half of the side walls, which have small windows like mine, where I sometimes see other prisoners and wonder if they also are waiting to be executed. In front of the windowless wall are four evenly spaced stakes like truncated telephone poles. The firing squads stand in the center of the court below me, and I watch their faces when they come about to march out afterward. These faces show the difference between killing a man in battle and killing him when he is helpless.

I once saw that difference take effect when the victim was a bird, not a man. The hunter was a government clerk in the village of my birth, a friendly man who read a great deal and loved to talk, especially about politics, in which he was too idealistic to prosper. He was an excellent hunter who always dropped his birds cleanly, and so took pleasure in his skill. But this once his dog flushed four birds which stayed bunched until the shot. The clerk killed one of them, but dropped another without killing it. The dog brought this crippled bird to him, and when it was released it began frantically to try to rise but kept falling over on its injured side. The dog became excited. The clerk held him off and started to pick the bird up, but stopped because he was caught by its eye watching him. He couldn't make himself wring its neck, but finally killed it with another shot. Afterward he was very nervous and a little ill. The next time he went out, he shot nervously, and crippled a bird in single flight. He gave up hunting. I know that not many men who will hunt at all are sensitive enough to stop hunting because they shoot badly. But I also know that all hunters are shaken, to some degree, by having to kill a cripple at close quarters.



The bird killed cleanly, in flight, is like the enemy killed in battle, and the crippled bird is like a prisoner at the stake, except that the emotional difference between killing men in the two ways is much greater. In battle you also kill to prevent being killed, and in executing a helpless man you identify yourself with him more completely than you would with a bird. Later you will see him in your dreams, and sometimes he will have your own body and face, or those of a dear friend. An executioner, unlike a soldier in battle, will finally feel like a murderer. And this result will be even stronger and more immediate if the victim dies badly than if he dies well.

The first of the two I saw this morning was the man who died badly. The guards had to support him all the way to the stake, and even from my window I could hear him whimpering. I believe he was nearly unconscious from anticipation. He made no trouble when they bound him, except for his sagging weight, but before they could blindfold him, he saw the firing squad and woke up. He began to scream and beg them not to kill him. He even told them that he had a wife, and the names of his children, and the age of the youngest. His voice echoed against the wall. They gagged him, but he continued to struggle and to work his mouth over the gag, trying to tell them. He was in the sunlight, and the firing squad was in shadow except for the helmets of the last two men on the left. When the order came, and the rifles all rose against him, like a row of toys, I couldn't watch. After the explosion, however, I had to look again, because the smell of powder was so strong and the silence so complete.

Too loudly and not very clearly an order was given. The squad came about, and I saw their faces. Most of them were set, of course, intent upon revealing nothing, even to themselves. Yet even the firmest of them stared a little too much. Two or three stumbled against the men beside them, and a boy on the end who was trying to march stiffly and with a raised face kept sagging in the knees and letting his face go almost to the point of crying before he could freeze it. The motion after the quiet started some of the prisoners weeping and cursing at their windows, and for a moment, because of his expression, I thought the sounds came from the hysterical boy. Even the officer cracked a little, looking up and yelling violently at the prisoners to be quiet. Then the sound of marching died, and there was only soft weeping at the windows, until one of the men began to scream. He stopped just as suddenly.

It all took a very short time, four or five minutes at the most; yet it still seems longer than there is any way to say, permanent, for in that time the lives of both prisoners and soldiers stopped, and when time was resumed, we had completed one life and begun another.

The dead prisoner is an unchanging monument in my mind. He still hangs there motionless against the ropes, his head forward and toward one shoulder, the knots of his gag and blindfold sticking up like white rabbit ears, the fingers of blood on his white shirt growing downward slowly and thickening at the top until they glitter in the sun. The soldiers won't forget him either. His fear conquered the place.

The other man died as I would rather die, if I am lucky enough, with his courage at the peak. He was a powerful man with a red beard. His open shirt, with the sleeves rolled up, showed the springy golden hair on his chest and arms. The guards were embarrassed because he came out as if taking a stroll, which made them stroll too. When they showed faults of nervousness in placing him, he laughed at them silently, stepped back against the stake as if measuring himself, and said it was too short for a man his size. He laughed again when the officer ordered him to shut up. He refused the blindfold, and when the officer insisted that he wear it, looked up and around at us in the windows and called, "They're afraid to look me in the eye, boys. That's the beginning. Soon we will have der Tag too." We cheered him, which must have sounded strange in the streets outside. I watched even the killing this time, for the red-bearded man made it an encouragement. But it was easier for the firing squad too. They went out in much better order than the first squad. Perhaps, because he was so calm and motionless, they were able to make him seem merely a target at the critical moment. He gave us courage, but the other, I believe, made our hate greater, and made the enemy more fearful.

So I needn't worry about how I die.

I've come to understand that my death, and all like it, are important, by enduring my memories. When you are certain to die, it changes the values of even your past life. For instance, take Annette, who is the most constant and difficult of my memories. I seldom think of her now as lying in my arms, except for some of the things she used to whisper, which have become so real that I actually hear them, and turn around expecting to touch her. And when I do think of her so, it is a quality like the whispered secrets which is important, a quality difficult to describe to a man who is still free to go back to his love in the flesh. Let me say, because I can't say it better, that it's as if a disembodied self held in its arms, with a great and sad longing for something far beyond either of us, a shapely essence of the spirit of Annette. It is perhaps this quality in my present love which makes me remember most searchingly incidents which seemed relatively trivial in their own time:

I am reading aloud a poem I have just written about her, and her mouth shows that she is touched but also amused, for Annette is clear-minded, and hears that I have been more fond than inspired—

We both shiver as her hand closes on my wrist because the orchestra is flawlessly rendering our favorite passage from Debussy—

Annette is standing in front of the striped cloth of a fruit stand, laughing at me with her eyes from over a bunch of grapes she is trying to eat quickly because they are very ripe and run wine through her fingers. She is slender, and looks competent in her suit and flat shoes, but also a little Dionysian at the moment—

Annette, walking as quickly as she is thinking, gets ahead of me in the park. When she wakes up and sees me waiting behind her, she makes a nose at me, and stands with her hands on her hips, refusing to come back. There is late sunlight and a gentle wind in the tops of the trees.

Such memories bend me like knife thrusts in the loins. It hurts even more to think how long Annette must endure them. Yet this is what makes important the end of my unimportant life. Annette will have thousands of such agonies, when she is alone and can weep, but also when she cannot weep, in the innumerable places of our city where we have been together. Annette is gentle, but not weak. Each time her love suffers again, her hate will grow stronger. This will also be true of my mother, my brother, and my friends. They will all care a little less to be alive, because I am dead. Around each of them are others whom I do not know, and around each of them others. The effects diminishing outward, they will all care less to be alive because I am dead. I will be a pebble tossed into water, the ripples circling out from me. Now multiply me by all of us who die. The toy boat which is the enemy cannot long stay afloat when the whole water moves. So really I am going to increase greatly the life I seem to give up.

It would be harder to die if I were a hostage, though hostages spread the ripples even better. The most elementary sense of justice is the nearest universal, and even dull spirits are moved when a man dies for something he didn't do. Yet the converse side of that elementary sense of justice is also strong. I feel better to have done what I'm dying for.

Or perhaps it is only that to act is a kind of triumph for me. Not many of us are naturally violent, and certainly I am not. I acted at last only because they killed my friend Jacques Labruge. Having lived most in my mind, I feared that although I was clear when we made plans, was even a leader then, I would become confused and useless when we acted. In a way I was confused. I never emerged from a dream. Familiar surroundings appeared strange, and success seemed improbable. Yet within that confusion my mind focused clearly, like a moral microscope, upon my individual duty, and because of the unreality there was simply a pleasant sensation of unexpected intellectual corroboration in seeing ideas materialize in earth, powder, and rails.

There were ten of us in the raid on the arsenal. We worked in complete darkness, and our organization and timing were exact, so that we gave no alarm and were done in six minutes.

There were twenty of us on the line outside the city. We planted a major mine and three follow-ups, spaced to include the length of the train. We ran our line to a plunger under a highway bridge nearly four hundred meters off, on the edge of a swamp. We should have left only one man to push the plunger, of course, as we had planned, but when we were ready, it was nearly time for the train, and we wanted to watch. Even then we could have made it if we hadn't been fascinated by the peasants. Our veteran leader, Frances, kept whispering at us to get out, but we wouldn't.

It was a supply train to a garrison in the city. We had watched it often, and knew there were guards on the cars. It was a strain to wait. We feared the mine wouldn't explode, and many of us, at the last instant, weren't sure we wanted it to. But Frances was on the plunger, and though he was anxious, he wouldn't hesitate. He was anxious, like a good technician, only about the timing. The long beam from the locomotive on the curve had almost picked us out when the flashlight signal came from the ridge. Frances whispered one, two, as if about to jump into cold water, and pushed home the plunger. The delay seemed long. I was about to say "dud" when a great fountain of upright flame rose out of the earth, shutting off the headlight at once, and then the three smaller fountains flared in quick succession. After the last flare came the first shaking roar, and then the other three explosions, boom, bam, bim. It was stunning under the bridge, even at that distance. Then a hissing jet of steam was rising out of the fallen locomotive into the light from the cars, which were all over too, in a long loop on the embankment, and beginning to burn slowly, crackling like heavy paper. As the light increased, it revealed trees and even distant farmhouses, and we saw the peasants coming out cautiously, stopping often. Finally they were there, minute silhouettes against the flames, plundering the cars they could get at. We were all glad of that. We of the cities have fared better than the peasants, because the enemy is afraid of hunger where there are so many of us together.

We forgot that the light exposed us too. Five were caught running in a group, and a sixth, who wouldn't stop, was shot at the edge of the marsh. I was in the willows at the edge of the marsh myself, when the searchlight of a patrol car on the highway found me. Two bullets clipped twigs near me and splashed beyond, and a voice using my own language ordered me to stop. Now I wish I had tried a dive into that muddy water. Then I did not even think. Somebody told me to stop, and I stopped. They made me raise my hands and walk up into the light, which was blinding, but they did not fire again. They were countrymen of mine. Sometimes, feeling that they, and not the enemy, mean the spiritual death of my land, to which this physical invasion is nothing, I hate their kind the most. But at least they didn't bully me. They didn't search far, either. They just wanted scapegoats, I suppose, or else they were afraid to separate in the dark.

Since I am not a hostage, it will probably be the guillotine for me, though I hope strongly for the bullet. There is something cruelly shameful about being made to lie down in public. But that again is personal. Perhaps the guillotine is better. More people will watch, and my own ripples will reach, with primary strength, many who don't know me.

There is so much of my life I want greedily to save that it is hard to stop writing, but I have told what matters, and there are only a few minutes now before the guard comes. He should be my friend who will take this out for me, but he may not be. My friend also brings me cigarettes. He is wonderful. I know how hard they are to get. I'll have one now, and it should taste better than any other in the last five days.

Land Fighting in Asia

BY DONALD W. MITCHELL

AN AMERICAN war correspondent leaving Burma shortly before the Japanese conquest gave a sick British soldier a ride to a field hospital. On the way they talked about the fighting, and at the end the Tommy said: "The bloody Japs are running us out of Burma, but we're coming back—that's sure. We won't keep on doing things wrong forever. Some day we'll wake up and get smarter than the other bloke."

In the present war few of the mistakes that cost the loss of battles and thousands of lives come to the attention of the general public. While events are occurring, they are enveloped in secrecy that is sometimes necessary and sometimes not, or the facts are distorted by government propaganda. After a campaign has been lost, the public's interest turns in some other direction, and only the historian or military professional has the desire and facilities to reconstruct a correct picture.

Nevertheless, a clear review of past mistakes is essential to prevent their repetition in the future. The soft-pedaling of disasters and exaggeration of gains which have been responsible for much ill-founded American optimism have served no useful purpose and may well boomerang against American morale. We need more statements like General Stilwell's on the Allied failure in Burma: "I claim we got a hell of a beating. . . . I think we ought to find out what caused it, go back, and retake it."

While all the facts are not available, we now know enough to do a reasonably good job of reconstructing the fighting in southeastern Asia and discovering the causes of the disaster, first in Malaya, later in Burma. Like our own commanders at Pearl Harbor, the British in the Far East owe a fair proportion of their defeats to an overconfidence based about equally on underestimation of their opponents and a smug, completely unfounded sense of superiority. Even after the Japanese had established bases in southern Indo-China and were making preliminary preparations to send forces into Thailand, British leaders felt certain that the Japanese would not dare attack them. And because of this inner certainty the actual defense measures taken at Singapore, press reports to the contrary notwithstanding, were so few that only in the last days before surrender was consideration given to air-raid shelters.

It has been the fashion to ascribe Japanese victories to overwhelming numbers. But while numbers were on Japan's side, this fact does not explain all the losses suffered by the United Nations. Lieutenant Colonel Paul Thompson, writing in the May issue of Infantry Journal, examines the Malay campaign with close attention. He finds that numbers favored the invaders only in the ratio of six divisions to four—no overwhelming superiority. Better concentration of troops, however, enabled the Japanese greatly to increase this advantage. Air and sea superiority, which the Japanese had, were not by themselves decisive. Early landings at Khota Bahru brought about an ill-guarded naval sortie which ended in the sinking of the Prince of Wales and the Repulse. Thereafter the Japanese had command of the sea on the eastern but not the western side of the peninsula. This is important because most of the landings of troops which repeatedly flanked the British positions and forced retirement were made along the west coast under the nose of the British navy, which could not stop small bodies of Japanese troops using native boats from making night landings back of the British lines. Air power came into its own only in the last stages of the campaign, when the imperial troops were crowded together in defense of Singapore, which held out for exactly a week instead of the expected several months.

The invading troops had only fair equipment, but they made use of native boats and bicycles, clothed themselves to resemble Malays, and deliberately and carefully prepared for the type of war they would encounter. The British did nothing of the sort. Cecil Brown is authority for the statement that it was only a few weeks before war broke out that British commanders discovered that flooded rice paddies could be successfully negotiated by tanks and Bren-gun carriers. Failure to destroy stocks of food greatly simplified the enemy's supply problem. Airports, boats, and in one instance a radio station were left undestroyed for use by the invader. The growth of a native fifth column to assist local Japanese guides was accelerated when at Penang the British took no pains to evacuate any but Europeans. Meanwhile, colonial administration seems to have been more stupid than usual. There was even one well-authenticated instance of a shipload of airplanes arriving at Singapore in the last stages of the siege and being sent elsewhere.

The Burma campaign shows a close resemblance to the Malayan. In its initial stages the American Volunteer Group and certain units of the R. A. F. gave the Allies actual air superiority over the invaders. But well-managed air power did not bring victory, and as the campaign continued, command of the air went to the Japanese. The numerically inferior British and Chinese troops did all that brave but poorly equipped men minus brilliant leadership could reasonably be expected to accomplish. They held their lines until flanking forces of the enemy compelled them to yield. They then fell back, obliged in many cases to fight their way through encircling forces, to make a stand at the next good position until forced to retreat still farther. Even less than in Malaya were the Allied forces prepared to fight the kind of war which the type of country necessitated. And where the Malays had been apathetic, the Burmese proved pro-Japanese and greatly aided the invading armies by murdering British civilians and reporting every movement of defending troops. The aid of veteran Chinese troops was refused until the fall of Rangoon had sealed the fate of Burma and until two Australian divisions, earmarked for Burmese service, went home instead. Without a single first-class road between Burma and India, aid from the million and a half trained Indian soldiers proved impracticable, the only reinforcements being small numbers of troops who arrived by air. After the débâcle a few left the same way, others escaped into China. But the whole Burmese campaign was for the Allies a tremendous military disaster. Japanese armies totaling around 75,000 men, and with only moderate air support, in four months and at a ridiculously low cost to themselves achieved victories of immense economic and strategic value.

The results are already apparent. The oil position of the United Nations in the Eastern Hemisphere, which was bad enough after Japan's seizure of the Dutch fields, has been made much worse by the loss of those of Burma. Iran and Iraq are now the only nearby sources of oil for an immense war effort. In the same degree the position of the Japanese has been improved. Strategically, their conquest of Burma makes it extremely unlikely that they can be immediately driven out of southeastern Asia. An attack by way of India would have to cope with extreme transportation difficulties. Here as elsewhere Japan can be defeated, but only if the Allies inflict tremendous losses in other theaters or exert far more pressure than Japan used originally.

That Japan has not committed itself to a heavy campaign in any particular zone of operations but has feinted in several directions may be due to its need of time to consolidate its gains as much as to a natural desire to mislead its opponents. Or the Japanese leaders may themselves be undecided. A campaign for possession of the iron regions of eastern India once looked likely, but the arrival of the rainy season has possibly postponed efforts in this direction. Australia and the neighboring islands are probably not valuable enough or menacing enough to be worth the major effort that would be required to reduce them provided they are not neglected by the United States. There remain Soviet Siberia and China, both weakened by war and both known to be objectives of the Japanese militarists. Preliminary moves indicate that the Japanese, true to the teachings of the Tanaka Memorial, regard China as the scene of their next major effort. Attacks along the Chinese coast have doubtless been hastened to prevent any further air raids on Japan's cities from bases in "Shangri-la." From the strategic point of view, further gains in China would destroy possible future bases of attack. From the economic point of view, China, if sufficiently exploited, can supply Japan's iron lacks as well as India could.

In fact, one of the direct results of Japan's Burmese victories is the cutting off of China from outside aid. Of all the hard lines of transport which American weapons must follow, that to China will now be by far the most difficult. Limited supplies may arrive by plane from India or be carried by primitive means of transport across the snowy plateaus of Tibet. Some war materials may still be supplied by the Soviet Union, but hardly in great quantity. As the Japanese both land troops along the coast for a fresh push inland and attempt to follow the Burma road to its destination, the fate of China takes its place among the major anxieties of the United Nations.

It is in the highest degree difficult to gauge the Chinese capacity for successful resistance. The fact that they have been fighting a losing war for five years argues ability to continue. The Chinese have proved peculiarly adept at guerrilla warfare, but they have also had the force to resist drives by Japanese armies operating far from their bases in the interior. For such resistance a certain amount of war material which the Chinese cannot produce at home is a prerequisite. Recently their armies have been able to conserve material because many Japanese divisions were withdrawn for action elsewhere. Now with the liquidation of Dutch, American, and British resistance the Japanese can turn their main armies against a China deprived of its major sources of supply. It is entirely possible that the tough, long-suffering Chinese will be able to weather the current Japanese attacks. Nevertheless, this campaign offers the greatest threat to the cause of the United Nations in Asia that has been faced up to the present. And since it is primarily a land threat, American naval and air demonstrations in the southwestern Pacific may only slightly affect its outcome.

More dangerous to our cause in the Far East than our continually deteriorating strategic position has been the caliber of our military leadership. Our foes have been more numerous, but they have also been better led. Of the military chiefs in the Far East only MacArthur has so far shown anything approaching the originality in offensive action, the mastery of men, the easy familiarity with the usual and the ability both to meet and to provide the unusual which great generalship entails. A complete lack of imagination and even of any ability to foresee the obvious, combined with consistent underestimation of an abler opponent, has brought one disaster after another in the Far East. We have lacked not only equipment and man-power but brain power as well. The Far East is not a secondary front; it is a second main front. Makeshifts and hurried improvisation have not been equal to solving our problem. Only bigger and better-trained forces, infinitely better led, can win our land wars in the Far East.

Is Lewis Licked?

BY JAMES A. WECHSLER

Washington, June 5

IT WAS supposed to be The Return of John L. Lewis. All the phlegmatic plug-uglies and the devoted machine-men and the obsequious hangers-on and the beaming relatives were present. They plodded into the basement of the United Mine Workers' Building, into the room where the walls are covered with photographs and caricatures of John L. Lewis. They listened attentively when he spoke, they applauded when he paused, they rubber-stamped his recommendations, they voted when he gave the signal to bounce Phil Murray. It was reminiscent of the old days, except for the handful of dissidents led by "Pat" Fagan, president of District 5, one of the few U. M. W. chiefs who are elected by their members rather than handpicked by John L. Lewis. It was the same show in outline, and yet it was unconvincing, lifeless. In that stuffy, smoke-filled basement John L. Lewis still was boss. But it was a pretty exclusive audience.

While this meeting of the U. M. W.'s policy committee was in session, the executive board of the C. I. O. also assembled. Lewis wasn't present. Neither were any of his loyal lieutenants or his daughter or his brother. They all had other engagements on the day that the C. I. O. executive board unanimously denounced John L. Lewis for "hampering the war effort" and branded him a "grave menace" to labor throughout the world. Nobody in the hall got up to defend the former president of the C. I. O.

For the first time Murray, the soft-spoken Scotsman whom Lewis chose to succeed him as C. I. O. president, told his story in public. He told how Lewis's agents had tried to undermine him from the moment that he assumed leadership. He told how Lewis himself had begged and bullied in an effort to persuade Murray to join the fight against Franklin D. Roosevelt's foreign policy last October. He told how organizers for District 50—Lewis's "catch-all union"—were hired on condition that they help disrupt the C. I. O. He charged that Lewis was "hell bent on creating national disunity and discontent." He insisted that he had tried to avoid a head-on collision—which was true—but that Lewis refused to tolerate support of Roosevelt by the man he envisaged as his puppet. He blasted the frail excuse—

"he has other jobs"—which Lewis had offered for ousting him from the vice-presidency of the Mine Workers.

Murray spoke with obvious reluctance and solemnity, but he was fighting mad. It had taken two years of "cold war" by Lewis and his agents to provoke this blast. This time Murray pulled no punches; he pledged himself to carry the fight to the rank-and-file of the miners, served clear notice that Lewis—for the first time since John Brophy's losing battle in 1927—faced a struggle for control of the United Mine Workers' Union.

There was a weak, if significant, retort. Twenty-four hours after his former lieutenant and "former friend" had talked back to him in headline words, Lewis accused Murray of "casting his lot with Communists" and piously declared that the issue was "the United Mine Workers of America versus communism." He indicated that unless Murray stopped associating with the Communists whom Lewis had hired for jobs and put into posts of power, the U. M. W. would take his union card away from him. After what had already happened, the threat was pretty puny. Murray had stated his readiness for a struggle that would be waged in every mining town.

So labor faces a new civil war. Lewis has lost the C. I. O.; so far he has failed to make peace with the A. F. of L. in the style that he desires. But he maintains fundamental control over a vital union. His "provisional" presidents—"provisional" means appointed by Lewis rather than elected by the membership—rule twenty of the union's thirty-one districts. To be precise, 71 per cent of the U. M. W. membership is deprived of the right to elect its own district officers. Lewis does not intend to relax this dictatorship, and the revolt against it is no simple assignment. So long as he rules the U. M. W. he remains a factor in labor politics.

More important than his control of the Mine Workers is his continuing partnership with William Hutcheson, czar of the A. F. of L. building trades. Lewis's rule of the U. M. W. saves him from oblivion; his contacts with the A. F. of L. hierarchy alone can restore him to eminence. There is pretty convincing testimony that Hutcheson inspired the newest A. F. of L. bid for "unity" with the C. I. O. It is all the more significant that Daniel J. Tobin, boss of the Teamsters, introduced the resolution which Hutcheson wanted. William Green is understood to have given Murray private assurance that he will not join in any Lewis-dictated peace scheme. But there is no assurance that Green's desires will prevail over Hutcheson's plans. The fact which is too little noticed is that Hutcheson—the A. F. of L.'s leading isolationist before Pearl Harbor and a staunch Republican fellow-traveler—still exerts major influence over A. F. of L. policy. Only the threat of condemnation by President Roosevelt has kept Hutcheson quiet in recent months. One of these days he may start talking. If he does, and if Tobin clumsily or purposefully agrees to serve Lewis's ends, the president of the United Mine Workers may raise a lot of hell before the summer ends.

It is against the background of this possibility that Lewis's current status must be weighed. In a last and desperate stroke he has invoked the slogan of anti-communism for his crusade against Murray. It is too easily forgotten that Lewis himself shared his bed with the Communists throughout the months of the Nazi-Soviet pact; the fact is that Communist influence—largely as a result of Lewis's regime—remains strong within the C. I. O. and a source of perpetual irritation to the right-wing bigwigs of the A. F. of L. A lot of other people will fall for Lewis's anti-Communist manifestos. Within the miners' union, where little awareness exists of the true issues dividing Lewis and Murray, this will become a powerful weapon. Outside the miners' union it will attract to Lewis the allegiance of diverse elements which share only their hostility to the U. S. S. R.

Lewis is the chief factor diverting labor from the war effort. He has already succeeded in shifting labor's eyes from such momentous issues as the scuttling of the tax bill to the issue of John L. Lewis. He has absorbed the attention of labor chiefs who should be worrying about production. He cannot be ignored because he thrives on the preoccupation of his enemies; he cannot be dealt with fully because there are too many other things to do. His power will not be finally shattered until he is robbed of control of the Mine Workers' Union. That can be accomplished only if Murray and his adherents are prepared to devote a large measure of their time and energy to the process in the coming months: It seems inconceivable that they can win at the coming U. M. W. convention in October. They have at least a two-year war on their hands, requiring large-scale preparation.

Lewis still retains certain assets—domination of a powerful union, close relations with high A. F. of L. leaders, ability to devote almost all his time to his private wars. These remaining resources, however, are far from overwhelming. I recite them only because the game of burying him has so often ended in disaster. Lewis is ruthless, shrewd, tough-minded—and very much alive.

Yet convincing evidence is emerging that the sweep of events has turned against him. It was no sudden surge of patriotism which prompted him, on the day that the C. I. O. board let loose its full indictment, to protest that he had not "detracted one whit or jot" from the war effort. This was his first public pronouncement since the day after Pearl Harbor. Where had he been? He had been plotting and pursuing his personal feuds. He had been raiding C. I. O. unions. He had been firing organizers who refused to join the anti-Murray cabal. He had been noisily buying war bonds while other union leaders mapped plans for expanded production.

But the swift and sudden C. I. O. attack forced him into the open. He even extended full support, in one sentence, to the "commander-in-chief" in the prosecution of the war. After ten days of intense deliberation his policy committee emerged with the resolute declaration that it was in favor of defeating the Axis. The gestures may seem slight, but they were a sign of Lewis's retreat. He had hoped to sit this one out; he was forced to stand up and get in line.

The man he fears most is still President Roosevelt. I am reliably informed that F. D. R. was drafting a letter praising Murray and condemning his critics on the morning that Lewis, altering his own time-table, abruptly removed Murray from the vice-presidency of the United Mine Workers. By ignoring the pending charges against Murray and invoking his arbitrary constitutional authority, Lewis forestalled the President's move. The haste was a measure of his uneasiness. And Roosevelt's opposition to any new Lewis dream is a major barrier against its realization.

Simultaneously he faces a full-fledged revolt within District 50 of the U. M. W., which he originally conceived of as the foundation for a new labor empire. When the vote on the ouster of Murray by the executive board was ordered, only one man said "no." It was Martin Wagner, former president of District 50 and later its representative on the executive board. When Wagner was booted upstairs last summer he didn't break with the Lewis machine, but he told intimates, "Some day I'll cast a vote that will vindicate me." He did. Now Wagner has resigned from the U. M. W. and is leading in the establishment of an independent union embracing the rebellious District 50 locals. The insurgents already have enlisted more than half the district's membership of about 26,000. Only the dairy farmers' unit—"the cowboys"—shunned the revolt. Lewis's surviving fragment of the "new labor movement" is now led almost exclusively by goons and sycophants with little talent or enterprise of their own.

The recent convention of the steelworkers' union was a further rebuff to Lewis. In key areas steel plants parallel coal mines; and the steel union indisputably belongs to Murray. Although Lewis tried to build a bloc against Murray, the effort was a dismal failure, as was shown by the long and tumultuous booing which oblique references to Lewis evoked on the convention floor. When Murray and his cohorts launch their campaign in the miners' union, the sentiment of steel will make itself felt.

So Lewis remains a diversion and a danger, but he is on the defensive. Through his hatred for Roosevelt he has lost any chance to play a part in the worldwide war against fascism. He is once again the emissary of reactionary Republicans to the labor movement; their weaknesses are his. He is labor's unhappiest warrior, looking for battlegrounds on which to carry out his local personal maneuvers. Having shared his bed with the Communists for long and ardent months, he will now carry on a red-baiting drive throughout the nation; there will be no attempt to distinguish between orthodox Stalinists and supporters of the Soviet armies. He has borrowed the celebrated tactic of rule or ruin; in the coming months there is little chance that he will rule.

RALPH B. STRASSBERGER, who has been associated with fascists like Manfred Zapp and George Sylvester Viereck, has just been elected to the Board of Directors of the New York Chamber of Commerce. When the German White Paper on Poland appeared, Strassberger financed its publication by ordering 17,000 copies. Last year he gave $500,000 to Vichy French relief organizations.

THE COMMUNIST PARTY is expelling members who do not buy war bonds and stamps. An Oregon Communist was the first to go under this ruling.

REPRESENTATIVE WILLIAM D. BARRY of Queens County, New York, is adept at working both sides of the street. He is so open an appeaser that he said not long before Pearl Harbor. "Not only can we trade with Hitler but we can make a nice profit doing it." But he also attended the Free World dinner of a month ago. Although all the speakers and most of the guests were Barry's political enemies, the Queens isolationist applauded every speech and said that he thought the Free World group was doing "a great job."

AN EXPLANATION now current in Washington of the discrepancy between the Bridges and Browder cases is that the President knew weeks ago that Biddle intended to deport Bridges but for reasons best known to himself decided not to interfere. In order at least to even the scales he freed Browder.

HENRY FORD will testify in favor of a new federal prohibition law before the Senate on June 22. Ford and others who will appear have been invited by Senators Bilbo, Capper, and O'Daniel. . . . The source of a good deal of the present anti-liquor agitation is said to be the International Temperance Union, whose headquarters are in Switzerland. Robert Herrod, a Swiss Nazi, is head of the organization, and much of the material in prohibition literature now circulating is drawn from books and articles by him.

THE NEW YORK POST has stopped demanding that the Senate investigate its charges that Senator David I. Walsh frequented a low dive in Brooklyn that was a hangout for Nazi agents. . . . A Washington grand jury has stopped its examination of evidence on Hamilton Fish's alleged connections with Nazi agents, for no publicly stated reasons.

America's Task in Asia

AMERICA IN THE NEW PACIFIC. By George E. Taylor. The Macmillan Company. $1.75.

BECAUSE the United States assiduously exported to the Far East ideas, ideals, and standards which were utterly antagonistic to Japan's ideas and way of life, this country is now forced to fight a war for survival and for the future ideological domination of a reawakening Asia. That, in brief, is the central argument and inspiration for "America in the New Pacific," an arresting and penetrating study of our conflict with Japan, the causes of that conflict, and some of the tremendous issues which will have to be faced when we have won the war.

Mr. Taylor spent two years in the Far East, largely in Japan, North China, and Manchuria, and besides traveling widely gained a valuable background by teaching in several Chinese universities. His, therefore, is not one of the catch-as-catch-can assessments of the problem of the Orient but a thoughtful study based upon real information and valuable contacts.

This is not one of the too plentiful "my country, right or wrong" books. In fact, the author frankly states that Americans are entitled to a bad conscience because they failed to act decisively before Japan had reduced millions of Chinese to death and starvation, before the Japanese Empire developed an industrial base in Manchuria, and "before it threw the subject peoples of Southeast Asia into a bloody and devastating war."

Mr. Taylor holds that we could not properly plead ignorance concerning Japan's methods and intentions. Formosa, Korea, Manchuria, and China told the tale with shocking clarity, he says, and he charges Japan's militarists with smashing political parties, destroying trade unions, steadily reducing the standard of living at home in order to purchase munitions abroad. Such people, he says, can hardly be expected to spread prosperity, education, social reform, and free competition in the lands they overrun.

Ultimate conflict between the United States and Japan was inevitable, the book declares, because this country exported a belief in the possibility of the rising standard of living, the assumption that all men should have freedom to use the raw materials of the world to acquire wealth, and the conviction that freedom of enterprise jointly benefits the individual and the state. American policy, it is contended, was in the main based upon the theory that this country's safety and prosperity would be enhanced as more and more peoples of the Far East became westernized in thought and ways under free political institutions.

Britain's present desperate plight as an imperial and colonial power is shrewdly assayed. Mr. Taylor declares that the British have taken with them to their colonies the weapons for their own eventual defeat—the ideas of law, of nationalism, and of political democracy. Even if Britain yields to native demands only under pressure, such yielding, he argues, is vastly better than what subject peoples could expect from Japan. Would Nehru have been left alive by Japanese rulers, he asks? Does Japan introduce education which cultivates "dangerous thoughts"? And then he points out with devastating sarcasm that there is a vast difference between forcing health and sanitary measures upon subject peoples and forcing them to buy opium and use narcotics.

Going back to historical beginnings, the author says that we in 1942 are now called upon to complete a struggle for place, power, and prestige in the Far East which we began in 1853 when we forced the opening of Japan. Nearly a century ago, seeking to anticipate the British, we forced Japan to abandon its long isolation. At that time we sought coaling stations and naval bases to insure the safety of our trade route to China. Today, he says, we are fighting Japan for the leadership of Asia—"the highest stakes man has ever conceived—the future of Asia and all its people." We are fighting, we are told, to prevent the "predatory monopoly state of Japan from conquering the raw materials and harnessing the labor power of Asia for further conquests."

The point is well made that the Asiatic peoples already dominated by Japan, as well as those subject to Britain, Holland, and France, look to this country for leaders and champions in their fight for freedom or autonomy. The following excerpts from Mr. Taylor's book are of extreme significance:

> It would be quite possible to fight and win the war without the assistance and even with the sullen opposition of the people of Asia. The other choice is to enlist, so far as possible, the good-will and cooperation of Asiatic peoples against Japan, to pay the price that will be demanded, and, if necessary, to compel our allies to do the same. . . .
> The British and Dutch empires can accept change forced upon them, but they have too much imperial history to lead a movement which can organize and vitalize the peoples of Asia who are threatened by Japan. They can follow, if it is clear they must. . . . They will not accept American solutions of the problems of Asia with a genial glow of good-will, but they will modify their imperial position if they have to.

Japan's war aims are analyzed with skill and insight. The author declares that according to the Japanese formula the "emancipation of the yellow race" means in essence stamping out all traces of the Americanization of education in the Orient, all traces of European liberalism, and all traces of Soviet communism. American forms of government and law must be outlawed, as must Christianity, labor legislation, civil liberties, and the eventual emancipation of women. The Japanese state is defined as a combination of political and economic monopoly, which is compelled to eliminate all competing ideas and to crush all intellectual movements threatening its stability at home or its conquests abroad.

"America in the New Pacific" might well be prescribed as "must" reading for all those who believe that a compromise peace with Japan is now or ever will be possible. It is a book which ably exposes our past errors of policy and with equal ability expounds some of the obligations with which we are almost certain to be saddled when we have won the war.

NEW POEMS: 1942. AN ANTHOLOGY OF BRITISH AND AMERICAN VERSE. Edited by Oscar Williams. Peter Pauper Press. $3.

THE second of Mr. Williams's anthologies may be a little better than the first, published last year as "New Poems: 1940," though I cannot find anything in the new one that strikes me as quite up to Empson's Missing Dates, which seems to me a poem in a lifetime. But comparison of the two collections is not profitable. What, rather, is the merit of this book, and what purpose does it serve? Does it make current enough good poetry to justify it? I think that it does. I do not like anthologies, but I like anthologies better than nothing. For this is an age in which they are peculiarly valuable: books by young poets, and some books by older poets, do not sell. It is a difficulty easy to take advantage of, and we must be suspicious of new anthologists. Last year I was suspicious of Mr. Williams. Now I am convinced of his disinterested purposes, as I think anyone must be who has read his Introduction to "New Poems: 1942."

It is something at any rate to have given us, in the midst of the greatest war, eight or ten very fine poems. At the Grave of Henry James is the best Auden, though it is a little stuffed in places. Jarrell's 90 North and Shapiro's Scyros ought to prove to the most obdurate that we have at least two young poets—both are under thirty—who could have more than held their own back in the twenties, which are now referred to as the good old days of poetry. Blackmur's Missa Vocis is very Yeatsian, more than it needs to be, but it remains a very good poem. I miss here Warren's Terror, which must have been available—it is Warren's best poem—yet the four pieces representing this poet are among his best and ought to remind us of the injustice which has kept his reputation somewhat private. Miss Rukeyser's Ajanta, a poem based upon a Hindu myth, I admire greatly: it has a close texture and controlled rhythms; and the poetry is all in the poem, not three-fourths of it participating merely by allusion to some field of Miss Rukeyser's sympathies, like the proletariat or airplanes. (I confess that Miss Rukeyser's poetry has hitherto bored me.) W. R. Rodgers's End of a World is interesting, but beyond the fact that it is a war poem I do not know what it is; I like it line by line, but having read it four times without being able to remember anything in it, I begin to suspect that the fault is not wholly mine.

The poems by Jarrell, Shapiro, and Rodgers are all war poems. There are other war poems which I shall not cite, but I shall cite two more, making four (counting Rodgers out), very brilliant examples of war verse. One of the best poems of this war was written in 1932, The Return, by John Peale Bishop; it has been published many times, but I think that Mr. Williams is right in claiming it as new. It is one of the leading poems of our time. Horace Gregory's Voices of Heroes has a very good chance to survive as the best poem by an American which has been directly prompted by this war. It is nonsense to complain that we are not getting good war poetry. Unless my memory betrays me, it is better than the poetry of the last war. Its range is greater; it takes in more of the total human experience; there is now much less of think-only-this-of-me, and a more intelligent awareness that war poetry ought to be poetry, not merely complaint.

Not all the verse in this book is good, or even good enough to be in it; much of it is the price we've had to pay for Auden's best, which, imitated, sounds like his worst. I have singled out some of the good things in order to correct a balance in favor of the poets, who are good enough today for any age. In times of peace the industrialists, the bankers, and the statesmen get credit for "civilization"; in time of war the imaginative writer gets credit for its fall. This hollow and possibly ominous nonsense will prevail for a while, but unless Mr. Williams wished to convict Mr. MacLeish of special pleading in connection with the Proust-caused-the-fall-of-France theory, I can see no reason for the presence of MacLeish's The Spanish Dead in this book. It is the worst poem in it; it is hortatory, insipid, and unfinished. Let us, in kindness to MacLeish, hold the belief that although the poets are not irresponsible, his own verse has gone sour for a while.

There is good new work by Stevens (not his best), by Spender and Thomas and Spencer, but not, alas, by Schwartz and MacNeice. Three new women poets will bear watching: Jean Garrigue, Gene Derwood, and Ruth Herschberger. I hope that Mr. Williams will do this job again.

History of Canada

A SHORT HISTORY OF CANADA FOR AMERICANS. By Alfred Leroy Burt. University of Minnesota Press. $3.

WHY do historians write histories—to trace the causes of contemporary unheavals back to their sources in previous generations, or merely to tell the story of the past? If the first answer is correct, then Dr. A. L. Burt's latest book on Canada, "A Short History of Canada for Americans," is a notable failure, but if the second answer is correct it is a notable success. Dr. Burt is a native Canadian who is now professor of history at the University of Minnesota. He tells the story of Canada's origin and growth in lucid and readable prose. Much that he has to say about Canada's part in the American Revolution and the War of 1812 will be new to his American public; all of it will be interesting.

But how does it happen that Canada, which has been close to the American New Deal for ten years, is the least progressive of all the English-speaking nations? This is no rhetorical question. It is a factual one which people who write books about Canada ought to get their teeth into. It is a question which should intrigue historians, because Canada was once the most liberal of countries. Its western provinces pioneered in workmen's compensation, in mother's allowances, in social services. But a blight descended upon our social consciousness; radicalism became conservativism. Something has happened to Canada, and the something is not good.

Even to begin to discuss Canada's retrogression in a book review is impossible. The best I can do is to mention several of Dr. Burt's rather glaring omissions. The first is the great Winnipeg general strike of 1919. This strike was broken, but during its six weeks it was one of the solidest and wildest ever staged. In it was the culmination of the ideological war which had raged in the organized labor movement for a decade. It was the war between craft and industrial unionism which in the United States led to the Congress of Industrial Organizations. In Canada it led to the One Big Union. After the failure of the Winnipeg strike the O. B. U. was beaten, and the craft unions triumphed.

Until the strike unionism was on the march. After the strike it went into a decline from which it is only now emerging. The hatreds spawned by the strike still flourish in Canada. Even today an Ontario industrial or mining magnate will froth at the mouth at the mere mention of unionism or the C. I. O. The labor movement is still hopelessly divided and will probably remain that way until its present leaders die.

There is no mention anywhere in this book of these important facts. Neither is there any mention of the American industrialization of Canada. Gustavus Myers's monumental study, "History of Canadian Wealth," is missing from the bibliography. We recommend it to Dr. Burt and to all other writers of books on Canada.

JAMES H. GRAY

Orphans of the Western Star

THE WIND BLEW FROM THE EAST: A STUDY IN THE ORIENTATION OF AMERICAN CULTURE. By Ferner Nuhn. Harper and Brothers. $3.

BOOKS about every conceivable aspect of American life and culture have been coming out thick and fast these last few years, but their common fault is that they are mostly written out of the war-time impulse to inflate the national ego. The business of journalists is to cash in on emergencies, and nowadays the American subject matter is yielding high dividends. Happily, it can be said of Ferner Nuhn's volume that its quality is altogether of a finer sort. As a critical effort it has scale, and sufficient insight and seriousness to merit close scrutiny. The pieties that possess Mr. Nuhn run deep, and without speaking at the moment of what he finally makes of them, one can still say that he carries forward the search for America in the spirit of that vital company of native writers to whom the American character presented itself historically as a "fascinating" problem. The effects of this fascination, of this tall measure of devotion, are writ large in our critical literature. Most of the famous testaments of our cultural history owe to it their verve in undertaking successively fresh appraisals of the New World experience; it serves at once as their goad and their charm. Its operation is everywhere manifest in such works as Emerson's "American Scholar," Whitman's "Democratic Vistas," James's biography of Hawthorne, Adams's "Education," the letters and essays of Randolph Bourne, and the passionate preachments of Van Wyck Brooks in the earlier period of his career, prior to his fall into the desperately amiable ancestor-worship of the "Flowering" and "Indian Summer."

Working under this spell, Mr. Nuhn's critical voice takes on the resonance of a close association with his antecedents. At the same time he is not unselective in his approach to the past. In his straight-out, one might say in his functional, loyalties he takes his stand almost exclusively with Emerson and Whitman—the true "votaries of the Western star." But in this first volume, which we are told is the opening part of a trilogy whose object is to fathom anew the American socio-cultural tradition, he is mainly concerned, after establishing a few basic definitions, with the fate of the New World spirit when it returns to the Old World inheritance, when it listens to the alluring "message of the East Wind"—the message of wealth, ease, and grace, aristocratic form and ancient status. To illustrate this side of what he calls the "two-way pull in American culture," or the East-versus-West argument, he chooses three men who, as against Emerson and Whitman, might well be named the orphans of the Western star: Henry James, Henry Adams, and T. S. Eliot. And Mr. Nuhn chooses them not simply because they went back—"to Mother England, Mother Church, and twelfth-century France"—but because he believes that we are still mystified as to precisely in what character they turned away from their native land. "There is a kind of enchantment," he writes, "about these pilgrimages, a witchery of the time and place dimensions."

What interests him in his three leading figures is, above all, the complex and contradictory psychology of their work. Mr. Nuhn's chief aptitude seems to be for psychological analysis of the historical and national meanings of literary art. His method receives its fullest elaboration in the chapter on James, which is easily the best in the book. Though by no means the most complete study of this novelist, it is in some respects the most far-reaching and brilliant, it seems to me, that has so far appeared: and that, in view of the very extensive critical comment on James that has become available in the past few decades, is saying a good deal. Mr. Nuhn is not dazzled by James's lustrous plumage of high civilization or by his pure-art ceremonials; nor does he permit his strongly "American" bias to push him into that systematic misunderstanding and denigration of James to which critics like Parrington and Brooks have been impelled—the former by a narrow sociological emphasis and the latter by an obscure and unhealthy emotion of nationalist self-inclosure. In this new estimate James retains his central position as an archetypal American character and as a very great artist; yet he is shown to be entangled in an "unbroken web of illusion," shown to be inhabiting an "enchanted kingdom" whose princes and princesses have the faculty of turning into wizards and witches. This insight is demonstrated with uncommon skill in the long commentary on "The Golden Bowl," which is here for once dissected in such a way as to expose the life within its encrusted artistry. The conclusion is that "as the bride of art James had torn the veil. . . . As the bride of life, however, he tended to leave the mystery all the more mysterious." This gives us a James all the better able to survive the test of time because he is not artificially purged of his contradictions, and one in whom a number of conflicting critical valuations are finally, though perhaps somewhat precariously, reconciled.

The analysis of Adams is almost equally good, though not nearly so definitive. He is pictured as a man torn between the Law of the Fathers and the Law of the Mothers, who at last found in the image of the Virgin a historical sanction for his ultimate choice. It is in the chapter on Eliot, however, that crucial weaknesses of argument and attitude come to light. The exegesis of "The Waste Land" adds very little to what other students have already discovered, while the approach to Eliot's work as a whole is distorted by a peculiar animosity which must be characterized as an inexcusable lapse not only from good taste but from justice. The point is that, despite all his strivings, Mr. Nuhn fails to place Eliot within his American perspective as securely as he places James and Adams, and this is perhaps one source of his animus. One can grant him his observation that Eliot dropped his New England–Middle Western heritage "too completely for nature or truth," but in itself this dark fact casts no shadow on the worth of his poems or on the validity of his aesthetic and metaphysical ideas. These must surely be probed on their own ground, which is that of the total modern problem and not of any special American revelation. Yet even so, Mr. Nuhn discloses a certain side of Eliot which has hitherto been but meagerly considered.

To my mind this book stands or falls by what it specifically contributes to our understanding of its three central "characters." For in so far as it attempts to work out a new synthesis, I cannot see where it succeeds. The last chapter, for instance, given over as it is to an all-inclusive discussion of the national scene and outlook, strikes me as oracular and Emersonian in the bad sense. But to judge Mr. Nuhn's position fairly, we must wait for the completion of his trilogy.

Questions and Answers

THE UNFINISHED TASK: ECONOMIC RECONSTRUCTION FOR DEMOCRACY. By Lewis Corey. The Viking Press. $3.

THE STRENGTH OF NATIONS: A SOCIAL SURVEY. By George Soule. The Macmillan Company. $2.50.

THESE books are signs of the resilience of the human mind in the face of crisis, and of the courage with which men of thought, even at the cost of logical structures which they themselves have erected, seek new values when the old have failed them. Both Mr. Corey and Mr. Soule have had the fortitude to search for new intellectual foundations and to begin to build again.

"The Strength of Nations" is the less ambitious of the two books, because it only asks questions, but in a way it is the more radical, because the questions are devastating. Mr. Soule challenges the self-sufficiency of the compartmented scientific disciplines. His purpose is to blast away the priestly ritual by which scientists in any field, but particularly social scientists, have abstracted their dogma from the lore of mankind and from the continuity of energy, matter, and life. He feels that all forms of knowledge are interdependent, and that the sciences can and should be arranged in a progression, from the inorganic (chemistry, physics) through the organic (medicine, psychiatry) to the super-organic (economics, sociology). He suggests certain principles, such as the first and second law of thermodynamics, which apply to all sciences; but in practice his most fruitful comparisons bridge the gap between psychiatry and the social sciences.

Mr. Soule is a universalist trying to see life whole. He knows that each scientific discipline is an abstraction—by derivation a "drawing away from"; and he seeks to replace in the context from which they were taken those qualities which have been drawn away from the totality of life for specialized study. The results are stimulating but necessarily a little vague. Anyone is welcome to take up where Mr. Soule leaves off.

Mr. Corey is more ambitious; he tries to supply systematic answers at least in tentative form. He is less radical because he has tried to revise ingrown, compartmented economic theory from only one new frame of reference; but that new frame is so important that it has demanded of him the courage to change his entire point of view, and in particular to cast out much of the Marxist dogma in which he formerly believed. The value which he sets above all others is freedom. He is concerned with both political and economic freedom, with the freedom of groups as well as of individuals. Conversely, he hates all massive, centralized power, whether it occurs in the state or in industry. He feels that the vicious core of all dictatorships is that both political and economic power have come to rest in the hands of a single unchecked oligarchy. (For Mr. Soule it is complete emotional dependence on the father image.) The first principle of his program, therefore, is the separation of economic and political power.

This, however, is not the familiar conservative cry of hands off business. Corey has no intention of allowing business to continue on its own regressive way of monopoly, of enforced scarcity, of unemployment, and of cyclical depressions. His second principle is that a way must be devised to break monopoly power, to democratize industry, and to force it to produce continuously and abundantly. Now it is easy to develop the first principle without the second; this is the conservative program. It is also easy to develop the second principle without the first; this is the social-planning program, to which most progressives today adhere. The ambitious task which Corey has set himself is the systematic development of economic arrangements which will satisfy both. He wants full production without bureaucratic controls.

Corey, like almost every other economist not on the pay roll of a bank, agrees that our failure to reach and maintain full production is traceable to an unbalance between saving and investment. To correct this unbalance, one can either increase investment, which enhances the material well-being of the community, or decrease savings, which creates a maximum of stability at the expense of progress. Most progressives believe that we must stimulate new investment either by pressure on business or by direct government investment. Mr. Corey rules out the former by an elaborate and, to me, unconvincing demonstration of the inevitable diminishment of opportunities for new investment; and he denounces the latter on the ground that it leads to totalitarianism by combining economic and political power in the same hands.

He therefore searches for a means of reducing savings. It is regrettable, since he lays so much emphasis on this, that he has not undertaken a statistical analysis of the flow of all savings in the community; he is a master at that sort of investigation. Instead, he proposes arbitrarily to bar one group, the large monopoly corporations and their stockholders, from saving by transforming a thousand or so of these giants into public corporations. The sins of the monopolies are many, and I have no desire to defend them; but it seems to me that when Corey avowedly attacks them as excessive savers, he really is reacting against the unchecked and irresponsible power of their executives, which is another matter entirely and should be differently handled. Corey charges that by means of all the familiar devices the monopoly corporations make excessive profits, but he does not show that they have accumulated swollen balances of uninvested savings. It is true that he refers to the concentration of ownership, but if it is the stockholders who are doing much of the saving (as they are), then the problem is one of the economic behavior of wealthy individuals, which may be modified in ways other than those which Mr. Corey proposes. Furthermore, there is a basic contradiction in the analysis: it claims both that investment opportunities are falling and that the rate of profit is too high. This confusion infects details: for instance, on page 250 Corey states that monopolies need little if any new capital from the public, while on page 251 he charges them with piling up too many new capital claims.

Corey's ideal public corporation resembles the TVA. Small industry he wishes to leave alone. In the large corporations technical and managerial skills will be unleashed for full production with a minimum of interference from government or, for that matter, from labor. He provides a valuable attack on Burnham's notion that technical managerial dominance must lead to fascism. He would set goals of full production at low cost for management, and reward performance. He would allow enough profit to take care of replace-

Whether the government would ever be repaid its capital investment, or even reimbursed for current interest, Corey does not say. It would be interesting to know if such charges could be met without making the public corporations behave very much like their private fellows.

And what is to prevent the managerial experts from juggling replacement reserves and maintenance charges, just as corporations now do, to obtain the desired fiscal results? Government supervision, perhaps? But would that not place ultimate power exactly where Corey does not want it? And thus would not Corey's program not only fail to improve politically upon that of the advocates of government investment, but actually be inferior to it economically? In the end the question of progressive economic arrangements in a democracy is not whether we should establish a strong central authority but simply whether such authority can be subjected to the control of the people. Mr. Jefferson

JEFFERSON. By Saul K. Padover. Harcourt, Brace and Company. $4.

THOMAS JEFFERSON: WORLD CITIZEN. By Senator Elbert D. Thomas. Modern Age Books. $2.75.

APRIL 13 of this year was the 199th anniversary of the birth of the most remarkable man this country has yet produced, and one of the most remarkable of any country. One "of the choice ones of the earth," Mrs. Abigail Adams called him. He was a statesman equal to our greatest; he was also a revolutionary, philosopher, philanthropist, agriculturalist, inventor, musician, architect, cultivated man of the world, and great democrat. "Too much in earnest in his democracy," said Alexander Hamilton, in a phrase which tells as much about its author as about Jefferson.

Senator Thomas quotes James Truslow Adams as saying that "without Hamilton the new nation might have disintegrated." That may be true, but it seems more certainly true that, as Mr. Adams goes on to say, "without Jefferson it would have lost its soul and that faith which has made it different from others." That faith is a belief in the rights of man based on confidence in the ordinary man. Jefferson's whole political philosophy was founded on a belief in the universal validity of the distinction between right and wrong—"I know of but one code of morality for men, whether acting singly or collectively." A generation which sees this principle challenged on a scale hitherto scarcely imagined may take heart from his comment on Bonaparte: had he "reflected that such is the moral construction of the world that no national crime passes unpunished in the long run, he would not now be in the cage of St. Helena."

Senator Thomas not only considers Jefferson the great antithesis of Machiavelli as a political philosopher; he compares him as a moral philosopher to Confucius. Certainly in their views on the supreme value of education they had much in common. But Jefferson had a firm belief in progress; and in this, as in his flexibility, his universality, and his intellectual curiosity, as well as in the philosophical balance and spiritual harmony remarked by Mr. Padover, "one of the few individuals who can compare with him . . . was his contemporary, the German poet Goethe." If he lacked Goethe's emotional depth and original creative genius, he equaled him in the qualities just mentioned and far surpassed him as a citizen and a man of action. And his simplicity of character was natural where Goethe's was perhaps achieved.

How truly extraordinary his simplicity was is best shown in the often-quoted epitaph which he composed for the small obelisk he wished placed over his grave at Monticello: "Here Was Buried Thomas Jefferson, Author of the Declaration of American Independence, of the Statute of Virginia for Religious Freedom, and Father of the University of Virginia." He was also Minister to France, Secretary of State, Vice-President, and twice President of the United States; but it did not occur to Jefferson, philosopher and friend of mankind, to think of these opportunities for service as distinctions. "It seemed," wrote a French traveler, the Marquis de Chastellux, "as if from his youth he had placed his mind, as he has done his house, on an elevated situation, from which he might contemplate the universe."

If neither Senator Thomas's nor Mr. Padover's book contains all of Jefferson, they complement each other admirably. The latter is a full-length biography of Jefferson the man, the former a series of topical studies of Jefferson the political and moral philosopher, by a political disciple. Senator Thomas is inclined to sermonize, and the total impression produced is thus one of paraphrase. Mr. Padover conveys a very clear picture of Jefferson as a person as he appeared in action. He makes a few rather one-sided historical assumptions—about the Monroe Doctrine, for example—and lays a good deal of emphasis on timely parallels. Both books lack the distinction of style which their subject deserves. Mr. Padover sometimes lapses into colloquialisms and journalese. Senator Thomas's style is tinged with what Byron, a contemporary of Jefferson's later years, called "enthusiasm." Nevertheless, both books are interesting and important reading for these critical times. Together they reveal a great man who lived through eighty-three years of one of the most critical periods in history and never lost faith in the triumph of democracy. "It is part of the American character," he once wrote his daughter, "to consider nothing as desperate, to surmount every difficulty by resolution and contrivance."

IN BRIEF

THE UNVANQUISHED. By Howard Fast. Duell, Sloan, and Pearce. $2.50.

The unvanquished of Mr. Fast's latest novel are the American Revolutionary army and its commander-in-chief, and if it is a far cry from the lifeless Father of His Country on which most of us were brought up to Mr. Fast's troubled and humble Virginia foxhunter, we are all the more moved by the new portrait. Mr. Fast has wisely limited his narrative to the awful period between the defense of Brooklyn Heights and the march on Trenton, and he gives us a Washington unequal in everything but spirit to the burden that was put upon him, a leader who, for instance, comforted himself through a sleepless night by feeling for the familiar pockmarks on his face. Mr. Fast's book is full of happy touches, and without implying any disparagement of a mature and well-documented novel, one finds in it something of the refreshing quality of a talented child's painting.

MUD ON THE STARS. By William Bradford Huie. L. B. Fischer. $2.75.

This is an accurate, disturbing social-political document of the South. Garth Lafavor comes from an old Alabama family which has fought in every generation for what it considers the American way of life. The present-day Garth sets out to find a present-day American way for which he too can fight, and in the course of his education brushes up against the extremes of social and economic struggle—race violence and union gangsterism, black reaction and ruthless radicalism. Fighting the TVA, which inundates his family lands, he learns that the government has to desert the few for the many; when he becomes a newspaperman in Birmingham and what he himself calls a "fascist whelp," he discovers that he has helped lynch two of his own Communist friends. At the end, with America at war, Garth has joined the army, pledged to destroy the enemies of democracy wherever he finds them. Mr. Huie calls his book a novel and insists in a preface that it is not autobiographical, but he supplies us with a dust-jacket sketch of his own life which corresponds with the life of his protagonist far too closely for comfort. Garth Lafavor's history is certainly not the less frightening for being familiar, nor is his final regeneration the more reassuring because what precedes it is told with disarming honesty: one wonders how far a person bred in prejudice and temperamentally so mercurial can be trusted even though he has confessed his sins and joined one's own team!

Drama Note

RAY BOLGER appears to have the time of his life as the warrior's husband in "By Jupiter" (Shubert Theater). The double meanings in the play about the Amazons and the Greeks, about Hercules and Diana, become triple when Mr. Bolger minces across the stage. (Needless to say one of the lines is "Boy meets girdle.") His light feet, faun face, insinuating—and wonderfully deft—movements, and his pretty costumes make the allusion complete. The Amazons who support him are good providers, particularly the blonde queen, Hippolyta (Benay Venuta) and her sister, Antiope, another smaller blonde (Constance Moore) who is shapely and has a very sweet voice. The invading Greeks are so handsome that they look like musical-comedy characters—except for Hercules and Homer, who are slapstick. Bolger himself drops into slapstick occasionally, but on the whole he carries off the much more difficult feat of balancing precariously on the edge of it.

Bolger's performance and the plot give zest and shape to what is in other respects a well-mounted musical hit designed by professionals who know what the summer trade demands in legs, leers, and lyrics. The tunes are pleasant, though none of them get caught in one's head. The funny lyrics are not quite clever enough; the best song in the show is the rather old-fashioned "Nobody's Heart Belongs to Me."

THE STORY OF THE STRANGEST JOURNEY EVER MADE ON THE FACE OF THE EARTH

RAGE IN SINGAPORE

By DAVID GEORGE KIN

Kin reached Singapore a few weeks before Pearl Harbor; Penang, only two days before the Japs descended upon it. With his wife he joined the thousands of natives and British colonials swept down the Malay Peninsula by the fathomless terror of the Japs.

▪ What becomes of privacy, decency, and personal morality in general during such an emergency? RAGE IN SINGAPORE is not only an eye-witness account of the first retirement of the West in the East, it is also a withering record of the multiplicity of shock, cruelty, treachery, insane terror and unbridled lust which attended it.

▪ "Mr. Kin saw so much that was incredible," says the New York Sun, devoting to RAGE IN SINGAPORE the whole third column of its editorial page of May 21, "that the incredible becomes the usual, and he has told it as such. The impact of the method is terrific. Mr. Kin is a master of incident and atmosphere, and with these he has painted a terrifying panorama."

▪ The Cauldron of Asia Boils Over, the author has subtitled his book, but as you read, the picture expands irresistibly into your own life. You see the Jap marauders promenading with their over-painted Geishas; the Warehouse where women are daily auctioned off to soldiers as well as merchants; the field workers humbly offering their wives to their masters over the week-end; the Javanese virgins simulating love against the stone images of their temples; the Sakais who live in trees but come down to earth for their pleasures; and countless other exposures of human nature at its simplest and wildest; and you realize that this is, indeed, the whole pot of humanity simmering and boiling over.

▪ Originally planned as a limited edition book for subscribers at $10 a copy, RAGE IN SINGAPORE is being made available to the public at $3.00.

MUSIC

NEW YORK'S Metropolitan Museum of Art put on a special show of Rembrandt's paintings and etchings during the past winter; and the New York Philharmonic-Symphony Society, which has the same function in relation to music as the Metropolitan has to the plastic arts, put on a special six-concert show of Beethoven's nine symphonies, his Missa Solemnis, several of his overtures, and the Triple Concerto. Since a piece of music, unlike a painting, must be ever newly created as a form in living sound, the special character of the Philharmonic-Symphony Society's Beethoven show consisted partly in its choice of Toscanini to create the forms of Beethoven's works for the six concerts. And the choice was justified by the plastic beauty, the emotional significance and power of the forms he produced.

Though the concerts were interesting primarily for their presentations of Beethoven's works, they were interesting incidentally for other things. Involved in the presentations was the New York Philharmonic-Symphony Orchestra, to which, in the ten or more seasons that he had conducted it, Toscanini had given a discipline, a sound, a style as distinctive as those of the Philadelphia Orchestra when conducted by Stokowski, or of the Boston Symphony when conducted by Koussevitzky. This discipline, sound, and style had departed from the orchestra when he had departed in 1936; and it was interesting to note their return with him at these Beethoven concerts. One would have supposed they had returned only after laborious inch-by-inch rehearsal; but actually nothing at the concerts was more breath-taking than what happened at the first moments of the first rehearsal, when Toscanini, with no preliminaries, simply began to conduct the orchestra for the first time after six years, and the orchestra began at once to play as though the interval had been only one day—when, that is, he began to convey his wishes through those largely moulding movements of the right arm, those subtly inflecting movements of the left hand, and the orchestra began to produce the razor-edge attacks, the radiant and beautifully shaped sonorities, the sharply contoured phrases, the transparent textures of balanced woodwinds or strings which those movements had elicited in April, 1936. For minutes at a time he continued to conduct and the orchestra continued to play in this way; only after such long stretches were there halts to go back and correct an imperfect balance, an unprecise rhythm, a wrong accent at one point, or work out the contour of a phrase at another; and at the end of one early rehearsal he turned to the finale of the First Symphony and, leading the orchestra through it without interruption, produced the performance of six or seven years ago in all its marvelously perfected detail.

The explanation of this is to be found partly—but only partly—in the fact that Toscanini carries the specific gifts for conducting—the ear for orchestral precision and sonority, the personal force and technique with which to achieve what the ear demands—to the point of sheer virtuosity to which they are carried by only two other men, Stokowski and Koussevitzky; that at these rehearsals he was dealing with an orchestra which he had in ten years made as phenomenally sensitized to his direction as the Philadelphia to Stokowski's, the Boston Symphony to Koussevitzky's—so sensitized as to be able to respond again to this direction after an interval of six years; and that he was conducting this orchestra in works which they had rehearsed and performed together a number of times. But the explanation is to be found also in the nature of Toscanini's musical conceptions—ths unfailing plastic continuity and coherence of the shapes he creates in sound moving in time. In such a progression the timing and force of one sound implies the timing and force of the next almost irresistibly; and it is the power of these implications, causing the many players in the orchestra to produce the next sound at the same point in time and with the right weight and color, that is partly responsible for the remarkable precision in Toscanini's performances, the extraordinary things the New York Philharmonic did at the first rehearsal.

Toscanini's feeling for the time element in the musical sound-time continuum is extraordinary; and its manifestations—in the choice of a tempo, in its subtle inflection, in its distention with increasing tension in the music, in the maintenance of proportion between successive tempos—are among the most distinctive characteristics of his performances. One hears, in the Missa Solemnis, the rightness of the pace of the Benedictus for the blessedness which the music is concerned with, and looking at the score one discovers that the pace is exactly the Andante molto cantabile e non troppo mosso which Beethoven prescribes; but Toscanini did not get his pace from this direction—he heard it in the music: with the same printed direction, but with not the same musical discernment, Koussevitzky causes the Benedictus to move at an Andante so troppo mosso as to be an Allegretto. Nor is it Beethoven's directions for the various parts of the Gloria or the Credo that give Toscanini the mutually related tempos which bind the parts into a continuous, coherent progression: with the same directions Koussevitzky produces awkward discontinuities. Again, though it is Beethoven who gives only one direction for the entire second movement of the Seventh Symphony, the entire Funeral March of the "Eroica," it is the necessities of Toscanini's own understanding of the music that cause him alone to establish a single unifying tempo for the various sections of the movement. And with no directions at all from Beethoven it is such necessities that produce the subtle inflection of this single tempo, the distentions that build up the fugato section of the Funeral March to a climax of shattering power.

Letters to the Editors

Sprung Rhythm Defined

Dear Sirs: I have just had the pleasure of reading Mr. Guérard's letter to you on the subject of sprung rhythm (in The Nation for April 25), and in spite of a conviction that these matters should properly be conducted through private rather than public correspondence I would like to point out that in all my remarks on the subject of the use of sprung rhythm by poets since the year 1930 I had in mind the following definition:

"Sprung rhythm is the most natural of all things. For (1) it is the rhythm of common speech and of written prose, when rhythm is perceived in them. (2) It is the rhythm of all but the most monotonously regular music, so that in the words of choruses and refrains and in songs written closely to music it arises. (3) It is found in nursery rhymes, weather saws, and so on; because, however these may have been once made in running rhythm, the terminations having dropped off by the change of language, the stresses come together and so the rhythm is sprung. (4) It arises in common verse when reversed or counterpointed, for the same reason."

This definition I take from the Author's Preface to the "Poems" of Gerard Manley Hopkins, edited by Robert Bridges and pretty scandalously edited at that. GEORGE BARKER

A Pacific Charter Needed

Dear Sirs: The war in Europe is still desperately critical but is not going too badly for our side. The war in Asia, on the other hand, is still a nearly unbroken series of defeats and retreats. One reason is that the people of the conquered countries of Europe hate Nazi rule, refuse in general to collaborate, and sometimes fight their Nazi conquerors by sabotage and guerrilla warfare. But in Asia, except in the Philippines, that is not the case. The native populations of the Dutch East Indies, Burma, Malaya, and India regard conquest by the Axis as merely an exchange of masters, despite the genuine advances in self-government which they have made in recent years.

The Filipinos fought with us like tigers because they had already been given a great degree of self-government and were promised complete freedom, and because they clearly believed that our promises would be carried out. But the colonial inhabitants of other territories governed by some of the United Nations had no such reason for fighting.

To give assurance to the people of Asia that we are fighting for freedom and democracy there as elsewhere, President Roosevelt should call a conference of the United Nations which are most nearly concerned with the war in the Far East to promulgate a Pacific Charter similar to the Atlantic Charter.

When Churchill specifically stated, apparently without consulting President Roosevelt, that the Atlantic Charter did not apply to the Far East or to India, he dealt a severe blow to the morale of the native peoples in that region. A Pacific Charter of freedom for all colonial peoples, issued by a Pacific conference of the United Nations, would go far toward remedying this mistake. It is not too much to say that such a Pacific Charter is necessary to give full meaning and universality to Vice-President Wallace's noble pronouncement that this war is one to advance and safeguard the "revolution of the common man."

Two Kinds of Consul

Dear Sirs: The article and letters about American consuls abroad printed in your magazine recently were to me very interesting. About 1890 I was a seaman on a Philadelphia barkentine loaded with shooks for a Cuban port, from which we would bring molasses back to Boston. I was the seaman told off to sail the old man ashore when he went for his mail. His reception at the American consul's office was, "I ain't your postmaster! Go to the post office for your mail." After that, even a mellowing day at the American Hotel with his shipmaster cronies didn't smooth the captain out, and that afternoon on the way back to the ship he told me the story. The vessel was the barkentine E. J. McManamee, Captain Philpotts.

About two years later I was in a Boston bark—this time as second mate—loaded with lumber from Mobile, Alabama, to Sierra Leone, on the West Coast of Africa. We arrived on a Saturday afternoon and anchored only a stone's throw from shore. There's a swift current, and by the time we got two anchors down and sails stowed it was late. Next morning, Sunday, the first flag flying ashore was the Stars and Stripes, high, wide, and handsome, and around eight o'clock the American consul came off with our mail and to offer the facilities of his office to the captain. We were there a month, and the consul did everything possible to make our stay interesting. That consul was a Negro, Colonel Bouchier. As I remember, he had been an officer in a Negro regiment during the Civil War.

Correction

Dear Sirs: In your March 14 issue there appeared a full-page advertisement signed by "Citizens' Committee to Free Earl Browder." This advertisement set forth as sponsors of the "Free Browder movement," among others, "Dr. Bella V. Dodd, legislative representative, American Federation of Teachers, Local 5." Similar advertisements appeared in a number of daily papers throughout the United States at about the same time.

As counsel for the American Federation of Teachers, I have been directed to call your attention to and to protest against the unwarranted and wholly false impression that was given by this advertisement in the following particular: that the Teachers' Union of the City of New York, formerly Local 5 of the American Federation of Teachers, is still associated with the latter organization.

The fact is that through a long series of inter-union proceedings, all of which were the subject of much publicity in the city of New York, the charter of the Teachers' Union of the city of New York, formerly Local 5 of the American Federation of Teachers, was revoked. This revocation was, in the first instance, recommended by the Executive Council at its meeting in Chicago held February 15, 1941, and on following days, and thereafter voted on affirmatively in a national referendum of the entire membership of the American Federation of Teachers. Fourth Freedom at Nassau

Dear Sirs: The report that workers on the American air base at Nassau in the Bahama Islands have rioted in connection with their strike for decent wages instead of the beggarly 81 cents a day which they are now being paid is highly disquieting, for it indicates a complete disregard for at least one of President Roosevelt's Four Freedoms on the part of the employer.

The President demanded, among other things, freedom from want for everyone throughout the world. So far as this is a war for the Four Freedoms—and I in common with many others feel that it is—the strikers in Nassau are fighting our war, because 81 cents a day does not give anyone genuine freedom from want.

We cannot fairly place the responsibility on the British government. The American government directly or indirectly is the employer on those air bases, since we have leased them and are constructing them.

The Shape of Things

MIDSUMMER IS AT HAND BUT IN RUSSIA THE battle lines remain much as they were at the end of the winter. The only appreciable Nazi success has been the recapture of Kerch, which cannot easily be exploited as a stepping stone to the Caucasus until Sevastapol is also taken. That, however, is a very tough nut and while the present desperate and costly German attacks may eventually crack it the Red Army is bent on exacting the highest possible price. Elsewhere in Russia there is intense but localized fighting with a second Nazi thrust in the Kharkov region producing many German claims but so far no concrete results. Up to date, it would appear, Hitler has not yet decided to commit his full reserves to an all-out offensive in the east. Part of them, at least, are still available for use in western Europe should the second front develop from a threat to a fact. Meanwhile the Axis is struggling hard to build its own second front in the Middle East. The battle for Tobruk is still inconclusive but General Rommel has retained the offensive and has forced the evacuation of the two anchors of the British line, El Gazala on the coast and Bir Hacheim in the desert—a name that will live because of the magnificent resistance there of the free, and fighting, French. As we write, a great battle is going on in the Mediterranean between a powerful British convoy and Axis air forces. While Rome claims tremendous successes, which are almost certainly exaggerated, no word can be expected from the British until the ships reach their destination. However, the dispatch of a large convoy by this dangerous route suggests anxiety about the position in the Middle East.

THE JAPANESE OCCUPATION OF ATTU AND possibly others of the western Aleutian Islands does not appear to create an immediate or serious threat to the main American base at Dutch Harbor. But if the United Nations were to launch a drive against the Japanese from the North, airplanes, troops, and supplies would have to be moved along or near the island chain. This could not be done safely as long as the Japanese possess outposts anywhere in the Aleutians. A strong Japanese base on Attu would be particularly valuable to the enemy in the event of a war between Japan and the Soviet Union, since it would enable the Nipponese to outflank the Soviet positions of the Kamchatka Peninsula and hinder American aid from getting through to Siberia. However the immediate Japanese objective is, almost certainly, the knocking out of our base at Dutch Harbor which they regard as a potential menace to Japan itself. The latest advices suggest that their forces in the northern Pacific are quite large, but our army and navy flyers are not allowing them the leisure to settle down and establish bases which could be used as stepping stones for a further advance eastward. One enemy cruiser has already been sunk and a number of other vessels severely damaged, including an aircraft carrier.

NOT CONTENT WITH REVENGING HEYDRICH by shooting hundreds of "suspects" the Nazis have added a new and horrifying page to their barbarous record by wiping out a whole Czech township. This is not, alas, an unsubstantiated atrocity story but a deed officially announced by the Berlin radio. Investigation had shown, it declared, that the assassins of Heydrich had been given shelter and assistance in the town of Lidice, and for this and other "crimes" all adult males were shot, the women sent to concentration camps, the children removed to "appropriate educational institutions," and the town levelled to the ground. This new peak in Nazi frightfulness has led to a widespread demand for reprisals. Major George Fielding Eliot has suggested that a list of ten German villages of similar size should be drawn up and announcement made by the United Nations that one of these villages would be destroyed from the air during a certain week. This would give away no military secrets and would put on the German government responsibility for removing women and children. Ingenious as this scheme is we doubt if it would save many victims of the Gestapo and we shrink from imitating the Nazi policy of vicarious atonement. We are more favorably inclined to a proposal made by Gaetano Salvemini, who will elaborate it in a forthcoming article—a proposal for a solemn compact between the members of the United Nations agreeing to hold individually responsible for Nazi crimes the whole Nazi party hierarchy, the German generals, and the high civil servants, diplomats, and other leading officials. Let it be publicly and continuously announced that for every Nazi execution one of these men will forfeit his life at the end of the war. Such a policy might save some innocent lives now and ward off an eventual undiscriminating and bloody revenge on the German people as a whole.

THE POLICY OF APPEASING VICHY WHICH was shelved for a few weeks after Laval returned to power is now being dusted off for a new trial. Shipments of fuel-oil, food, and clothing to French North Africa are being resumed, and the State Department is said to be satisfied that this operation can be "insulated from Europe." It is a little difficult to see how this is to be achieved since many reliable observers have reported a steady flow of food products from North Africa to France and the regular requisition of the bulk of such shipments by the Nazis. However, the State Department is ready to overlook this fact, just as it is ready to overlook Laval's mobilization of French industry for the benefit of the Nazis, so long as Vichy doesn't translate collaboration into terms of overt military aid to the Axis. In his first public interview after his return from France Ambassador Leahy defended this policy of clinging to Vichy in an amazing series of contradictory statements. Admitting that the French people were practically unanimously anti-Axis, he declared that the only way of maintaining our traditional friendship with them was through the agency of the French government. By maintaining diplomatic relations, he said, it was possible "to assist the French people in keeping alive their hope for eventual deliverance from their oppressors." How this hope is to be fostered by giving moral and physical support to a government which notoriously takes its orders from the same oppressors, Admiral Leahy did not explain. As he stressed his "high personal regard" for Pétain it may be that he, and the State Department, are still clinging to the belief that the aged marshal retains some power of independent action. This is a difficult theory to defend in view of Pétain's recent declaration of complete confidence in Laval.

A SERIOUS SHORTAGE OF MANPOWER—which is inevitable in total warfare—is already weakening Germany's war capacity, according to a pamphlet written by Fritz Sternberg and published by the Brookings Institution. Mr. Sternberg estimates that at least one-half of Germany's most productive manpower has been drafted into the army. During the first two years of the war, Germany was able to make up the deficiency by drawing upon women workers, foreign labor, and war prisoners. But today, with considerably more men under arms than in 1940 or 1941, such replacement has become impossible. Efforts to enlist men over 65 years of age and to draw on married women have yielded negligible results. Despite a vigorous campaign to attract workers from occupied Europe, estimates indicate an increase of only 400,000 such workers in the past year. Although Germany may have several million war prisoners, it has hesitated to make any use of the Russian prisoners in industry for fear of sabotage. In any case Mr. Sternberg believes that it will be quite impossible to close the gap created by the withdrawal of five million men for military service this year. Under these circumstances he considers a further increase in Germany's output of war materials out of the question and predicts a substantial reduction, possibly of 15 to 30 per cent. Such a reduction will not, however, seriously affect Germany's striking power in 1942. It can be expected to deal its heaviest blows this year. If the United Nations can withstand these blows and impose further heavy losses on the Reich, Germany's inferiority in manpower may prove a decisive factor.

CHILE'S STAND AGAINST THE AXIS HAS BEEN strengthened by three recent events: the entry of Mexico into the war, the protest of the Argentine government on the torpedoing of the Victoria, and the punishment inflicted by our navy on the Japanese fleet. Any anti-Axis move, however timid, by Argentina reduces the danger of totalitarian intrigues from Buenos Aires against the Chilean government, while the Pacific battle has considerably lessened the fear of many Chileans of the eventual bombardment of its long coast by Japan. Consequently Chile now feels better able to follow its natural pro-democratic inclinations. The political revival there is having the double effect of increasing the repression of domestic and foreign fascist activities and of enlarging the zone of public opinion in favor of a break with the Axis. Under the leadership of Oscar Schnacke, the able Minister of Public Works, who only a year ago was bitterly attacked by the Communists, a strong bloc has been created with the participation of the Socialists, Señor Schnacke's own party, Democrats, Communists, and a section of the Radical Party. It is the old Frente Popular coming to life again under the more palatable name of Frente Democrático. Though for a while it looked as if President Rios resented the vigor with which his most important minister had advocated breaking off relations with the Axis, mutual explanations have cleared the new group of any anti-Rios tendency.

IN ARGENTINA, TOO, THINGS HAVE NOT been moving lately entirely according to the pleasure of Berlin. We must be careful not to exaggerate the importance of Señor Ruiz Guiñazú's protest to the German government. We remember that in the last war diplomatic protests were constantly combined with the most scandalous behind-the-scenes complicity, and in many cases the only result of such protests was to provide a new opportunity for the complaining "neutral" to acknowledge publicly the good faith and gentlemanly behavior of the government responsible for the aggression. But genuine or not, the Argentine protest has given the press and political parties a chance to discuss in public the methods Nazi Germany uses to show its love for its favorite country in Latin America. A good start was made in the recent debate in Congress when the Radical deputy, Damonte Taborda, disclosed new activities of Nazi agents and strongly attacked Foreign Minister Guiñazú for having attended a meeting at which some of the speakers abused the United States in the crudest terms. He also denounced Guiñazú for having welcomed to Buenos Aires the Spanish Phalangist delegation sent by Franco and Hitler to conclude a new barter agreement. In his speech Guiñazú insolently declared that Argentina was determined to have Franco's Spain serve as a go-between for trade with Europe, including Germany, and added that it would "not allow any foreign interference to deflect it from that determination."

THE APPOINTMENT OF ELMER DAVIS TO head the new Office of War Information is a matter of congratulation for everyone concerned, except, perhaps, Mr. Davis, who is too much of a realist not to appreciate fully the arduous nature of his task. The reorganization of the government news services is long overdue and consolidation of existing agencies into one cohesive and coherent body will call for the ruthless use of the ax. But worse than overlapping and inefficiency in this field has been the lack of clear policies both in regard to information at home and to propaganda abroad. Mr. Davis's principal function, it appears, is to be that of policy maker and it is one for which his training and abilities fit him admirably. In the past few years of crisis he has become familiar to millions as the most incisive and clear-headed of the radio news commentators, but for much longer than that he has been known to a rather smaller circle as a pungent writer on current affairs. His devotion to the cause of democracy has never led him into wishful thinking and we can depend on him, so far as it lies within his power, to give us the facts and nothing but the facts. It must be noted, however, that the authority conferred on Mr. Davis by the President's order is subject to distinct limitations. The service departments will, of course, continue to have the final word on what military news is released. Moreover, both the Office of Censorship and the Office of the Coordinator of Inter-American Affairs are to retain their independent status. Why the latter should be exempt from reorganization is an unexplained mystery. Certainly there is nothing in its record to justify this distinction and from the point of view of political strategy there is everything to be said for coordinating our propaganda to Europe with our propaganda to Latin America.

IN THE LEXICON OF THE FBI AND THE CIVIL Service Commission—the lexicon seems to be Mrs. Dilling's "Red Network"—a Communist is anyone who ever happened to take the same side, on any issue, as the Communist Party. PM estimates that as a result some two hundred liberals have been dismissed from government jobs for such crimes as supporting the Loyalist government in the Spanish civil war, advocating collective security, or criticizing the Dies Committee. On the other hand, we have never heard of an investigator who was at all interested in finding out whether or not a given candidate had fascist leanings. PM has also been printing some of the outrageous and often illegal questions put to prospective or incumbent government employees. They include not only queries as to political opinions and religious beliefs, but insulting questions, amounting to insinuations, about matters personal and private. As Elmer Davis said in an excellent broadcast on the subject a few weeks ago, the investigators sent out by the FBI and the Civil Service seem to be ignorant and naive rather than vicious; but the persistent red-baiting pattern of the investigations and the consistency with which only liberals are fired give strong color to the suspicion that officials higher up in both agencies are neither ignorant nor naive. It is time we discovered who is responsible for the idiotic and dangerous procedure by which men and women appointed to government jobs because they are known anti-fascists are forthwith dismissed—for the same reason.

Congress Tax Strike

CONSERVATIVE members of the House may be outraged to have their actions characterized in such terms, but it is quite apparent that the Ways and Means Committee is engaged in a sitdown strike against the Administration's anti-inflation program. The issues of tax policy, as we have repeatedly pointed out, are basic not only in the successful prosecution of the war but in determining the kind of world that we shall live in after it is over. In order to prevent a runaway inflation the President formulated and dispatched to Congress a carefully worked out, comprehensive program for cushioning our economy against the effects of the war.

The first item in what the President described as our "national economic policy" was that we must "tax heavily" in order to soak up the excess purchasing power created by the war-production program. As an illustration of what he meant by "tax heavily" the President suggested that no American ought to have a net income of more than $25,000 after he has paid his taxes. A concrete program for raising nearly $9,000,000,000 in new taxes had already been presented by the Treasury.

The House Ways and Means Committee not only ignored the President's request for a heavy tax on persons with high incomes but during the past few weeks has been steadily whittling down the Treasury's program in practically every category. First, it cut the projected tax on corporations from 55 per cent to 40 per cent. Then the proposed tax on individuals with incomes of $5,000 a year and upward was drastically slashed. A suggested increase in estate and gift taxes was turned down flatly. Action on a withholding tax was postponed. And in the past week the committee pared down the excise-tax rates proposed by the Treasury on a series of luxury articles. The Treasury wanted $236,000,000 additional in tobacco taxes; the committee allowed only $105,600,000. A suggested increase in the tax on rail transportation was cut in half, and a request for an additional tax on Pullman accommodations was rejected outright. Proposed increases in the tax on motor oil and liquors were likewise dealt with harshly. As a result of these cuts the committee's tax bill will fall short by nearly $3,000,000,000 of the sum requested by the Administration.

This sabotaging of the Treasury's tax program seems to have been deliberately planned by some members of the committee with a view to forcing the Administration to countenance a sales tax. There are reports that these tactics are succeeding. They, of course, represent a conscious effort, backed by an important section of the press, to force a greater share of the burden of the war on the poor. Taxes on luxuries are rejected in the hope of placing a levy on necessities. The President's appeal for sacrifices by the rich is ignored, and in its place the committee would impose a flat tax which would fall most heavily on those with the least money.

Faced by increased opposition from their constituents to a sales tax, some Congressmen are reported to be suggesting that the tax bill be left as it is—$3,000,000,000 short of Treasury estimates. This is the most irresponsible and dangerous proposal of all. At best the Treasury program was several billions short of closing the gap between increased purchasing power and the declining supply of goods. For a time it was hoped that this gap might be nearly closed by voluntary purchases of war bonds by individuals, but it is now apparent that this cannot possibly be achieved. If the gap is to be further widened by the committee's refusal to levy the taxes requested by the Treasury, it is obvious that the entire anti-inflation program will be gravely threatened. The price ceilings cannot possibly withstand much additional pressure, and once shattered, their restoration would be a difficult if not a hopeless undertaking. Their shattering, moreover, would have a most adverse effect on the immediate war-production program.

As a face-saving measure, perhaps the most effective step that the Ways and Means Committee could take at this moment would be to resurrect the proposal for a 10 per cent withholding tax on all incomes over $25 a week, and the early enactment of the plan. For a dollar that is collected this year and spent for the immediate purchase of war equipment may be more effective as an anti-inflation measure than two dollars, raised by whatever method, in 1943. If the House members were as interested in speeding the war effort and protecting the nation's economy as in political expediency they would not have allowed this proposal to be sidetracked.

Russia and the Future

BY FREDA KIRCHWEY

RUMOR blossomed into momentous fact when the coalition among Russia, Britain, and the United States was announced last Friday. The decisions taken in London and Washington tower over the military and naval actions of a week of great events. Britain and Russia are linked in a full alliance binding for twenty years. Russia and the United States are held by an unwritten pledge of mutual assistance in the war and after and by a lease-lend agreement promising full support in arms and all other supplies. All three powers reached a verbal accord on "the urgent tasks of creating a second front in Europe in 1942."

The importance of these agreements cannot be exaggerated. For Britain and Russia, the treaty of alliance wipes out two decades of suspicion, and the Soviet Union becomes Britain's chief military ally on the Continent. That the understanding with the United States is less explicit is due, quite obviously, to two things: our remoteness from the chief European battlefields and our nearness to the next Congressional elections. It is unfortunate that hang-over symptoms of isolationism should be strong enough to influence policy for war or peace; but I am inclined to think the President did well not to pitch the issue of a long-range alliance with Russia into the political debate. Our commitments are both material and moral; they take the form of acts rather than written agreements; and they bind us for the future as well as for the duration of the war. For better or worse the United States is "in" the peace as irrevocably as it is in the war. And I think the agreement with Russia has strengthened the hands of those who hope this country will take the role of liberator rather than policeman.

But it must be admitted, even now that Molotov is safely back in Moscow and the agreements have been signed and published and approved, that the future is still obscure. It lies across blackened fields and the seas that mercifully hide the victims of fascist mania. It lies beyond a political battlefield as wide as the world. The future still must be fought for and won. The agreements made in Washington and London are only a blueprint. To carry them into effect, the Allied governments must not only send great armies to new fronts and speed their production and delivery of weapons; they must also adopt new and revolutionary policies to make good their implicit promise of a democratic peace.

On another page of this issue J. Alvarez del Vayo discusses the forces which, from one generation to the next, have tried to keep the peace poised on a delicate balance of conflicting power and interest. This system was in direct conflict with the hope that animated the idealistic designers of the League of Nations. But the Treaty of Versailles reconstituted a European balance of power and the League became its instrument. The principle of cooperation between equal sovereign states, which alone could have created a system of collective security, was never given more than lip-service by the major powers at Geneva. Not even the adherence of the United States, in my opinion, would have tilted the balance against the rising threat of the fascist powers. It is true that America's isolation weakened the forces that tried to use the League to defeat aggression; but it is, alas, equally true that the mighty weight of this country, when it was employed at all, was used to reinforce the hesitations and appeasements of the British Foreign Office and the Quai d'Orsay. Would it have served a different purpose—the purpose of collective security—if the United States had been a member of the League? I have never been able to convince myself that it would. For to this day, balance-of-power diplomacy is the diplomacy of the American State Department.

Cheering millions all over the Soviet Union greeted the new agreements with the United States and Britain; they were read aloud to Red Army soldiers and factory workers and the farmers in the collectives and explained as harbingers of a victorious struggle and a democratic peace. It is to be supposed that those millions went back to their guns and machines sustained by a new sense of international solidarity; the old vision of collective security lay as the end of the bloody road ahead. And it is improbable that they read in Pravda or their regimental newspaper that on the very day when the new coalition was proclaimed, Secretary Hull announced the resumption of shipments of food and other supplies from America to the Vichy government in North Africa.

No promises, no pacts, no fine speeches by Welles or even Wallace or Winant, can wipe out the demoralizing effect of the old diplomacy pursuing its old discredited maneuvers while the struggle against fascism reaches a climax of danger and effort. The inner conflicts that corrode the integrity of the anti-Axis powers will have to be ended before the victory of democracy is assured. Even when the longed-for second front is opened, its effect will be doubled if the armies of revolution which wait to join the armies of invasion know they are fighting for freedom and not for some new brand of despotism approved by the balance-of-power advocates in the Allied foreign offices.

The questions raised in the article by J. Alvarez del Vayo deserve more than passing attention, particularly now when the agreements with Russia focus public attention on the problems of the coming peace. The Nation has asked a number of persons of widely differing points of view to discuss briefly some of the chief issues touched upon by Mr. del Vayo. Their comments will appear in subsequent issues.

Biddle and the Facts

BY I. F. STONE

II

Washington, June 11

JUDGE SEARS relied on the testimony of two witnesses to prove that Bridges was a member of the Communist Party. One of the two, as we saw last week, makes a peculiar witness. James D. O'Neil was alleged to have said that he saw Bridges putting stamps in a Communist Party membership book. Actually, on the stand and under oath, O'Neil denied that he had made any statement of that kind. Sears, and Biddle after him, chose to believe what O'Neil was supposed to have told Department of Justice agents and to disbelieve what O'Neil said on the stand. Their position with respect to the other witness was just the opposite. Harry Lundeberg admitted that on three different occasions he told Department of Justice agents that he had no evidence to link Bridges with the Communist Party. On the stand Lundeberg testified that Bridges told him he was a member of the party. In this case Sears, and Biddle, chose to believe what Lundeberg said on the stand rather than what he admits he said before.

Lundeberg is the only witness believed by Sears who actually testified that Bridges was a Communist. His testimony is therefore worth closer examination. Sears thought Lundeberg's testimony against Bridges was given in "natural, rugged, hard-bitten fashion." A few excerpts from the record will let the reader judge for himself.

Lundeberg testified that he had dinner with Bridges at the latter's home in the summer of 1935. That was six years before the hearing. Lundeberg said the Communist leader, Sam Darcy, was there. Lundeberg's first answer, when asked to tell all that happened at the dinner, was, "Well, I don't remember the details. We talked about various things on the waterfront, and unions, and so forth. Darcy asked lots of questions. It was a general conversation." A little later Lundeberg was asked whether Darcy asked him "to do something." Lundeberg then replied that Darcy asked him to join the Communist Party. Lundeberg was next asked whether Darcy said "anything about Bridges being a member of the Communist Party in Bridges's presence." Lundeberg answered, "He mentioned several people who were members of the Communist Party." Counsel for the government persisted: "What did he say about Bridges?"

> A. Well, he said he was a member of the Communist Party.
>
> Q. What did Bridges say?
>
> A. Well, he says, 'You don't have to be afraid because nobody has to know you are a member of the Communist Party if you join.'
> Q. Did Bridges join Sam Darcy in urging you to join the Communist Party? A. No.

Counsel for the government pressed Lundeberg harder, with Sears breaking in to protect the witness. Lundeberg was asked whether Darcy or Bridges had said anything else at the time, but couldn't remember. Lundeberg was asked whether he joined the Communist Party. "I should say not," was the reply. The questioning continued:

> Q. Generally, in substance, what did Bridges say? We don't expect you, of course, to remember the exact words or the—(Sears broke in).
>
> Sears: Have you given the substance as far as you remember it?
> Lundeberg: Well, the substance was, as I told you, that Darcy asked me to join the Communist Party and Bridges says, 'You don't have to be afraid because I am one too,' and the old stuff, and the conversation was friendly all the way through, and I just laughed at it and forgot about it.

So it was that, on the third try, counsel for the government got Lundeberg to testify that Bridges had sai that he was a Communist. The impression is not that o testimony in "natural, rugged, hard-bitten fashion" bu at best of a witness whose recollection six years later i understandably hazy. Yet this vague testimony, from bitter trade-union rival of Bridges, is the best the Department of Justice and the FBI had to offer. The Board o Immigration Appeals, in reversing Sears, felt after survey of all the evidence that "Lundeberg impresse neither in truthfulness nor in forthrightness." The boar found unanimously "that the dinner conversation a testified to by Lundeberg did not occur, that Darcy wa not present on that occasion, and that Bridges made n admission of Communist Party membership."

The board believed none of the witnesses who sai Bridges was a member of the party. Sears himself, as w have seen, believed only Lundeberg's testimony. Th Attorney General would like to believe them all. He sa of the witnesses rejected by Sears as well as the boar "Although Judge Sears concluded that their evidenc for one reason or another, did not establish membershi in or affiliation with the Communist Party, taken as whole it cannot, because of its volume, be complete disregarded." This would seem to say that in matters proof quantity can be a substitute for quality.

Biddle mentions Sam Diner and Maurice J. Cann longa among those whose evidence "cannot, because its volume, be completely disregarded." The Attorn General seems willing to trust the judgment of Sears to "demeanor and expression" when it is agai

Bridges but not when it is for him. Sears said of Diner that he "was not an impressive witness." He said of Cannalonga, "I have come to the conclusion, upon a consideration of all the evidence, that no reliance is to be placed upon any testimony offered by this witness."

A reading of the record reflects the readiness of the FBI, under J. Edgar Hoover, and the Immigration Service, under Biddle's appointee, Major Lemuel B. Schofield, to fish in some pretty muddy waters in their anxiety to "get" Bridges. On Sears's own findings, there was among the government's witnesses against Bridges a Communist who was a labor spy for the Los Angeles police, a thief, a confirmed drunkard, and a man on parole after murdering his wife.

The question of affiliation with the Communist Party is a much more difficult one than that of membership, and it would take far more space than can be given to it to analyze the evidence on this score. In part, this evidence comes from the same witnesses; in part, from Bridges's connections with the Waterfront Worker. Of the witnesses it can be said that their credibility is in inverse proportion to the importance of their testimony. Sears believed Howard Rushmore's testimony that Bridges praised the Youth Congress in July, 1935, and was treated as "a sacred cow" in the Communist press. But he disbelieved the wild tale told by William C. McQuistion and Peter J. Innes of arranging a secret phone call from the Communist "Politbureau" in New York to Bridges in California. The strongest point in the government's case on affiliation lies in the Waterfront Worker, but a reading of Sears, the board, and Biddle leaves one with reasonable doubts.

One who studies Biddle's opinion alone, or only Biddle and Sears, will picture the Waterfront Worker as advising its readers "to read Communist literature." The Immigration Service charged that it "continually advised its readers" to do so. But the board's opinion discloses that the service was able to find only three instances of this in the more than three years of the paper's existence. In January, 1933, it recommended Dunne's pamphlet on the 1934 strike. In March, 1934, it advised the reading of the Western Worker. In November, 1934, it placed both the Western Worker and the Daily Worker in the category of the "workers' press," which it urged its subscribers to read. The board says this advice was accompanied with a full exposition of the reasons therefor. It was, as the board summarizes it, "not intended to convey approval of them qua Communist publications but was based on an asserted contrast between their truthfulness on labor matters and that of the Hearst press." Biddle does not refute the facts on which the board found that the Waterfront Worker, during Bridges's connection with it, "was not an organ of the Marine Workers' Industrial Union or of the Communist Party." Biddle does little more than summarize Sears and say that the latter's conclusions are "not unwarranted."

Nor will one find in the Biddle opinion any refutation of the board's summary of facts which in its words "look the other way" on the question of affiliation:

> Bridges supported "Ham and Eggs," a bitterly fought political issue in California. The Communist Party was opposed to it. In the last election Bridges supported the position taken by John L. Lewis—contrary to the attitude taken by the Communist Party. He differed with Walter Stack, a prominent Communist, on the question of affiliating the Maritime Federation of the Pacific (apparently to the C.I.O.). Stack opposed it. Bridges was for it. A committee of which Bridges was chairman investigated and rejected, during the 1934 strike, an offer of legal assistance from the International Labor Defense, found by the Presiding Inspector [Sears] to be a Communist organization whose "immediate purpose is to assist and defend Communists who encounter legal difficulties by providing bail, lawyers, and other assistance." Bridges was opposed to the position of the M.W.I.U. that longshoremen, teamsters, engineers, and seamen should all be in one union.

The Attorney General is telling friends that, after all, the case will still go to the courts, but he knows that this Supreme Court, after its rulings in regulatory cases, will find it most difficult to reverse findings of fact by an administrative officer. The Attorney General has shown a great reluctance to "infringe civil liberties" when dealing with the right. The Bridges case shows he has fewer qualms when dealing with the left.

The new interdepartmental committee to smell out radicals in the government circulated Biddle's decision on Bridges the day after it was handed down. "Certain portions," said the accompanying letter, "may be of interest in connection with the investigations of federal employees upon which the FBI is now reporting." One of those portions is this one in Biddle's decision: "Other Communist front organizations were the International Labor Defense, whose immediate purpose was to defend Communists but among whose members were many non-Communists unaware of its Communist control, the All-American Anti-Imperialist League, the American Negro Labor Congress, and the American League Against War and Fascism." There were few "innocents" in the I. L. D., many in the League Against War and Fascism. Under Biddle's ruling membership in the league will become grounds for dismissal.

I have kept closely to the facts and the law. I would like to say in conclusion that the whole case suggests absolutism in decay rather than democracy in action: the long persecution of a workers' leader, the use of the secret police for political purposes, the mobilization of witnesses from the dregs of society, the readiness of an upper-class liberal to serve as the tool of these forces.

World War III?

BY J. ALVAREZ DEL VAYO

SOME day the war will end with the victory of the United Nations, but the joy with which we look forward to that day is disturbed by the thought that the old diplomacy may reappear at the peace table. It is a diplomacy which, judged by its accomplishments in recent years, is as inept at war as it was at peace. It failed when the moment called for a gesture of conciliation, and it failed again when circumstances required energy and boldness.

It failed to take advantage of the "year of hope," 1924, when a rare coincidence, the first and last between one war and another, brought progressive governments to power both in England and in France: in England the Laborites; in France, Herriot and Briand, supported by an electorate which had declared itself definitely against Poincaré-la-guerre in one of the few French elections where foreign policy relegated domestic issues to second place. This was the great opportunity to revitalize the flaccid Weimar democracy and to win from Germany a policy of cooperation. It failed again when Hitler occupied the Rhineland—a moment which called for energetic action, the dispatch of an ultimatum accompanied by a couple of divisions of French troops. And from that fateful day it has sunk lower and lower.

In any other field of human activity officials who present a balance sheet of insolvency year after year are usually deprived of their directive functions. But one can still see the bankrupt diplomacy which was responsible for the war not only perservering in its old errors but confident that when hostilities cease it will have a decisive influence in organizing the world of tomorrow. It would be puerile to attribute this extraordinary vitality to the whim of statesmen, to the interplay of party struggles, or to personal influence. Its power lies in the fact that it is one of the instruments of an economic system which refuses to disappear, and which will stop at nothing to prevent the People's Revolution, proclaimed by Vice-President Wallace, from taking place. Since its function and raison d'être is to assure the survival of the status quo, diplomacy in the service of vested interests thinks predominantly in terms of the balance of power. Its guiding spirit, if it may be said to have one, leads it toward those solutions in which the concessions that must be made, however great they may appear on the surface, never compromise the basis of the present social system.

Of typically Florentine origin, a happy invention of the Medicis toward the turbulent end of the sixteenth century, the balance of power is offered as the magic remedy in each great crisis which threatens the established order. It always comes wrapped up in the loftiest proposals and is offered as an instrument for the maintenance of peace. Ever since the Congress of Vienna the balance of power has been a favorite and successful trick used to cheat the people when the hour of their real liberation has seemed to be drawing near.

Of the Congress of Vienna little remains in men's minds except the brilliance of its social splendor and the fascinating personalities of its principal characters. Gossip of the antechamber told how Metternich lost southern Bavaria because on the morning when the decisive discussion took place he lingered in the arms of the "maigre et ardente" Duchesse de Sagan. We have Talleyrand displaying at the same time the most contradictory qualities—fawning and threatening, ironical and solemn, chatty and impenetrable. Yet despite its air of frivolity, the congress was a meeting of statesmen called to decide the fate of the entire civilized world and to accomplish not only the liquidation of the Napoleonic dream but the reconstruction of Europe with a view to creating a permanent equilibrium.

The program could not have been more noble or more ambitious. According to Metternich's definition, given in his inaugural address, the purpose of the Congress of Vienna was the reconstruction of the moral order, the regeneration of the political system of Europe, the establishment of a lasting peace based on a just division of forces—and all that "in the name of the eternal law." Nor did the Congress lack an expression of international public opinion, to the extent that public opinion was able to make itself felt at the time. The desires of liberal England, reflected freely in the pulpit and in the press, were made known in Vienna in a manner sufficiently insistent to exasperate the British plenipotentiaries. Each delegation felt obliged, from time to time, to say something agreeable to the ears of the people, who took the promises of the Coalition seriously. But they were only words, as we learn from the memoirs of von Gentz, that master of indiscretion and intimate adviser of Metternich. "The true purpose of the congress," wrote von Gentz, "was the division among the conquerors of the spoils of the conquered."

But even that was only its immediate task: its ultimate objective was to save autocracy from the dangers that threatened it from all sides. Under its inspiration the sovereigns of Europe assumed the role of gendarmes of reaction. It was able to combine admirably the desire for a lasting peace with the principle of legitimacy by creating a barrier against any possible movement of the people. In the name of legitimacy, a number of dynasties were restored to their thrones and possessions—the House of Savoy to Sardinia, the House of Orange to Holland, the Bourbons to Spain. The balance of power was established with a very clear purpose: "to burn out of Europe with red-hot irons the gangrene of the Revolution."

II

Actually, it was the "Big Four" at the Congress of Vienna, the representatives of England, Prussia, and Russia, and Metternich, who parceled out provinces and colonies among the crowned autocrats and decreed peace. The number seems fatefully prophetic. Four was also the number of individuals in whom, a hundred years later, was concentrated the power to reorganize the world.

At Paris as at Vienna the future of peoples was resolved without giving the peoples themselves the last word in the decisions taken. Social security, the economic existence of the great masses which were crushed and ruined in the war, scarcely weighed in the deliberations of these artisans of peace. From many points of view the similarity between Vienna and Versailles is great, although their principal protagonists were cast in a different mold. It would be absurd to try to establish a parallel between Metternich and Clemenceau, beyond the fact that they both knew exactly what they wanted. And certainly, with respect to any oppositon to his desire to run the whole show, Clemenceau found in Wilson no second Talleyrand. Apart from the idea of the League of Nations, the American President had nothing to offer; shut up in a room with Clemenceau, Lloyd George and Orlando, Wilson was lost. Not only was he personally ill-informed about the condition and the feeling of the peoples of Europe, but the discussions almost always developed on the basis of a British or a French draft from the complications of which he saw no way out.

Along with Wilson, the other idealists at Paris had to console themselves with the thought that once the machinery of the League of Nations had been set up, other difficulties would be solved in the course of time. That hope of seeing a really international organization substituted for the balance of power provided the frail basis for the optimism of those who, as Harold Nicolson tells us in "Peacemaking, 1919," journeyed to Paris "not merely to liquidate the war but to found a new order in Europe; not to prepare Peace only, but Eternal Peace."

But even before the delegations had left Paris, the shrewdest and most honest observers began to doubt the efficacy of the work accomplished there. The conference had not produced a people's peace. Worst of all, no instrument had been created which would assure to world democracy a direct share in the control of international affairs. The maintenance of a peace very badly put together was left entirely to a few governments composed of men brought up on the idea of unlimited nationalism, and devoted entirely to the old form of society which had made their careers possible.

It would have been different if the people could have made themselves heard in the deliberations of the League of Nations. From the moment that fascism established itself in Italy there was in Europe a popular anti-fascist current strong enough to have forced the adoption at Geneva of a policy of resistance to violent and unilateral solutions of international problems. But the defenders of the existing economic order saw in fascism an effective means of creating a new balance of power against any possible advance of a democracy which might try to go too far. Thus, just as Metternich bound the peace of Europe to the idea of legitimacy and survival of the reigning dynasties of the time, the lesser Metternichs of the period following 1919 joined the idea of the stability of Europe to the survival of the capitalist regime which they served.

They encouraged the existence of a few fascist countries as a check against any country which might move too close to socialism. Thus was invented the theory that it was possible for aggressor nations and those which respected international law to live together and even to sign mutual agreements.

But for anyone not influenced by a secret attraction to fascism as a weight in the balance against a too progressive democracy, it was evident that the very character of fascism, the psychology of its leaders, its economic program, its tendency to seek in foreign adventure a solution of its internal problems, led fatally to war. Hitler could not stay at home. It seems incredible that only a few months ago the man in whom liberal England had trusted most for his judgment on foreign policy said that "what matters in foreign affairs is not the form of internal government of any nation," and that "the trouble with Hitler was not that he was a Nazi at home, but that he would not stay at home." But it must be admitted that Anthony Eden merely repeated in a crude form the third point of the Atlantic Charter, which respects the right of all peoples to choose the form of government under which they live, insinuating the possibility that fascist regimes may be tolerated after this war. Even the twenty-year Anglo-Soviet treaty just signed, while it states firmly that the contracting parties "will after termination of hostilities take all measures in their power to render impossible the repetition of aggression by Germany or any of the states associated with her . . . ," reiterates the principle of "non-interference" in the internal affairs of other states.

It is as if the experience at Geneva during these past years had carried no lesson. There the balance of power had been established all right, but against the Covenant. For whenever any wholesome antidote was put forward by the Soviet or the Spanish delegation or by the smaller neutrals, one heard the voice of the Secretary General of the League, supported by his British and French protectors, recommending moderation, on the theory that any protest might be resented in Berlin or Rome. Not only were the fascist nations tolerated at Geneva instead of being denounced and treated as aggressors, but it was they who indirectly commanded, who were the real masters of the situation. In the balance of power previous to 1939, there was one reality, fascism, and one shadow, democracy.

III

Is it true that the chance to win a true people's peace is greater this time than in the past? That is the question which, together with the will to defeat Hitler, has absorbed the attention of every genuine liberal since the beginning of the war. To defeat Hitler—first. To see to it that the peace shall not be made by another "Big Four" for the ultimate benefit of the present social order—second.

Until now the evident contradiction between authorized statements about the kind of peace for which the United Nations are fighting and the facts of everyday diplomacy has caused considerable confusion. Even in waging the war the diplomacy of the principal democracies continues to play the same game as before 1939. But the worst of it is that the flirtations of yesterday with Mussolini—that is to say, during the entire spring of 1940—and later with Pétain, and all the time with Franco, were not mere tactical moves based on the balance of power. This policy was aimed not merely at using the puppet dictators in order to win time for the democracies. The Pétains and the Francos were not merely tolerated. They were, and they yet are, considered by the ruling diplomacy a useful element of counterpoise in a Europe which tomorrow might swing too far to the left. That is why the diplomacy which today still directs foreign policy on the side of the Allies, when it has a choice, prefers an Otto of Hapsburg to an Austrian Socialist, an Eckhardt to a Hungarian democrat. From the point of view of the old diplomacy this is all very well. But the old diplomacy cannot be married to the idea of the democratic conduct of the war, or to the spirit which we hoped presided at the signing of the twenty-year pact between Britain and the Soviet Union.

Not everything looks altogether encouraging even today in the ensemble of the United Nations. The governments-in-exile still harbor not only men known throughout their lives as capitulards in the domain of foreign policy but men of the purest reactionary extraction. One cannot but maintain a certain reserve when considering the question what kind of peace would emerge if the present governments of the United Nations could vote secretly on the transcendental question of the organization of the world of tomorrow.

The same need to concentrate all effort on defeating the Axis and on extending as far as possible the Allied political and diplomatic front has led to the avoidance of any discussion of problems which might create controversies between governments of different political and social structure. And this is still more true on the internal front in every country. While discussion limits itself to questions of political democracy, everything goes relatively well. But issues of economic democracy, in the opinion of officials responsible for national unity, are dangerously "controversial." This was clearly stated by Mr. Churchill himself in one of his speeches (March 28, 1941): "The moment you leave the area of pure platitude you will descend into the area of heated controversy, and that would militate against the efforts which we are making." Thus, through fear of disturbing the "defensive unity" so necessary to carry on the fight, the opportunity is lost to build up a "positive unity" for the construction of a genuine democratic order after the war. Almost everywhere, at least in Europe, it is the reaction which has chiefly profited by the Union Sacrée, exploiting the truce to strengthen its own position for the future.

Some people honestly believe that at the end of the war the old social hierarchies will have been so heavily hit by taxation and the extension of state control over production that hardly anyone will be found interested in opposing a genuine economic democracy. They are living in the moon. It is possible that individually many persons, wealthy before the war, will have joined the proletariat. But as a class the elements of reaction will still be strong enough when the war ends to endanger any real attempt at a people's peace unless the democratic forces combine for action.

And if the old diplomacy still intrenched in the different Foreign Offices is allowed to play its classic game of the balance of power, the old social order will again find a way of escaping transformation. Here a government of liberals with a couple of Labor ministers; there a government of "national unity" with the conservatives retaining the chief portfolios. Here a progressive republic; across the frontier a monarchy that retains the bonhommie of a certain patriarchal tutelage; farther on, beyond the next boundary line, a corporative state adapting its structure to the "new realities"—and twenty-five years later, World War number three.

IV

The picture is not all dark. The Metternichs of our time will have a devilishly difficult job to put over a peace which is a simple compromise between the old interests and the new ideas. If at the end of the first World War many people were already convinced that the capitalist system plus the international anarchy inherent in the balance of power would lead to another war, today the opinion is overwhelming that only a fundamental social change can save the world from plunging into an entire century of foreign and civil wars. "A profound social revolution, profounder even than the revolution attempted by the Communists in Russia" was the recommendation of H. G. Wells in an essay published some six months after the beginning of the war. Since then other men, more directly tied to official responsibility, have recognized the inevitability of a drive toward social security and economic democracy. "We must move on to a great social offensive if we are to win the war completely," declared Ambassador Winant in Durham only a few days after the historic speech of Vice-President Wallace. The idea is gaining headway that only a socialist Europe can secure the peace.

At the same time, we have the determination of the people not to allow themselves to be deceived this time. One has only to look at England. The man in the street in England has undergone an astonishing change of attitude in the last two years. To begin with, he mistrusts the most eloquent speeches and all the points put on paper—whether they are fourteen or eight. On the occasion of the last broadcast of Sir Stafford Cripps the London Tribune said (May 8, 1942): "What matters now above all is that Cripps and the government and the Labor Party should understand that a Great Reform bill in 1942 is worth more than a promised revolution in 1952. Revolutions will happen anyhow. They don't have to be promised." And that in the Tribune, which is considered Cripps's organ!

It is nothing to feel particularly happy about. If in one sense it is a sign of popular strength, in another it reveals a loss of faith in all promises, even the most sincere, and opens the way to a skepticism that can be exploited by many kinds of demoralizing propaganda. But that is the situation to which ten years of constant betrayal of democracy have led. Probably the Tribune would not speak in that way if the government of Cripps were not also the government of Sir John Simon. And if this happens in England, where after all political life proceeds normally, and parties and leaders and the press are permitted to mold public opinion, one can imagine the feeling of the ordinary man in the occupied countries. Let them try the Atlantic Charter on one of these young Frenchmen who from his bicycle risks his life to shoot a Nazi! His response will depend on who talks to him about it—a repentent capitulard or a man the people have learned to trust.

However one looks at the problem there is only one way out—the total mobilization of the democratic forces in the fight for a peace that corresponds to the sacrifices the people are making, a fight to prevent the diplomats, or another "Big Four," from determining, as at Vienna and Versailles, the life or death of a new generation.

But to suggest the mobilization of the democratic forces for a people's peace will again be only words if it is not translated into terms of political action. To begin with, parties and organizations capable of exerting strong popular pressure have not emerged from the crisis into which the war plunged the left movement everywhere. The shrewdest observers agree that never have political parties been held in lower esteem in England since the reign of George III. That applies especially to the conservatives, who suffer more directly from the bankruptcy of the Chamberlain policy. But the mere fact that Attlee and his colleagues in the government win a vote in a party conference does not prove that Labor is behind them. It is one of the weaknesses of the left that the reaction will try to exploit when the war ends. In an impressive article published in the New Statesman and Nation last February by a Labor candidate, with the significant title The Silent Revolution, these words appear: "The greatest danger of all is that the fighting services, at the end of a war which is likely to grow more and more destructive, will become so violently anti-politician that they will hand over power to any individual who has managed to gain their confidence."

The great international movements suffer from the same crisis. From the Second International nothing remains but the memory of its hesitations and its failures. Other organizations, like the former Fédération Syndicale Internationale and the cooperatives, are in the hands of routine-minded officials who have not yet freed themselves from the psychology of refugees, and who think only about flattering the governments of the countries where they have established bureaus and delegations. As for the Third International, not the boldest Communists would believe that by themselves they can produce a movement strong enough to prevent a bad peace.

It is of the most extreme urgency to revitalize all those groups. But even the largest and best articulated movement in favor of a people's peace would fail if it did not have a correct, clear policy to follow. Any political strategy worthy of the name is conditioned by the nature of the world that surrounds us. The battle is still in terms of the balance of power, and the first aim of the liberals must be to tilt in their favor the present balance in the cadres of the United Nations: to strengthen every genuine tendency in support of a real democratic victory; to back every man whose democratic record guarantees a firm stand in the next peace conference. Whoever supports Benes, for instance, works for a people's peace. Whoever, inside the Free French movement, supports the effort to surround De Gaulle with men who represent the real people of France, instead of dubious adherents of the Croix de Feu, works for a people's peace. Whoever in Allied governments and the free movements gives maximum support to the new Russian-British alliance, works for a people's peace. Whoever tries to force out of the Allied Foreign Offices the remaining appeasers and reactionaries works for a people's peace.

In a word, the problem is (1) to create a strong democratic world movement and (2) to place proved anti-fascist and progressive leaders in key posts in the governments of the United Nations. The value of any international agreement depends on the men who will carry it through. The Soviet-French pact concluded in 1935 was a quite different instrument for peace in the hands of Louis Barthou than in the hands of Georges Bonnet. In the end, it comes back to the men and to the forces that move them.

Keep Them Out!

III. STEPHEN A. DAY OF ILLINOIS

BY SYDNEY JUSTIN HARRIS

FOR more than twenty years Stephen A. Day was a joke in his part of Illinois and a nonentity elsewhere. He was a joke to the politicians of both parties, who ridiculed his pathetically serious attempts to gain public office year after year. He was a joke to the newspapermen, who had heard his solemn chant of devotion to the Constitution at a hundred D. A. R. meetings and Union League banquets. And until 1940 this baldish, chubby, self-righteous messiah was a joke to the electorate of Illinois, who repudiated him six times consecutively at the polls, both in his party primaries and in the November elections.

Day's election in 1940 as Congressman-at-Large on the Republican ticket has been variously interpreted by politicians and editorial writers. According to the Chicago Tribune, he was sent into office on an "Illinois landslide." The G. O. P.'s local leaders, who cater to the Tribune's whims publicly but have their own private opinions, simply shake their heads and call it a "political accident." The Democrats ascribe his long-delayed success to the growing strength of labor in America in 1940, which frightened Illinois farmers—almost 3,000,000 of them—and to the threat of war.

Whatever the reasons for Day's unexpected victory, overnight he ceased to be a joke to responsible citizens. He immediately took his place in the front line of the pro-Axis propaganda campaign, inveighing long and lustily against the Administration's foreign and domestic policies. The Tribune and the Hearst press began touting him as the white hope of the Middle West, and the fascist and bundist groups adopted him as one of their own. He was mentioned in the same breath with Pelley, Coughlin, and Gerald Smith. Stephen Day had arrived.

Once on the floor of the House, Day swung into action with a ferocity which belied his meek, diffident appearance. He voted against the lease-lend bill, against the first lease-lend appropriation, and against the draft extension. He opposed repeal of the bans on arming American vessels and on their entering combat zones. On the domestic front, like many a politically wise Republican, he yielded to Administration pressure and helped defeat the Smith labor-spy bill. This was his only pro-labor vote.

He became a member of the House too late to vote on such important issues as fortification of the Guam naval base, air-force appropriations, neutrality, the WPA, the NYA, and other public-works bills. His subsequent activities, however, leave no doubt as to where he would have stood on these matters. The editorial column of the Chicago Tribune is his master's voice, and he makes no effort to deny it.

But it is Day's extra-Congressional sorties into world affairs which brand him as a pro-Axis agitator. Try as he may to disclaim the love of the native fascists, their affection for him is inscribed in the pages of William Dudley Pelley's fascist weekly Roll Call, which, on August 11, 1941, had a front-page editorial titled Will Stephen A. Day Save This Republic? Pelley had this to say about his new-found hero:

> He takes his place on the patriotic honor roll along with Lindbergh, Nye, Wheeler, Thorkelson, and more. . . . Whether the revolting Seventy-seventh Congress will generate sufficient spunk and genuine patriotism to go down the line with Representative Day remains to be seen. . . . If the Congress really wants to go the whole hog on the revolt, here is its chance to prove whether it is composed of Christian patriots or Stalin-Roosevelt instruments—whether they love their country more than they love Jewish-controlled Russia, with Jewish-controlled Britain thrown in for boot!

Certainly Day has done everything to win the admiration of the Pelleys, the Coughlins, and the Smiths. He has spoken before Gerald L. K. Smith's Committee of One Million, We the Mothers, Mobilize for America, William Grace's Citizens Keep America Out of War Committee, and several other pro-fascist and super-isolationist groups. The planning and timing of his radio diatribes against the Administration might have been directed from Berlin, so perfectly did they fit into the propaganda strategy of the Axis. For instance, in a radio address on August 1, 1941, when Russia was making its heroic stand against the Nazi invasion, Day assailed "lease-lend for atheism" and asked Congress to revoke the authorization granted the President for aid to Russia.

Day's Kampf against the forces of "socialism, communism, and internationalism" goes back at least to 1930 when he formed the Lincoln-Jefferson Liberty League, virtually a one-man organization with headquarters in the office of the German-American Republican Alliance in Chicago. The league's platform was a conglomerate of anti-prohibition, anti-British, and anti-socialist propaganda. Day said at the time:

> We are suffering today under the narrow-minded rule of a successfully organized minority. This powerful network, a product of the World War, is founded upon the Anti-Saloon League and the Federal Council of Churches in America, controlling the votes of millions. This autocratic combination is allied with the forces of intolerance, including the Democratic Party in the South and numerous pacifist organizations, many of which are frankly communistic in their appeal.

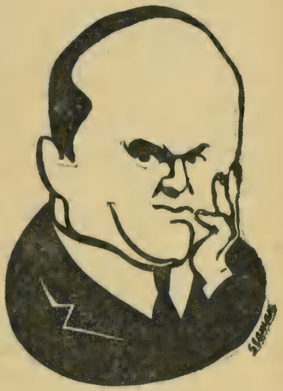
His main theme in later years, however—thousands of reprints of his remarks have been distributed by Nazi groups under Day's Congressional frank—is that Roosevelt is plotting to overthrow the Constitution and betray the United States to Great Britain, a foe whom he considers only slightly less dangerous than the Soviet Union. On June 15, 1941, in what the Tribune called an "arresting radio address," Day revealed that the President's plan is to merge Congress in the parliament of the "Anglo-American Union," of which "the rulers will be Winston Churchill and Franklin Roosevelt."

A few months later, however, he was embarrassed when Washington newspaper columnists revealed that his rabidly isolationist, anti-British, and anti-New Deal book, "We Must Save the Republic," had been published by Flanders Hall, a registered Nazi publishing house controlled by the convicted Nazi agent George Sylvester Viereck. The book, which sold for $1 under the Flanders Hall imprint, was advertised and praised in a number of American fascist periodicals, which recommended it along with "other books exposing the Communist and Jewish control of England and America." In an interview he gave to newspapermen on October 9 of last year Day said: "I wrote the book myself, without aid or collaboration, as an answer to Union Now. I never got any royalties from Flanders Hall. As soon as I found out that those fellows were registered as foreign agents I bought my contract back at considerable expense."

The book is a hysterical, often incoherent formulation of the anti-British and anti-Roosevelt sentiments which Day has been spouting for the last ten or twelve years. Typical chapter titles are: Shall We Follow George Washington or Benedict Arnold?, The Invasion Myth: a Bogy for Suckers, and Independent America vs. Fifth Columnist Federationists.

At Viereck's trial it was disclosed that the Nazi agent made changes in Day's manuscript before it was published—but who can distinguish between the "American" and the Nazified portions of the book? It was also shown that Viereck received $1,000 from the Nazi-controlled Make Europe Pay Its War Debts Committee to promote the sale of Day's book. This committee, and others equally under the shadow, mailed out thousands of pieces of propaganda under the Congressional frank of Day and of his colleague, William Stratton, another Tribune Representative from Illinois.

Day has hotly denied being anti-Semitic and has not publicly expressed any open hostility to the Jews. However, a notarized affidavit signed by Eric von Schroetter, an anti-Nazi German and former instructor at Northwestern University, declares that Day sent a cable to Hitler on April 6, 1933, congratulating him upon his rise to the chancellorship of the Reich. According to von Schroetter, Day approached him through an official of the German-American Republican Alliance and asked him to translate the cable into German. Von Schroetter has also stated under oath that Day then delivered a "lengthy monologue against the 'world conspiracy of the Jews,' and told what should be done about it." Day said, it is alleged, that "a strong drive against the Jews, against Morgenthau and Roosevelt especially, should be made by the citizens of this country."



Stephen A. Day

Day is sixty years old, wears drab, loose-fitting clothes, boasts that he has never taken a drink although he ran as a "wet" for fifteen years, and has no perceptible social life. Almost everyone who meets him for the first time is struck by his remarkable resemblance—in appearance and manner—to Victor Moore, the stage and film comedian. He has the same awkward diffidence, the prim shyness which conceals sharpness of a sort, the naive "folksy" attitude which Moore radiates in his stage characters. Despite his outbursts of demagoguery, he is no streamlined fascist of the Smith or Coughlin variety but rather a dull, pontifical throwback to nineteenth-century conservatism. He is a menace because he can be—and has been—used by smarter and more dangerous men.

Stephen Day's father—and he is never reluctant to bring up the fact—was William R. Day, Associate Justice of the United States Supreme Court, and Secretary of State in President McKinley's Cabinet. Among his ancestors was General Joseph Warren, who fell at Bunker Hill. Stephen himself, just out of the University of Michigan, in 1905 became confidential secretary to Chief Justice Melville W. Fuller of the Supreme Court. Thus, by proxy, the Constitution has become Day's private property at patriotic and political functions in Illinois. He is the custodian of the sacred parchment and waves it at every opportunity. Just before the 1936 elections, when Day was strenuously campaigning to block the President's plan for reorganizing the Supreme Court, he spoke to an audience in Canton, Ohio, his birthplace, and with tears almost streaming down his cheeks, à la Victor Moore, he cried:

> I pledged my father that if the Supreme Court ever were in danger I would fight with all my strength to preserve its integrity. If the present Administration is reelected, the Supreme Court will be so weakened that its integrity will be lost, and then the United States will become a proletarian state with the average citizen on relief.

Most of Day's speeches are in this frenetic vein, and they have been uniformly unsuccessful in campaign-wise Chicago as well as in his home town of Evanston. But his stuff is eaten up downstate, where the name of Justice Day is proudly remembered and the Battle of Bunker Hill is still a live issue. In the recent Republican primary Day was badly beaten by his interventionist opponent in Chicago and Evanston but gained a sufficient plurality downstate to win the nomination.

Day has run for office almost every two years ever since 1920. Usually he has failed to receive indorsement or nomination in the primary; if he was nominated in the spring he was always beaten in the fall. It is said that his once thriving law practice—General Dawes was a client and personal friend of his—has gone to seed in the last ten years. He is known to have little money.

Neither a popular nor a well-known figure in his own district, Day is regarded as an outsider by the regular Republican organization, which failed to indorse him this year. In past election years he has volunteered to make speeches, and the leaders have allowed him to talk at "safe" meetings. His naivete is legendary among the politicians and newspapermen. In 1936, the story goes, he telephoned a county chieftain and told him blandly that he wanted to run for President. The G. O. P. leader patiently explained the process: "You have to start in the precincts," he said, "and then get the county and state indorsements. After that you get delegates pledged to you and try for the nomination at the National Convention." Day never mentioned the aspiration again.

Illinois is going to vote Democratic again in 1942, if the primary is any indication, and Day will probably find himself once more on the outside looking in. His opponent this fall is a young, aggressive Pole, Benjamin Adamowski, with an excellent New Deal record in the state legislature. Adamowski polled almost twice as many primary votes as Day and ran well ahead of the rest of the Democratic ticket. Moreover, he is actively supported by the largest Polish community in the nation, and he will gain many Republican votes because of his known independence of the Kelly-Nash machine. It is believed by political experts in Illinois that Adamowski will win handily, piling up enough Chicago and suburban votes to offset Day's certain downstate majority.

Price Ceilings—Quality Cellars

BY RUTH BRINDZE

PRICE ceilings alone are not enough to prevent inflation, and the Office of Price Administration knows it. As Harold Mager wrote in The Nation for May 30, there are two ways in which the cost of any article can be increased—by a mark-up of the price and by a debasement of quality. If the shoes for which a man normally pays $3.98 are now no better than a pair that cost $2.98 before the war, the actual cost has gone up 33⅓ per cent, even though the price tag has remained the same. This is the kind of inflation that must be expected if government control extends no farther than price.

The General Maximum Price Regulation merely provides that the price for the same or "similar" articles may not be more than that charged in March, 1942. A "similar" commodity is defined as one that "affords the purchaser fairly equivalent serviceability and belongs to a type which would ordinarily be sold in the same price line." This is one of those blanket provisions that cover practically nothing.

What is the meaning of the words "fairly equivalent serviceability," and who will decide on it—the government, the manufacturer, the retailer, or the customer? A professional buyer whose judgment is supplemented by laboratory testing may be able to determine the comparative serviceability of a woman's blouse, a child's snowsuit, or a man's overalls. The average over-the-counter buyer will not be able to judge. He will be further handicapped because war shortages will necessitate many changes in articles made for civilians. The leather used for men's work shoes will be different because heavy leather is needed in the manufacture of shoes for the armed forces. War-time furniture will be different because jute, burlap, kapok, and many other products normally used in its manufacture are no longer available. Bicycle tires, another of the articles classed as "cost-of-living commodities," will undoubtedly be different—if they are manufactured at all—because reclaimed instead of new rubber must be used. In addition to all such necessary changes, some manufacturers will make others because cheating promises bigger profits.

How can control be exercised? Bernard Baruch has suggested one way; the OPA is already experimenting with another. Several months before the general price-regulation order was issued, the OPA went into action to check the runaway prices of sheets and pillow cases. Not only were maximum prices set, but these were tied directly to quality standards. Instead of merely saying that sheets could not be sold for more than a fixed maximum, the OPA established specifications for four types of sheeting and then named price ceilings for each. Labeling requirements were set up so that the various grades might be readily identified—by the trade. Of course the labeling should be carried through to the consumer, but we are only one step away from that now. The OPA's order did not limit the kinds of sheeting that may be manufactured. Other varieties, including high-count percales, may still be made, but they do not come under the labeling regulations. All sheetings manufactured according to government specifications must be labeled, and "seconds" must be marked as such.

Writing specifications for the multitude of articles used in the average household, including clothing and food, is a task of heroic proportions. The system used in Great Britain, with which Bernard Baruch's suggestion is directly in line, is simpler but more drastic than price and quality regulations. Mr. Baruch has pointed out that the way to prevent waste, as well as to control production for civilian use, is by standardization. Shoes, for example, he would order made in a limited number of grades and styles. Novelty footgear, especially that made for women, would be out. True the toeless, heelless trivialities don't take much leather, but they do require labor and machines for their construction and transportation facilities for their delivery. Whether such frivolities are desirable for a nation at war is a debatable question. In England, where clothing is rationed, "utility" cloth, manufactured to government specifications, is being used for many articles of wearing apparel. Styles have been restricted; only "utility types" of corsets and stockings may be made.

Foodstuffs are even more rigidly controlled. In order to prevent waste in production and distribution, and to control price, many of the basic foods have been "nationalized." Margarine, for example, is manufactured by only one company, which is directly controlled by the Ministry of Food. Two standard grades are made. Bread and butter have likewise been standardized, and instead of individual brands, consumers buy "national" bread and "national" butter. The effect of this standardization —or socialization—on Britain's post-war economy is an interesting field for speculation, but not one that appeals to American business men, who have spent a fortune advertising brand names. From their point of view, any regulation, however stringent, which permits the continued use of the company's name is preferable. We are not yet ready for "nationalization," but we are ready for restrictions. We can effect a major economic change by regulation without facing the hurdles that a direct take-over would involve. This is the direction in which we are heading.

Our War Production Board is not only deciding what consumer goods may be made but how they may be made. Government orders have fixed the length of hairpins and the number that may be included in a package; also the length of shirt tails, the amount of rubber in corsets, the number of tacks hammered into a pair of shoes, the yardage to be used for men's and women's clothing, the thickness of the glass in food containers and their size. The OPA has already learned that the effectiveness of price ceilings depends on the control of production. In August, 1941, it fixed maximum prices for 52 types of rayon fabrics; in April, 1942, it specified 177 additional types; so that the regulations now affect 90 per cent of all rayon goods. Before the order was extended, manufacturers were switching production to types that brought a higher return, and as a result there was a shortage of goods used in women's low-priced dresses. With the order now in force, labels might be developed which would inform the public on quality and durability. And if subsequent events should make it necessary, the OPA could amend its order and completely control the types of fabric woven.

Control is not always so easy. In an explanatory statement on the price schedule for leather, the OPA has pointed out some of the difficulties:

> The length of time taken for the tanning process, the method used, and the amount of load or excess weighting to which the leather is subjected during the tanning process are all factors which substantially affect the quality and value of the resultant leather. Two bends of substantially the same crop, the same area on a footage basis, and the same thickness may easily result in leather which will vary, as between tanners, by as much as 20 per cent in actual weight because of the loading.

But such obstacles can be overcome. The army, the navy, and other government services have long bought shoes and other leather goods to specification. The OPA would not have to start from scratch in developing standards for civilians' shoes.

The groundwork has also been laid for many other manufactured and natural products. The specifications for sheets developed by the United States Bureau of Home Economics over many years and the findings of the National Bureau of Standards were available to the OPA when it set up its quality and labeling regulations. Specifications have likewise been established by the government for a wide variety of other items ranging from blankets to house paint. In peace time the government is the biggest buyer of consumer goods; and quality standards for various civilian articles might be based on federal specifications.

It will be necessary, however, to develop many new standards for war-time substitutes. The Consumer Division of the OPA has already attacked the problem. We may get longer wear from war-time rubber heels because Washington postmen and policemen were enlisted by the division to give them a practical test. Durability will now be one of the factors determining the formula to be used in preparing the reclaimed rubber heels.

The problem of grading foodstuffs is comparatively simple. During the First World War the food trade began to use grades as the basis for wholesale buying, and by the time the Second World War started, government grading had been adopted for most fresh and canned fruits and vegetables, as well as for meat and poultry. But while we lived in peace, the meat packers and the food processors bitterly fought attempts to make quality grading and stamping mandatory and thereby to give consumers a rule for determining value. The weakness of the food industries' position was obvious, for while they were arguing that canned fruits and vegetables could not be sold to consumers by grade, they were themselves buying and selling by grade at wholesale. The OPA has the power to end the long argument and to require that food in the "cost-of-living" group be grade-labeled.

Existing government requirements can be used as a basis for quality standards for many of the foods over which the OPA now exercises control, and the Department of Agriculture has a corps of trained graders who might be called into service. Intelligent use of the quality standards can be expected from the public, for a large number of consumers have already been educated in the advantages of grade buying by the efforts of schools, colleges, the General Federation of Women's Clubs, the League of Women Voters, and federal, state, and city consumer agencies.

The enforcement of price control depends on quality standards. It requires a vigorous and adequate policing force and a punitive system with real guts. If industry refuses to submit, or alleges that cooperation is not possible, then complete control of manufacturing and processing may be necessary. Control by regulation, however, has more to recommend it. And the present is the time to take the offensive.

Everybody's Business

BY KEITH HUTCHISON

Will Planes Oust Trains?

THE railroads are breaking all records for freight handling, and under the spur of necessity and the firm direction of Joseph Eastman, Defense Transport Commissioner, they are operating with a hitherto unknown efficiency. Last year freight movements were 25 billion ton-miles greater than in 1929, although 600,000 fewer freight cars were available, and this year the 1941 figure will be vastly exceeded.

The tremendous volume of goods which the rails are being called upon to move is of course a direct reflection of a total national output soaring month by month to new heights. But in addition to what may be considered their full share of a super-normal transport load, the railroads are taking traffic from every competing form of transport. Oil and coal, which previously moved mostly by sea to the Northeastern states, are now being carried by rail; so is much of the freight which used to pass through the Panama Canal. The same sort of thing is happening in the passenger departments. With large numbers of airliners requisitioned for war purposes, travelers are flocking back to the Pullmans, and motorists are turning to the railroads wherever possible.

As a consequence of near-capacity use of all their facilities, the railroads' revenues are soaring to new heights, and despite increases in labor and other costs and mounting taxes, many companies are making very handsome profits. Stock-market quotations for railroad securities, however, suggest that investors remain singularly unimpressed by all this evidence of prosperity. It has not proved a cure for the disease of post-war defeatism, epidemic in the American stockholding class, which is convinced that ruin is right around the corner.

There are reasons for supposing, however, that holders of railroad securities may have more cause for anxiety about the future than investors in other fields. Recently their flesh has been made to creep by air-minded prophets who assert that earthbound means of transport will soon be a thing of the past. In a speech on May 2, Grover Loening, consulting engineer of the Grumann Aircraft Corporation, declared that cargo planes would very soon take over all carrying operations by land and sea. Referring to the projected Glenn Martin flying ships, which will carry a useful load of eighty tons, he declared that owing to the tremendous saving in time, 8,300 such machines could displace the entire merchant marine of the world. As for the 1,900,000 freight cars in the United States, their work could be done by 45,000 aircraft of a type now being flown day after day. "It is clear," Mr. Loening said, "that to keep the 300,000 pilots that we are going to have at the end of this war at work, and the millions of mechanics also, and in order to use some of the thousands of highly usable aircraft that we are going to inherit from this war, as well as to keep our factories going in some way—air will have to invade the heavy freight field of the railroads and the heavy cargo field of the international shipping companies right away."

Similar ideas were propounded a few days later by Glenn L. Martin, who told a New York audience that the Mars, the latest flying boat produced by his company, had a hull with a cubic space equal to that of the average fifteen-room house. It could, he said, carry 102 passengers with 80 pounds of luggage apiece, 25,000 pounds of mail, and a crew of 12, and cover the distance between New York and London in 13 hours. And this boat by no means represents the possible limit in size.

Both railroad and shipping men have scoffed at these prophecies, pointing out that while airplanes may score as regards speed they are still handicapped by the cost factor. Air freight rates between New York and Buenos Aires are roughly five times those charged by the steamship companies, which refuse to recognize a menace from the air until the cost differential is brought down to a mere 100 per cent. Railroaders, while recognizing that the airplane will compete for an increasing amount of passenger and express traffic, believe it will be a long time before they are challenged in the field of bulk freight. Planes, they say, will continue to be handicapped by the force of gravity, which compels them to develop a great deal more horse-power per ton-mile than a locomotive.

Probably the truth lies somewhere between the airmen and the earthmen. Commercial aviation is bound to take a tremendous leap forward when lessons learned under the forced draft of war are applied to the uses of peace. But it took a long time for the steamship to displace the sailing vessel, and even today the lumbering barge still competes with the railroad for certain forms of freight. Aircraft costs will certainly fall after the war. The secrets of mass-production of planes now being mastered are likely to reduce initial capital outlay per unit tremendously. Severe competition between manufacturers is probable, with four or five well-established firms competing with Douglas Aircraft, which formerly enjoyed a near-monopoly in the commercial-plane field. Nor are the automobile manufacturers, now that they have rather belatedly turned to plane production, apt to relinquish their stake in this "growth" industry. It is unlikely that Henry Ford has built Willow Run just to make bombers.

While the air enthusiasts, therefore, may be allowing their imagination to soar rather higher than the facts warrant, it is not hard to foresee increasing competition between the plane and older forms of transport. Moreover, with its great margin of speed, the plane is likely to skim the cream off the business at a fairly early stage. This is what is going to hurt the railroads and hurt them so much that I fully expect in a few years' time to see a movement, supported by the banks and blessed by the Wall Street Journal, to persuade the government to nationalize the railroads. Capitalists begin to see virtue in socialism when they find themselves stuck with an enterprise whose future is blighted.

BOOKS and the ARTS

Her Name Is Legion

THE COMPANY SHE KEEPS. By Mary McCarthy. Simon and Schuster. $2.50.

THE publishers' somewhat pretentious synopsis and Miss McCarthy's amusing foreword unintentionally do their best to mislead us as to the character of this novel. So let us begin with a synopsis of our own.

"The Company She Keeps" is divided into six episodes. The first, Cruel and Barbarous Treatment, describes, with the disgusted objectivity of a dyspeptic anthropologist, the various stages of an adultery which lead to divorce and the decision not to marry the other man. Neither the girl, the husband, nor the lover is given a name; passion is purely algebraical; the authoress unfolds her theme with the gusto of a scientist developing a favorite thesis. The result is brilliant and highly convincing, but it is the weakest thing in the book.

In Rogue's Gallery we meet Mr. Sheer, a dealer in doubtful antiques, who gives the girl her first job. (This episode is, of course, a flashback to Margaret's earlier pre-marital life.) Mr. Sheer, with his debts and deceits and baroque imagination, is quite somebody. We see far too little of him. Miss McCarthy could easily have expanded this portrait into a short novel. That she has not done so shows either the folly of a literary spendthrift or the liberality of vast inventive wealth. Here is a figure who might have stood beside the Great Gatsby.

And now we are on a westbound train. Margaret is traveling to visit an aunt in Portland—to tell her that she is going to marry again. Once more, however, she changes her mind: this time because of her encounter with The Man in the Brooks Brothers Shirt. Here is a little masterpiece, carried through in perfect detail from the come-on to the brush-off—the classic study of the Business Man conquering the Tired Bohemian Girl. Even those who have never been seduced in a railway compartment will recognize here the accents of utter and awful truth.

The Genial Host is another portrait, crueller but equally well balanced, of one of those arachnidan entertainers who weave spider's webs around their guests and exact from each a character performance in exchange for a good dinner. Margaret, growing weary of this technique, tries to walk out of her role, but is promptly lassoed and yanked back into position by a silky thread.

Portrait of the Intellectual as a Yale Man is good, too. Its central figure is Jim Barnett, the clean-limbed Bright Young Pinkist whom everybody likes; in the end, of course, he sells out to weekly pluto-imperio-reportage-journalism—accepts, in other words, the Facts of Life. Margaret appears here at second remove. She is seen through his eyes. She is his bad conscience: sexually, because Jim has an affair with her while his wife is in childbed; politically, because in the obstinate integrity of her Trotskyism she seems to him to symbolize loyalty, idealism, honorable poverty, and freedom.

But Margaret, when we see her last, in the consulting-room of a psychoanalyst, is neither loyal, idealistic, nor free. Remarried at last to a successful architect, she is no longer even poor. Ghostly Father, I Confess is the annotated report of a typical hour spent with Dr. James—the annotations being Margaret's childhood memories. "Here," says Simon and Schuster's back flap, "for the first time, we see the girl plain and whole. . . . Psychologically she has come to a dead end and can only act and reenact the childhood drama of estrangement that has left her permanently in doubt as to her moral identity, turned her into a human chameleon who can only know herself vicariously, through those whose company she keeps."

This kind of talk seems to me, as I have said above, misleading and anyhow superficial. There is nothing special, or inviting to pity and terror, about Margaret's case; we are all "human chameleons," every one of us. The stupid are not aware of this fact, the wise accept it, and the rest make a terrible fuss. The search for what Miss McCarthy calls "the ordinary indispensable self" is as futile as the "search" for one's own reflection in a mirror: the object sought is infinitely protean, and it can never be grasped or possessed. since it moves on another plane of being. Between the eternity of the animal, which is reproduction, and the eternity of the spirit, which is awareness of its life in ultimate reality, there is nothing firm, nothing solid, nothing "indispensable." The personality, which we value so much, is only a swirling nebula, a looking-glass at a fair—or, as the Hindus put it, the skins of the onion, which, when they are peeled off, leave nothing at all. "But," the reader will object, "surely you'll admit that the 'ordinary indispensable self,' however illusory it may be in our human life, is very real in fiction. Surely this is the paradox of the novelist's art: in his work he must square the convention of 'the personality' with his empirical knowledge that the personality does not, in any final sense, 'exist'."

Needless to say, I agree. And I am bound to add that if this was really Miss McCarthy's original artistic intention and not a regrettable highbrow afterthought, I think she has made a very bad job of it. Margaret does not appear as a series of striking contrasts and apparent contradictions; in fact, this idea seems hardly to have been exploited at all. Actually, she is a somewhat colorless though sympathetic and attractive minor figure who serves as a stooge for feats of really dazzling social analysis or as second fiddle to the principal characters.

But why carp? Why be ungrateful? Never mind if the book is wrongly presented; never mind the slightly dated, almost twentyish intellectualism. Miss McCarthy has given us Mr. Sheer and Mr. Breen and Pflaumen and Jim Barnett and Dr. James. She is a real novelist, a vivid original talent whose warmth and charity and insight need no pompous introductions. We should rejoice in her, and wait eagerly for more.

CHRISTOPHER ISHERWOOD

The Ramparts We Lost

RAMPARTS OF THE PACIFIC. By Hallett Abend. Doubleday, Doran and Company. $3.50.

HALLETT ABEND, former Far Eastern correspondent of the New York Times, made a whirlwind, two-month clipper survey of Oahu, New Zealand, Australia, the Dutch East Indies, and the Philippines to write a last-minute report on the strength of the democracies shortly before the attack on Pearl Harbor. Before he could finish his book, however, the screaming headlines of our newspapers were providing the frightening answer to questions about the strength of Singapore, the Philippines, and the Dutch East Indies. His discussion of these bases as ramparts of the democracies comes, therefore, as an anti-climax to one of the great tragic stories of our day.

Since the author visited these bases at a time when they were rapidly being strengthened in preparation for possible Japanese attacks, it is natural that he should have been impressed by the striking improvement in the military, naval, and air position of their owners in the western Pacific. Consequently he is somewhat at a loss to explain the reasons for the shocking defeats suffered by the United Nations. If his figures on the military and air strength at Singapore, the Philippines, and the Dutch East Indies are correct, the cause of the disasters is more inexplicable than ever, for they indicate that the United Nations were not so greatly outnumbered by the Japanese as is generally believed.

Mr. Abend thinks that there was a "minimum" of 180,000 soldiers in the Philippines and about 200,000 British, Australian, New Zealand, and Indian troops in Malaya. These troops, he writes, were overwhelmed by a Japanese force in both areas "not to exceed 400,000 men." In the East Indies Mr. Abend believes the Dutch had almost 200,000 men under arms, giving the United Nations a total of 580,000 men in the three strategic areas which the Japanese apparently succeeded in capturing with a total force not much greater.

For an explanation of the disconcerting puzzle presented by these figures the author points to the fact that the United Nations lacked control of the air. But his estimates of United Nations air strength make it difficult to understand why we were so completely overwhelmed in that field. Mr. Abend asserts that the Dutch had about 2,400 planes of all classes and sizes in the Netherlands Indies and that the British had at least 800 planes in Singapore and Malaya. He offers no figures for the Philippines but says planes were being sent across the Pacific in "astonishing numbers" after midsummer of 1941. It is incredible that there were in the Philippines less than 300 planes, which would mean that the United Nations had a total air force of at least 3,500 planes at the three ramparts which have now fallen.

If these figures are anywhere near correct, then the Japanese could not have had much superiority in the air in the southwestern Pacific, as their total air force is estimated at less than 7,000 planes, about half of which must have been reserved for Japan proper, China, and the Soviet-Manchurian frontier. Mr. Abend's figures suggest that it was not entirely a question of "too little and too late," that the lack of coordination at each base and between all the forces of the United Nations had not a little to do with our defeats.

It can be assumed that General MacArthur is now perfecting coordination of our forces at Australia, which is being converted into a base for the eventual counter-offensive against the Japanese. Mr. Abend's chapters on New Zealand and Australia, therefore, provide valuable and timely reading. He presents a large amount of fresh material, and his description of the heroic efforts being made by the Australians and New Zealanders provides a measure of compensation for an otherwise bleak picture.

The large number of fliers being turned out by our allies in the Antipodes is particularly impressive. New Zealand is expected to train about 5,000 fliers annually, and of the 210,000 Australians who applied for enlistment in the air force, Mr. Abend says more than 70,000 have been accepted. Given such an air force and the continued indomitable resistance of the Chinese—who have already suffered 9,000,000 casualties in their struggle against the Japanese—the outlook for the United Nations is not at all dark.

Russia's Strength

RUSSIA'S ECONOMIC FRONT FOR WAR AND PEACE: AN APPRAISAL OF THE THREE FIVE-YEAR PLANS. By A. Yugow. Harper and Brothers. $3.

MR. YUGOW'S book is important not so much because of its intrinsic merit as because it fills a conspicuous void in our information about Russia. The reviewer knows of no other place where the average person may so quickly and conveniently obtain the basic facts regarding Soviet economic development, together with information that will enable him to appraise these facts intelligently. It is distinctly not pro-Soviet in its interpretations; nevertheless, the general picture is one of amazing progress despite blundering and in the face of a heavy cost to the Russian people. Progress appears to have been particularly rapid in the months between 1938 and June, 1941—a period of almost complete blackout so far as information about Soviet Russia was concerned.

A few statistics will help us to see how phenomenal Russia's industrial advance has been since the Revolution. As compared with 1913, Russia's output of iron ore has increased threefold; of pig iron, fourfold; of steel, fivefold; and of machine-building, thirty-two-fold. Many new industries, such as the manufacture of tractors, automobiles, precision machine tools, motors, and electrical machinery, have been started and carried to a high level of development in the past fifteen or twenty years. Most of these gains have been made since 1928, when the First Five-Year Plan was inaugurated. Industrial production as a whole in 1940 was seven and one-half times as large as in 1928; the output of producers' goods—the key to Russia's strength in peace or war—increased no less than fourteen-fold during this twelve-year period and was still expanding rapidly prior to the invasion in 1941. Much less emphasis was placed, of course, on consumers' goods. Nevertheless, the output in this category increased nearly four and a half times between 1928 and 1940 and five times between 1913 and 1940. No other country has shown a rate of industrial growth that is at all comparable to that of the Soviet Union during this period.

There is, of course, a negative side to the picture. Soviet tanks, airplanes, and other war materials are of relatively high quality, but largely as a result of the speeding up of production, the quality of non-military goods has been consistently poor and costs of production have been high. Carelessness had led to much waste and many accidents.

The progress made in agriculture in the same period has been in a way fully as remarkable as that in industry, for the possibilities of growth in this sphere are obviously more restricted. The grain yield in 1939, 1940, and 1941 was about double the pre-war average, and the cotton crop was about three and a half times that of 1913. The consistently high yields of recent years contrast with the wide swings between good and bad harvests in the past, and are perhaps the most encouraging feature of Soviet agricultural development.

The standard of living of the Soviet population, Yugow believes, has increased appreciably in the past few years, particularly in agricultural regions. But he maintains that the average Russian worker, though his position has improved, has still a lower standard of life than French, German, or even Bulgarian workers. The condition of the peasants on the collective farms, however, has notably advanced. Reliable figures are cited indicating that in the Middle Volga region and the Kuban, as well as in the Ukraine, the peasants consume one and a half times as much bread, one and a half times as much milk, and eight times as much meat and lard as they did before the First World War. Even greater advances are shown in the consumption of clothing, shoes, furniture, and other goods. While the industrial figures may explain Russia's unexpected strength in planes, tanks, and the weapons of war, the undeniable improvement in living standards, especially in the country, explains the utter collapse of Hitler's hope that the Russian people would rise against the Soviet regime and pave the way for the Nazi invaders.

MAXWELL S. STEWART

Inside Italy

AGENT IN ITALY. By S. K. Doubleday, Doran and Company. $3.

THE author of this book lived in Rome from the summer of 1939 to the summer of 1941. When he speaks of things outside the city of Rome or of facts of an earlier date, he piles error upon error, as does any foreigner who deals with Italian affairs on the basis of his immediate observations alone, without knowing present-day Italy widely or the Italy of yesterday at all. But S. K.'s errors should not obscure the fact that during the years of his residence in Rome he gathered with diligence and intelligence a great deal of first-hand and reliable information on rising prices, on the deterioration of the standard of living, and on the infiltration of German agents into all branches of the Italian economic, military, and administrative structure.

The author does not believe in the possibility of a separate peace between Italy and the Allied Nations:

> It is a mistake if anti-Axis forces today suppose that Italy will drop out of the war by itself. Such an event can be brought about by only two means. . . . One is invasion by the United Nations, which would be warmly welcomed and abetted by the mass of the people. The other is for Germany to be militarily defeated and Nazism destroyed. . . . There will be no revolution in Italy until peace—as defined above—comes again to Europe.

When the Fascist structure falls, he says, the monarchy will not outlive it.

Whoever knows the state of mind of the great majority of the Italian people must agree that on these points the conclusions of the author correspond to reality. The British Foreign Office and the American State Department would do well to discard their dreams of concluding a separate peace with the King or the Italian army chiefs after the latter decide to throw Mussolini into the sea. Mussolini, the King, and the army chiefs will sink or swim together. At the most, when Hitler has lost the war for good, some army chiefs and the King will endeavor to save their skins by staging a faked "revolution" against the Duce, to the satisfaction of the gullible "anti-Bolshevist" hearts of the British and American tories.

Though he lived in Rome for two years, the author of this book never speaks of the Pope. This fact will seem strange to those who fancy that no one moves a finger in Italy without the permission of the Pope. Yet this absolute ignorance of the Pope is the surest evidence that the author really lived in Rome for two years. If he had not, he would certainly have told us that the Pope is the greatest authority in the life of Rome and of Italy. The fact is that the authority of the Pope is extensive in London (England), Quebec (Canada), and Washington (U. S. A.), but not in Italy. To an inhabitant of Rome the price of tomatoes and charcoal is much more important than the latest address of Pope Pius XII.

Unfortunately the author has discredited himself by making out that in Italy he took part in an underground revolutionary movement. Underground movements do exist in Italy, but the internal evidence of S. K.'s account makes it obvious that he had no connection with them.

Out of the Many, One

$1,000 A WEEK, AND OTHER STORIES. By James T. Farrell. The Vanguard Press. $2.50.

THE items of this volume work by a wide variety of methods. In the simplest distinction, there is the fact that one "story," G. B. S. Interviews the Pope, has the form of a dramatic dialogue between the irresistible force and the immovable object named; another consists of nothing more than the near side of a telephone conversation. Somewhat less obviously, there are differences of style to be seen, for example, in the contrast of such stories as $1,000 a Week, The Sport of Kings, and Whoopee for the New Deal! with such as Sorel, After the Sun Has Risen, The Bride of Christ, and Counting the Waves. The former group, which forms the majority, has the relaxed American colloquialism of the author's novel-writing, whereas the latter uses a manner much like the average style of the French or Russian realists, who appear to make a studied blend of the colloquial with the formal and "literary." It is interesting to observe, incidentally, that Mr. Farrell's exotic manner occurs in concomitance with a subject matter which, beside his regular Chicago-Irish-American milieu, is also exotic: Jacques Sorel, the French royalist Vichyman; the expatriate bohemian paralytic of After the Sun Has Risen; the dead nun of The Bride of Christ; the scenery and minor persons, if not the protagonist, of Counting the Waves.

But the shifting feature of these stories that is most difficult to trace and define is their meaning. I would decline to enter the lists on behalf of a True Technique of the Short Story, and I shall not be trying to join the dance by a back door if I say that the stories of Mr. Farrell whose effects I value most highly are those founded upon a perspicuous meaning. And what do I mean by "meaning"? It is not easy to give the term an exact definition because the phenomena to which I am applying it are not easily classified. I will propose, tentatively, that a meaningful story is one which conveys an empirically true statement of the common ground of human experiences that are unlike in detail while it actually presents only a single set of particulars and the experience of individuals. This will sound like a paradox, and as I have put it, it is, for the statement of a particular cannot at the same time be the statement of a generalization. There must really be something more than a mere account of particulars in what I am calling a meaningful story. The device by which a story can achieve the double focus of the specific and the general is usually the symbol; how we are persuaded to recognize the symbol as such is a problem that requires for its solution a delicate study of the manipulation of "minimal clues" against the anticipated foreknowledge of the audience.

In this sense of the label, at least one of Mr. Farrell's stories—Accident—has, as I read it, no meaning whatever; it stands solely on the feet of its action and circumstantial detail, more or less like its legion of innocent brothers the world around. Other stories, such as the title piece, $1,000 a Week, seem to involve their literality with some meaning, but one that is relatively limited, superficial, and ready-to hand—not very perspicuous, in short. Of the small selection which passes beyond this stage, the leader is probably Whoopee for the New Deal. John and Kate Robinson and Henry and Myrtle Lohrman are seen during the course of a recreational evening in the period just after Mr. Roosevelt's first election and the announcement of the NRA. The story is in Mr. Farrell's painstakingly concrete mode; the details of person, speech, behavior, and scene are full and precise. The two couples exchange opinions about the times ("the new man in Washington," "this fellow Hitler," "Socialists . . . they're morons"), although these opinions have a plausible context of other opinions about golf, adultery, and the proper way of slapping up a highball. They go to a speakeasy to celebrate the New Deal, lean yearningly toward the disgraceful, and come home drunk and singing. The central thing about this story is the kind of understanding which the four chief characters exhibit toward their total social situation, and which the reader can recognize as representative. It is such a compound of shallow realism and downright error and illusion (the reader must supply this judg-

RUSSIA'S ECONOMIC FRONT for WAR and PEACE

By A. Yugow

Russia's ability to pull rabbits out of the hat in this war continues to amaze business men, politicians, military strategists and the average citizen who had been conditioned to expect her defeat in any test of strength. Here is an inside picture of Russia that journalists and even ambassadors never see, presented by a former director of the U.S.S.R.'s food trust who has had unlimited access to heretofore unpublished facts and figures. This book tells why Russia can fight, and what she's fighting with and for.

"Here is something unusual, if not unknown, under the sun: a book about Russia that is neither uncritical eulogy or bitter detraction. One gets a picture of Soviet industry, agriculture, and living conditions closer to the probabilities of the "Russian enigma" than the customary polemical effort, pro or con." —W. H. Chamberlin, Atlantic Monthly.

ment) as to be entirely unavailing as a weapon against the situation; this is the source of the governing effect of the story, which is an effect of irony, pity, and not a little terror, now that history has shown us something more of its hand. When the Lohrmans are staggering home from the speakeasy, Henry sings "Git along little dogie, git along." They are all "little dogies," but only Mr. Farrell and the wise reader are in on the secret. "Well, we had something to celebrate," says Henry apologetically as he undresses for bed, and the remark functions as an epigram of the total meaning which the story has been accumulating, and also as a final crystallization of the ironic effect: it recalls the inadequacy of the Lohrmans' and the Robinsons' understanding of their broad historical predicament, and it plays upon the discrepancy between the fatal potentialities of that predicament and the couples' empty and ignorant "celebrating." Whoopee for the New Deal! is by my standards one of the most admirable sorts of short fiction that an author of Mr. Farrell's intellectual position and human sympathies could produce; a sort, that is to say, in which the psychological meaning is inseparable from the social meaning, since its materials are human experience of the crises of society. Unfortunately, in the present collection, the effort is scattered and the score is low. E. S. FORGOTSON

Semantics as a Rigorous Discipline

INTRODUCTION TO SEMANTICS. By Rudolf Carnap. Harvard University Press. $3.50.

PROFESSOR CARNAP'S semantical theory has very little immediate connection with the attempts of Korzybski, Stuart Chase, et al. to develop the hygiene of linguistic usage and communication. It is, rather, a rigorous science of the relations of signs to what they "designate," deriving, as the author indicates, from the pioneer discoveries of the Warsaw school of logicians, especially of Alfred Tarski, who is now in the United States. This "Introduction," the first of a series in preparation under the general heading "Studies in Semantics," is the only systematic treatment in English and will undoubtedly be a standard introduction to the subject for a long time to come.

Carnap is widely known as the chief spokesman for one of the most radical forms of scientific, anti-metaphysical philosophy—logical empiricism or logical positivism. Formulating his theses in the light of the technically abstruse results of contemporary symbolic logic, he has argued consistently that when the problems of empirical science have been set aside, what meaningfully remains for philosophy is the logical analysis of language. In his earlier writings—particularly "The Logical Syntax of Language"—logical analysis was understood as "syntax," that is, as analysis concerned with the order and arrangement of symbols without regard to their meaning. Now he finds it necessary to broaden the conception of philosophy so as to include the signifying function of language, that is, meaning and interpretation, which is the subject of "semantics," as well as the relation between the user of signs and the signs and meanings, which is the subject of "pragmatics." The general theory of signs and language, including syntax, semantics, and pragmatics, is called semiotic. Thus, as he now formulates his position, "the task of philosophy is semiotical analysis; the problems of philosophy concern—not the ultimate nature of being but—the semiotical structure of the language of science, including the theoretical part of everyday language."

The present book omits treatment of the problems of pragmatics, which have formed the major concern of traditional theories of knowledge. But the recognition that philosophy includes at least something more than the syntax of language may help to build bridges between logical empiricism and other forms of contemporary epistemology. Nevertheless, it is hardly likely that those who were not sympathetic before will become so now. Carnap's opponents have frequently shown a disinclination to read his books with sufficient care and understanding, a disinclination not mitigated by the fact that they presuppose a working familiarity with modern logic. The further fact that in his new book he devotes comparatively little space to the wider philosophic import of semantics promises little easing of that situation. On the other hand, philosophy has always included, and philosophers have always pursued, so much more than theory of knowledge that even the sympathetic may still be unconvinced that a diet of semiotic will suffice in the way of spiritual nourishment. The Haitian Revolution

THE HAITIAN PEOPLE. By James G. Leyburn. The Yale University Press. $4.

HAITI was the second country in the Western Hemisphere to free itself from Europe by means of a revolution. In this case the revolution, almost the only successful slave revolt in history, was a real one, directed toward a drastic modification of society. As a consequence, the colonial society of Haiti, made up of a master-class and slaves, was transformed into a peasantry of small Negro landowners. An intermediate stage, one which was definitely formative of contemporary mores, was a sort of agrarian state socialism, at times headed by Negro dictators.

Dr. Leyburn's concern in "The Haitian People" is to describe the social evolution outlined above as a prelude to a systematic account of its end products in terms of mental attitudes, beliefs, customs, and institutions. He does this with exhaustive scholarship and with generosity, though always with that conspicuous inadequacy as to cause and consequence notable in most sociological studies restricted to orthodox methods. For example, when Dr. Leyburn, commenting upon the decline of prosperity after the first revolutionary epoch of Toussaint, Dessalines, and Christophe, attributes it in part to the disappearance of compulsion to labor, his treatment, always richly suggestive, cannot fail to prompt other speculations. Expressly forbidding himself lengthy economic discussions, he does not ask how a market for surplus production on a money-crop basis might have been created, or how the popular will might have been animated. Nor does he clearly see in the peasant's indifference to politics and deliberate ignoring of formal law a protective device. Nevertheless, the author's descriptions (his scientific ideal is one of description, one feels) are vivid and sophisticated, especially in his discussions of the caste problem in its relation to politics.

"The Haitian People" has a greater value than that inherent in a solid history of one society. Its importance as an illumination of the problems of revolution and reform is in no way to be measured by the apparent unimportance of the case. The liberal reader will find himself constantly provoked to fresh and fruitful thought concerning such events as the Mexican and Russian revolutions. RALPH BATES

A thoughtful analysis of our own brand of "made in America" humor

HORSE SENSE IN AMERICAN HUMOR

By Walter Blair

One of the keenest ways to appraise any American age is to look at its humor. For the fashions of living, the topics of the times, the degree of literary artistry are all reflected in the popular wit of the day. And this common-sense humor of the American people—"horse-sense humor"—has for two centuries been used by the man-in-the-street, the journalist, the politician, the poet and the scholar alike, not only to amuse but to put across a serious idea in a way which people would remember. Here is the story of our grass-roots, homespun, cracker-barrel humor, from Ben Franklin and Davy Crockett, through Mark Twain, Josh Billings and Mr. Dooley right down to the present, when the works of Will Rogers, Kin Hubbard, and Ogden Nash carry on the tradition in the face of attacks by the more sophisticated wits . . . a thoroughly American story that is as full of meaning as it is of genuine reading entertainment.

IN BRIEF

THE FRIENDS OF THE PEOPLE. By Alfred Neumann. The Macmillan Company. $2.50.

Choosing a great theme for his latest story—Paris in 1870—and making all the gestures of writing an important and serious novel, Mr. Neumann has actually produced an incoherent and very dull book. He treats his historical characters—Clemenceau, Gambetta, Verlaine, and the rest—with a combination of flamboyance and knowingness that amounts to irresponsibility, and even his fictional characters, particularly his sixteen-year-old hero, are quite inadequate to the historical roles they are supposed to have played. If Mr. Neumann had in mind parallels between the Paris of seventy years ago and the Paris of more recent history, the lesson is lost in the muddy current of his narrative.

THE GRAND PIANO. By Paul Goodman. The Colt Press. $2.50.

Somewhere along in this Dada novel of infantile petulance and protest (query in passing: why are Dada novels always such Mama novels?) one of the characters says, "This public has already got all those shocks you mention. . . . There is only one way to make a dent. . . . Boredom! This they cannot endure." Mr. Goodman is quite right! And granted that the naturalistic techniques are only a prejudice, "The Grand Piano" is still no proof that post-naturalism can do anything (except bore) that naturalism plus talent plus a sensible modesty before the possibilities of fiction cannot do. This novel, by the way, is well below the level of talent that Mr. Goodman has shown in his short stories.

THE COPPER POT. By Oliver La Farge. Houghton Mifflin Company. $2.50.

This is the same old story of one man's coming of age in bohemia. Tom Hartshorn is a painter who has the Real Stuff but hasn't Found Himself. Beset by temptations female and artistic, he triumphs over them to paint the Copper Pot of the title and win the Award; then once more he is beset by temptations female and artistic. Add to the clichés of the story the filter of Harvard gentility through which the former Pulitzer prize-winner sees them, and perhaps it isn't only the fault of the times that a book about love and art in the Latin Quarter of New Orleans doesn't even make us nostalgic.

FATIGUE OF WORKERS: ITS RELATION TO INDUSTRIAL PRODUCTION. By the Committee on Work in Industry of the National Research Council. Reinhold Publishing Company. $2.50.

In rather appalling technical language this book describes a series of studies on the general problem of fatigue and productivity. The results of the studies are highly significant. Contrary to ordinary opinion, it was found that such factors as intensity of illumination, heat, humidity, and hours of work were of minor importance in their effect on health and productivity as compared with psychological factors. While the efficiency of workers may be drastically affected by such physical factors as extreme heat and high altitude, the influence of these factors is in turn often modified by psychological conditions. Lack of understanding on the part of management of the forces which motivate workers, particularly their own informal social organization, may drastically influence production. Especially interesting are the experiments showing that where workers participated in the planning—in their own way—the results in increased production were far higher than those achieved by so-called "scientific management." As written, the book is unlikely to have very wide circulation, but a way should be found to place its conclusions in the hands of every factory executive, personnel manager, and trade-union leader.

MUSIC

A REVISED edition has been published of Rimsky-Korsakov's "My Musical Life" (Knopf; $5). The book does not give us the complete, objective history of the period of the flowering of Russian music that a scholar may construct some day from all available materials, including this autobiography. But it has the special fascination of the personal immediacy of an account by one who himself knew the men and participated in the events of the period.

What I have found especially interesting in the book is the material that has enabled me to understand how Rimsky-Korsakov was led to do what he did with Mussorgsky's "Boris Godunov." A footnote gives Jean Marnold's much-quoted description of the revision: "The scene of Boris with his children is especially mutilated. Rimsky-Korsakov cuts . . . one, two, or three measures as serenely as he cuts fifteen or twenty. At will he transposes a tone, or a half-tone, makes sharps or flats natural, alters modulations. He even corrects the harmony. During the tableau in the cell of Pimyen the liturgical Dorian mode is adulterated by a banal D minor. The interval of the augmented fifth (a favorite device of Mussorgsky) is frequently the object of his equilateral ostracism. . . . From one end of the work to the other he planes, files, polishes, pulls together, retouches, embellishes, makes insipid, or corrupts. . . ." Imagine the analogous things being done to a painting, to a poem: you will see what violation of the integrity of another artist's work Rimsky-Korsakov committed; you will see also that it was one which no painter, no poet would commit or be allowed to commit.

The explanation of Rimsky-Korsakov's act begins in his description of the Balakirev circle. Balakirev, a brilliant musician and perceptive critic by virtue of gifts and experience that compensated for lack of formal schooling, and a magnetic personality, dominated the others: from him Cui, Mussorgsky, Rimsky-Korsakov, and Borodin acquired their tastes in music; to him they brought their essays in composition, to be told how and how not to proceed; from him they got their attitude toward the craft of composition—that "there was no need of training: one must begin to compose outright, to create and learn through one's own work of creation." The error in this for them was that they had not had his long experience as a practicing musician to develop their talents. And as it worked out, what was technically unskilful in their work he corrected, what remained unfinished he did for them; only in this way was the piece made ready for performance or publication. And in addition to receiving criticism and help from Balakirev they criticized and helped each other.

From the start, then, there was this practice of mutual aid in composition; and later Rimsky-Korsakov's criticisms and suggestions to Borodin and Mussorgsky acquired additional authority, in his own mind, from the professional training that he gave himself and the professional positions that he occupied. The composer of the symphonic works "Sadko" and "Antar" and the opera "Maid of Pskov" was appointed professor of practical composition at the St. Petersburg Conservatory, and thought it necessary to know as much about harmony and counterpoint as his pupils; also, after he had exhausted the few devices he had used in those works "only the development of a technique . . . permitted new living currents to flow into my creative work"; and so he acquired a disciplined craftsmanship that enabled him to be steadily productive. The composers of the B minor Symphony and "Boris Godunov," on the other hand—without the schooling and discipline in composition for which they continued to express scorn, and with increasing disorganization in their daily lives—were able to compose only mere bits of "Prince Igor" and "Khovanchina." And it was Rimsky-Korsakov now, with Balakirev withdrawn from the musical world, who did what Balakirev had done. When Rimsky-Korsakov wished to perform excerpts from "Prince Igor" which he could not get Borodin to finish orchestrating, he and Lyadov had to help Borodin do the job in one evening. For another concert he had to orchestrate the Persian Dance from "Khovanchina" for Mussorgsky, who, he says, "was quite pleased with my work, although I had made many corrections in his harmonies and part-writing."

From this the next step was to complete the works when Borodin and Mussorgsky died leaving them collections of composed fragments, partly composed sketches, merely projected ideas. And the way had been prepared for the final step: When Mussorgsky died Rimsky-Korsakov "undertook to set in order and complete all of [his] works"—not just the ones that Mussorgsky had left incomplete and in disorder, but even the ones that he had left completed and in order—even "Boris Godunov," which not only had been completed but in its completed form had been found worthy of publication, of performance "with uninterrupted success" from 1874 to 1882; which had been brought to this completed form by years of work, of thought, of second thought, of consideration of what Rimsky-Korsakov believed it should be, of decision what Mussorgsky himself wanted it to be; and which, when he had made it what he wanted, nobody had a right to make anything else.

The way had been prepared; but the step was one that a painter or a poet would not have taken. He might have thought the equivalent of Rimsky-Korsakov's opinion of the technical faults in Mussorgsky's writing; he might have been, in Tovey's words, "a perky and conceited little mind" incapable "of telling a blunder from a stroke of genius or feature of style." He might have been also an arrogant, a vengeful little mind: he might have thought the equivalent of Rimsky-Korsakov's remark that Mussorgsky's light praise for a few things in "Snyegoorochka" and indifference to the rest were caused by "his fatuous self-conceit and conviction that the path he had chosen in art was the only true path," while his own conceit and conviction that his was the only true path gave him not indifference but a burning desire to impose his method on the other artist, a less conscious desire to avenge the slight to his method and work. He might have failed to understand that the other man's path was the only true one for him, and that his own was the true one only for himself; that technical training had indeed made his capacities strong and lack of it had indeed left the other man's weak, but that his strength was not transferable: since technique was acquired, and existed, in the different terms in which each artist was articulate in his medium, he could not alter the other man's technical practices in accordance with his own, without altering those terms of the man's personal artistic functioning. But he would have been restrained by one thing that he did understand—that another artist's work is inviolable. And it was Rimsky-Korsakov's failure to understand this that led him to his act of vandalism.

Moreover, a painter or a poet would not have been allowed to commit this act. But that will have to wait.

Letters to the Editors

The U. D. A. Gains a Member

Dear Sirs: After reading your indorsement of the Union for Democratic Action (The Nation of May 16) and after studying their literature, I forwarded to them my application for membership. The hole the dues have made in my military bank roll is nothing compared to the good I believe the organization can and will do. I have always wanted to be connected with such an organization because alone a person cannot do much against the enemies one is proud to have. But a united effort cannot fail.

By the way, after I finish The Nation each week four or five diligent readers ask me for it, and they in turn pass it on to several others. It takes an effort to find the time to read anything in the army, but it can be done.

I am hoping to be able to join the fight on the home front after the one I am now engaged in is over. I believe that victory in one of them is useless without victory in the other. Indeed, in the final analysis the two victories are one.

Your weapons are different, but they must be just as accurate and just as deadly, for our enemies are the same.

Japanese Evacuation

Dear Sirs: As a native Californian old enough to have seen something of the Chinese problem and to have observed the successive phases of the Japanese problem, I regret that Charles Iglehart, in his article Citizens Behind Barbed Wire in your issue of June 6, did not give your readers a more balanced picture of the situation of the Japanese evacués. He seems not to have recognized the full seriousness and extreme difficulty of the problem as it existed in the minds of West Coast Americans, much less the careful consideration given by General DeWitt and his advisers to all its phases.

It must never be forgotten that Japanese evacuation from coastal areas was regarded as a military necessity. It was urged by thoughtful citizens long before it could be finally consummated. I have not doubted that most of my own numerous acquaintances among the Japanese, both alien and American-born, sincerely desired to be loyal to the United States; but they were among the ones who recognized the necessity of general evacuation, with full understanding that this necessity was thrust upon us by Japanese treachery and aggression. Many of them also felt the policy to be in the interest of their own safety, especially in the event of attack or threatened invasion of the West Coast.

Surely Mr. Iglehart must know the history of the Japanese question in California from the beginning of the century. How, then, can he conclude that "even as a war measure evacuation was unnecessary"—and what point can be gained by such an attitude now? He must know that those people have not been permitted freely to amalgamate with the whites; also that Japanese aliens are ineligible to American citizenship—which renders it quite unrealistic to compare them with Europeans and children of European parents.

I believe that the well-considered and efficient work of the appropriate authorities in handling an extremely difficult situation suddenly thrust upon them is deserving of sincere approbation.

ROCKWELL D. HUNT

Los Angeles, Cal., June 7

Dear Sirs: The question whether the evacuation from the West Coast of American citizens of Japanese descent was necessary or not may be a moot one; probably, had there been more time, a better method might have been found. The evacuation is however a fait accompli and must be accepted.

But much can still be said and done about the reception of our Japanese citizens in the resettlement areas. This reception has been disgraceful. There is not the slightest justification for the inland communities and states to act as if all the evacuated Japanese were undesirables and suspects. The reasons for this attitude are of course mainly economic ones, and much could be said about them.

But the point I wish to make here is this: It might be well to consider that these American-born citizens of Japanese descent, by accepting the evacuation, are playing their part in the defense just as truly as our soldiers at the front.

Washington Front

Dear Sirs: Gerald L. K. Smith's reply to your "Keep Them Out" article about him printed in the issue of May 16 should stimulate liberals to continue the fight to get a war-winning Congress. Mr. Smith seems to be upset. That alone is a clue to the result of this battle on the Washington front.

"The Pope's Neutrality"

Dear Sirs: G. A. Borgese's article The Pope's Neutrality, in The Nation for May 30, was excellent and timely but it did not go deep enough. The Pope asks and prays for a negotiated peace. He abhors war, and his sensitive heart bleeds for the destruction wrought by Mars. But if the Pope is such a lover of peace, why, during the Spanish civil war, did he refuse to ask and work for a negotiated peace between the Loyalists and the Fascists? Two popes not only refused to remain neutral and aloof from the conflict but blessed the German-Italian-Moorish legions as they marched against the Spanish democratic government.

Why, then, this different behavior of the church before two phases of the same conflict? The answer is clear to those who know the real nature and aims of the Catholic church. During the Spanish civil war the Pope took sides with Franco because he was sure that he would be the winner. But the Pope is not sure now; hence he cloaks himself with a neutrality he is very far from feeling. Afraid of communism and the rising tide of liberalism and popular fronts, the Catholic church looked for its salvation to Hitler and Mussolini, whose philosophies are in harmony with its dogmatic and authoritarian doctrines. But now that the clash has come between democracy and despotism, the Pope finds three powerful enemies aligned against those who were his allies in Spain—England, Russia, and the United States. Russia is Communist; England and our country are not only democratic but Protestant. We know how the Catholic church feels toward communism and Protestantism. How can we expect the Pope to take our side?

AM I NUTS???

Would you let principles interfere with business and lose money? I would, and I am! In former years I advertised in the Daily News and got swell results. But, because of its isolationist editorial policy, I've decided to cut it out. This will cost me business. But in these times . . . after Pearl Harbor, you can't continuously snipe at our efforts, smear our allies, question our Commander-in-Chief, retain a self-admitted, unprincipled editorial writer . . . and still want to beat the two H's and big mouth Mussolini. Therefore, I am dropping the Daily News and ask non-isolationist readers to look for our advertisements in other newspapers that are making an all-out effort to help Uncle Sam smash the axis.

It is obvious that the Pope is shivering at the prospect of a victory for Russia. Naturally he would rather have a negotiated peace, in other words, that the status quo should be maintained.

I agree with Mr. Borgese that "no institution will go changeless through the "infuriate tragedy," as the Pope calls it, "of this era." From the victory of democracy true Christianity has nothing to fear, but dogmatic, totalitarian, and materialistic Catholicism has everything.

The Shape of Things

THE GERMANS ARE GRADUALLY CLOSING IN on Sevastopol but are paying a huge price for every inch gained. Their hope of celebrating the first anniversary of the invasion of Russia by capturing this key city was blasted by the stubborn and gallant resistance of the Soviet garrison and civilian population. But we cannot assume that Sevastopol will hold out indefinitely. Nor should we underestimate its strategic importance. It is one of the chief outer bastions of the Caucasus and its fall might well give the signal for the all-out offensive which Hitler must soon launch if he is to break through the Russian lines this summer. Soviet leaders continue to stress the urgent necessity of a second front and both American and British spokesmen continue to promise an invasion of the Continent. But will the decision be made in time? In his speech at Madison Square Garden Ambassador Litvinov pointed out that one favorable moment—at the close of the Russian winter when the Red Army still held the initiative—had been allowed to slip. Another opportunity may arise, however, in the near future, if Hitler commits his still intact reserves to a drive for the Caucasus. The United Nations must then act and act swiftly, for they cannot hope to win by always leaving to the enemy the choice of a battlefield. It is not necessary to think in terms of an invading army strong enough to drive the Germans out of France and the Low Countries this summer. The purpose of diverting the full German strength from the eastern front would be served by the establishment of a powerfully held bridgehead across the Channel.

THE POSITION IN THE ALEUTIAN ISLANDS remains doubly obscured—by bad weather on the spot and by the fog of censorship in Washington. The latest report is that the Japanese have occupied Kiska, some 650 miles from Dutch Harbor, where attacks have been delivered by United States flyers against enemy naval vessels and transports. Unofficial comments from Washington suggest that Japanese operations in the neighborhood of Alaska are not regarded as very important by the army and navy. An off-the-record military opinion quoted in the New York Times was to the effect that should the Japanese build up their forces in the Aleutian area, it might become worth while for an American task-force to undertake an expedition to dislodge them. The same experts expressed the view that this would not be a difficult job. The mere layman is left wondering whether it might not be better to throw out the Japanese before they have had a chance to settle down. We cannot safely assume that the Japanese sortie into the far north is no more than a nuisance raid or an extended reconnaissance. Bases at Attu and Kiska would become of great strategic importance should Japan attack Siberia, for they would imperil our communications with the Soviet forces. On the other hand, the desultory shelling of points on the British Columbia and Oregon coasts was, we suspect, a demonstration intended not so much to cause damage to property as damage to morale. The raids seem to have been taken calmly by those on the spot, and we hope they will not be allowed to serve the enemy's purpose by diverting attention from our real line of coastal defense, which lies far to the west and north.

THE FALL OF TOBRUK SEEMS LIKELY TO touch off a new political crisis in Britain. It is doubtful, however, if it will end in anything more than another reshuffle of ministers which will in no way allay the rising tide of public anxiety and discontent. In an article on page 737 Tom Wintringham tells how the common man in Britain, feeling that the present Parliamentary set-up fails to give adequate expression to his desire to fight the war on an all-out basis, is groping toward new means of making himself heard. The last general election in Britain took place in the fall of 1935 at a moment when the Tory government of the day was making a show of enforcing sanctions against Italy and won many votes by paying lip-service to collective security. The House of Commons then elected was not a truly representative body and in the seven years that have elapsed it has fallen still further behind public opinion. Since the war a party truce has been in operation and the many vacancies that have occurred have been filled by nominees of the party machines. Now the stagnant political waters are being stirred by the challenge of independents. Mr. Wintringham mentions the most remarkable victory won by an independent candidate—the by-election at Wallasey. This town is a lower middle-class suburb of Liverpool, the kind of constituency which the Tories have always considered the equivalent of a pocket borough. Yet it was captured by an independent standing on a left-wing platform which called for socialist measures in order to win the war and organize the peace. There was no class issue here, for the belief that vested interests are obstructing the war effort has become widespread among all classes. A general election in Britain today, if it were possible to hold one, would produce some startling results.

THE STATEMENTS ISSUED BY GANDHI AND Nehru urging an immediate British evacuation of India have created some concern lest the Indian leaders take steps which will weaken British defenses against the still acute Japanese menace to India. Anxiety has been aroused particularly by Gandhi's threat to make "a move which will be felt by the entire world" if the British do not withdraw. But against the negative interpretation of the statements issued by the two leaders following their conference at Wardha must be placed Nehru's forthright denunciaion of Japan and the Axis powers and Gandhi's letter to Chiang Kai-shek advocating effective resistance to Japan and the Axis powers. Nehru made it clear that he did not expect the British and American troops now in India to pack up and leave the country at the mercy of the Japanese. What both leaders appear to want is an unequivocal recognition of India's status as an eqnal in the family of nations, and assurance that it will be allowed to work out its own destiny after the war. It is to be hoped that the British can put aside the irritation and resentment which many of them naturally feel as a result of the failure of the Cripps mission and make an attempt to meet India's request, in principle at least. The stakes are high. The recognition of an independent India would make the war in Asia what it is in Europe—a clear-cut fight against tyranny and oppression.

HOPE THAT ARGENTINA'S PRESIDENT ORTIZ might return to office and reverse the pro-Axis policy of Acting President Castillo faded when Dr. Castroviejo, the New York eye specialist, sailed for home without performing an operation to restore the President's sight. Whether he recommended one or not is still uncertain. There are rumors of differences of opinion between him and his Argentine colleagues which may have a political background. Meanwhile, there is scant hope that Castillo will modify his policies, despite widespread opposition to them. The Nazi note expressing "lively regret" at the sinking of an Argentine tanker two months ago appears to have been accepted without question. On the other hand the Argentine government has declared that it would not seek immunity from the blockade since such a course would be "contrary to the principles of continental solidarity." But to make certain that new incidents will not arise as a result of the blockade, Argentine vessels have been instructed to call at New Orleans instead of New York. The efforts of the majority group in the Chamber of Deputies to force a debate on the government's foreign policy failed when Foreign Minister Guiñazú refused to make a report with stenographers present. The Chamber, in three votes, insisted on keeping a record, and finally took the position that no explanation was worth listening to that could not be made available to the public. There seems little doubt that Argentine public opinion has hardened against the Axis in recent weeks as a result of Mexico's entry into the war and the stronger stand being taken in Brazil, but so far the only outcome has been a strengthening of Castillo's repressive measures.

PROSPECTS FOR A SATISFACTORY TAX BILL were improved last week by two important Administration victories in the House Ways and Means Committee. After shelving the Treasury's request for a wartime ceiling on incomes, the committee made an abrupt about-face and followed the Treasury's recommendation in rejecting a sales tax and adopting, by a small margin, a modified proposal for collecting the income tax at the source. Although the committee's action does not bar an effort to reintroduce the sales tax on the floor of the House, there is every reason to believe that the decision will stand. With elections only about four months off, few members of the House will wish to have their names listed in a roll call as favoring such a levy. Objections to the withholding tax should be overcome at least in part by the committee's decision to make half of next year's deductions applicable to an individual's 1942 taxes, thus spreading the transition burden over two years instead of one. Although the committee's tax bill is better than it seemed likely to be a few weeks ago, it still falls short by some $2 billion of the goal set by the Treasury. There seems to be little chance that the House will close this gap, but it is possible that the Senate, which is not so election conscious, may recognize the necessity of finding additional revenues as a means of holding off inflation.

IF THE NEW YORK PARTY MACHINES HAVE their way in the primaries, this year's contest for the governorship will be between John J. Bennett, Jr. and Thomas E. Dewey, leaving the voters a pretty choice in mediocrities. Jim Farley's boy Bennett, although for twelve years Attorney General of New York State, is a completely anonymous politician who keeps his views on public questions strictly to himself. His impressive record as a vote-getter must be ascribed to his high standing with the professionals and the difficulty of antagonizing anyone by silence. Mr. Dewey is a horse of another color and one more noted for flashy starts than for staying power. He is as loquacious as Mr. Bennett is taciturn but it is just as hard to know where he stands, for in his eagerness to be all things to all men he is apt to cancel one statement by the next. Despite his strength with the machine, Mr. Dewey has not the indorsement of Mr. Willkie and cannot count on active support of the latter's still large following. With Democratic and Republican forces in the state fairly evenly matched, the balance of power is probably held by the American Labor Party, but this power is difficult to exercise unless one of the major parties can be persuaded to nominate a candidate acceptable to labor. Rejecting both Bennett and Dewey, the A. L. P. is talking about nominating a candidate of its own, but the objection to this course is that it would almost certainly make the election a gift to the Republicans. One powerful voice has yet to be heard—that of the President. Since the nomination and election of Mr. Bennett would mean in effect that Jim Farley would control the New York delegation at the 1944 convention, Mr. Roosevelt can hardly regard his candidacy with enthusiasm and may well be looking for an opportunity to push forward a compromise candidate with a definitely liberal record.

GOVERNOR DARDEN OF VIRGINIA IS TO BE congratulated for his fair-mindedness in granting a fifth reprieve to Odell Waller so that the Negro share-cropper might receive a hearing on his plea for clemency. It would be a travesty of justice if Waller were executed because of a technicality. The Supreme Court has held that it is unable to review the case because Waller's attorney failed to take the proper steps to prove his contention that the jury was chosen from a panel from which non-payers of the Virginia poll tax had been systematically excluded. Meanwhile a petition has been sent to President Roosevelt asking him to intervene by appointing a commission of inquiry, as President Wilson did in the cases of Tom Mooney and Joe Hill. We urge our readers to reinforce this petition by sending telegrams or letters to the President; for if Governor Darden does not commute Waller's death sentence, Presidential intervention offers the only hope of delaying execution and opening the way for a reconsideration of the basic issues of race and class raised by the Waller case.

Tobruk and the Second Front

(An Imaginary Monologue by F. D. R.)

WHAT I'm going to say, Winston, may sound hard and ungracious. Perhaps you'll think I shouldn't say anything. We came in late, and then only because we were pushed. And so far we haven't won any real victories. We thought, I too, that we might stick to the business of production and let you fellows do the killing—and the dying. Not because we are afraid or bad fighters, but because—well, no country wants to get into a bloody war even on the right side unless its interests are clearly, directly engaged. Britain didn't want to either, if you'll remember.

That's by way of apology, just to make it clear that I know we are in a poor position to give advice. Bataan was useful, but a useful defeat is a good deal less than a victory. The Coral Sea and Midway battles were useful, too, and might be rated as victories, but they were defensive actions at best and a defensive victory is a good deal less than an offensive.

But just the same, I must speak my mind, Winston, about the war—the war and Britain. I must say what I think about China—Tobruk—Sevastopol. And what I say will be unpleasant for you as well as for me.

Those three places—a great diversified front, a desert garrison, an ancient fortified port—those places are keys to Allied victory or final defeat. You British and we Americans are jointly responsible for the desperate position of China. We armed Japan instead of cutting off its war supplies years ago. And since Japan turned on us we have failed to use or safeguard or reinforce China—though China is worth all our Far Eastern forces put together. Now China is isolated, cut off from supplies, and the Japanese are seizing, one by one, the bases in China from which we could attack Japan. Not only that. If China is conquered the whole back-side of Russia will be open to invasion. We must not forget that China has been defending Russia as well as the West.

For the betrayal of China before Pearl Harbor, you and we share responsibility, Winston. Perhaps ours is the heavier. For the abandonment of China after Pearl Harbor and its present peril, you are chiefly to blame, if I may say so. The conduct of the British command in Singapore, in Malaya as a whole, and then in Burma was a disaster. And a large part of the fault lay in your refusal to look upon the Chinese, not to mention the native population, as fighting equals. Your policy in India didn't help, either, and it may yet lead to new disasters.

Then Tobruk. Whatever the commentators think up to say, Winston, you and I know that we have suffered a terrible defeat in Libya. Of course there's a good British army in Egypt, and it will fight, and Rommel may be stopped in his tracks. But he may not be stopped. We know that, too. His Afrika Korps threatens Egypt; and if Egypt and the Canal are conquered the Middle East is gone. There's nothing beyond Cairo to stop Rommel. Not the French and British forces in Syria. Not the other Allied contingents scattered through the neighboring countries. And then if the Germans succeed in their drive on the Caucasus. . . . But that comes later.

What I want to say about Tobruk is just this, Winston. After all the explanations of the defeat are read and digested one solid—and most indigestible—fact remains: the British under Auchinleck and Ritchie were outmaneuvered and outfought.

Tobruk was another Singapore, another Burma. The best German tanks, the Mark IV's, were better than the best British tanks, our American General Grants. The best German anti-tank artillery, the mobile 88 mm. guns, are better than the best British guns. This is a reason for defeat. But is it an excuse? Laboriously and successfully the British supplied themselves with adequate air equipment—except for dive bombers. But not with tanks, not with guns. Why? Is it to be taken as a law of nature that the Germans will always have better weapons?

Then, too, it is said that the fate of Tobruk was sealed when a large British armored column was caught between two enemy formations near Bir Bellefa and wiped out. And Rommel, it seems, cut off Tobruk's line of retreat by sending contingents ahead toward Egypt and then wheeling north to the coast and severing the line between Tobruk and the border. And, besides, he moved too fast. Nobody at Tobruk expected him so soon. There are a lot of other reasons pouring in over the wires, Winston, but none is more reassuring than the next. Whether Tobruk's defenders were inadequately equipped or surprised or just inefficient—the result is the same. Tobruk fell; and the whole Middle East is in danger.

One by one the strongholds fall. First Europe—all of it, practically speaking. Then Asia—most of it, with more defeats to come. Now North Africa. And nothing, Winston, nothing of any importance has been won back. Except in Russia.

Russia alone knows how to fight Hitler. I say this with no wish to hurt you, Winston, more than ourselves. It is a simple fact to be verified not only on the maps but in a dozen other ways. The Russians, for all their mistakes, knew what fighting the Axis meant in its full unvarnished horror. They knew it meant not only every man but every woman and boy and girl. They knew it meant not only as much of the nation's productive capacity as was convenient to put to war use, but all of it that was not absolutely needed for civilian maintenance. They haven't any cartels to deal with in Russia, Winston, nor coal-owners and shipmasters. Russian workers have made no bargains because no one stands to gain by their sacrifices—no one but their country, which is themselves. They know how to fight to kill; they are ready to die—to the last villager, and even the last officer. They know how to starve and to freeze. They know how to destroy everything they have built. They know how to retreat and then turn swiftly to attack.

The Russian strategy, Winston, has been both bolder and suppler than yours and ours. It has been as good as the German strategy. Today the Russian army is our army—our one best fighting force in the war against Hitler. Is it too much to say that its defeat would be ours?

I am not going to argue that the Russian front is more important than the Far Eastern or the Mediterranean fronts. Each is part of the next. A major defeat in any one might well mean the loss of the others.

The problem is not which one to safeguard. The problem is to find the strategy which offers the best hope of winning the war. Naturally, you say. But if we grant that, and grant, too, that armed men and supplies and ships are limited, we must stand ready to throw that strength into any theater that seems to offer the best hope of taking back the offensive. For only when we take the offensive shall we find ourselves in a position to win.

What I am getting to, Winston, is this: If the war is to be won, Russia must not be given material help alone but must be relieved. Russia cannot win by itself. It is being pressed now beyond its immense power to fight back. The defeat in Libya inclines you to turn your eyes to the Middle East and propose reinforcement of the British positions there. And here is where I take issue with you. Libya is 12,000 miles from its sources of supply unless you risk ferrying goods through the Mediterranean. It will take three months—two, at the lowest—to throw new American supplies into North Africa. But the issue in Egypt may well be decided between now and then. Rommel cannot be expected to halt his advance just to oblige the British.

No, Winston, we must look at the whole picture and plan more boldly. It is being said that the defeat in Libya has postponed indefinitely any serious consideration of a second front in Europe. I should like to put forward just the opposite contention: The defeat in Libya makes immediate consideration of a second front in Europe absolutely essential. An invasion of the Continent offers the one possibility of drawing substantial German forces from the Russian front. Even Hitler has too few men and machines to fight in full strength on several fronts at once. A second front in Europe might save the Middle East.

I know the objections. They are many. The shortage of shipping is first among them, now that we have sufficient men and materials in the British Isles. But let me remind you that for the first time since the war began the R. A. F. commands the air over the Channel and can protect convoys on the short journey to the French coast. Even more remote European shores are nearer and safer to reach than North Africa. And a ship can carry eighteen or twenty loads of men and supplies to the Continent while it takes one to Alexandria.

I ask you to consider seriously the possibility of early action in Europe. New methods must be tried; old ones have failed. New men must be used; old ones discarded. Such a move as I am proposing calls for the closest unity in command—as in the fighting itself. American troops in Ireland and Britain are ready to move. With deep earnestness I suggest that the United Nations together be called to this great task and that the best men in the entire group be given responsibility for carrying it out. If an Englishman should head the United Nations command for an invasion of Europe, very well. But if the ablest leader is to be found in Russia, or among the Free French, or the Poles, let us not for any reasons of national preference pass him over.

This is my proposal, Winston. What do you think of it?

FREDA KIRCHWEY

That Liberal Majority

THE Supreme Court ended its session for the year with two revealing decisions. One provides a loophole in the Wage-Hour Law through which employers may evade payment of overtime. The other weakens constitutional guaranties of free thought and expression. Each was a 5-4 decision. The majority in the first was Byrnes, Roberts, Jackson, Frankfurter, and Chief Justice Stone. The majority in the second was Reed, Roberts, Jackson, Frankfurter, and Byrnes. Black, Douglas, and Murphy dissented in both cases; Reed joined them in the first case, the Chief Justice in the second. These decisions are further stages in the division of this New Deal court into a new majority and minority. The core of the new liberal minority are Black and Douglas; of the new conservative majority, Roberts and Byrnes, neither New Dealers. While the others remain more difficult to predict, Murphy tends toward the liberals, Reed, Jackson, and Frankfurter toward the conservatives. The Chief Justice is not easily placed on economic questions, but seems to be the most dependable member of the court on questions involving basic liberties. The most interesting tendency to be noted is the steady movement of Justice Frankfurter toward the right. If continued, it will mean a great loss to American progressivism.

It is safe to surmise from the general social and political outlook of Justices Byrnes and Roberts that neither is sympathetic with the Wage-Hour Law. It is sad to see Stone, Frankfurter, and Jackson taken in by the sweet company-union overtones of Byrnes in the wage-hour case. This case had to do with individual labor contracts made by a newspaper publisher and radio-station owner in Dallas to get around the overtime pay requirements of the Wage-Hour Law. By these contracts, and their ingenious manipulation of hourly rates, the employer succeeded in continuing to work his men 54½ hours a week at the same weekly rate of pay as before. Byrnes, in the opinion accepted by the majority, dwells on the patriarchal goodness of the employing corporation. It gave the men time off with pay for illness. It carried life insurance for them. It took care of old employees. These touching details throw more light on the mental processes of the new conservative majority than on the overtime sections of the Wage-Hour Law.

The other decision is an echo of Justice Frankfurter's opinion in the flag-salute case. In that case the Chief Justice alone dissented from a ruling which subjects a great nation to the ignominy of forcing children to salute its flag in violation of their religious principles. We are happy to see that Justices Black, Douglas, and Murphy, who joined Frankfurter in that decision, have written a joint note in this case declaring that they now believe the flag-salute decision was wrong. This new case also concerns members of Jehovah's Witnesses. They refused to pay license fees for the sale of their religious literature. The majority upheld convictions of the Witnesses for failure to pay the tax.

The majority opinion is arid and pettifogging. The division in the court rested on a question of emphasis. Two quotations will illustrate the difference. In the opinion written by Justice Murphy and concurred in by Douglas, Black, and Stone, it is said "If this court is to err in evaluating claims that freedom of speech, freedom of the press, and freedom of religion have been invaded, far better that it err in being overprotective of these precious rights." Our one Catholic Justice does honor to himself, his church, and our American traditions by championing the anti-Catholic Witnesses.

A different attitude is revealed by the majority, speaking through Reed. "Too many settled beliefs have in time been rejected," it admits unctuously, "to justify this generation in refusing a hearing to its own dissentients. But that hearing may be limited by action of the proper legislative body to times, places, and methods for the enlightenment of the community which, in view of existing social and economic conditions, are not at odds with the preservation of peace and good order." The minority is ready to take a chance on freedom. The majority prefers, though ever so mildly, to regulate the spread of ideas. A majority of this kind inspires little confidence as a guardian of free discussion in time of deep feeling or war. It is more apt to cover prejudice with the garments of legalism.

"It Was Serrano Suñer"

ON THE subject of Serrano Suñer's recent visit to Rome, we are in a position to give our readers a completely inside story. First of all, we can report that the Spanish Foreign Minister made his long journey from Madrid to Rome by train—not partly by car as was first stated. Thus he avoided the diplomatic bad taste of using, for an official visit to a country with which the United States is at war, some of the oil we are still sending Spain under the "realistic" policy of our State Department. He doubtless felt that to Americans limited to three weekly gallons, a 2,200-mile trip by automobile would seem excessive.

But that is not the only bit of news we have to offer on the Mussolini-Suñer meeting. Again contrary to rumor, which had hinted at an eventual cession of the Balearic Islands to Italy, we are able to inform our readers that the conversations were limited to ways of using more efficiently the islands and ports already at the service of Germany and Italy. The status quo in the Mediterranean remains unchanged. Spain will go on, as it has since the beginning of the war, giving German and Italian submarines the hospitality of the Spanish naval bases. So much and no more.

But our story would be incomplete if we failed to reveal the actual background of this latest visit of Señor Suñer to Rome. Last February both British and American diplomats in Madrid reported with evident satisfaction the development of a serious clash between General Franco and his brother-in-law, the Foreign Minister. Of course the thing had been expected; Allied diplomacy had been playing for a break for many months. You could call Franco a reactionary, a fascist, but he was a patriot and a gentleman just the same. As with Pétain, you could be sure that one day or another he would throw out the men in his cabinet who acted more as representatives of German and Italian interests than as leaders of the new "Blue Empire." The diplomats were right; the break was genuine. Only the long cipher reports to London and Washington failed to explain the real cause. In the background of the internal conflict between Franco and Suñer, between the army and the Phalanx, between the elements inclined toward the United Nations and the pro-Axis group, was an Andalusian midwinter night's dream.

Señor Serrano Suñer had met her in Seville: "Morena y sevillana," brunette and from Seville, as a popular Spanish song puts it. He brought back to Madrid, as a souvenir, an affliction which sounds no more respectable when suffered by a Phalangist. Nor was the situation improved when Señora Suñer became a victim and finally revealed the painful fact to her sister, Señora Franco. There followed terrific scenes in the Dictator's household, family conferences, councils of war, admonitions and threats—and every evidence of a final break. But the Allied diplomats were premature in congratulating themselves on the outcome of their patient appeasement. Nothing lasts forever, not even the unhappy effects of ill-considered romance. Thanks to the intervention of a most respected prelate, Serrano Suñer dropped the sevillana and peace and reconcilation descended on the official households. As a reward of virtue, the Foreign Minister was allowed to proceed to Rome and renew his policy of collaboration with the Axis.

Of the whole episode, there remain only a collection of diplomatic reports and a verse in three lines that has run like fire through Spain and Latin America, where a rhymed squib carries more political punch than ten thousand editorials.

Se ha perdido una mujer—
Se enamoró de un serrano;
Era Serrano Suñer!

(A woman was lost—
She fell in love with a serrano; [*]
It was Serrano Suñer!)

[*] A "serrano," in roughly equivalent American slang, is a "wolf."

Nelson and Guthrie

BY I. F. STONE

Washington, June 22

ON THIS, the first anniversary of the Nazi attack upon the Soviet Union, the atmosphere of the capital is compounded equally of gloom and fatuity. The best opinion here is that Churchill arrived, not to plan a second front this year, but to dissuade the President from attempting one. Rommel has since reinforced Churchill's argument by taking Tobruk and threatening Egypt; the Axis continues to hold the initiative on all fronts. The Navy Department, which seems to have learned little from Pearl Harbor, is busy issuing soothing syrup on the Japanese invasion of the Aleutians. It is now admitted that the Japanese have occupied Kiska, 650 miles west of Dutch Harbor, as well as Attu, westernmost island of the chain, but we are assured that the weather on both islands is very bad, "foggy"—maybe the Japanese will all come down with bronchitis and cough themselves to death. Bases in the Aleutians can be used by submarines and planes to raid our shipping if Japan attacks Siberia, or they can be utilized for bombing raids on the Western hemisphere. The Navy Department's light-minded attitude toward this Japanese invasion of our territory is appalling.

This giddiness-in-the-head is not confined to the Navy Department. Pap has been pouring from the press agents of the Administration, the War Production Board, and the National Association of Manufacturers. The Truman committee on the Guthrie case offers an antidote for the hurrah stories on production, but it will be shelved and forgotten as rapidly as possible. A whole corps of clever propaganda analysts are at work here, listening in on the Axis radio and scanning the Axis press, but few seem to realize that our most dangerous fifth column is complacency and that Washington rather than Berlin remains the most important source of the poison.

The Axis has two principal propaganda objectives. One is to divide. The other is to lull the victim into a false sense of security. The second task, with some encouragement, can usually be left to the victim himself. To paraphrase an advertising slogan, it may be instructive to know the truth, but it's more fun to be fooled. Few here will admit that Tobruk fell, as Manila and Singapore fell, partly because the arsenal of democracy, two years after the launching of the defense program, isn't delivering the goods.

Carefully read and considered, the Truman report on the Guthrie case is the key to the continued setbacks suffered by ourselves and our allies. The arsenal of democracy, as the Guthrie case and the reactions to the report show, is still being operated with one eye on the war and the other on the convenience of big business. The progress made on production so far is the fruit of necessity and improvisation rather than of foresight and planning, and the men running the program are not willing to fight business interests on behalf of military efficiency. Donald Nelson is full of good will and good intentions, but the only battle he has staged since becoming head of the War Production Board was his fight last week to suppress the Guthrie report.

The Guthrie report shows that, months after Pearl Harbor, the men Nelson put in charge of converting the consumer durable-goods industries to war were still trying their best to postpone curtailment of civilian production. It shows that when it came to the test Nelson took his stand with the men of "business as usual" against a business man who seemed only to be acting on the principles Nelson himself was expressing in his speeches. It shows that Nelson and his aides are still trying to palm off curtailment as the equivalent of conversion, although the former is only the first and negative step of the process. It shows that the big-business crowd is as powerfully entrenched under Nelson as it was under Knudsen. It shows that we are not going to get maximum utilization of our resources until there is a shakeup more fundamental than the adding of the new alphabetic alias to the series NDAC-OPM-SPAB-WPB. That shakeup will be effective only if labor, small business, and independent engineering talent are brought into the agencies supposed to direct the mobilization of industry. For the demonstration, and the statements, though some of them were left to implication, the country is indebted to Senator Truman and his colleagues, especially Ball, Brewster, and Mead. They stuck to their guns under pressure from Nelson.

It is important to realize that we are in a very critical period of war production. The shortage of basic materials, which might cost us victory, is itself a victory for the big-business status quo. The shortage of materials has become an excuse for dropping plans to expand basic industries. It has become an excuse for concentrating war output in the new plane, tank, and ordnance plants instead of spreading the work out to smaller-business men. The big-business crowd has succeeded so far in fighting the war its way—with a minimum of conversion, a maximum of new war plants, a minimum of industrial expansion, as much monopoly as possible, and without the dreaded admission of labor into the councils of management. For despite plant committees, labor today has less influence and less voice than ever before in the planning and direction of the war-production program. Yet labor participation is needed more than ever in the basic material-producing and mining industries, for there is no doubt that in the case of many materials the shortage is remediable. We could produce more copper and we could produce more steel if we were prepared to impose over-all control and rationalization of production in these industries.

The solution of our problems lies in a more democratic direction of our industrial effort, but the trend is the other way. The next step will be to merge the industrial branches of the WPB in the army and navy, where it will be more difficult than ever for labor to have a voice, where there will be less interference than ever from Leon Henderson's hard-working little crew of all-outers in civilian supply, and where the "dollar-a-year men" can more easily be shielded from criticism. It is harder to spot a big-business man in uniform than in mufti, and Congressional committees are shyer of criticizing "the military." Thus the Truman committee pulled its punches when Undersecretary Patterson intervened last winter to postpone conversion of the radio industry and when the supply branches of the army pleaded for business as usual in the typewriter industry.

The Guthrie report shows how a "plutodemocracy"—to use Mussolini's favorite phrase—mobilizes for war. When the Truman committee last January criticized the dollar-a-year men for their tendency to feather their own nests, Nelson rushed forward not only to defend them but to claim that criticism was interfering with the war effort by making it more difficult to bring more dollar-a-year men to Washington. A hitherto unpublished story indicates how Guthrie, the maverick, put himself in wrong with the gang the day he was made Philip Reed's assistant. He shocked Reed and WPB General Counsel John Lord O'Brian by announcing that he was selling his stock and giving up his directorship in White Sewing Machine Company because the sewing-machine industry was one of those he would be expected to help convert to war purposes. "You're certainly a rare bird," O'Brian told him—much too rare to last, as it turned out.

The Score After Midway

BY DONALD W. MITCHELL

THE Battle of Midway was easily the best news of the war as it was also the first decisive check on Japan. While news is so far incomplete, the outlines of the Nipponese scheme of campaign are plain. It is a plan astonishing for its boldness and complete underestimation of American strength. For Japan, as for the United States, there are three main routes by which the war may be carried on a large scale into enemy waters. The Coral Sea battle, while not decisive, doubtless convinced the Japanese of the danger of trying to sever our southern communication lines or of attempting a campaign by the use of such distant stepping stones as the islands north of Australia. In their attacks along the lightly guarded Aleutian chain and in the heavy offensive against Hawaii by way of Midway, the Japanese tried these other two lines of attack simultaneously. One was apparently light while the other used a large share of the Japanese navy's striking power. Both were utterly unsound strategically and could have succeeded only against a much weaker opponent.

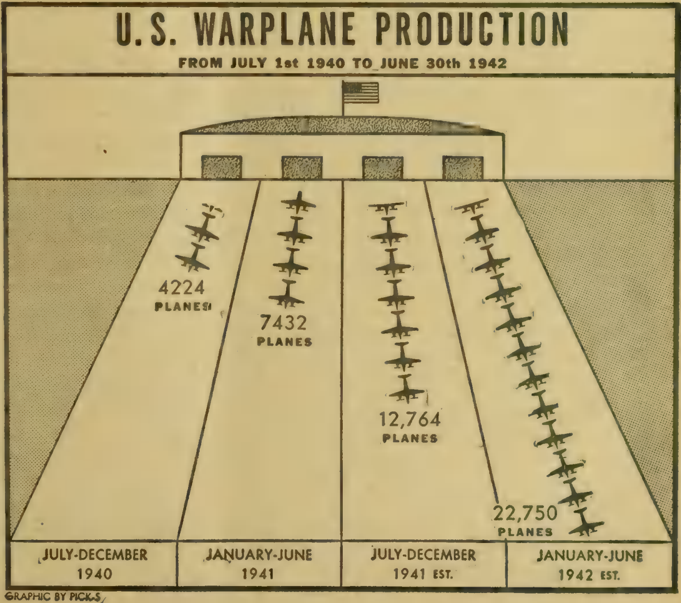
The surprising thing is not that the attacks failed but that they were attempted at all. Japanese admirals may have been suffering from extreme cockiness; or over-anxious to avenge their check in the Coral Sea, they perhaps convinced themselves that they could repeat their "impossible" exploit of December 7.

Very likely the Japanese attacked the Aleutians in order to seize bases from which they could interfere with aid to Siberia in case of a later thrust in that direction. The slight degree of success in this attempt must be quickly canceled if Japanese "digging in" and consolidation is to be prevented. But American dominance in the Hawaii-Aleutians-Canal Zone triangle is overwhelming. Not only did the enemy find abundant shore-based airpower, capable of rapid reinforcement from the mainland, but its forces penetrated into waters dominated by superior American seapower operating close to home bases. The sea and air dominance of the United States extends for a fair distance beyond Hawaii and its appendage, Midway. Even Wake in mid-Pacific was well within the range of supporting forces and would not have been lost if the Pearl Harbor disaster had not disorganized our fighting strength. The Japanese, therefore, in trying to penetrate our outer defenses in the Pacific, advanced beyond the protection of their own shore-based airpower and placed themselves well within reach of our military as well as naval aviation long before they were within gunnery range of Midway. Only an attempted conquest of Hawaii which, had it succeeded, would probably have ended all American chances of winning the war, might conceivably have justified the assumption of such risks. With all the cards stacked against it, Japan took a long chance on the possibility of large winnings—and lost.

While Japanese ship losses are considerable they may be less vital than indicated by some commentators. The battle of Midway, though a Japanese defeat, was no catastrophe. Its results were greater than those of Jutland but not to be compared with those of Tsu-shima or Manila. Had our slow battleships come into action in the later stages of the conflict, they might easily have turned defeat into a rout and, because of their ability to continue pursuit longer and pour in a much greater volume of firepower, might have annihilated a badly crippled enemy. As it is, unless Japan has many more plane carriers than those for which it has received credit (something very possible), or unless American estimates of damage are far from accurate (much less likely), at least half of Japanese ship-based aviation has been wiped out. And this has been accomplished at comparatively slight cost to ourselves. Since planes form the spearhead of modern naval attack, it is safe to say that Japan will find it difficult to undertake large-scale sea offensives for months, possibly years, to come. Conversely, our operations may be pushed with greater boldness.

On the other hand, the victory itself was essentially negative. With conditions very much in our favor we stopped a powerful Japanese drive, but we have yet to launch a powerful Pacific offensive of our own. And we cannot hope to win the war by merely parrying the enemy's blows. If the threat of land-based airpower prevents our taking the offensive, as it stopped our following a defeated enemy, we will encounter grave difficulties in winning today's war. The considerations which prevented our following up the Midway victory may have been strategically sound but they represent a far different policy to the "Damn-the-torpedoes.-Full-speed-ahead" doctrine of Farragut.

As a matter of fact, caution has been the keynote of our operations in the Pacific. Aside from a few raids which we have not followed up with an offensive campaign, we have left the initiative entirely to the Japanese. This policy must ultimately be abandoned, though the reasons for following it at the moment may be perfectly sound. In the first place, the United States has less reason for speed than previously because it has already lost all that effective air and naval intervention could have made less vulnerable. It is no secret that Germany comes first as the object of American war efforts. Again, it is undoubtedly true that American seapower, scattered over the seven seas on convoy duty, probably lacks the crushing superiority needed to battle Japan on even terms in its own waters. Under such circumstances our admirals may be quite willing to await the completion of more ships, on the grounds that delay now strengthens their forces more than it does those of Japan.



GRAPHIC BY PICK-S

The more complete information which has been made available on the Coral Sea engagement explains why both Japan and the United States could claim victory. The Japanese apparently succeeded in effecting landings in both the Louisiade and Solomon groups, though at a disproportionate loss. The gigantic Lexington with its capacity of nearly one hundred planes will, however, be missed. The destruction of the Ryukaku and the injury to the Shokaku reveal that at least two new plane carriers other than those generally known to be in existence were completed by the Japanese before the war. They therefore started the war with at least nine carriers as compared to the seven belonging to us and of our seven three were probably in the Atlantic at the time war broke out.

The recent Pacific battles mark a revolutionary change in naval warfare. The torpedo has replaced the gun as the primary weapon mainly owing to its enormously greater range when carried by air. Battleships are not yet obsolete. With their enormous firepower they can, if guarded from air assault, do vastly more damage from short range than a plane carrier, but they are clearly secondary to longer ranged planes, and our older ships are too slow to add their gunpower to our cruiser-carrier striking groups.

There is one corollary to the fights in the Pacific that is deeply disturbing to the United States. If the superiority of land-based planes over both naval vessels and naval aircraft proves too great to permit such operations as carrier-raids on Japan proper, or sea and air offensives through the Japanese mandates, then American war plans will require drastic alteration. The step by step advances through the central or north Pacific will cease to be feasible and we shall be reduced to the initial use of land-based airpower.

The bases available for warfare of this kind are all but non-existent. Australia can be used, but not for attacks upon Japan proper, merely for attempts at an island-by-island reconquering of the enemy's earlier gains. Because the ways to Japan are so indirect, the distance from the United States so great, and the transportation and industrial system so backward by American standards, Australia should be a last, not a first choice as a base from which to launch an air offensive.

Japan's current campaign against China dates from General Doolittle's raid on Tokyo and is clearly for the purpose of eliminating "Shangri-la" as an air base. Unfortunately, we were not prepared to back up that raid by giving such aid to China as would enable it to hold its coastal sections.

There remains Siberia as a future possibility. This is, above all, the ideal air base from which to hit Japan. Vladivostok is within light-bomber range of every single major objective in the island empire. We must be prepared to keep open air lines to this country and rush reinforcements in, in case of Japanese attack. It is extremely unlikely that a Japanese attack here, the one major remaining threat to metropolitan Japan, will now be long delayed.

China's Peril Is Our Own

BY GEORGE E. TAYLOR

CHINA is facing the greatest crisis in its history since the establishment of the National Government in 1928. Those of us who have loved it and respected it must share, in these dark days, the bitterness, the disillusionment, and the apprehension which now consume it. The country with the longest and most consistent record of struggle against Axis aggression, the country which has lost more men, and killed more Japanese than any other, is now facing, almost alone, the fury of a renewed Japanese offensive which aims to put it out of the war for good. The tragedy of China has already happened; it has not been furnished the materials of war it asked for and in spite of the brave defense it is putting up its main armies are being pushed back into the western provinces, and its people driven to death and starvation. China is in desperate straits.

The tragedy is one of lost opportunity, of lack of appreciation of the role of China in this war and the importance of its armies to final victory. Look at the map of Asia and imagine China under Japanese control—see the great sweep of territory bordering the Soviet Union and India and the strategic possibilities this opens up to Japan and its Axis partners, consider the manpower of China, what it means to Japan and what its loss would mean to us, think of the effect that China's fall would have upon the morale of India's millions and upon the overrun populations of Southeast Asia. Above all, think how difficult would be a land attack upon Japan, especially upon its great industrial base in Manchuria, if China were out of the fight.

No wonder China is angry and alarmed. While America and Great Britain were out of the war China, in the hope of future assistance, defended itself against Japan even when the markets of the world were open to Tokyo; now that the allies it longed for have entered the struggle it is almost isolated from the western world, unable to get supplies from the Soviet Union, and compelled to face Japan alone, a Japan flushed with victory and with men and materials to spare. With the fall of the Philippines, Malaya, and Burma, millions of overseas Chinese came under Japanese rule and substantial financial contributions to the war were lost with them. The loss of the Burma Road, which we thought at one time could be made up by air transport, was followed by the loss of northern Burma, which removed the air bases necessary for transport planes. Now the problem of getting in and out of China even by air is one of great technical difficulty, and it is complicated by the danger of Japanese fighter plane opposition.

Japan can afford to throw away cruisers, carriers, and even battleships against the American fleet and land-based aircraft so long as these expeditions achieve one of their major objectives, that of keeping America sufficiently worried about its own shores to forget China.

It is worth sacrificing half the Japanese fleet to conquer China and to create the illusion of victory in the United States. Ships of war and airplanes can be replaced by Japan but how can America replace millions of trained Chinese troops, air bases within flying distance of Japan, and the one great continental ally on the Pacific? If the 450 millions of China go under, what will it avail us with the peoples of Asia to say that at least we saved the 7 millions of "white" Australia?

Why has China been sent too little material and that little too late? The Chinese feel the main reason lies in the apparent determination of those responsible for the strategy of the United Nations to consider Hitler the chief enemy and concentrate on him while leaving Japan for future treatment. Their attitude has been consistent; as the nations came into the struggle one by one, they have been welcomed by the Chinese as allies in the common cause against the Axis. The Chinese were realistic enough to see that it was the British people, more than the British government, who insisted that Hitler and fascism be stopped. The Chinese saw the entry of Britain and France into the war as the acquisition of allies against the Axis. While others were doing their best to sabotage the war effort in America and were analyzing the struggle between Germany and Great Britain as an imperialist war, the Chinese were pleading for the mobilization of the democratic powers against aggression. China's analysis of world affairs has stood the test of time much better than that of almost any other country.

It is tragic that this very analysis should now be used to China's disadvantage. Those who did not see the global nature of the war until Soviet Russia was involved are now among the first to use this definition to the disadvantage of the Chinese. The argument runs that the place where planes, guns, and tanks can be most effectively used is on the Russian front, and that it is wiser for the United Nations to make a combined attack on Hitler from all sides, leaving China to hold on against admittedly enormous odds. This, it is argued, would defeat Japan more quickly and more surely than any other strategy. China is cynically told that it has grown stronger during the past five years, particularly, one might suggest, during the past five months, which have seen the closing of every door to outside assistance. China is told that it can do much more to mobilize its own political and economic resources and that if it could attend to the achievement of greater unity among its fighting forces, it would be more difficult for Japan to succeed in its present campaign. At a time when China is appealing to the Soviet Union to open up a second front in the Far East against Japan it is told to hold the Japanese offensive alone and look to its own unity. The Soviet Union cannot possibly be asked to assist it and, moreover, must have all the guns, planes, and tanks we can spare. Nothing for China except advice, not even a word of encouragement.

This view is not that of the President and the State Department, who have given China encouragement if they did not always succeed in giving it arms. And one reason why arms did not arrive in time was certainly the rapidity of Japan's advance. American plans for aid to China were real enough, but were made on a much longer time basis. Now that the task is more difficult it is more urgent and must be fitted in with other obligations.

There is no question that any reasonable person is more than persuaded that every possible assistance must be sent to the Soviet Union, for the war can still be lost on the Russian front. But is it necessary, in order to emphasize the importance of one continental ally, to overlook the other? It may be the course of wisdom to open a second front immediately in western Europe—though this is hardly a matter for laymen to decide—but in order to open a front at all, certain other fronts must be held, particularly the Russian and the Chinese. This should be clear enough to anyone except those who interpret the phrase "global war" to mean the Soviet Union's war and no one else's.

How can we assume that if Hitler is defeated Japan will automatically go down? Time is on the side of Japan—give it time and it will consolidate its great empire, turn India into a chaotic shambles, and construct tremendous fortifications. And if Hitler is defeated, who will fight Japan? Can we assume that Soviet Russia will plunge into the struggle in the East if it is not attacked? Why should it? Will Britain fight for the restoration of its Pacific empire? How would America fare against Japan with a conquered China, a neutral Russia, and a Britain with no great heart in the struggle? It is noteworthy that the Anglo-Russian alliance did not mention the Far East, only Germany and its allies in Europe. The Pacific is America's job, and China is its ally just as the Soviet Union is Britain's ally in Europe.

There is certainly as much reason to have confidence in China's armies as in the mighty forces of the Soviet Union. This is far too serious a matter for anyone to complicate by indulging in odious comparisons, but China did not retreat any faster than Russia when attacked; it has suffered as much in terms of lost territory and civilian population; it has scorched as much earth; it has lost more men; it has been more consistently anti-Axis. Whereas Russia started the war with armies comparable to those of Germany and in some ways superior, no one would think of comparing the equipment of China's armies with those of Japan. Yet China has driven the Japanese from some areas without offensive weapons, without tanks, heavy guns, or planes. One fraction of the weapons sent to the Soviet Union or even to Australia would have enabled China to dislodge the Japanese from key positions and to protect the airfields which were being built to bomb Japan. No country wanted less and could have done more with it.

As time goes on the consequences of bombing Tokyo will become more and more apparent. Did we expect the Japanese to do nothing about it? Did we expect them not to destroy the American and Chinese bases from which the experiment could be repeated? After Australia had won a major diplomatic victory in persuading America to send MacArthur and military equipment there rather than to China, which we could much less afford to lose than Australia, it was disastrous to bomb Tokyo before providing China with enough planes and other equipment to defend the bases for offensive action on which so much time and labor had already been spent. While there may have been very good domestic reasons for bombing Tokyo at this time it does not follow that they were weighed against the price that China, or for that matter America, would have to pay for it. Japan, it is true, had very good reasons for attacking China in any case, but if it were in doubt as to the direction in which to strike, the bombing of Tokyo must have done much to decide its course of action.

What of China? Can it hold the Japanese or are we watching its slow dismemberment? Fight it must, for there is no alternative it can accept. It has materials of war stored up but is naturally reluctant to use its last resources; it has also the very difficult problem of transporting them to the various fronts, for the Japanese advances have complicated the already difficult internal communications. The economic situation is bad, inflation is rampant, and the hoarding of goods is the main form of saving. The prestige of those Chinese who have always leaned toward Britain and America is low, for the Chinese feel that they have been left in the lurch.

The political situation in Chungking is critical; never has the leadership of Chiang Kai-shek been put to a greater test. But if China stands alone it will not fall; it is still no easy matter to conquer a new nation and force more than 400 million people to submit. It is partly on the assumption that China can take the punishment that strategic calculations have perhaps been based, but if strategy must be cold-blooded it is well to remember that China is composed of warm-blooded human beings whose sufferings concern us closely.

After a long period of comparative stalemate Japan's armies are striking once more into the living flesh of China. The Free China which faces it is still powerful in China's greatest assets, man-power and territory. The nine provinces of Chinghai, Kansu, Shensi, Kwangsi, Kweichow, Szechuan, Sikang, and Yunnan, which form an untouched nucleus, have a population of nearly 100 million people; the six adjoining partly occupied provinces of Suiyuan, Honan, Kwantung, Shansi, Hupeh, and Hunan have at least another 66 million people who have never seen the Japanese. Separated from this compact mass, but in political and economic communication with it, are another 120 million people belonging to these six provinces. In the remaining provinces of North and Central China, which took the brunt of Japanese occupation, some 100 million people are maintaining themselves in more or less active opposition to the Japanese. Japan probably directly controls, therefore, according to latest reports from Guenther Stein in Chungking, no more than 50 and no less than 25 million Chinese. Japan still has a long way to go. But if it is willing to pay the price it can do enormous damage to China, and it has never been in a better position to pay the price.

What will happen, then, in China? China will lose territory and men and consume precious supplies; it will probably be made useless as an offensive base against Japan for years to come. All these things can be measured in terms of additional American casualties. If it is too late to use China as it might have been used, as an offensive land base against Japan, it is not too late to do two things, to ponder on the price that China is paying for our grand strategy and to reassure the Chinese, at this time of trial and torture, of the place that they will have in the world order for which the United Nations are fighting; and to make every effort to get some material assistance to China's armies. Is it too much to ask our Russian allies, whose fight has already done so much to turn the tide of war, if not to open a second front in the East, at least to make every sacrifice to get materials to China? It is our duty, not Russia's, to provide the materials, but the Soviet Union now controls the effective routes. There is much we could do in the way of diverting Japanese ships and planes from China, and the cost would be much less than the cost if China were to fall. If we can keep the Chinese fighting we can still rally the peoples of Asia actively to our side.

At present the Chinese do not even share our counsels on equal terms. They should at least be told our aims and given our encouragement. Those great intellects who think that Japan is going to be such an easy matter to deal with when Hitler is defeated and tell us that it is dangerous to talk now of war aims because they might get in the way of winning the war, ought to be shipped out to China and assigned the task of explaining to the Chinese why global strategy means that they are to get no planes, tanks, and guns—and do this without mentioning what we are fighting for. Now of all times is the moment to tell China where it fits into the picture of strategy and war aims; now it is more essential than ever to get to it the most impressive propaganda of all—materials of war, a task in which all the United Nations must share.

Britain's New Left

BY TOM WINTRINGHAM

London, June 2

BRITISH politics today is dominated by the fact that the common man is cutting loose from old forms and ideas and from political parties and leaders that six months ago seemed almost irreplaceable. In what direction the common man will go is not clear. Nor is it certain who will express his hopes and influence his thinking. But among the factors that will certainly enter into the making of new popular policies, and probably new parties, we can today reckon the following: Sir Stafford Cripps, whose independence is much of his strength, two groups of independent politicians with whom I will deal later, and the majority of the members of the Labor Party.

Sir Stafford Cripps plays his lone hand in the War Cabinet as the representative of the first big push by the common man against the old parties. His position is well known to American readers, and I need not add more than one fact: it is widely believed that in his efforts to bring a New Deal in Britain and a new inspiration for the United Nations in their war, Cripps's main opposition within the government comes from the leaders of the Labor Party, and in the country from their direct representatives and from the Communist Party.

The second big push by the common man against the old parties is marked by the nomination of independent candidates at by-elections, three of whom have defeated regular government candidates during the past two months. These independents, candidates, or M. P.'s, divide sharply into two groups. One group has called itself at different times the Democratic Alliance and the People's Party. It includes politicians of varied experience: Mr. W. J. Brown, leader of a civil servants' trade union, who has held many political viewpoints (if "held" is the right word; none lasted long); the ex-Tory Cunningham-Reid, apparently ex-Tory because even the Conservative Party did not properly appreciate his expedition to Hawaii during the early part of the war (our war; he came back before Pearl Harbor); and an assortment of young men who express only the deep frustrations governing the lives of the young in England. The common platform of this group, as far as it has one, is negative: they are against most things. They are not fascists, but should the demagogic expression of frustration, without any positive drive to reshape the social and economic order, take a fascist direction they might drift the same way.

The second group of independents belong mainly to two organizations, Sir Richard Acland's "Forward March" and J. B. Priestley's "1941 Committee." Together they support a body provisionally called the "Nine Point Group," from the nine points of the declaration recently put out over the signatures of Acland, Priestley, George Reakes, M. P., the independent recently elected at Wallasey, and myself. The list of those signing or supporting this manifesto is growing rapidly and includes economists and university professors, trade unionists and technicians, architects and novelists, and one or two of the more far-sighted industrialists.

Sir Richard Acland is a member of Parliament who, elected as a liberal, turned six or seven years ago to a vigorous Christian Communism around which he built his Forward March. He and his group of crusaders influenced the Malvern decisions of a representative part of the Church of England, and have swung much of what remains alive in that church toward the view that great changes must take place in society if men are to live good lives. The first decisive victory for an independent candidate standing on a positive program of socialism now, socialism in order to win the war, was very largely a victory for Acland personally. His was the only national backing for the victorious candidate at Wallasey, who won by more than 6,000 votes—an enormous majority for these days when polls are necessarily small.

The key point in Dick Acland's program, which his advocacy has made perhaps the most important of the nine points of our declaration, is that we need to transfer to common ownership, during the war and for the purposes of the war, "services, industries, and companies in which managerial inefficiency or the profit motive is harming the war effort. This," our statement continues, "will increase the war effort and will be a token of the post-war New Deal in which common ownership of all the great resources of the country must become the fundamental basis of our whole economic life."

It is no longer, for us, a question of some form of control by the state or community over private profit-making industry. During the war there has been an immense amount of this control; not only has it failed to solve the problem of inefficient management but it has added to it the problem of civil-service inefficiency. We know that a change as great as this—from private ownership to public, of the great resources of the country—cannot be made during the war; but we insist that the worst scandals in production should be cleared up by taking from their present owners the actual direction of the firms in question, and running them with the single aim of getting maximum production.

In particular we stand for immediate nationalization of the coal industry. The whole business of coal has been shockingly muddled here; our homes will be bitterly cold next winter and even our war plants are likely to be hampered in consequence. There is a wave of small strikes; men escape from the mines into other jobs any way they can; the ordinary economic incentives of profit on the one hand and pay on the other no longer work. The incentive of patriotism does not work well enough, largely because the miners have a deeply ingrained and well-justified feeling that the owners' patriotism has always, in the past, taken second place to profits, and that if peace "broke out" tomorrow the owners would not hesitate to shovel miners by the hundred thousand on to the scrap heap of unemployment if that gave them a greater margin of gain. In these conditions no measure of government control, no temporary plan, will supply the men and the technicians with a new incentive to extraordinary efforts. Straight nationalization would provide that incentive. To many managers it would be a relief: instead of being hampered by two controlling bodies—government and shareholders—pulling in divergent directions, they would be responsible to the government alone. They know that their labor troubles would be over for a period; that the men would work as fiercely for the needs of their country as Russians are working today.

Is this, as some have represented it, a longing for a totalitarian collectivism, abolishing all the rights of democracy for which section after section of the British people have fought stubbornly and shrewdly for centuries? No; that is not what the English want; nor is it our aim. The central and most difficult problem in the building of a new society today is how to make a real marriage between economic collectivism, forced on us by the collapse of capitalism, and the freedoms that are our most precious inheritance. Our socialism needs more than an addition of timidly measured cupfuls of democracy; it needs to be socialism reinforced by democracy alive and kicking. That is why our nine-point statement asks for "the energy and enthusiasm of a free people who know what they fight for and love what they know . . . a really vital democracy throughout our public life—social, economic, and political."

And this is where J. B. Priestley comes in. Many in America will know his writings. Many have heard him broadcast. What they cannot easily know is his standing as a politician in this country. Yet it was not until Dunkirk that he began to speak and write in a way that bore immediately on the political problems of the nation. Then his broadcast "postcripts" made him, for three months or more, the voice of the British as a people. When the powers-that-be kept him from the microphone—his words were becoming too powerful and too popular—he set up an informal committee of "men who know their jobs" to discuss and work out the politics of vital democracy.

Priestley has English caution and English commonsense, a hatred of all "isms," and no liking for politics as such. It has not been easy for him to take the decision that led him recently to begin campaigning in South Wales for an independent who stands for our nine points. But his decision may mark a turning point in the political history of Britain. It would not be fair to represent Acland simply by the word collectivism and Priestley by the word freedom; but when the two of them work together in the building of a new political movement, common ownership and vital democracy are so merged that each in fact multiplies the effect of the other.

My own part in the business derives from this: I believe that to do our share in winning this war, we in Britain must make it completely a peoples' war and must stop trying to fight it as a war for the defense of the empire. As a journalist and as an instructor in the training schools I have helped to shape the Home Guard and to alter radically the tactical training of the army. I learned the basis of my politics in Moscow in 1920; fighting in Spain strengthened my belief that an army must be morally united and without class conflicts if it is to do the best possible job, and that initiative and morale depend on the population as well as on the army. Having got as far as I could without direct intervention in politics, I resigned from a War Office job in June, 1941, and soon after joined Priestley and the 1941 Committee in the hope of helping to defeat politically the conservative stupidity which still hampers our fighting.

I was the first journalist in Britain to call for a second front. That second front may be a reality before this is printed; but it could never be a reality had we no Home Guard here to release regular troops for it, or if this force had consisted only of a few hundred thousand special constables, untrained as combatants. The agitation for a second front has run almost throughout English society; the noisier aspects have been monopolized by Lord Beaverbrook and the Communist Party, but if we land in Europe tomorrow, our action would be largely the result of pressure from men, sergeants, officers, and generals in the army, who are very tired of waiting and very envious of the Red Army's share in the war.

Where the Labor Party comes into all this worries many people here. Even on coal it stands not for nationalization but for some form of control. It has done little to express the desire for a second front. Its leadership has clung to the electoral truce until independents made that truce utterly unreal. Yet at the recent Labor Party conference a resolution supporting the electoral truce was carried by so tiny a majority that the platform was in effect defeated. The rank and file of the party want to break the electoral truce, whether or not this implies pulling Labor out of the government. These Labor Party members want to express the deep surge of feeling in the country in favor of rapid changes in the way the war is fought and the factories are run. My own guess is that the leaders of the Labor Party will not permit them to do this, and that the party will remain frustrated and ineffective for some time to come.

If the new movement now led by Acland and Priestley has to become a new political party, and has to act in some way as a rival of the Labor Party, this development will be against our own desires and against the desire of most members of the Labor Party. We would rather be the allies of the Labor Party; better still we would like to see such changes in the Labor Party outlook that the forces we represent could find a place within it. The men to whom the name Cripps means hope, the men who would vote for any independent rather than for a candidate of the old parties, the men to whom the "Russian glory" has not meant—as it has meant for some thousands—a desire to join the Communist Party but a desire to do something useful, these men are now politically unorganized. If the Labor Party changes far more rapidly than seems probable, it can win these new forces and hold the vigorous younger men and women now within its ranks. If it does not change, the Labor Party will lose both.

THE LATEST CRUSADE of Marshall Field's PM has been to force New York newspapers to drop advertisements of hotels that discriminate against Jews and Negroes and indicate their policy by the words "restricted" or "Christian" clientele. But while Marshall Field's PM has been campaigning against "hate ads," Marshall Field's Chicago Sun has been publishing them every day.

BRITISH COMMUNISTS have lost one hero and found another. For some obscure reason, the party is now very critical of Sir Stafford Cripps, but it is lavish in its praise of Lord Beaverbrook.

AN EXCERPT from a prohibition pamphlet now being circulated in the South: "Not one penny of the liquor tax money ever goes into the building of an airplane or gun—but even if it did, that airplane or gun would never serve the cause of our country. Why? Because it would be built with tainted money. Liquor taxes built the Maginot Line and look what happened to France. Ladies and gentlemen, France fell because of liquor taxes."

STEVE HANNIGAN, who did publicity for the State of Florida, has been retained by Henry Ford to tell the world that Ford is a patriot and a democrat. A story that may or may not be part of this publicity campaign was recently told to a New York newspaperman by Harry Bennett, Ford's personnel director. Bennett said that after Lindbergh's famous Des Moines speech, in which the flyer warned the Jews not to be interventionists, Ford called Lindbergh in and rebuked him severely.

THE SOCIALIST PARTY is now divided into four factions, each representing a different attitude toward the war. One is pacifist; one takes the traditional class-war position; one, led by Norman Thomas, advocates limited support of the government; and one argues that Socialists should act as if there was no war.

The Fourth Reich

WILL GERMANY CRACK? A FACTUAL REPORT ON GERMANY FROM WITHIN. By Paul Hagen. Translated by Anna Caples. Harper and Brothers. $2.75.

PAUL HAGEN is singularly qualified to give the American reader an evaluation of present economic and political conditions in Germany. He was for years an active member of the German labor movement. As one of the founders and spokesmen of the "New Beginning" group he enjoys valuable political contacts in Europe. And through his work with the American Friends of German Freedom for whose Inside Germany Reports he has been largely responsible, he has acquired a more intimate knowledge of the American scene than most refugees. "Will Germany Crack?" is a timely and absorbing report.

Making critical use of official Nazi publications, German business data, and private factual information Hagen devotes the first part of his book to an analysis of some key problems of Hitler's war economy. He sees as its most acute difficulty a shortage of labor—"the chief symbol of the multiple crisis of scarcity in Germany." Shortage and declining productivity of labor, more than any other factor, limit the program of Germany's coal, iron, and steel production, says Hagen, and force the Nazis to employ an ever-growing number of their foreign labor conscripts and prisoners in vulnerable war industries. Shortage of industrial labor also dictates the Nazi policy toward the lower middle classes, the artisans and small shopkeepers whom they "comb out" of business by the hundreds of thousands to replace the skilled workers needed in the mechanized armed forces. Hagen's description of the state of Germany's productive plant should have a sobering effect on the mystics to whom Hitler's economic miracle is as overwhelming as it is inexplicable.

Informative as these economic chapters are, a good many readers will find more food for thought in the political conclusions Hagen draws from his analysis, and in his treatment of some of the outstanding post-war problems. The vital question he asks is really not whether Germany will crack, but how the Nazi war machine can be destroyed with a minimum of sacrifices, and the fruits of a democratic victory secured. His chapter, How to Beat Hitler Politically, offers some of the most convincing and eloquent advice ever addressed to those responsible for the United Nations' political warfare and the future peace of the world. One after the other, Hagen punctures the "easy" solutions, the dreams of the reactionaries, the hopes of the crowned houses, the chauvinistic cries for senseless destruction. "It is a great accomplishment for the Nazis and the other fascists," he writes, answering Vansittart and his friends, "to lure some of their enemies back to tribalism too, but we cannot defeat them by sinking to their depths; on their own level they are invincible."

There is little comfort in this book for people who still believe in the German army, led by a conservative officers' corps, as the great counter force to the Nazi gangsters. Hagen traces the relations between the Nazis and the Reichswehr back to their treacherous solidarity at the very beginning of the Weimar Republic and proves beyond any doubt that political control and power over the armed forces rest today with the party's SS, not with the General Staff. There are conflicts of interests between the army and the party, and an effective political strategy will take them into consideration, but the author truly asserts that these conflicts disappear before the common menace of a democratic victory, just as the conflicts of interest between Nazis and big business melt away in the face of a threatening social revolution. Even the hopes of a return to the democracy of Weimar are not encouraged. Hagen sees neither a liberal opposition surviving in Germany nor an economic basis for its rebirth.

Who, then, if neither the army nor German big business, neither royal families nor Weimar democrats, will make reliable and powerful allies for the United Nations? Hagen does not exclude the possibility that one or all of these groups might give active support in one phase or another of the fight against the crumbling Nazi regime, but he counts them definitely as the less significant forces in Germany's anti-fascist potential. It is the greatest merit of his book, I think, to have rediscovered German labor as the strongest anti-Nazi power within the Third Reich and to have called the attention of the United Nations to the fact that they can have this tremendous force as an ally in a new Europe if they understand the signs of our time. Progressive statesmanship, he believes, should not fear the coming anti-fascist revolution in Germany and Italy, but help bring it about. It should not shrink from the necessity of solving Europe's vital problems in the framework of a European federation. They cannot be solved any longer in the morass of national chauvinism. Hagen regretfully states that so far the Allies have shown no tendency to include a European federation in their war aims and that even the Atlantic Charter evades the issue.

The spirit of more recent diplomatic agreements will hardly encourage him and his political friends.

Conquistador

THE KNIGHT OF EL DORADO: THE TALE OF DON GONZALO JIMÉNEZ DE QUESADA AND HIS CONQUEST OF NEW GRANADA, NOW CALLED COLOMBIA. By Germán Arciniegas. Translated by Mildred Adams. The Viking Press. $3.

HEREDIA, in his meticulously chiseled sonnets, di perhaps more than anyone else to evaluate favorabl the awesome deeds of the Conquistadors in defiance o Western Europe's long hostility toward them. In this coun try Archibald MacLeish, following that tradition, has s humanized men like Cortés and the anonymous seekers o gain and glory that the accusations leveled at them lose their force.

To such an extent has our judgment now matured that we cannot ever again denounce the Conquistador out of ill-disciplined sentimentality. For the same reason we cannot let our Western partisanship blind us to the irreparable harm caused by the Iberic exploitation of empires and peoples. Sympathy for the Indians is imperative if we are to gain their cooperation in the common tasks, and so is appreciation for the daredevils who, in the secret designs of history, wrought the beginnings of a new fraternity of peoples. These two supplementary feelings now provide the emotional setting for the new attitude toward the Conquistador.

In the past twenty years or so Englishmen, Frenchmen, Germans, Spaniards, Americans, have treated more or less adequately the lives of the Spanish explorers and founders of the New World—Columbus, Magellan, Cabeza de Vaca, Ponce de Leon, Cortés, Alvarado, Pizarro, Las Casas, Coronado, etc. But Latin Americans have been a little slow in joining the school of reconstructed and imaginative biography started by Strachey, Maurois, Ludwig, and Zweig.

Now Germán Arciniegas, the present Colombian Minister of Education, in "The Knight of El Dorado," has told with humor, penetration, and deeply felt piety the story of Don Gonzalo Jiménez de Quesada, the conqueror, explorer, and founder of what is today Colombia. All travel books agree that Colombia is the most inaccessible territory of all South America even today; neither from the Pacific nor from the Atlantic is it easy to ascend the imposing meseta of Cundinamarca. But the Encyclopedia Britannica ignores the extraordinary achievement of Quesada, the Andalusian lawyer who accompanied Don Pedro Fernández de Lugo to the port of Santa Marta.

Don Pedro sent Quesada inland to the jungle in search of wealth and breathable air. The expedition lost over eight hundred out of a thousand men before reaching the Chibchas' lands. In the clear style of Señor Arciniegas a very dark page of early American history becomes dramatically alive. The most astonishing phase of the story is that there were, all told, three rebellious, adventurous captains, unaware of each other's existence, pressing hard from the north, the south, and the east, to set foot on Cundinamarca. The powerful German banking houses of Fugger and Welser lent moneys to Charles V in return for which the Welsers were permitted to ship their agents to Venezuela. And it was from Venezuela that one of Quesada's two rivals, the unscrupulous Nicholas Federmann, reached the Chibchas' empire a few days later than Quesada. Don Sebastián de Belalcázar, who years before had shared in the conquest of the Inca empire and founded city after city in the Andes, was the other rival who missed the chance of being the first to lay the foundations of New Granada. Quesada's southern suavity and legalistic acumen convinced the other two adventurers of the advisability of referring their claims to the authorities in Spain. Arciniegas's banter deliciously pokes fun at the tradition revered in Bogotá. "This city of mine which was shortly to receive its heraldic bearings from the mystic King Charles and the mad Queen Juana could not have had a more honorable origin. This is the way all noble cities are born. . . ."

A Woman of Valor

HENRIETTA SZOLD: LIFE AND LETTERS. By Marvin Lowenthal. The Viking Press. $3.

TODAY, at eighty-one, in the desert or on mud-clogged roads, Henrietta Szold travels from one labor commune in Palestine to another, to watch over and direct the rehabilitation of thousands of young Jewish boys and girls who have been rescued from Nazi persecution. This work, as constructive as it is dramatic, was undertaken at her suggestion in 1935 by the American women's Zionist organization, Hadassah, which she had founded in 1912 and which previously had carried out her program of medical and sanitary rehabilitation.

The daughter of a liberal Baltimore rabbi who envisaged for her a life of scholarship, Miss Szold, after a period of substantial contribution to teaching as well as to Hebrew scholarship and Jewish culture, chose work which would satisfy her desire to translate spiritual values into "practical terms." In her twenties she had added to a double teaching task the founding, direction, and active participation in a school for Russian Jewish refugees from Czarist persecution. What distinguished her from her West European contemporaries was that she was more impressed by the rich cultural values of the East Europeans than by the problems which their poverty seemed to raise for the comfortable Baltimore Jewish community. As a result, the school, which served as community center for non-Jewish immigrants as well, never failed, as did many of the contemporary settlement houses, to provide a link between the Old and the New World.

In her long career of Zionist activity in the United States and, since 1920, in her work in Palestine, her effort has been directed toward the removal of what she called the "taint of charity." It is a testimony to her understanding of the aims and values of the various factions in Jewish life that she has been accepted, as perhaps no other "middle class" American has been, by the Jewish labor groups.

Mr. Lowenthal, whose many books give proof of his knowledge of Jewish culture, has written a vivid section on the Baltimore background in his usual felicitous style. But for the major portion of the account he has relied on a generous selection of Miss Szold's letters to tell the story, adding only occasional footnotes or supplementary narrative. In the case of a person both as busy and as modest as Miss Szold, this method is not well designed to make her contribution understandable to the general public for whom this volume was intended. The quality of her spirit is made clear, and so is her courage in undertaking tasks which she had outlined for technicians and specialists but which she had to carry out herself, as acting director of the Medical Unit, as a member of the Palestine Executive during a period of economic crisis, mass immigration, and Arab-Jewish disturbances, and then as head and sole worker in the program of social service which she initiated in 1931. Little was needed to supplement her caustically correct analysis of British colonialism. But an appreciation of her emphasis on the need of Arab-Jewish rapprochement requires more background and an account of what she did in her own work to achieve that end. The same is true of the problems raised by factionalism and especially by the conflict over the aspirations and methods of the labor groups. With such a background, a more limited selection of letters would still have conveyed her warmth and her achievement—the achievement of a woman who preferred hard work to sermonizing, but whose scrupulous laying of stone on stone never obscured her vision of the regeneration of her people as one step in the enriching of all human life.

ELSIE GLUCK

The Tewlers

YOU CAN'T BE TOO CAREFUL. By H. G. Wells, G. P. Putnam's Sons. $2.50.

H. G. WELLS still goes his old unregenerate way. His latest novel is announced as a return to story-telling but actually it is a reformer's field-day in which the story of Edward Albert Tewler is only a pretext for Wells to range the whole of modern English life, scolding, satirizing, waving the banner for science and education. But Wells's prose is as vigorous as, at its best, it has always been and a great relief after the dreariness of most contemporary writing. And if his research into Tewler frightens us for the society that produced him, it also frightens us for Tewler himself: Wells the novelist is still capable of coming to the rescue of Wells the sociologist.

Tewler is homo sub-sapiens and, for Wells, pretty much the type of all modern humanity. Edward Albert, the specimen Wells is examining, is born in London at the beginning of the century and reared by a mother whose whole poor view of life is contained in the single maxim, "You can't be too careful"; by the time his mother and an England of prejudice and superstition are through with him, he is a small monument of ignorance, fear, and pointless self-assertion. He becomes a citizen of a world with which he is not equipped to cope, yet this world must look for survival to its Tewlers. And then comes the present war and Tewler has his moments of responsibility and courage; they are not to be made much of, says Wells, because at best the Tewlers act only from an animal instinct for self-preservation; and in war as in peace they act from the wrong motives, and always with a hatred of "ideers." But by this time Edward Albert is of course full-grown and whatever fictional interest Wells has had in him has been sacrificed to out-and-out political preachment. Down the political hatch, too, have gone all the subsidiary Tewlers, male and female, who enlivened the first half of the book and gave Wells the opportunity to exercise his pleasant ambition to be a modern Dickens.

It is the thing, nowadays, to consider Wells old-hat, and "You Can't Be Too Careful" certainly adds nothing new to what he has said in the past. Here he is still calling for a convocation of wise men to settle the ills of society and still inveighing against the sad influences of religion; he reminds us yet again that we are only apes, and we have a strong impulse to ask him to let bygones be bygones. But perhaps it is as much a comment on us as on him that we think Wells's "modernity" so old-fashioned. Something other than sophistication may lie behind our present-day lack of concern with the still-dangerous fundamentalisms—a weariness of spirit, maybe, to which Wells's seventy-six-year-old energy is a rebuke.

DIANA TRILLING

IN BRIEF

MR. PAN. By Emily Hahn. Doubleday, Doran and Company, Inc. $2.50.

Emily Hahn has collected twenty-eight of her Chinese conversation pieces into this one volume. The scene is Shanghai about 1937, and the talk is about Pan Heh-ven, his life and family. The author-listener endeavors to understand Pan Heh-ven, and the critical awareness of her own bewilderment is the real frame of the conversations. Because Miss Hahn's manners are excellent and her sympathy is genuine, the conversations acquire the charming ease and delightful obliquity of her Chinese subject, and permit her at the same time to retain her own integrity and inflect her general wonder into ironic comment. Some of the pieces are rather thinly confected, but now and then—as in Sound of Metals—there is a glimpse of profounder depths in a cold plunge beneath the conversational waters.

CLARK GIFFORD'S BODY. By Kenneth Fearing. Random House. $2.50.

It's an uneasy world that Mr. Fearing predicts after the present war; we suspect that his Clark Gifford, leader of the so-called Committee for Action, is Mr. Fearing's John Brown of our coming period of civil strife. But nothing in this novel has enough reality either to touch or to warn us—not the people, the political parties, or the society itself. Mr. Fearing names no names; we guess his scene is America and that his abortive insurrection (it's a matter of seizing the radio stations) is scheduled for around 1956. The story is told through the eyes of a dozen or more characters and skips back and forth in time over a period of thirty years before and after the "attack"; it's a confusing technique which befuddles the reader, creates a sterile objectivity, and spares Mr. Fearing the necessity of committing himself on his own political viewpoint, if any.

To go on with what Rimsky-Korsakov did to Mussorgsky's "Boris Godunov": A painter or a poet would have known that he must not lay hands on another man's work; and if he didn't know it the world would have known it for him. But I once pointed out that people who bring to literature the understanding which permits them to be fairly discriminating about a performance of "Hamlet" bring no such understanding to a performance of Beethoven, a transcription of Bach. It was this lack of understanding that caused Rimsky-Korsakov himself to do what he did, and others then to accept what he had done: a world that would have known enough to reject a painter's or a poet's transformation of another man's painting or poem and to condemn him for it, has listened to Rimsky-Korsakov's transformation of "Boris Godunov" and accepted his justification of it.

"It must be remembered," says Carl Van Vechten in his introduction to the new edition of "My Musical Life," "that Rimsky-Korsakov meant it all for the best, that he did no more for his dead friend than he was constantly doing for himself, and that he made it possible for Mussorgsky's music drama to be performed not only in Russia but also out of it. And the logic of his answer to his critics is unassailable. If, he hypothesizes, the future may decide his work on the Mussorgsky manuscripts to be an impiety, then all the future has to do is to return to the original scores, none of which he destroyed." What should be remembered, rather, is the occasional evidence that arrogance, and anger at Mussorgsky's scorn for his "Conservatory learning" and indifference to his work, also impelled Rimsky-Korsakov; that what he might do to his own music he was not privileged to do to anyone else's; that "Boris Godunov" did not require Rimsky-Korsakov's alterations in order to succeed; that with these alterations what was performed everywhere was not Mussorgsky's music drama but Rimsky-Korsakov's transformation of it; and that once this had taken root everywhere in opera houses and in people's minds it was almost impossible to dislodge it for Mussorgsky's original.

As finally revised by Mussorgsky after its rejection by the committee representing the directors of the imperial theaters, "Boris" was produced at the Mariinsky Theater in St. Petersburg in 1874 "with great success," Rimsky-Korsakov tells us. It continued to be performed once or twice each year, except 1881, until 1882, when, "the Lord knows why, productions of the opera ceased altogether, although it had enjoyed uninterrupted success. . . . There were rumors afloat that the opera had displeased the imperial family; there was gossip that its subject was unpleasant to the censors." But Rimsky-Korsakov mentions no rumor of any difficulties created for performers or audience by defects in Mussorgsky's writing. And when he speaks of his revision later it is only to say how well it sounded. That was its purpose—to make the work conform to his taste.

Nor is it true that his revisions in themselves made possible performances that would not have been given without them. The truth is rather that in a situation where he could get "Boris" performed, and where someone else would have won a performance of Mussorgsky's original, Rimsky-Korsakov secured a performance of his own revision. Once out of the repertory Mussorgsky's work would have stayed out for a number of years, just as Verdi's "Othello" and Mozart's "Marriage of Figaro" were out of the Metropolitan's repertory for twenty years or so, and for the same reasons—among them the fact that the men who directed the imperial theaters were as uncompelled by greatness in art as Gatti-Casazza and Ziegler of the Metropolitan. "Othello" and "Figaro" were restored at the Metropolitan eventually, not because they were rewritten, but because Edward Johnson, who succeeded Gatti-Casazza, had ideas about the Metropolitan's repertory that included things like "Othello" and "Figaro." "Boris," too, would have been restored eventually through some similar personal intervention; and it could have been restored through Rimsky-Korsakov's intervention in 1896. In that year he accepted the chairmanship of the Society of Musical Gatherings; and "at the same time," as he puts it in a statement which betrays the capacity for concealing truth behind the show of soberly, unflinchingly telling it, "there sprang up in the Society the idea of a stage production of 'Boris Godunov' in my revision." With a different man in his position there would have "sprung up" the idea of a production of Mussorgsky's original work. And if the intervention had been for this original, the original instead of the revision would have been produced by Mamontov's company in Moscow with Chaliapin and brought to St. Petersburg by this company in 1899; it would have come to the Mariinsky Theater with Chaliapin in 1904; it would have gone with him to Paris in 1908 in the production that carried the work to western Europe and eventually to America.

Once the revision had been established everywhere in this way instead of the original, the logic of Rimsky-Korsakov's answer might be unassailable in the world of pure thought, but in the world of action—which is to say the opera house—it was routine, inertia, lack of conscience or understanding that proved unassailable by a few critics' demonstrations of the revision's "impiety." The original score has been available since 1928; but it is still used for performances only in Russia.
